"The House is very much capable of multitasking," said the second aide. "The bigger question is what the Senate is going to be able to swallow."

The first significant item that could be bumped by Katrina is the budget reconciliation process. Under this year's budget agreement, authorizing committees have until Sept. 16 to submit proposed spending cuts under their area of jurisdiction, and the House Ways and Means and Senate Finance Committees have until Sept. 23 to finish the overall reconciliation package.

DeLay said Tuesday that he expected those deadlines would be pushed back a week. The issue was set to be officially decided at a meeting between the Majority Leader and House committee chairmen Tuesday night.

On Social Security, meanwhile, the same uncertainties that plagued the issue in the House before the recess persist after Katrina.

While the Ways and Means Committee continues work on a broad retirement security package, GOP leaders have been unable to reach agreement on their tactical approach to the issue. Specifically, senior Republicans have not formed a consensus on whether they should push forward and pass a bill this year even if the Senate would be unlikely to follow suit.

Though Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and DeLay are in favor of moving a bill regardless of the Senate's plans, GOP sources said some lawmakers are wary of subjecting everyone to a tough vote on a measure that might never reach the president's desk.

In addition to Social Security and reconciliation, the House will also likely tackle a potentially divisive immigration bill or bills and the remaining appropriations conference reports.

Despite the heavy workload, GOP leaders remain confident they can still accomplish their pre-Katrina goals.

"We can do more than one thing [at a time] in the House," DeLay said.

Experts Warn Of Katrina Identity Theft (WP/AP)

By Jennifer C. Kerr, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Social Security cards, driver's licenses, credit cards and other personal documents are literally floating around New Orleans, raising the prospect some hurricane survivors could be victimized again _ this time by identity thieves.

Betsy Broder, the attorney who oversees the Federal Trade Commission's identity theft program, said the agency has not received any complaints yet. However, it's still early after the disaster and people have been focusing on more pressing needs, such as shelter, food and medicine.

"This is probably not the most immediate concern that people have, but at a certain point they need to stop and take stock of their financial health," Broder said Tuesday.

As survivors begin to rebuild their lives, she said, they can take steps to avoid becoming the victims of identity scammers.

Broder said survivors giving personal data to insurance adjustors or Federal Emergency Management Agency representatives should be certain they're dealing with legitimate individuals and "not crooks who are trying to trick them out of their information so they can commit identity theft."

Once victims are able to get access to phones, Internet and mail, they should check their credit card and bank statements to see if there's been any unusual activity.

DOJ_NMG_0003375

They can also obtain their credit report, for free, to make certain no one has accessed their accounts. Under federal law, consumers can request a free credit report each year from any of the three major credit bureaus _ Equifax Inc., Experian Information Solutions and TransUnion.

The FBI also warned people wanting to donate money for Katrina survivors to beware of scammers who solicit online donations to lure victims into giving up credit card numbers and other sensitive information.

"There are people out there who are willing to stoop so low as to scam people who are willing to open their hearts and wallets to people in need," said FBI spokesman Paul Bresson.

He said the bureau has identified about 2,000 Web sites related to the Katrina relief effort. Most are legitimate, Bresson said, but the FBI is investigating about a dozen for possible fraud.

The Better Business Bureau advised Americans who want to give to seek out familiar charities such as the American Red Cross and The Salvation Army.

"In a disaster like this, you must give to well-known organizations that have a track record for providing this type of relief," said Art Taylor, president of the BBB's Wise Giving Alliance. Besides concerns about phony groups, he said, "it's impossible for a newly established organization to get to these victims at this time."

People who think their personal information has been misused should contact the local police, the FTC's Broder said. They can also contact the FTC on the Web at http://www.consumer.gov/idtheft or by phone at 877-IDTHEFT.

___

On the Net:

Federal Trade Commission: http://www.ftc.gov

Better Business Bureau: http://www.bbb.org

U.S. Officials Warn Against Hurricane Aid Scams (REU)

By Jon Hurdle

Reuters, September 7, 2005

PHILADELPHIA (Reuters) - U.S. government officials warned on Tuesday that scam artists will try to profit from the outpouring of donations to aid victims of Hurricane Katrina.

After last year's Asian tsunami that killed nearly 300,000 people, the FBI investigated more than 170 Web sites that were preying on donors by mimicking the sites of well-known charities, according to Patrick Meehan, U.S. district attorney for Eastern Pennsylvania.

While no evidence has emerged of criminals attempting to divert money destined for hurricane victims, Meehan said authorities were on high alert.

"If the lessons of September 11th and the Asian tsunami are learned, some cold-hearted evil scam artists will use this occasion to perpetrate fraud, lining their own pockets at the expense of hurricane victims," Meehan told a news conference.

Private donors should avoid giving personal data such as social security numbers, dates of birth and bank account information to any organization that says it is seeking disaster aid, and should make sure they are giving money to a legitimate organization, officials said.

Some scam artists seek funds by adopting names that are similar to those of well-known organizations, such as "Red Shield" instead of Red Cross. Others attempt to win the confidence of the donor by thanking them for past donations.

"Be skeptical if someone thanks you for a pledge you don't remember making," said Oriey Glenn of the U.S. Postal Inspection Service, which is on the lookout for such scams.

Officials said the public should give directly to well-known organizations such as the Red Cross, rather than to an intermediary that might claim a "processing fee" to forward the donation. They also warned against organizations seeking a fee to help locate a family member caught up in the disaster.

The Red Cross said it had so far received $409.2 million in pledges from individuals, corporations and foundations.

Meehan urged people to avoid giving to Web sites whose addresses end in ".com" since most nonprofit organizations use ."org," and beware of emails soliciting donations, since legitimate charitable groups typically avoid that approach.

DOJ_NMG_0003376

Donors seeking to confirm the legitimacy of a charity were urged to check the Web sites of the American Institute of Philanthropy and Charity Navigator, an organization that evaluates charities.

Four Held In Scam Soliciting Money (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

Fairfax County police arrested four persons on Sunday for operating a roadside scam claiming to collect money for victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Police said Joseph J. Murphy Jr., 23, of Warrenton, Va., and Isaac M. Beavers, 22, Marie S. Golden, 22, and Nicholas P. Flint, 19, all of Manassas, Va., told motorists in the 12100 block of Sunset Hills Road in Reston they represented charities helping hurricane victims and asked for cash donations.

"They were at the intersection, going up to the cars and people walking by," said Fairfax police spokesman Officer Edward Orellana. "They were able to collect some money."

Officer Orellana said the suspects did not represent any specific charities. Police would not disclose the amount of money they collected.

The suspects were charged with misdemeanor solicitation violations and released on a summons to appear in court.

Police in Arlington, Montgomery and Prince George's counties said they have not received reports yet of any relief-related scams. But area officials are still urging people to be cautious in their rush to help.

"Bottom-feeding con artists always try to find ways to exploit tragic headlines to cash in on unsuspecting investors," Maryland Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr. said.

In February, scam artists dressed as Red Cross volunteers bilked money from motorists in Prince George's County under the guise of raising funds to help survivors of the deadly tsunami in Southeast Asia.

Similar schemes were spread via the Internet following the tsunami, as fake fundraising messages claiming to be from relief organizations or tsunami survivors themselves were e-mailed around the world.

Financial scammers already are hitting investors with post-Katrina stock scams tied to speculation about spiking energy prices. One spam e-mail making the rounds on the Internet refers to "a spate of refinery glitches and an unusually active hurricane season" and says investors could more than double their money in just days on certain penny stocks, the Securities and Exchange Commission said.

Mr. Curran said people also could be targeted for oil and gas investment scams because of current oil prices.

After the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, the SEC accused Texon Energy Corp. of soliciting elderly people to invest in an oil and gas Ponzi scheme by telling them Texon would profit from rising energy prices.

A 2002 court judgment ordered Texon to repay $1.2 million after a settlement agreement with the SEC.

Mr. Curran said investors should simply hang up on aggressive cold callers and ignore unsolicited e-mail.

"Whenever something is too good to be true, it really is," he said. "Sadly, there are people who fall for it."

Government Works To Arrange Places For The Displaced (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, September 7, 2005

The federal government is pushing ahead with plans to offer makeshift housing — in cruise ships, abandoned military houses and recreational vehicles — to tens of thousands of Gulf Coast evacuees.

Housing and Urban Development (HUD) Secretary Alphonso Jackson said Tuesday that the government is cobbling together enough housing to take care of the hundreds of thousands of people who were displaced by Hurricane Katrina and have nowhere to go as they rebuild their lives.

The effort is the latest by the government, criticized for its lack of speedy response to the Katrina crisis, to address the basic needs of hurricane-battered residents.

HUD and the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) initially looked for temporary housing within a 500-mile range of the devastation along the Gulf Coast.

DOJ_NMG_0003377

The search was expanded nationwide.

FEMA spokesman James McIntyre said the agency has ordered 70,000 small recreational vehicles, each of which can sleep five. In areas without flooding, the trailers can be parked on people's property.

In Alabama, where 2,600 trailers have arrived, people can begin moving into them today.

For those who can't go home, FEMA will use city-owned parks or commercial land to build small temporary cities.

In some cases, FEMA may set up temporary stores for the residents. Starting Friday, McIntyre said, FEMA expects 500 trailers a day to begin arriving outside New Orleans.

The agencies also are offering space on cruise ships — 8,000 beds are available on three ships in Galveston, Texas, and Mobile, Ala. — and in apartment complexes, on military bases and elsewhere.

"We will work until we get every displaced citizen into some type of housing," McIntyre said.

But there have been glitches along the way. The cruise ship space was offered Monday to evacuees 65 and over. By Tuesday morning, emergency workers were finding that many evacuees in shelters didn't want to move again.

Even with the prospect of a private room and bath, people were too traumatized to move once again and be isolated on a ship, McIntyre said.

Jackson said government relief workers were bringing in ministers and local leaders to talk with evacuees and convince them that they won't be able to return to their homes or neighborhoods any time soon and that they shouldn't stay in warehouse-style shelters such as the Houston Astrodome for long.

"It is very difficult to convince many people in the shelter that they're not going to be returning home very quickly," he said. "We have to be sensitive."

Among other government efforts underway:

•The Department of Veterans Affairs will make some of the 5,000 properties it owns nationwide available, spokesman Scott Hogenson said. About 2,000 of the homes — property seized from veterans who defaulted on loans — are in nine states in or around the disaster area, he said.

•The Agriculture Department said states could offer $50 food benefit cards to evacuees before processing their applications for food stamps.

•The Social Security Administration sent workers to the Astrodome and other shelters to help cut checks and let people know how they can get their checked cashed.

Spokesman Mark Hinkle said the agency is working with the U.S. Postal Service to mail checks to shelters and other temporary homes.

"We can issue emergency funds anywhere," Hinkle said. "We can send your check wherever you want us to."

•HUD granted a 90-day moratorium on foreclosures of Federal Housing Administration-insured homes.

At the White House, President Bush said he intends to "make sure those poor folks … get the help they need."

Miscommunication has continued to plague the relief operation in and around New Orleans.

One example: a 10-bus caravan full of supplies from Washington arrived outside New Orleans over the weekend with plans to take 400 evacuees back to a shelter in the capital. By the time the buses arrived, the evacuees scheduled to be moved to Washington had been flown out, and there was no need for more supplies in New Orleans. The convoy headed for Alabama but got only one taker there. Tuesday, the 10 buses were headed back to Washington with one evacuee on board.

Residents Will Be Forced To Leave (WT/AP)

By Cain Burdeau, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- Engineers struggled yesterday with the weeks-long task of draining this flooded saucer of a city, while the mayor last night issued an order authorizing the forced removal of people refusing to leave a city that was rapidly becoming a health risk.

Mayor C. Ray Nagin told all public safety officers "to compel the evacuation of all persons ... regardless of whether such persons are on private property or do not desire to leave."

DOJ_NMG_0003378

Meanwhile, authorities braced for the horrors that would be revealed by the slow drainage of waters from Hurricane Katrina, a herculean task that was being measured by inches yesterday.

The pumping began after the Army Corps of Engineers used hundreds of sandbags and rocks over the Labor Day weekend to close a 200-foot gap in the 17th Street Canal levee that burst in the aftermath of the storm and swamped 80 percent of this below-sea-level city.

After an aerial tour yesterday, Mr. Nagin said the water was dropping ever so slightly, and he estimated that it covered only 60 percent of the city.

"Even in areas where the water was as high as the rooftops, I started to see parts of the buildings," he said, adding, "I'm starting to see rays of light."

In Washington, congressional officials said President Bush intends to seek as much as $40 billion to cover the next phase of relief and recovery as leading lawmakers and the White House pledged to investigate an initial federal response that was widely condemned as woefully inadequate.

As Congress convened after a five-week vacation, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, Texas Republican, said Katrina aid will be the "number one priority for the foreseeable future," a priority that Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said might cost the federal government more than $150 billion.

In New Orleans, the pumping got off to a woefully slow start.

Once all of the city's pumping stations are running, they can move water at a rate of 29 billion gallons a day and lower the water level a half-inch per hour -- or about a foot per day. But by late yesterday afternoon, Corps officials said only three of New Orleans' normal contingent of 148 drainage pumps were operating.

The Army Corps of Engineers said the timetable ranges from three weeks to nearly three months, depending on a string of variables, including rainfall, the still-unknown condition of the abandoned pumps and whether the system can withstand the flotsam of broken buildings, trees, and trash -- and corpses.

"We have to get the water out of the city or the nightmare will continue," said Louisiana Environmental Secretary Mike McDaniel.

Mr. Nagin also warned of what could be revealed when the waters recede.

"It's going to be awful, and it's going to wake the nation up again," said the mayor, who a day earlier increased his estimate of the death toll in his city to as much as 10,000.

With the water dropping, military and police turned their attention to evacuating the streets of the estimated 10,000 people still thought to be in the city. Some have been holed up in their homes for more than a week and refuse to leave.

"You've got to protect your property, that's the main thing," said 69-year-old John Ebanks, who waved off would-be rescuers from a porch stocked with food, mosquito spray and other supplies. "This is all I've got. I'm [too] old to start over."

New Orleans Police Superintendent Eddie Compass told CNN: "These citizens will have to be removed for their own good."

The mayor's forced removal order did not apply to people in Algiers on the west side of Orleans Parish, CNN reported.

In a plea to holdouts who might be listening to portable radios in the powerless city, Mr. Nagin warned that the fetid water could carry disease and that natural gas was leaking all over town.

"This is not a safe environment," Mr. Nagin said. "I understand the spirit that's basically: 'I don't want to abandon my city.' It's OK. Leave for a little while. Let us get you to a better place. Let us clean the city up."

To that end, the Pentagon began sending 5,000 paratroopers from the Army's storied 82nd Airborne Division to use small boats, including inflatable Zodiac craft, to launch a new search-and-rescue effort in flooded sections of the city.

But the water from Katrina has been standing for more than a week and is contaminated with E. coli bacteria, a highly placed official in the New Orleans mayor's office told CNN yesterday.

"It's absolutely unhealthy to be anywhere near the water," said the official, who declined to be identified.

Public-health officials in Washington yesterday announced the first deaths suspected to be related to tainted floodwaters, although they were not apparently related to E. coli, a bacteria that can cause fatal diarrhea in children and the elderly.

DOJ_NMG_0003379

Tom Skinner, spokesman for the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, said four persons -- one a hurricane refugee evacuated to Texas, the other three in Mississippi -- might have died of a waterborne bacterial infection circulating in Hurricane Katrina's floodwaters.

The deaths appear to have been caused by Vibrio vulnificus, a germ common in warm Gulf Coast waters that's usually spread by eating contaminated food but can also penetrate open wounds, the suspected mode of transmission in these cases.

And in Houston's Astrodome, health officials took steps yesterday against a diarrhea-causing virus made infamous by recent cruise-ship outbreaks.

Officials handed out alcohol-based hand sanitizers to stem the spread of norovirus, an easily spread cause of diarrhea and vomiting. Officials isolated some refugees with the illness, although they couldn't provide an exact count. No treatment exists except to keep sufferers hydrated.

No large outbreaks are attributed to the hurricane, but infection control within shelters housing thousands of evacuees is a top priority, said Dr. Julie Gerberding, CDC's director.

A plan to move thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees from the Astrodome to cruise ships was put on hold yesterday after many objected, some because they were terrified by the thought of living on the water.

"I can't live over water. I can't swim," said Donna Smith, 24. "I wouldn't want to see no more water. I saw enough already."

Some National Guardsmen and helicopters were diverted from their search missions yesterday to fight fires, an emerging threat in a city that is still at least a day and a half away from restoring the first running water since the storm.

A candle was blamed for starting one major blaze in the lower Garden District -- a historic neighborhood of mostly wooden homes. The flames started in an abandoned brick building and spread to a neighboring apartment house. The blazes burned for hours before Chinook helicopters with water pouches were brought in to fight the blaze.

Superintendent Compass said lawlessness in the city "has subsided tremendously," and officers warned that those caught looting in an area where the governor has declared an emergency can get up to 15 years in prison.

The signs of hope came against increasingly angry rhetoric over the federal response as too little too late. In Washington, congressional leaders planned hearings into the aftermath of the storm.

"We need to rebuild the confidence of the American people ... in our government's ability to protect them from attack, whether it comes from nature or from terrorists," said Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat.

Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard was even more blunt.

"Bureaucracy has murdered people in the greater New Orleans area," he said on CBS' "Early Show." "Take whatever idiot they have at the top of whatever agency and give me a better idiot. Give me a caring idiot. Give me a sensitive idiot. Just don't give me the same idiot."

Together In Houston: 'We're Going To Survive As A Family' (WP)

By Krissah Williams

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

HOUSTON -- At first, it was almost like a family vacation. The boys brought their Microsoft Xbox and all the games with them to the hotel in Houston. The night the hurricane hit New Orleans, Blaire Garnett and her cousins went to a nightclub and partied hard.

Then the floodwaters began to rise, and by Tuesday, Garnett's family members were riveted to the televisions in their hotel rooms, watching their home town drown. At the nearby Astrodome, they found a cousin who had escaped the Louisiana Superdome. He joined them at the hotel, 35 members of the same clan crammed into four cramped rooms.

Later, a relative got through on a cell phone to tell them that Garnett's aunt, who was mentally disabled, had died on the Interstate 10 bridge in New Orleans, awaiting help. The mood turned to disbelief.

So much is gone, but one thing is intact: the family's will to stand together. They have gone hunting for jobs as a group and have rented six apartments in the same complex to house them all. If their life in New Orleans is gone, they will remake it in Houston.

DOJ_NMG_0003380

"We came here as a family, and we're going to survive as a family," said Blaire's cousin Gregory Garnett, 20, an electrical engineering student at the University of New Orleans.

The Garnett family wasn't rich before the storm, but they were comfortable. Blaire Garnett, 21, lived with her mom, stepdad and sister in a three-bedroom house in a quiet neighborhood of rental homes in Metairie, a suburb of New Orleans on the south shore of Lake Pontchartrain. Blaire, a third-year business administration student at the University of New Orleans, says she wants to be a lawyer.

To help pay the bills, Blaire worked in a factory that made conveyor belts. She liked the job because it paid well -- $12 an hour plus health benefits -- and because her mom, Lucille Garnett Wiggins; her sister, Crystal; and two of her cousins worked there.

"We all liked our jobs. It was a good company," she said. "They send conveyor belts around the world."

Blaire's stepdad, Chad Wiggins, worked in a plant mixing chemicals for $8 an hour. It was Wiggins who alerted the family that they might want to leave town to ride out the hurricane. When he went to cash his paycheck Friday night, he saw a long line of people who warned that the hurricane might be severe. The next morning, they headed to Houston because it looked to be outside the storm path.

The family had fled hurricanes before and thought they knew the drill. Blaire said her mom told them: "Throw some jeans and T-shirts in a bag. We'll be home by Tuesday."

That sense of optimism vanished after the family spent those first few days watching the suffering of the displaced people on television.

"These are not refugees; this is our country," Blaire said emotionally as she and her cousins discussed the evacuation in disbelief last week. They said they felt the federal government's response would have come more quickly for white people. "This is happening right here in our country, " Crystal said.

It became clear the family could not quickly return to New Orleans. They heard reports that the neighborhoods where their home, companies and schools were had all been flooded. Many people helped them. One company gave all the evacuees in the hotel T-shirts, brought the children Barbie dolls and puzzles and twice prepared barbecue dinners for them. One night, a customer at Church's Chicken paid for the family's chicken when he realized they were from New Orleans. And the Texas Health and Human Services Commission provided the family with food stamps.

But the family realized that was not enough. Blaire tried to call the conveyor belt factory last week to see if workers would be paid but got busy signals. The family concluded they could no longer afford $200 a night for four hotel rooms and needed to move to apartments. But many places refused to rent to tenants without jobs.

On Thursday, Blaire and five of her cousins went to the Texas Workforce Commission, where a woman helped them type resumes and sent them to Randstad, a temporary-staffing company. Randstad found six $7-an-hour positions at Drake Pack, a packing and assembly company that needed workers for a few days to pack canvas tool belts in boxes.

For the past five days, Blaire and her cousins have worked in the hot Drake Pack warehouse, slicing open boxes, removing tool belts, putting barcodes and tags on them, repacking the belts and sealing them shut. Yesterday was their last day at the packing company, but a Randstad official said he plans to make sure the family members continue to get work.

Other family members went apartment hunting. At each complex, they repeated their story: They were a family of 35 who had fled the storm and wanted to stay together.

They asked if owners had any deals for people from New Orleans. One did -- $99 down payment per apartment, with the first month's rent free. After the first month, rent would be $540. The owner waived the standard credit checks and job requirement.

The apartment he was offering was brick with green grass and blue awnings. It looked safe. They signed leases for six apartments. The family plans to leave the Sheraton today and move into the first two apartments. The other four apartments will be ready later in the week. The children will enroll in the public schools nearby.

Blaire is relieved that the family will have an address. But she thinks wistfully of what she left behind, little things, such as her collection of Will Smith paraphernalia, including a candle with Smith's photo printed on it and T -shirts that had her photo and his, along with the words "Mr. and Mrs. Will Smith."

DOJ_NMG_0003381

She also misses her old nail salon. She figures it will be a long time before she finds one in Houston that can buff her fingernails the same way. Glancing down at her hand, she sighs, "I would spend my last to get my nails done."

Some sense of normalcy is returning. On Monday, Crystal bought a hair weave at a beauty supply store, and her 17-year-old cousin Tiffany sat with a fine-toothed black comb and parted Crystal's hair, braiding in the weave.

Later that night, Crystal got on the Internet and was finally able to contact the conveyor belt company. The company said Crystal, Blaire and Lucille would be paid through September. The checks will be mailed to their new apartment, though the company could not give a precise date when the checks would arrive.

"I understand they are going to pay us, but we are out of funds," Lucille said. She also says she's worried that the paycheck will be smaller than normal, because she generally works 20 hours of overtime. She isn't expecting more than $400 this check.

Meanwhile, other family members are looking for jobs. Blaire's uncle Matthew, who worked for UPS in New Orleans, says he hopes the company can find him a similar job in Houston. He said he's done with New Orleans, tired of running scared every time a hurricane warning sounds.

Blaire's mom, Lucille, agrees, saying she is afraid to return to New Orleans.

Not Blaire. She misses her life back there. But where she settles next may depend largely on where she can continue her education.

Her federal financial-aid loan has already been processed by the University of New Orleans. Since she hasn't been able to reach anyone at the school, she doesn't know whether she can transfer the loan to another college.

She figures she won't be able to start at a new school until next semester. "I've already missed like four weeks of school," she said. "If I go to school right now, I might be behind."

She knows she fared better than many, and she says she'll just keep on pushing. "We are used to living at a certain level, and it is hard," Blaire said. "We have to keep working. I don't want to be complaining and whining. We are blessed."

Stunned By Scope Of Destruction, Couple Wonder Whether To Begin Rebuilding Home (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, September 7, 2005

D'IBERVILLE, Miss. — Katherine and Marshall Hill had a thriving, happy family life here near Biloxi before Hurricane Katrina struck. He installs and repairs slot machines at local casinos. She is chief financial officer for a chain of medical clinics that serve low-income patients.

The Hills had a four-bedroom, 2,000-square-foot ranch house and a new air-conditioning system. They had a boat, a motorcycle, a widescreen TV and a Bose surround-sound audio system. They had a pool table in the family room that attracted neighborhood kids, and saltwater aquariums full of expensive lion fish that Marshall Hill watched to relax. Hurricane Katrina destroyed all that — except the boat.

The Hills are putting their lives together, almost from scratch, and it's hard for them to know where to begin. “I gave up last week,” says Marshall Hill, 41. “I looked around, saw everything destroyed and said, ‘I'm never coming back.’” But after a couple days, seeing many people worse off than his family, Hill regained his fighting spirit and the desire to stay in the area where he's lived since he was a child.

For now, the family is staying at his parents' house in Woolmarket, 10 miles inland from the coast. The adults sleep in a spare bedroom. Matt, 19, sleeps in the den until he returns to junior college and pursues his dream of becoming a Major League pitcher. Ashley, 11, who likes dirt bikes and cheerleading, sleeps on the living room sofa. Another daughter, Shawnessy, 16, is staying with her boyfriend's family for now but will return soon.

This arrangement may last months.

The Hills have to decide first what to do about school for the kids. The school year started in early August but may not resume for three to six months. Students may have to go to Mobile, Ala., 60 miles away, or Jackson, Miss., 180 miles away, to attend classes. The Hills could send Ashley to live with cousins in Kingsport, Tenn., and have her go to school there.

Ashley wants to stay home, and the parents are torn.

DOJ_NMG_0003382

“I don't know if it's right to send my daughter away to a school where she doesn't have friends and will stay only a few months,” says Katherine Hill, 38.

Maybe they'll home-school her for a while, they think. Maybe they'll hold her back a year. “Sometimes life teaches you more than school,” Marshall Hill says.

The Hills met with their insurance company after the storm. They learned that half their house is covered by insurance and half is not. Damage to the back of their house is covered by homeowner's insurance because it was caused by wind that ripped a hole in the roof. The front of the house is not covered because it was damaged by rising water.

The Hills did not have flood insurance, because at 34 feet above sea level they were not in a flood plain. Still, the house took on 18 inches of water during the storm, forcing the nine people and four dogs in the house — friends and family — onto pool tables and beds to stay above water. Five cars owned by family and friends were destroyed at their house in the flood. Insurance will cover that.

Right now, the Hills are using a truck borrowed from parents. Katherine Hill's 2000 Buick LeSabre will have to be replaced. After the storm, you could pull out the dipstick and measure the water in the engine.

Since insurance will cover only part of their loss, the Hills must decide how to spend the money they do get.

“We lived like many Americans — too many car loans, too much credit-card debt. We had a great life, paycheck to paycheck,” Marshall Hill says. Insurance might help pay off the debts, but it won't leave much to rebuild.

Family members have offered to come immediately with tools to rebuild the house, which still stands although everything is ruined. The Hills have asked them to stay put until they know what they will do next. Marshall Hill expects to do much of the work himself. “I want the house to be fixed up totally before we buy new anything,” he says. “I don't want to just put in a carpet and make do.”

The best news: The Hills don't expect to lose their jobs. The slot machine company he works for says it will find jobs for people hurt by the hurricane. But he wonders if that means he may have to work temporarily in Las Vegas or elsewhere as a repairman.

Katherine Hill prepared for Hurricane Katrina by going into work the Saturday before the storm and running the payroll early for her company's 200 workers. The money was scheduled to be credited to employee accounts this past Friday. It didn't happen.

After solving the payroll problem, she'll have to reconstruct the company's records. Her computers were destroyed, and her backup records were in a safe that flooded. She hopes the company's information systems manager has a copy, but she hasn't been able to reach him because he lives in a hard-hit area closer to New Orleans.

“I have to come up with a new record-keeping system from scratch,” she says. “I'm worried less about the billing records than about getting patient records.”

For all the hard work ahead of them, the Hills consider themselves lucky. They have family in the area, unlike many casino workers. Their house is uninhabitable but still standing. And everyone is alive.

Over the weekend, power came back on at his mother's house where they are staying. They took a warm shower. For breakfast, they had eggs. The small pleasures of life made them laugh with delight.

Barbara Bush Calls Evacuees Better Off (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6 - As President Bush battled criticism over the response to Hurricane Katrina, his mother declared it a success for evacuees who "were underprivileged anyway," saying on Monday that many of the poor people she had seen while touring a Houston relocation site were faring better than before the storm hit.

"What I'm hearing, which is sort of scary, is they all want to stay in Texas," Barbara Bush said in an interview on Monday with the radio program "Marketplace." "Everyone is so overwhelmed by the hospitality."

"And so many of the people in the arena here, you know, were underprivileged anyway," she said, "so this is working very well for them."

DOJ_NMG_0003383

Mrs. Bush toured the Astrodome complex with her husband, former President George Bush, as part of an administration campaign throughout the Gulf Coast region to counter criticism of the response to the storm. Former President Bush and former President Bill Clinton are helping raise money for the rebuilding effort.

White House officials did not respond on Tuesday to calls for comment on Mrs. Bush's remarks.

Amid One City's Welcome, A Tinge Of Backlash (NYT)

By Peter Applebome

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 6 - Last week came the rumors - of riots at Wal-Marts, of break-ins at homes, of drug gangs from New Orleans roaming the streets of its more sedate neighbor 75 miles up Interstate 10.

Today came the reality - of a dozen or more relatives crowded under one roof, of hours stuck in traffic trying to get to school or work, of frustration and fear about what kind of city Baton Rouge will be with at least 100,000 evacuees and rescue workers added to the 227,000 residents it had before the storm hit.

Make no mistake. The overwhelming response of people in Baton Rouge to Hurricane Katrina has been one of compassion and sacrifice with every church in town, it seems, housing or feeding evacuees.

But there have also been runs on gun stores, mounting frustration over gridlocked roads and an undercurrent of fear about crime and the effect of the evacuees.

After the chaos of the storm, which did some damage here, and a long weekend, Tuesday was the first day most residents returned to work and school. Before the evacuation, blacks made up about half the population of Baton Rouge and almost 70 percent of New Orleans, and in conversations in which race is often explicit or just below the surface, voices on the street, in shops, and especially in the anonymous hothouse of talk radio were raising a new question: just how compassionate can this community, almost certainly home to more evacuees than any other, afford to be?

"You can't take the city out of the yat, and you can't take the yat out of the city," said Frank Searle, a longtime Baton Rouge resident, using a slang term for New Orleanians derived from the local greeting, "Where y'at?"

"These people will not assimilate here," Mr. Searle said. "They put up with the crime in New Orleans, and now it's staring them in the face, but up here that's not going to be tolerated. People are going to handle it individually if they have to. This is the South. We will take care of it."

For a week Baton Rouge, the state capital, home of Louisiana State University and a place that sees itself as a less raucous cousin to what had been the kingdom of sin and merriment to its south, has been trying to come to terms with its sudden status as the state's most populous city.

"It's a new Baton Rouge we're living in, isn't it?" said Jeanine Smallwood of suburban Prairieville, in the middle of a 90-minute drive to work that should have taken 20.

Like many people in and near Baton Rouge, Mrs. Smallwood, her 1,700-square-foot house now sheltering 14 people, is trying to balance the need for compassion with the vertigo of a changed city. And so while she wishes all the evacuees well, she said she feared an influx of people from the housing projects of New Orleans, places, she has heard, where people walk around in T-shirts that read, "Kill the cops."

"Or so the story has it," she said. "Those aren't neighborhoods I go to."

She was so rattled, she said, she told her daughter she might have to move. On reflection, she said, there is little chance of that. Instead, she is hoping for the best.

"People are, what's the word? Not frustrated, not scared, it's more like their lives are on hold, everything's changed and we're trying to figure out what the new normal is going to be," Mrs. Smallwood said.

Many relief workers and volunteers say the worries over crime reflect more wholesale stereotyping of people fleeing a catastrophe than anything based in fact, but safety is a major issue. At the height of the post-storm panic last week, people waited in line for three and a half hours at Jim's Firearms, a giant gun and sporting goods store. Many were people from New Orleans with their own safety issues. But many were local residents jumpy about the newcomers from New Orleans and stocking up on Glock and Smith & Wesson handguns.

DOJ_NMG_0003384

Jim Siegmund, a salesman at Jim's recently returned from military service in Iraq, said he did not think there was anything to worry about. Still, holding a cellphone in his hand and comparing it to a 9-millimeter handgun he said: "When push comes to shove, this won't protect you, but a Glock 9 will."

Joel Phillips, a 38-year-old contractor, said he had never owned a gun in his life, but after watching an angry argument at a gas station, he stood in line for three hours at Jim's to buy a 9-millimeter Ruger handgun and then went with a friend to a firing range over the weekend to learn how to use it.

"I have two daughters, I sometimes have to work in bad neighborhoods," Mr. Phillips said. "I probably don't need it, but I'll feel better knowing that I have some protection."

Many evacuees are staying with family or friends, their campers, S.U.V.'s and pickups parked on front lawns or circular driveways.

Most people at the broad array of shelters were dazed but appreciative of the help from local volunteers like the Louisiana State University students, upbeat and attentive, tending to sick and exhausted evacuees at the triage center on campus.

But others, particularly those at the main Red Cross shelter at the River Center convention center downtown, were seething with frustration, not just over the disaster they were fleeing, but from the sense that they were being treated not so much like guests as people being warehoused until they could be shipped elsewhere.

Patricia Perry, a postal employee from New Orleans, said anyone with a wristband from the River Center shelter was being stereotyped outside it as one of "those people" - looters, criminals, outcasts.

"It's like a stigma," she said. "All they really want to do is get us out of town. Well, I'm from Louisiana. I work hard. I pay my taxes. Surely, this state can find a place for us to live."

Still, many residents, with the sense of intimacy that remains so much a part of Southern life, took their role as hosts seriously, as if it would be bad manners, the ultimate sin in the South, to do otherwise.

So when Pam Robertson, manager of a convenience store, asked a customer how he was doing, it was not dutiful chatter but a real question that begged for a real answer.

When it came, she took the man's hand in hers over the counter and talked about her friend Hunter, evacuated from Loyola University, about her upbringing in the town of Henderson in the heart of Cajun country, about the grid of local streets here.

She greeted one and all with the same missionary zeal, as if the right words could somehow undo the disaster of the past week.

And when asked how she was doing, or even when they didn't, she replied: "I'm tired, but I'm hanging in. It's good. It's all good. God is good. We'll get through it."

Hundreds Of Storm Survivors Arrive In Capital (WP)

By Theola S. Labbe And Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

He was the first person to step inside the D.C. Armory yesterday, the tall elderly man who carried all his belongings in a plastic grocery bag and walked with a slight limp. Behind him was a woman in a plaid dress who pushed a walker, a girl with a pink barrette in her hair and a small boy in a lime-green T-shirt who was scooped up into a hug by a D.C. official.

One by one, the New Orleans survivors of Hurricane Katrina arrived in Washington yesterday, welcomed with smiles and applause from emergency workers and District leaders. Some came on stretchers or makeshift wheelchairs. Others could move on their own but looked tired and dazed.

Along with the clothes on their backs and the scraps of their lives stuffed into trash bags, the evacuees brought tales of fear and survival -- and were grateful to finally be able to call someplace home.

"I feel very warm," said Jameila Anderson, 19, until last week a sophomore at Dillard University in New Orleans, who arrived at the shelter with her boyfriend and his mother. "I feel relieved. I feel like everything is going to be all right."

A total of 295 evacuees were flown from New Orleans to Dulles International Airport on two commercial aircraft, and more may arrive here over the next several days. They were taken to the armory on Metrobuses and fed a hearty lunch of meatballs, egg noodles and mixed vegetables with a garden salad.

DOJ_NMG_0003385

Workers with the American Red Cross, which is managing the shelter, planned to issue identification cards and assess whether evacuees needed such services as medical treatment, mental health counseling, job referrals or help with school enrollment. They will be able to stay at the armory 30 days, perhaps longer.

"This is Step 1. They're here," said Linda Cropp, chairman of the D.C. Council, who stood with Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) and other city officials shortly before the evacuees arrived. "We now must get them involved in our community."

Although District officials initially had planned to receive a group of hurricane survivors being housed in Arkansas, the Federal Emergency Management Agency on Monday night instead arranged the airlift from the New Orleans airport.

City Administrator Robert C. Bobb, who met the first plane at Dulles, said that although many people were relieved to reach a well-equipped shelter, others were astonished and dismayed to find themselves in the nation's capital, "thousands of miles from home."

"People were real irritated. 'Why am I in Washington when I wanted to go to Texas?' I heard that on two or three occasions," Bobb said. "No one told them where they were going until they got on the plane."

Three people arrived at the armory only to demand a ride back to the airport so they could travel at their own expense to Texas, Bobb said. Another man asked to go to Alabama.

Other jurisdictions in the region also were making plans to put up evacuees in shelters if needed.

"We will treat them like we treat our sisters and brothers," said Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson (D), with Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) by his side, at a news conference where government and religious leaders pledged help.

Virginia Gov. Mark R. Warner (D) said the state has identified temporary living facilities for at least 3,000 evacuees. He said that as many as 1,000 will be housed at Fort Pickett, an Army National Guard facility in central Virginia, and others in 4-H centers run by the state or in private homes identified by churches and synagogues.

During health screenings of the evacuees who arrived in the District, some were suffering from diarrhea and dehydration, but most were in good physical condition, said D.C. Department of Health Director Gregg A. Pane. Sixteen people were taken to a hospital for immediate treatment, he said.

Outside the Stadium-Armory Metro station, a group of people stood in front of the iron fence and waited as evacuees periodically came to talk with them.

"We slept on the roof for three days. We were lucky we had a two-story house," said Cleo Breland, 48, who used to help shampoo hair in New Orleans. "Man, I don't have no ID on me, no nothing."

A rescue boat left him on a highway, he slept on a funeral home floor and then was told to go to the New Orleans convention center.

Now, he said, everybody wanted to help, wanted to treat the evacuees "like movie stars."

"It was weird," he said.

John Vaughn, 42, a New Orleans restaurant worker who was rescued two days ago, flew to Washington with his sister and her three teenage sons. He said he has no money and needs to find work quickly.

Gary Graham, 49, a hospital pharmacist, said he stayed in New Orleans during the hurricane because he was classified as an essential worker. When his house became uninhabitable, he moved into his truck and ate canned food until he was rescued Thursday.

He ended up in the vast sea of humanity at the New Orleans airport and said he was unaware he was coming to Washington until he asked a flight attendant.

Many of the area residents outside the armory hoped to help.

Geraldine Pritchett, president of Labor of Love Homeless Institute in Fairfax County, was offering donations from Costco and Giant in Northern Virginia. "We've got diapers, baby food, children's books and toys," she said, "and we hope to help get people into homes."

Donna Coates, a D.C. resident, wanted to contribute clothing. Elsa Malloy, of Maryland, wanted to help organize apartments. And Meshelle Carter, of Northeast Washington, wanted all 295 evacuees to come to a welcome picnic" at her house Saturday.

Carter, a security officer, said she knew what it meant not to have. "My heart just went out" to the evacuees, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0003386

Offers Of Aid Immediate, But U.S. Approval Delayed For Days (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

Offers of foreign aid worth tens of millions of dollars -- including a Swedish water purification system, a German cellular telephone network and two Canadian rescue ships -- have been delayed for days awaiting review by backlogged federal agencies, according to European diplomats and information collected by the State Department.

Since Hurricane Katrina, more than 90 countries and international organizations offered to assist in recovery efforts for the flood-stricken region, but nearly all endeavors remained mired yesterday in bureaucratic entanglements, in most cases, at the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

In Germany, a massive telecommunication system and two technicians await the green light to fly to Louisiana, after its donors spent four days searching for someone willing to accept the gift.

"FEMA? That was a lost case," said Mirit Hemy, an executive with the Netherlands-based New Skies Satellite, who made the phone calls. "We got zero help, and we lost one week trying to get hold of them."

In Sweden, a transport plane loaded with a water purification system and a cellular network has been ready to take off for four days, while Swedish officials wait for flight clearance. Nearly a week after they were offered, four Canadian rescue vessels and two helicopters have been accepted but probably won't arrive from Halifax, Nova Scotia, until Saturday. The Canadians' offer of search and rescue divers has so far gone begging.

Matching offers of aid -- from Panamanian bananas to British engineers -- with needs in the devastated Gulf region is a laborious process, in a disaster whose scope is unheard of in recent U.S. history, especially for a country that is more accustomed to giving than receiving aid.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said yesterday that to his knowledge, all offers of foreign aid have been accepted but must be vetted by emergency relief specialists. "I think the experts will take a look at exactly what is needed now," he said.

FEMA spokeswoman Natalie Rule said the foreign complaints echo those from governors and officials "across the nation."

"There has been that common thought that because [offers of aid] are not tapped immediately, they're not prudently used," Rule said. "We are pulling everything into a centralized database. We are trying not to suck everything in all at once, whether we need it or not."

European diplomats said publicly that they understand the difficulty of coordinating such a massive recovery effort. In an open letter released yesterday, though, Ambassador John Bruton, head of the Delegation of the European Commission to the United States, wrote:

"Perhaps one of those lessons will be that rugged individualism is not always enough in such a crisis, particularly if an individual does not have the material and psychological means to escape the fury of a hurricane in time."

Soon after the flooding, the government of Sweden offered a C-130 Hercules transport plane, loaded with water purification equipment, and a cellular network donated by Ericsson.

"As far as I know, it's still on the ground," said Claes Thorson, press counselor at the Swedish Embassy in Washington. He said that along with 20 other European Union nations that have pledged money and goods, "We are ready to send our things. We know they are needed, but what seems to be a problem is getting all these offers into the country."

So far, Thorson said, the State Department has denied Sweden's request for flight clearance. "We don't know exactly why, but we have a suspicion that the system is clogged on the receiving end," he said. "But we keep a request alive all the time, so we are not forgotten."

German telecommunications company KB Impuls contacted another company, Unisat, based in Rhode Island, with the idea of contributing an integrated satellite and cellular telephone system.

In a region with its communications systems in tatters, the $3 million system could handle 5,000 calls at once, routing them, if necessary, through Germany.

DOJ_NMG_0003387

KB Impuls would contribute the equipment and two engineers, supplied with their own food, water and generator fuel, to set it up. Unisat contacted another firm, New Skies Satellite, based in the Netherlands with offices in Washington, which agreed to contribute satellite capacity.

New Skies even arranged transport, securing a C-130 cargo plane from the Israeli Air Force, to pick up the equipment and technicians from Germany and bring them to Louisiana. "With one call, I got an airplane," Hemy said. And then, over four days, she and the owner of Unisat, Uri Bar-Zemer, called contacts at FEMA, the American Red Cross, the State Department, even members of Congress, trying to find someone to accept the gift.

Finally the State Department told them that to receive flight clearance, the gift must have a specific recipient. "I was ringing, ringing, ringing -- and nothing," Hemy said. Finally, yesterday, she got a call from the U.S. Air Force's Joint Task Force Katrina Communication Operations division, thanking the companies for the gift and inquiring about the system's technical specifications.

As of late yesterday, the companies were waiting for a written order from the Northern Command to begin the mission. "I don't have a problem confirming that," Bar-Zemer said of the story. But he expressed concerns that disclosing the difficulties in donating could jeopardize the company's chances of actually delivering the aid.

U.S. Declines Some Foreign Offers Of Hurricane Aid (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

The United States has accepted help from about 40 countries for the victims of Hurricane Katrina -- fewer than half of those that offered -- including high-speed water pumps, food, cruise ships and more than $400 million in cash, U.S. officials said yesterday.

Although no offer has been rejected officially, proposals from Cuba and other countries to send doctors or nurses have not been accepted because there is enough U.S. medical personnel to deal with the crisis for now, the State Department said.

"There's been a robust response from the American medical community in terms of medical supplies, in terms of medical professionals, doctors, nurses, as well as public health officials," spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters.

A senior State Department official added: "We have the people we need right now, and we have more in the pipeline."

A Belgian offer to send medical teams to assist the American Red Cross was accepted, but they include only logistical personnel, U.S. officials said.

The State Department sent a cable to U.S. embassies around the world over the weekend with what one diplomat in Europe described as a "generic list" of needs that the Federal Emergency Management Agency had identified as top priorities.

The list did not include medical professionals, diplomats in Washington and overseas said.

"The cable said that interested governments should let us know what from the list they can provide," the U.S. diplomat in Europe said.

Once those governments respond, Washington will decide what to take from each of them, he said.

He also noted that some foreign officials are asking why it took Washington so long to compile the list, but the Bush administration said the enormity of the crisis required time and care for a comprehensive list to be produced.

"Over 90 countries and organizations around the world have made offers of assistance to the United States and the American people in our time of need," Mr. McCormack said.

"As needs are identified, certainly if they can be filled from the international offers of assistance, that is something that we have and will go back to foreign countries to try to meet," he said.

He noted that Germany and the Netherlands are sending high-speed pumps, and that Greek cruise ships are on their way to the Gulf of Mexico region.

"There is a process of matching needs with the expertise and the donations that have been made. This is going to be an ongoing process over a period of time," Mr. McCormack said.

The largest cash contributions so far, $100 million each, have come from three Persian Gulf countries -- Qatar, the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait. The latter is also shipping $400 million worth of oil.

DOJ_NMG_0003388

The United States has accepted help even from poor countries like Afghanistan that are recipients of substantial amounts of U.S. aid.

"What we do is, we accept these offers in the spirit in which they are given," Mr. McCormack said.

A Foreign Aid Twist: U.S. Gets, Others Give (USAT)

USA Today, September 7, 2005

World reaction to Hurricane Katrina has been like viewing the USA through a Hall of Mirrors. To believe some commentary in countries from Europe to Asia to the Middle East, the world's wealthy superpower has, in Katrina's wake, been exposed as a vulnerable supermonster.

In this view from abroad, the USA is a place that is callous toward its poor and black. A Pakistani newspaper wrote, for example, of how the U.S. government "for three days sat smugly apathetic to the people's plight."

It's a place where the early looting reflects a culture of violence and selfishness: "The darker side of the American dream" was how a columnist for London's Daily Mail put it.

And it's a place where a focus on the Iraq war has starved it of resources to deal with natural disasters — a favorite topic in the Arab media.

The comments, which contain both distortions and grains of truth, are a jolting reminder that the U.S. image in the world has been in a tailspin since the start of the Iraq war — fueled by anger and frustration over the go-it-alone U.S. approach that has too often disregarded others' opinions or interests.

And yet Hurricane Katrina also presents a fleeting moment of opportunity to start repairing that image. Generous international offers of aid have accompanied the criticism. The United Nations is offering its emergency response system, including disaster relief teams, equipment and expertise. As many as 90 nations have deluged the State Department with offers.

A few come tinged with political agendas or are cynical public relations ploys: Iran, for example, wants to send oil — just so long as sanctions are first lifted to allow it. Cuba wants to send doctors.

But most of the offers spring from a reflexive generosity, including much reciprocity for past U.S. help. One of the largest donation pledges, of half a billion dollars, is from Kuwait — liberated from Iraqi occupation by U.S.-led troops 14 years ago. Even small Sri Lanka, badly hit by last year's tsunami and a recipient of U.S. aid, has promised a $25,000 donation to the American Red Cross.

The manner in which the United States accepts or rejects the offers of help has the potential to influence the soured global mood. International relations are, when all's said and done, much like everyday human relationships. Psychology plays a large role. Right now, it's as if the whole neighborhood is reaching out in a time of trouble, despite having felt slighted by what many see as the rich bully on the block.

For months, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has made changing the international mood a priority. That has been hard, particularly as other nations have been reluctant to help in Iraq. Graciously accepting most offers can telegraph a newfound humility and appreciation of the value of international cooperation.

Not that doing so is easy.

Receiving help can be embarrassing and goes against the American character of self sufficiency. Americans see themselves as aid donors, not recipients, and appropriately so given the nation's wealth. No one should take from others in greater need. So far, U.S. officials seem to be playing it just about right.

Rice has profusely thanked other countries for their compassion. And not only is the United States accepting much of the international generosity, it is making specific requests. Germany, for example, can supply forklifts, veterinary supplies and ready-to-eat meals. That is in part just good common sense. For all its resources, the United States can't match the U.N. or others in some aspects of disaster relief. The U.N. has long experience dealing with traumatized children and is sending pre-made playgrounds, much as it did to tsunami victims.

Accepting Hurricane Katrina aid with grace can't magically make the United States popular, particularly when it comes to sworn U.S. enemies. Some in the Muslim world, for example, are portraying Katrina as God's wrath, as are some thoughtless Christian leaders here.

DOJ_NMG_0003389

But it can be a start on rebuilding alliances.

Four years ago this weekend, after the Sept. 11 attacks on New York and Washington, the world had a very different reaction to the U.S. distress. Besides offers of help, the world was united with Americans. As a headline in France's Le Monde newspaper trumpeted: "We Are All Americans."

Recalling that more pure generosity — of spirit and practical help — is heartening. It's a reminder that, not so long ago, the world saw the United States much as it likes to think of itself: as a generous-spirited, socially-responsible beacon of democracy. Regaining that cleareyed international admiration is an ideal. The international response to Hurricane Katrina provides an opening.

Bush: Aministration Looking To Help Schools Absorb Kids Displaced By Katrina (AP)

AP, September 7, 2005

President Bush says the administration is looking at ways to help schools absorb students displaced by Hurricane Katrina.During a meeting with Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, the president said local school districts are extending "extaordinary efforts" right now to help kids learn.Bush said he's sending his wife Laura to DeSoto County, Mississippi, tomorrow to talk to school officials about their problems.At the same time, Bush promised that Washington is ready to show flexibility when it comes to college loans. He says Katrina has forced many college students to change plans, and the Education Department will show what he calls "loan forebearance."

Across Nation, Storm Victims Crowd Schools (NYT)

By Sam Dillon

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

School districts from Maine to Washington State were enrolling thousands of students from New Orleans and other devastated Gulf Coast districts yesterday in what experts said could become the largest student resettlement in the nation's history.

Schools welcoming the displaced students must not only provide classrooms, teachers and textbooks, but under the terms of President Bush's education law must also almost immediately begin to raise their scholastic achievement unless some provisions of that law are waived.

Historians said that those twin challenges surpassed anything that public education had experienced since its creation after the Civil War, including disasters that devastated whole school districts, like the San Francisco earthquake and the Chicago fire.

"In terms of school systems absorbing kids whose lives and homes have been shattered, what we're going to watch over the next weeks is unprecedented in American education," said Jeffrey Mirel, a professor of history and education at the University of Michigan.

The vast resettlement was already under way last week, with schools in Baton Rouge, La., Houston and other cities near the Gulf Coast enrolling some students. Yesterday, officials in cities including San Antonio; Phoenix; Olympia, Wash.; Freeport, Me.; Memphis; Washington; Las Vegas; Salt Lake City; Chicago; Detroit; and Philadelphia reported enrolling students or preparing for their arrival.

The total number of displaced students is not yet known, but it appears to be well above 200,000. In Louisiana, 135,000 public school students and 52,000 private school students have been displaced from Orleans, Jefferson, St. Bernard and Plaquemines Parishes.

President Bush, speaking with reporters at the White House yesterday, thanked the nation's educators "for reaching out and doing their duty," and he said that Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings was working on a plan to help states absorb the educational costs but gave no hint of what kind of assistance might be provided. The Department of Education set up a Web site to coordinate private donations to schools enrolling displaced students.

"They said we could brace for about 500 kids," said Sue Steele, coordinator of homeless student programs for the public schools in Wichita, where buses carrying 1,800 storm victims were expected to arrive yesterday, part of some 7,000 headed for Kansas.

DOJ_NMG_0003390

Many students were concentrated in districts along an arc from the Florida Panhandle west through Georgia, Tennessee, Arkansas and Texas.

The Santa Rosa County School District in the Florida Panhandle has enrolled 137 students, said Carol Calfee, a district official.

"And we still have folks coming in," she said. "They're walking through the door and some of them just have nothing, so it's really hard." The local United Way has said it will try to buy school supplies for every displaced student, she said.

The crisis poses new challenges for Ms. Spellings, including financial. The Department of Education's budget this year for homeless student programs is about $61 million, which she said was insufficient.

Ms. Spellings, who has spent her first months in office fighting a backlash by local educators and state lawmakers against the federal law known as No Child Left Behind, is also hearing calls from advocacy groups that she take emergency measures that could be controversial.

The National Education Association, the nation's largest teachers union, asked her on Friday to waive the accountability provisions of the law for schools in the hurricane's path as well as in Texas and other states receiving large numbers of students, a move Ms. Spellings said she was reluctant to take.

Private companies that operate online courses or charter schools are urging her to use emergency powers to authorize them to enroll displaced students at the Houston Astrodome and other shelters across the nation.

Ms. Spellings has invited 40 education groups, including the P.T.A. and teachers unions, to meet at the Department of Education today to discuss disaster recovery efforts. Reg Weaver, president of the N.E.A., which has challenged No Child Left Behind in federal court, said he immediately accepted the invitation.

But in a separate letter, he also asked Ms. Spellings to use her powers to waive provisions of the law, which requires school districts to raise student scores on standardized tests each year by a percentage set by each state, a goal known as making adequate yearly progress.

"Until these children, their teachers, districts and families gain their footing under these extremely difficult circumstances, I encourage you to implement the provisions in N.C.L.B. that deal with the impact of natural disasters on testing and adequate yearly progress," Mr. Weaver's letter said.

Ms. Spellings is consulting with state school superintendents as she considers whether to waive the law's accountability provisions in some cases, said her spokeswoman, Susan Aspey. One consideration is how many displaced students that individual schools or districts enroll; those with higher concentrations may be more likely to receive waivers, Ms. Aspey said.

"There is no one-size-fits-all approach," she said.

Even before the storm, hundreds of schools that had failed to meet the federal law's proficiency requirements for several years, most of which educate the urban poor or non-English speaking immigrants, were facing sanctions that include school closings and the firing of staff. Thousands of others were expected to be placed on academic probation or labeled as low-performing.

Theodore R. Sizer, a visiting professor of history at Harvard, said that unless the law's accountability provisions were waived during the emergency, they would add tensions to the resettlement crisis.

"Imagine you're the principal of a big high school in city X, and your scores are above the state minimums, so you're doing fine with the law, and suddenly you have 300 displaced kids," Mr. Sizer said. "That not only brings crowding but also means that on the next exams your scores could plummet and the federal law will say you run a terrible school."

The Bush administration must also make decisions about another hotly debated issue in public education: charter schools. The National Council of Education Providers, which represents the nation's largest commercial school management companies, has asked the Department of Education to authorize it to enroll students housed at emergency shelters in Internet-based courses offered by its companies.

The National Council's Web site yesterday highlighted its request to the department to establish a "national virtual charter school" that would "serve evacuees wherever they are."

"Once students have access to computers and connectivity - borrowed, donated or shared - companies are standing by to waive state restrictions and log these students on," the Web site said. The restrictions in question include enrollment caps in state laws that apply to charter schools. The National Council wants the federal government to waive those laws during the emergency.

DOJ_NMG_0003391

Jeanne Allen, a paid consultant to the National Council who is also president of the Center for Education Reform, a nonprofit organization, said she delivered a draft "Emergency Public Charter School Act" to members of Congress yesterday.

Hard Lessons For Kids Starting Class Far From Home (AP)

By TODD LEWAN

AP, September 7, 2005

HOUSTON — On their first day in class after the Labor Day weekend, second-graders of Briarmeadow Charter School were excitedly playing "Subtraction Wars" with toy blocks in their math class.

Not Jameall Gatlin. The 8-year-old boy had a donated new blue polo shirt, new khaki shorts, new Nike sneakers. But he was quiet and shy, understandably so: He's a long way from his home in devastated New Orleans.

"It's very different," he mumbled, shoving his hands in his pockets, when asked what he thought of his new school.

Here, as in towns and cities around the country that have taken in Hurricane Katrina's dispossessed, refugee students are getting a tough crash course in adjustment.

Katrina forced an unprecedented displacement of students from the Gulf Coast, just as schools across America are starting the academic year. From Maine to California, districts have begun hastily enrolling these students, even embracing them — with a smile, a hug or a welcome sign drawn in art class.

The influx is putting a logistical and financial strain on schools at a time when many are grappling with budget and program cuts, soaring gas prices, and the pressure of satisfying the No Child Left Behind Act, which requires yearly progress in math and reading among all students.

Classroom space, textbooks, transportation and teachers for new students — how much it will cost? No one can say. Still, says Paul Houston, executive director of the American Association of School Administrators, "I think districts will keep taking the students and figure it all out later."

Even before Katrina, Texas, which has absorbed nearly a quarter-million refugees, was already having problems funding its growing, public school system. In 2003, about 300 school districts sued the state, claiming that not enough money was going to schools.

This year, in response to the lawsuit, Gov. Rich Perry convened three emergency sessions of the Texas Legislature to resolve the money problem. Still, lawmakers failed to come up with a new plan.

Regardless of such challenges, schools are welcoming displaced kids.

By yesterday afternoon, the Houston Independent School District had taken in 889 students, a number expected to grow by 5,000 or more in the coming days, said spokesman Terry Abbott. The district is hiring retired teachers and certified instructors from Louisiana, and getting breaks on textbooks from publishers, he said.

Teachers and administrators are also trying to make "Katrina kids" and their parents feel at home.

"The first thing we do is give them a hug and say, 'How can we help you,'" says Lynn Barnes, the principal at Briarmeadow, which had enrolled at least 22 refugee students. When Briarmeadow runs out of room, "we will contact other schools."

River Oaks Elementary has been preparing since last week for the flood of Katrina evacuees. One art class got a special assignment: to make a poster that read, "Welcome, Louisiana children."

Some New Orleans students were resettling in Louisiana itself. Schools sent employees to shelters and churches in Baton Rouge to give beleaguered parents tips on where to find school supplies, clothes, food and donated, day-to-day spending money.

The Bernard Terrace Elementary School signed up two dozen refugee students for classes on Tuesday, and Principal Deborah Daniels said the school, now with 480 students, would "take however many they want me to."

The uprooted students miss their homes, their friends — their stuff. "They say they want to go back and get this and that," said Trellis Royal, as she waited to register her 10- and 14-year-old daughters at a Baton Rouge school.

Katrina Forces Children To Start School Again In Georgia (AP)

By Greg Bluestein

DOJ_NMG_0003392

AP, September 7, 2005

ATLANTA - Fifth-grader Layanda Grinstead looked like she was having fun playing badminton with her sister Leslea in the halls of a Red Cross shelter, but secretly, she said, she's eager to hit the books.

"I'm not nervous at all. I'm ready to get back," she said.

Her mom, Latanya, is too. "I'm so ready for them to go to school," she said. "They have the attitude that it's a new start even though it's hard losing everything."

Hundreds of students who fled from Hurricane Katrina will take their seats at schools across the state this week as state officials struggle to direct a smooth transition.

Some 350 evacuees have already enrolled in Georgia public schools - a number that's expected to increase significantly this week. And dozens more are expected to enroll in the state's lottery-funded pre-kindergarten program, which announced today it would open its doors to storm victims.

Although education officials are uncertain how the influx will strain schools throughout the state, the priority now is to "put them in a classroom and we'll work out the details later," said spokesman Dana Tofig.

The state board of education will also likely relax rules that limit class sizes. "The systems don't want to worry that they're being penalized to open their doors," Tofig said.

At the state's largest shelter, Georgia Tech's Alexander Memorial Coliseum, an Atlanta Public Schools liaison was helping direct students to a van early Tuesday that dropped them off at nearby schools.

Some children, like second-grader Bobby Whittey, aren't quite ready to get back to the daily grind. While at the shelter, Whittey said he's gotten used to "playing and sleeping" since his family escaped New Orleans.

His grandmother, Velma Whittey, had other ideas.

"He's got to go back to school," she said. "He's got so much energy sometimes I got to pray to the Lord so I can get some peace to deal with this little boy."

Student Displaced By Hurricane Instant 'Rock Star' At Local School (MINNST)

By Dan Wascoe

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 7, 2005

Two weeks ago, before Katrina turned New Orleans into a deadly, fetid lake, Johnathan Smith, 18, began his senior year in nearby Metairie, La.

On Tuesday, uprooted by the hurricane from his mother, brother, sister, school and city, he began classes again, this time at Minneapolis' Southwest High. He said he is grateful for the chance to make a fast transition by moving in with his father, Crosby Smith. But he's also itching for the chance to enlist in the National Guard.

As he made new friends, grabbed a quick lunch at a nearby Dairy Queen and stood still for media attention, he was quick to note differences between his old school and his new one.

Archbishop Rummel in Metairie is a private, Catholic, all-boys, nearly all-white school of about 1,330 students in grades 8 to 12. All of them wear blue, short-sleeved, button-down shirts and khaki-colored pants.

Southwest has a coed, racially diverse enrollment of more than 1,600 in grades 9 to 12 and tolerates a greater range of apparel. Smith sported a small earring Tuesday that he said would not have been allowed at Rummel. He would have worn a cross instead.

In these ways, he acknowledged, his new start is almost a liberation -- although he admitted that attending an all-boys school reduced the distraction of what he called "social drama."

The drama quotient was definitely higher Tuesday at Southwest. As word spread of the New Orleans emigre's arrival, Johnathan was treated "like a rock star," said Josh Collins, a Minneapolis schools spokesman.

He accepted greetings and condolences from staff and students who learned of his predicament. One parent asked whether he played football. No, but he did play rugby and served on Rummel's Student Council.

A loquacious student who often calls adults "Sir" and "Ma'am," Smith started his day with Southwest Counselor Jean Sherwood. She spent about 50 minutes helping him enroll in physics, pre-calculus, psychology, Advanced Placement English and economics/government classes. He has one period free, which could help him search for a job. He'll have no 1½-hour religion course as he did at Rummel, but his lunch break at Southwest is a half-hour rather than the hour and a half he was used to.

DOJ_NMG_0003393

By day's end, he said Southwest "is interesting once you learn your way around."

After his brushes with media earlier in the day, he sat quietly in his government class during a discussion of current events in New Orleans. He finished an English homework assignment in class but otherwise said the first day's coursework centered on orientation.

Studying Minnesota

Crosby Smith said his son adapts well to changing situations and was a natural candidate to make do in Minneapolis after Crosby's ex-wife and their other children left their home two days before Katrina struck.

"We're very lucky," he said. "We had options that other families didn't have."

Within days of arriving in Minneapolis after a long drive with his father from Memphis, Johnathan used the Internet to meet other Southwest students. He also visited the Minnesota State Fair, where he sampled cheese curds and described the lambs and pigs as "neat." But he couldn't understand how a Minnesota audience at the fair could resist dancing to a band playing Cajun music.

Except for one or two people, he said, "They just sat there."

Even so, he said he was impressed by the willingness of Minnesotans to help people displaced by the hurricane.

Back in Louisiana, he said, his mother, Peggy, and 13-year-old brother, Philip, were staying with relatives in New Roads, north of Baton Rouge. Their house near a Jefferson Parish levee may soon be used by doctors and staff at a nearby hospital. The storm tore siding from the house and broke tree limbs but did not flood the property. His sister Christine, 19, hopes to resume her sophomore year soon at Louisiana State University.

Crosby Smith said that during his son's drive from Louisiana to rendezvous with him in Memphis, Johnathan nearly ran out of gas. But a computer search by a friend in Minneapolis located a well-supplied service station 25 miles out of the way.

Although not sure how long he'll stay in Minneapolis with his father -- a semester seems likely -- he intends to enlist soon in the National Guard, either in Minnesota or Louisiana.

"I was kind of ticked last year," he said, because his folks wouldn't let him sign up at age 17. If that had happened, he said, "I could have been with the Guard now helping out down there."

Texas Expecting Up To 60,000 New Students (DMN)

By Herb Booth

The Dallas Morning News, September 7, 2005

More than 6,100 students fleeing Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath have enrolled in Texas public schools so far – including about 2,000 in North Texas – and state education officials promise to release money immediately to help affected districts cope.

Officials expect 50,000 to 60,000 new students to enroll in Texas schools.

And the federal government is doing its part, sending $250,000 apiece to six Texas regional education service centers, including Dallas' Region 10.

Dallas Independent School District spokesman Donald Claxton said it's still too early to tell how many students displaced by the killer hurricane would enroll.

"We had 255 kids report for classes today," Mr. Claxton said Tuesday. "But we expect that number to rise. There were a number of parents who held on to their kids today to see what FEMA assistance they might get to rebuild."

Normally, it takes a year for districts to begin receiving money for students on its rolls. But Mr. Claxton said DISD has begun to receive funds for its new pupils.

"We started collecting average daily attendance money on these students right away," Mr. Claxton said. "For us, it's not an immediate impact. It's still too early to see how it will affect the classroom."

DOJ_NMG_0003394

Suzanne Marchman, spokeswoman for the Texas Education Agency, said the entity urged districts to maintain records for Title 1 and FEMA reimbursement detailing how much money is spent on evacuee students.

But the state is contributing funding as well.

"If more than 50 students enroll in a district or a smaller district is impacted, the district should contact our financial office to begin receiving additional funding as soon as possible," Ms. Marchman said. "We anticipate hearing from Dallas, Houston, San Antonio and others soon. We want to create some normalcy for these kids as soon as possible."

Some educators wondered about where these new students might be in their education.

John Rose, principal at Irving's Crockett Middle School, said there are no records to tell administrators how the students did on tests or in certain subjects.

Waiting to enroll

Some parents had mixed feelings on when to send their children to school, and many opted to wait.

"We're really trying to find housing before we get them into school," said Rosalind Armour, a New Orleans resident who took shelter at Reunion Arena and has two school-age children. "The goal is to get settled first."

But Willie Williams wasn't having any delay in his child's education. On Friday, he anticipated starting her in school as soon as possible.

"I didn't want her to miss any school," Mr. Williams said of his daughter Brittany, 9.

About 140 displaced students had joined the Frisco school system by yesterday afternoon, according to Shana McKay-Wortham, the district's communications director.

With the majority of them staying at the homes of family and friends, it's difficult for officials to tell how long many of them will remain in the district.

"When they're enrolling, we're figuring they are going to be with us for a while," Ms. McKay-Wortham said.

DeSoto has enrolled about 170 Hurricane Katrina evacuees. "The community has been amazing with the outreach," Superintendent Alton Frailey said. "We're providing vouchers for uniforms. There are funds for school supplies. So many people have made donations. The feeling I get is that for a number of these people, the move might be permanent. They appreciate the reception they've gotten in DeSoto."

Relocating for good?

So much so, that some of them will make the Dallas area their permanent home.

Sharon Price, DeSoto school district's assistant superintendent for administration and operations, said many of the parents are picking up job applications as they enroll their children.

"They've applied for all types of jobs, from clerical to professional to construction to secretarial," Ms. Price said.

But it isn't just parents and students who are coming to North Texas for the long haul. Some Louisiana teachers are coming here, too.

One, Clifford Hawkins, has relocated for good from the New Orleans area and has landed a job at Arlington's South Davis Elementary School as a fifth-grade teacher.

"We got out in time. So did all our family," said Mr. Hawkins, who has taught for more than 26 years. "I'm not going back. I might go just to visit, but this is my home now. A visit might do more harm than good"

Like thousands of others who fled New Orleans, Mr. Hawkins said his home and Parkview Academy, a New Orleans elementary school, sat in areas of town that were inundated with water and severe storm damage.

Mr. Hawkins, 50, said that his son lives in Arlington and that the school district impressed him whenever he visited.

Veronica Sopher, Arlington school district spokeswoman, said Mr. Hawkins showed up with a suitcase, a laptop and a memory stick. She said district officials were able to verify Mr. Hawkins' teaching certification and are glad to get him.

"He had the foresight to know life wasn't going to be what it was for a while," Ms. Sopher said.

Local Schools Open Doors For Displaced (WT)

By Gary Emerling and Arlo Wagner

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003395

The first day of school in Northern Virginia yesterday symbolized the start of a new life for some children whose homes were destroyed by Hurricane Katrina, as area officials opened their doors to many displaced students from the Gulf Coast.

On the day after Labor Day, most public schools opened in Alexandria, and in Arlington, Fairfax and Prince William counties.

So far, 11 children from devastated parts of the Gulf Coast have registered to attend school in Arlington County.

"There's concern for the families in the Gulf Coast and we want to provide some stability in the lives of those students," said Robert Smith, Arlington County schools superintendent. "I suspect in most of these cases we're dealing with family members taking in these children."

Public schools in Maryland and Virginia are enrolling Katrina victims under the federal McKinney-Vento Act, which provides for the enrollment of homeless students without immediately obtaining birth records or requiring the children to receive necessary immunizations.

About 25 displaced students have enrolled to attend school in Prince George's County. Officials have been told to waive tuition and provide school supplies to students in need during the expedited enrollment process.

Montgomery County has enrolled eight displaced students, and Alexandria has enrolled three. School officials in Anne Arundel and Fairfax counties said they did not have a count of how many displaced students had been enrolled in their respective school systems.

D.C. officials also did not know how many hurricane victims were enrolled, but said staff members were registering students arriving from the Gulf Coast at Shaw Junior High School in Northwest and at the D.C. Armory.

Patricia Williams, a D.C. school official, said students in need will receive free immunizations, school meals and school supplies.

"The most important thing is the superintendent wants these families and these children to know they are absolutely welcome in the District of Columbia public schools," she said. "We are going to do everything we can to make sure their transition is as smooth as possible because they've already been through enough."

Catholic schools within the Archdiocese of Washington have enrolled 31 students from the Gulf Coast.

Within minutes after the newly built South County Secondary School in Lorton opened its doors, its 2,500 students were asked to donate toiletries, clothing, baby items, bedding and canned food for Katrina victims.

School counselor Marci Norem said two tractor-trailers loaded with 4,620 gallons of water and 20,000 meals ready to eat from a local business was expected to arrive at the school today to pick up donated items and take them to Biloxi, Miss.

By yesterday afternoon, the school lobby was filled with so many goods that Miss Norem was searching for more boxes.

Principal Dale Rumberger called the service project "a teachable moment."

"You're never too busy to give," he said.

Fairfax County Schools Superintendent Jack D. Dale, who toured the new 410,000 square-foot school yesterday, said the school system has expedited registration for those displaced by Katrina and will hire more teachers if necessary.

"I know we have kids throughout the county from different parts of the Katrina disaster. We're just saying all kids are welcome," said Mr. Dale, who heads up Virginia's largest public school system of about 165,000 students.

South County was built on 73 acres across a field from the former Lorton Prison. Its enrollment will mostly alleviate Hayfield Secondary School near Fort Belvoir, Mr. Dale said.

Top Pentagon Brass Defend Response Time (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon's top officials said Tuesday that the military responded quickly to Hurricane Katrina, although it took nearly four days for troops to begin delivering large amounts of food and water to storm victims.

“Not only was there no delay, I think we anticipated in most cases — not in all cases, but in most cases — the support that was required,” Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said at a Pentagon news conference.

DOJ_NMG_0003396

Storm victims in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama complained bitterly that the military didn't start large-scale delivery of provisions until Friday. Some military helicopters began search-and-rescue operations Aug. 30.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said he had appointed Navy Adm. Edmund Giambastiani to study the military's response to Hurricane Katrina to determine whether any mistakes were made. Giambastiani, a close Rumsfeld ally, is vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The commander of the first large Navy ship to participate in relief efforts said last week that she was notified the night of Aug. 28 — the day before the storm hit — that her vessel might be needed to provide relief. But she wasn't told to do so until late Aug. 30, the day flooding started in New Orleans, she said.

"I've got sailors I could send to the beach, but I can't force myself on people," Capt. Nora Tyson said Friday in an interview on the bridge of her ship, the USS Bataan.

Myers said military officials worked from the afternoon of Aug. 30 through the morning of Aug. 31 to assess the situation in New Orleans and decide what to do.

Myers and Rumsfeld said the military had planned its hurricane response but was caught off guard by the flooding. Experts, including those from the Army Corps of Engineers, have predicted for years that a hurricane as large as Katrina could cause widespread flooding in New Orleans.

Katrina, Iraq Aid Efforts Hit Same Hurdles (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Military officials surveying the slow federal response to Hurricane Katrina say the problems that hindered early relief efforts along the Gulf Coast are eerily similar to those that have dogged relief and reconstruction efforts in Iraq.

The crises spotlight the inability of disparate departments within the government to plan together before a catastrophe and work quickly together once one hits.

"Clearly we didn't get a coordinated governmental response in the case of Katrina," said Michele Flournoy, a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, or CSIS, a nonpartisan think tank in Washington, which studied the U.S. response in Iraq. "The same thing happened in Iraq. The mechanisms to integrate efforts across the government were just lacking."

Some senior Pentagon officials, however, dispute that analysis. Rather than lack of coordination, they blame the magnitude of the disaster, which wiped out state and local emergency-response efforts. "The federal response is designed so assistance flows through the state and local government," said Peter Verga, the principal deputy assistant secretary of defense for Homeland Defense. "In this case not only did we have to backfill [state and local forces], we had to fill their front ranks as well because the breadth of the disaster overwhelmed the first responders, making them victims as well."

The failure of federal agencies to work together in a coordinated fashion has been a major issue since the Iraq war. In Iraq, the Pentagon and the State Department developed separate plans for reconstructing the war-torn country, without significant input from each other. The State Department plans for postwar Iraq eventually were shelved. The Pentagon even told top officials not to attend meetings tied to the State Department's postwar Iraq effort.

As a result there was poor coordination between the military campaign to topple Saddam Hussein and the postwar efforts to deal with the ensuing chaos. As looters tore through the country -- something expected by State Department planners, based on experiences in Haiti and the Balkans -- senior military officials on the ground largely were caught off guard.

Similarly, many months before Hurricane Katrina, senior military officers within the Pentagon's Northern Command -- formed shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to oversee the military contribution to homeland defense and disaster relief -- complained that they often were hindered from planning and working alongside other key government agencies such as the Department of Homeland Security. The commander of the Pentagon's Northern Command reports directly to Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld.

Retired Gen. Ralph Eberhart, who was the senior officer in Northern Command until late last year, frequently complained that he had to get approval from the Office of the Secretary of Defense before he or his senior staff could work together with the Department of Homeland Security, said military officials who worked with the general. In some cases, Northern Command was able to work around the bureaucratic barriers, senior military officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0003397

"Ultimately, everything that Northern Command wanted to do with Homeland Security had to go through the Pentagon and be approved by the Office of the Secretary of Defense. It was a huge issue," said retired Marine Col. T.X. Hammes, a professor at the Pentagon's National Defense University who also commanded the Marine Corps' Chemical Biological Incident Response Force. "Every time you add a layer of staff you slow down the response."

A senior Pentagon official confirmed that there were limits on interaction between the Northern Command and Department of Homeland Security. But he says those applied only to policy-level discussions regarding how the Pentagon would support civil authorities, like state and local police, the defense official said. And he said the limits applied only to the most senior officials. He said the Pentagon encouraged the Northern Command and Department of Homeland Security staffs to conduct joint exercises and planning.

Northern Command didn't respond to calls seeking comment for this article. Secretary Rumsfeld Tuesday defended the Pentagon's response, saying that some troops and helicopters began to prepare for rescue and relief missions before the storm hit. "As the storm was approaching the Department of Defense met and discussed the importance of anticipating things that the department could be asked and ... actually prepositioning things before [the hurricane] ever hit," Mr. Rumsfeld told reporters.

On Aug. 30, shortly after the magnitude of the crisis in New Orleans became clear, Gen. Richard B. Myers, the military's top officer, said he told the four-star generals in charge of the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marine Corps to work directly with Northern Command to speed troops, ships and helicopters to the Gulf Coast. The order cut through at least two layers of bureaucracy, such as requirements that the Department of Homeland Security formally request forces and that Mr. Rumsfeld's office and the Joint Chiefs of Staff approve them.

"I think we anticipated the support required and were pushing support before it was requested," Gen. Myers told reporters at the Pentagon.

Still the predisaster barriers limited how much planning Northern Command could do with Homeland Security, some military officials said. One senior Army official said "the same problem" that hindered reconstruction efforts in postwar Iraq arose with the response to Katrina. "It is the interagency problem," he said. "How do you rapidly integrate all the powers of the U.S. government."

About a year ago Gen. Eberhart pitched a solution to senior Pentagon officials, some of his former staffers said. He pushed to create a permanent task force that would include people from Northern Command, the Pentagon, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the Justice Department, the Coast Guard and the Federal Aviation Administration. The members of the task force would plan and train together and during a crisis would form the core of a headquarters to oversee the relief effort. The task force would be headed by a civilian who would oversee all relief efforts if and when there were a terrorist attack or a natural disaster.

Many in the Pentagon thought it a good idea, said one senior military official involved in developing the concept. But other crises -- such as the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan -- took precedence and the idea was put on the back burner, this military official said.

At about the same time, a team from CSIS had begun briefing senior U.S. officials on their solution to some of the planning problems that plagued Iraq. Although the team focused on overseas efforts and not domestic ones, it came up with a similar solution. The team called for the U.S. to build rapidly deployable teams of representatives from the Defense, State, Commerce and Justice departments. All told, the task forces would total about 100 people who "know how to mobilize the assets of their department quickly," said Ms. Flournoy, who was one of the authors of the CSIS study.

The CSIS study got a warm response from the Pentagon and, in particular, from Gen. Peter Pace, who is set to become the next chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The Pentagon is exploring how to build such task forces for wars overseas.

Navy Pilots Who Rescued Victims Are Reprimanded (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003398

PENSACOLA, Fla., Sept. 6 - Two Navy helicopter pilots and their crews returned from New Orleans on Aug. 30 expecting to be greeted as lifesavers after ferrying more than 100 hurricane victims to safety.

Instead, their superiors chided the pilots, Lt. David Shand and Lt. Matt Udkow, at a meeting the next morning for rescuing civilians when their assignment that day had been to deliver food and water to military installations along the Gulf Coast.

"I felt it was a great day because we resupplied the people we needed to and we rescued people, too," Lieutenant Udkow said. But the air operations commander at Pensacola Naval Air Station "reminded us that the logistical mission needed to be our area of focus."

The episode illustrates how the rescue effort in the days immediately after Hurricane Katrina had to compete with the military's other, more mundane logistical needs.

Only in recent days, after the federal response to the disaster has come to be seen as inadequate, have large numbers of troops and dozens of helicopters, trucks and other equipment been poured into to the effort. Early on, the military rescue operations were smaller, often depending on the initiative of individuals like Lieutenants Shand and Udkow.

The two lieutenants were each piloting a Navy H-3 helicopter - a type often used in rescue operations as well as transport and other missions - on that Tuesday afternoon, delivering emergency food, water and other supplies to Stennis Space Center, a federal facility near the Mississippi coast. The storm had cut off electricity and water to the center, and the two helicopters were supposed to drop their loads and return to Pensacola, their home base, said Cmdr. Michael Holdener, Pensacola's air operations chief.

"Their orders were to go and deliver water and parts and to come back," Commander Holdener said.

But as the two helicopters were heading back home, the crews picked up a radio transmission from the Coast Guard saying helicopters were needed near the University of New Orleans to help with rescue efforts, the two pilots said.

Out of range for direct radio communication with Pensacola, more than 100 miles to the east, the pilots said, they decided to respond and turned their helicopters around, diverting from their mission without getting permission from their home base. Within minutes, they were over New Orleans.

"We're not technically a search-and-rescue unit, but we're trained to do search and rescue," said Lieutenant Shand, a 17-year Navy veteran.

Flying over Biloxi and Gulfport and other areas of Mississippi, they could see rescue personnel on the ground, Lieutenant Udkow said, but he noticed that there were few rescue units around the flooded city of New Orleans, on the ground or in the air. "It was shocking," he said.

Seeing people on the roofs of houses waving to him, Lieutenant Udkow headed in their direction. Hovering over power lines, his crew dropped a basket to pick up two residents at a time. He took them to Lakefront Airport, where local emergency medical teams had established a makeshift medical center.

Meanwhile, Lieutenant Shand landed his helicopter on the roof of an apartment building, where more than a dozen people were marooned. Women and children were loaded first aboard the helicopter and ferried to the airport, he said.

Returning to pick up the rest, the crew learned that two blind residents had not been able to climb up through the attic to the roof and were still in the building. Two crew members entered the darkened building to find the men, and led them to the roof and into the helicopter, Lieutenant Shand said.

Recalling the rescues in an interview, he became so emotional that he had to stop and compose himself. At one point, he said, he executed a tricky landing at a highway overpass, where more than 35 people were marooned.

Lieutenant Udkow said that he saw few other rescue helicopters in New Orleans that day. The toughest part, he said, was seeing so many people imploring him to pick them up and having to leave some.

"I would be looking at a family of two on one roof and maybe a family of six on another roof, and I would have to make a decision who to rescue," he said. "It wasn't easy."

While refueling at a Coast Guard landing pad in early evening, Lieutenant Udkow said, he called Pensacola and received permission to continue rescues that evening. According to the pilots and other military officials, they rescued 110 people.

The next morning, though, the two crews were called to a meeting with Commander Holdener, who said he told them that while helping civilians was laudable, the lengthy rescue effort was an unacceptable diversion from their main mission of delivering supplies. With only two helicopters available at Pensacola to deliver supplies, the base did not have enough to allow pilots to go on prolonged search and rescue operations.

DOJ_NMG_0003399

"We all want to be the guys who rescue people," Commander Holdener said. "But they were told we have other missions we have to do right now and that is not the priority."

The order to halt civilian relief efforts angered some helicopter crews. Lieutenant Udkow, who associates say was especially vocal about voicing his disagreement to superiors, was taken out of the squadron's flying rotation temporarily and assigned to oversee a temporary kennel established at Pensacola to hold pets of service members evacuated from the hurricane-damaged areas, two members of the unit said. Lieutenant Udkow denied that he had complained and said he did not view the kennel assignment as punishment.

Dozens of military aircraft are now conducting search and rescue missions over the affected areas. But privately some members of the Pensacola unit say the base's two available transport helicopters should have been allowed to do more to help civilian victims in the days after the storm hit, when large numbers of military helicopters had not reached the affected areas.

In protest, some members of the unit have stopped wearing a search and rescue patch on their sleeves that reads, "So Others May Live."

IRS Offers Relief To Katrina Victims (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

As evidence mounts of Hurricane Katrina's devastation, the federal government has greatly expanded the number of areas eligible for special tax relief and is taking other steps designed to ease pressures on taxpayers in the storm-ravaged region.

Areas eligible for relief include 64 Louisiana parishes, 52 Mississippi counties and six Alabama counties, the Internal Revenue Service said. Also on the list are three Florida counties: Broward, Miami-Dade and Monroe. Early last week, the IRS initially singled out only 31 Louisiana parishes, 15 Mississippi counties and three Alabama counties.

That means many more people now are eligible for a special tax break that applies when the president declares a place a federal disaster area. They can choose to deduct their disaster losses for 2005 on their tax returns for 2005, to be filed next year -- or on their returns for 2004. (If you've already filed for 2004, as most people have, just file an amended return on Form 1040X.) Ordinarily, taxpayers can deduct casualty losses only for the year in which they actually occur.

IRS officials also have suspended many compliance activities, such as liens, levies and seizures, for those affected by Katrina. This general suspension will last for at least 60 days, the IRS said.

Officials are extending filing deadlines and abating interest payments and penalties. For example, they have extended the Sept. 15 due date for paying estimated taxes until Oct. 31. For the hardest-hit areas, the IRS "anticipates extending these deadlines even further in the near future."

The IRS also set up a special toll-free disaster hotline (866-562-5227). Those affected by the disaster who need copies of tax returns to apply for aid or some other purpose can have the usual user fee waived, the IRS said. Write "Hurricane Katrina" in red across the top margin of Form 4506, which you use to ask for a copy of a tax return.

Separately, the IRS, citing shortages of clear diesel fuel caused by Katrina, said it won't impose a tax penalty when so-called dyed diesel fuel is sold for use or used on the highway. The IRS said this special relief applied beginning Aug. 25 in Florida, Aug. 30 in Alabama, Louisiana and Mississippi, and Aug. 31 in the rest of the nation. It will remain in effect through Sept. 15. (According to the IRS, dyed diesel fuel usually isn't taxed because it's typically sold for uses exempt from excise tax, such as to farmers and to local governments for buses.)

Yesterday, the IRS promised "an expedited review and approval process" for new groups seeking tax-exempt status in order to provide relief for storm victims. New organizations should apply by filing Form 1023. Write at the top "Disaster Relief, Hurricane Katrina."

For more details on this and other recent IRS moves related to Katrina, go to the IRS Web site (www.irs.gov) and click on the box that says "Helping Hurricane Katrina Victims."

DOJ_NMG_0003400

The choice of whether to deduct casualty losses on your return for 2004 or 2005 can be tricky. Many people will be better off by claiming their losses on their returns for 2004 because it will mean an earlier infusion of cash. But others will want to wait to claim their losses on their returns for 2005.

For example, you can't deduct any losses unless you itemize your deductions. If you itemize, you must first reduce your casualty losses by $100 for each event. Then you have to reduce your total casualty losses for the year by 10% of adjusted gross income.

H&R Block Inc. says it's offering Katrina victims free preparation and filing of amended 2004 returns that claim weather- and theft-related losses resulting from the storm. Liberty Tax Service also is offering free services to victims.

Taxpayers facing extraordinary hardships who can't get satisfaction through normal IRS channels should consider contacting representatives of the IRS Taxpayer Advocate Service (877-777-4778). This IRS unit, headed by National Taxpayer Advocate Nina Olson, is designed to help taxpayers untangle problems with the IRS. Ms. Olson also recommends legislative changes to Congress designed to fix problems in tax administration.

* * *

BEWARE of con artists asking for donations for Katrina victims.

When disaster strikes, scamsters often lurk close behind. For example, watch out for phony charities, warns JJ MacNab, a financial planner in Bethesda, Md.

"Stick with big-name charities -- and, if you have any questions, verify that it's a real charity" by checking sources such as GuideStar (www.guidestar.org), Ms. MacNab says. GuideStar offers access to a vast database on nonprofit organizations.

Other sources include BBB Wise Giving Alliance (www.give.org), FEMA (www.fema.gov), the IRS (www.irs.gov) and the Federal Trade Commission (www.ftc.gov), which offers a guide to "giving wisely." For example, donors should be wary of charities with names that sound like other nationally known groups. Ask for identification when a solicitor approaches you in person. Don't provide personal or financial information, such as your Social Security number. Don't give or send cash. And try to verify whatever you're being told.

If you aren't sure if a charity is qualified to receive tax-deductible gifts, start by checking out the IRS site. Clicking on "Helping Hurricane Katrina Victims" should lead you to a page with information about charitable giving, including a search feature for the IRS's huge list of qualified charities. (The IRS says it doesn't endorse charities.) But some organizations, such as churches and governments, "may be qualified even though they're not listed," the IRS says. Thus, donors may need to do additional research on the Web, such as search for news articles.

Also see IRS Publication 3833, which can help people who want to make gifts or form a new charity.

* * *

A PRESIDENTIAL PANEL on overhauling the tax system meets tomorrow.

President Bush's advisory panel on federal tax reform, headed by former U.S. Sen. Connie Mack, is scheduled to meet in Washington tomorrow morning at the Marriott Wardman Park Hotel. The panel (taxreformpanel.gov) has set another meeting for Sept. 15.

The panel's report is due by Sept. 30.

* * *

BRIEFS: Indiana plans a tax amnesty starting Sept. 15 and running through Nov. 15. The state calls it a "limited-time opportunity" for individuals and businesses to pay and file taxes free of penalty, interest and collection fees, and without fear or prosecution.... Many other states have offered various forms of amnesty in recent decades.

Storm Giving Outpaces That Of 9/11, Tsunami (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, September 7, 2005

Private fundraising for Hurricane Katrina victims — from bake sales, to carwashes, to football games — has topped a half billion dollars and is outpacing U.S. donations for tsunami relief.

DOJ_NMG_0003401

The American Red Cross has raised more than $409 million, abetted by corporations, Texas businessman T. Boone Pickens as well as schoolchildren emptying their penny jars. Half of the total has arrived online.

"It's going gangbusters," says Devorah Goldburg, the group's spokeswoman. She says the amount is more than double what was raised in a similar time period after southern Asia's disaster in December.

The intensity is expected to continue as schools hold fundraisers, former presidents Bill Clinton and George H.W. Bush plead for donations and entertainers host a TV benefit concert, "Shelter From the Storm," Friday.

Next month, talk radio host Rush Limbaugh will appear on a show on Broadway to raise money for hurricane relief.

Today more than 40 different education groups meet with Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to brainstorm ways schools can both help displaced students and teach the value of good citizenship.

The Salvation Army, which raised $20 million after the tsunami, has already pulled in at least $51 million for Katrina victims.

"People are responding at a record pace," says Major George Hood, national community relations secretary. He notes the tsunami, however, occurred right after the Christmas season, and many people had already contributed to the charity.

Hood says fundraising for Katrina is occurring faster than after 9/11, when the Salvation Army raised $90 million for victims over an extended period. Many online donations have come from abroad, including the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia and Europe.

Catholic Charities received 20,000 online donations in the past two days, spokeswoman Shelley Borysiewicz says. She says it usually gets 6,000 such donations in a year. The group has raised more than $5 million, most of it online. She says the total doesn't include special collections taken in churches.

Nationwide, the young and the old have mobilized disaster relief. In Omaha, kids distributed fundraising leaflets at soccer tournaments and high school girls held a carwash. In DeSoto, Kan., Mill Valley High School students plan to collect bottled water at a football game Friday. Ohio State University is sponsoring a "September to Remember" effort in which the athletic department will donate $2 from programs sold at home games.

In Parma, Ind., Mayor Dean DePiero asked residents to donate goods — bottled water, over-the-counter medicines, clothes, diapers, toilet paper — to help 7,000 evacuees being bused to Marksville, La. He says volunteers quickly filled two semi trucks.

"It's been overwhelming," he says. At one point, he had to ask residents to hold off so that the donations could be boxed. A third truck is on the way. Among the donations: dolls given by little girls.

In Katrina's Wake, Generosity (USAT)

By Marco R. Della Cava

USA Today, September 7, 2005

SAN ANTONIO — If this nation has a hallmark, forged in communal hardship, it is this: In the face of inexplicable sorrow, we give.

Money. Time. Materials. Love. Whatever it takes.

And so it is with Hurricane Katrina. But while bake sales and food collections have sprung up in countless towns, some cities are giving more. Much more. Partly because they're asked to, by both city officials and fate. But mostly because they want to. Such is the case with Texas' historic Alamo City, where nearly 12,000 of Katrina's dazed evacuees have turned up in recent days.

In response, citizens have pulled all-nighters volunteering in shelter kitchens, offered rooms to elderly survivors and left their own young ones to tend to the babies of strangers.

It might be 98 degrees in the shade here, but folks are out and about, organizing toy drives downtown, lemonade sales in tony suburbs and barbecues in poor districts. Put simply, the exceptional has become the norm, a baseline for tireless displays of charity.

The catastrophe in New Orleans has many assigning blame. Some say American leaders failed. But the American people have not.

DOJ_NMG_0003402

“I watched on TV, and I just thought of myself and my little children, that it could have been us running,” says Jill Fitch, explaining how she came to be bouncing another woman's infant on her knee at a child-care center inside KellyUSA, a former military facility that is housing the bulk of the evacuees.

“I feel I'm my brother's and my sister's keeper. It's really as simple as that.” The baby squawks. Fitch brushes away a tear. “I feel almost bad for what I have.”

An emotion-fueled sentiment. But being in the presence of the truly destitute will do that. Just look straight down in this cavernous cot-filled space: Most feet are shod only in socks and flip-flops. Everywhere you go in this makeshift mini-city, flip flop, flip flop.

New shoes are said to be on the way. In the meantime, the halls of KellyUSA bustle like a New York city block. Kids play with a new puzzle, two mothers load up on diapers, and a trio of men tune into a baseball game on a donated TV. Over here someone's getting a haircut, down there a grandfather is pushed about in an office chair, the only wheelchairs around. And this being a First World calamity, the air trills with sounds of cellphones.

Sometimes you even see smiles. Flooding, mayhem and rage have been replaced by air conditioning, regular meals and naked gratitude.

“If it wasn't for the care of the persons here in San Antonio, I don't know what would have become of me. It's been an emotionally overwhelming experience,” says Bernadine Holbert, whose escape from her ruined home has become routine in its hellishness.

Waiting in water. Bodies floating past. A boat ride to a field followed by a night under a highway overpass. Finally, evacuation.

“There are people whose bodies will never be identified, there are babies …” Her voice trails off as she turns away for a moment. “Although this has begun, it also will end. You just have to let go of what you think you've lost. I am very grateful to be alive.”

The what-next question, however, can't be avoided. In fact, volunteers with mental health expertise say that as the evacuees get over the shock of their ordeal, a natural anger begins to set in.

“Most of these people have no clue what happens now, and we frankly can't give them many answers,” says Ramona Leonards, a child counselor who took off work to help the Red Cross here. “Sure, most people are grateful for the food and shelter. But others feel that's too little.”

Leonards says the best approach is to solve problems one at a time. In Holbert's case, Leonards is helping her get a transfer to Dallas, where she hopes to lean on her employer, the Army Corps of Engineers, to find work.

Indeed, few evacuees talk about returning to New Orleans. Bruce Gaten, a jazz trumpeter who lost all three of his horns to the waters, says he'll go to Houston.

“It's music, right? I'll just play it there,” he says, lying on a green Army-issue cot as he stares at the ceiling. “I tell you, lots of people say they won't go back, and I think it's because they finally got out of town for the first time.”

Fernell Augustine had never been to San Antonio, but he likes what he sees. And his chances for staying just improved. An impromptu Labor Day visit by Texas Gov. Rick Perry turned into a chance chat between the two. After the governor and his entourage left, Augustine explained that he had asked for help getting his wife and seven children transferred here from another Texas shelter.

“I am tired of the murder in New Orleans, and I want something better for my family,” he says, adding that he battled both looters and snakes while escaping the Big Easy. “This town has shown us love. I am a cook and a handyman. I will do anything. I just want a chance.”

If the altruism on display here means anything, it is that Augustine could get that chance.

Consider that when calls went out on radio stations asking for donations, lines nearly 100 cars long stretched back from the massive Salvation Army warehouse on the west side of town.

“This is so insanely wonderful,” says Denise Curran, who along with her husband, Scott, spent nearly 33 hours helping sort donations, which ranged from the eclectic (Hawaiian shirts on hangers) to the indispensable (cartons of baby formula). “Everyone's coming out, blacks, whites, Hispanics. I am very proud of this town.”

DOJ_NMG_0003403

Consider that when Sibyl and Don White, both 79, finally made it out of New Orleans to stay with their son and daughter-in-law here, they immediately went to shop for new clothes and had an unforgettable experience.

When a young man in the store heard they had survived the calamity, he handed them $5 and said he wished he could do more. The Whites, who are financially secure and white, were overwhelmed by their African-American benefactor, who they say was of modest means. "We gave the bill back to him with a hug," says Sibyl. "I will never forget that."

Consider that when the owner of local Pizza Hut stores was asked if he'd sell a huge order at a discounted price to help feed those pouring off planes and buses, he simply gave 320 pies away.

"I mean, you see the plight these people are in, leaving their homes with nothing but the clothes on their backs. Something had to be done," says Jack Richmond, who owns 31 stores throughout the city and county. "I figured a nice slice of pizza might help start their stay here right."

Consider that when neighbors from an elegant northern suburb noticed their children trying to process the scenes on their television, they didn't have to wait long before the kids themselves asked to set up a lemonade stand to benefit evacuees.

"It was wonderful to see these kids get a huge lesson in humility and compassion all on their own," says Tom Heffron, whose kids (Cody, 11, Kyle, 10, and Connor, 7) joined the Jones kids (Scottie, 11, Emily, 10, Johnnie, 6) on a blazing hot street near their gated community. The older ones had spent the morning hauling boxes of donations at the Salvation Army depot. "You want them to understand that the way they live isn't the way others live, says the elder Heffron. "I sense they get that right now."

Consider that when one of the city's leading Jewish citizens heard about an 86-year-old woman who had arrived at KellyUSA disoriented, he immediately opened his home to her.

"This woman spent four days in her New Orleans home alone, with little food or water," says M.H. Levine, director of the Jewish Family and Children's Service, which also has collected mountains of food, clothing and toys for evacuees. "We found she had a son in Houston, who is about to come pick her up. But she did tell me the other night that she likes it here so much, maybe she'll stay. How about that?"

But how would that work? So far, the indicators are promising.

This city of 1.1 million — nearly split between whites and Hispanics, with 6% African-Americans — has a falling unemployment rate of just under 5%, and will soon boast a new Toyota factory.

As for housing, the latest Census reports that 7% of the city's half-million housing units are vacant, and real estate agents and apartment managers are quickly updating local officials on their inventory.

"Folks we see (at KellyUSA) who were in public housing in New Orleans can get vouchers for public housing here quickly," says Melanie Villalobos of the San Antonio Housing Authority. "So far, we're finding that people are taking whatever is available and worrying about the rest later. They want to get back on their feet."

For some, regaining dignity and self-sufficiency is as simple as being given a few dollars and taken to a local store to spend it themselves. "It's just a way of taking back some control, which they've lost so much of in these past days," says volunteer social worker Leonards, who has organized such trips.

For others, it means finding their way to relatives here who can promise them unlimited shelter until it is time to see what remains of their old lives. Pharmacist Famous Washington, who along with his wife, Lisa, grew up in New Orleans, is sheltering 16 of his distraught relatives who have made their way to his expansive suburban home.

"Most of my relatives were insured, so we hope eventually they'll get something back. But for now, we just wait," says Washington, whose guests, ages 9 months to 77 years, are Lisa's extended family. The younger ones already have been accepted at local public schools, which have gone out of their way to make room for Katrina kids.

Although the Washington house was filled with the smell of blackened chicken and baked beans over the holiday weekend, festive smiles were wanting. Lisa's sister-in-law lost both her aunt and uncle when, after days of medical neglect, they died on a crowded highway overpass. "It was a general evacuation, right?" Lisa says with a quiet rage. "I don't understand why buses weren't sent for everyone."

Says Famous: "This tragedy has brought out the bad and the good."

Around here, it's the good that is shining through, a welcome respite from the death, lawlessness and neglect that have punctuated these past 10 days.

DOJ_NMG_0003404

The kind of good that radiates from Tiffany Collins, a parks and recreation secretary who, in volunteering at KellyUSA, befriended single mom Shantrice Wyatt and her children, Latrice, 6, and Gregory, 3.

On a recent afternoon, Collins thought it was time for Wyatt to catch a break from parent duty and for the kids to get away from the shelter's fluorescent lights. So she whisked the kids over to her modest house on the working-class side of town.

There she filled up a little plastic pool and smiled as two innocents who had escaped New Orleans played with her two children, Ayanna, 2, and Nate, 5. “They've been through an ordeal,” she says. “I figured maybe this would cheer them up.”

Back at KellyUSA, Wyatt is the one who is smiling.

“I have lost everything, like a lot of folks, but ever since I got here, people have been good to me,” she says. “I was a janitor back home. Maybe I can find that work here. All I know is, it's time for a fresh start. A new beginning. This could be a nice place to do that.”

A Mission Of Mercy To Houston (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

HOUSTON, Sept. 6 -- "Need a home?" the flier asked.

The Rev. William Finch, pastor of St. Raphael's Catholic Church in Rockville, arrived here Tuesday ready to sell Montgomery County as a haven for 50 hurricane evacuees living in the Astrodome.

He's printed 100 fliers outlining the package that he and his parishioners have assembled for those who get on his bus for Maryland: $500 in cash, unlimited use of cell phones, access to schools, help finding jobs. And they will live in some of the nicest homes in Rockville and Potomac for as long as it takes to reestablish themselves.

An ambitious and generous plan. But getting his congregation's 3,300 families, many of them well-to-do, to donate more than $100,000 was the easy part. As he prepared to board a flight for Houston on Tuesday, he realized that his busload of good intentions could go for naught.

"I'm scared to death," the 51-year-old District native said.

Since deciding to go after watching television coverage of Katrina's catastrophic aftermath last week, Finch has contacted the Red Cross and Texas officials for help identifying evacuees. He said he has not been able to reach anyone who can help.

Others who want to assist have been rebuffed. When the D.C. government sent 10 buses to New Orleans to pick up storm victims Friday, people reportedly refused to leave.

With no contacts, Finch's game plan is pretty simple. He plans to go to the Astrodome on Wednesday, walk around and ask people if they want to live in Maryland.

What if nobody wants to come? What if he can't even get into the Astrodome?

If that happens, Finch said, he will donate the money to Catholic Charities, which has taken an active role in helping the hurricane victims.

"At least we tried," he said. "Our people wanted to do something other than write checks."

Despite the uncertainty, Finch persuaded others to travel here with him. On Monday, he called Jeffrey Dunckel, a Bethesda parishioner who works for the Montgomery County Department of Public Works and Transportation. Dunckel called his supervisor and requested the week off, then got a seat on Finch's plane.

"He gave a very inspired call to action," Dunckel said.

Luisa Duarte, the Hispanic coordinator at St. Raphael's, didn't need much convincing. She left Cuba 43 years ago without her parents. "I know what it's like not knowing what's going to happen next," she said.

Since announcing his plan to parishioners during Mass over Labor Day weekend, help has emerged from all directions.

Robert Ivany, president of the University of St. Thomas in Houston, agreed to house Finch and his crew for a couple of nights. The Marriott Corp., which had offices in Bethesda and employs several of his parishioners, donated 30 free hotel rooms at a Fairfield Inn in Knoxville, Tenn., where they plan to spend Thursday night during their 22-hour drive back.

Once they get back to Maryland, Finch's staff will match evacuees to the 34 parishioners who have offered their homes. Pediatricians, dentists and counselors will offer their services.

DOJ_NMG_0003405

Once the evacuees have settled into their new homes, Finch said, he will help them find jobs. Dunckel said Montgomery County will train any evacuees over age 21 as Ride On bus drivers. There are currently 25 vacancies, he said.

Regular potluck dinners will keep the evacuees together, Finch said. Parishioners are willing to house them, possibly for a year or longer.

"This is a long-term project," he said. "We will carefully watch over them and guard them."

New Orleans Bus Convoy Returning Mostly Empty (WP)

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

A convoy of buses that set out Friday to rescue New Orleans evacuees is scheduled to return this morning largely empty-handed, but city officials say the effort was not in vain.

A caravan of 10 motor coaches, staffed with medical crews, social service workers and police officers, departed Friday in hopes of bringing 400 evacuees to the District and sheltering them at the D.C. Armory. By the time they made it to New Orleans, though, crowds at the convention center and Superdome had been evacuated, city officials said. The caravan tried other areas, but crowds had been cleared or evacuees declined a free trip to the capital.

The District's convoy carried 19 social service workers, two mental health workers, three emergency management employees, two doctors and one physician assistant from Georgetown University and 28 police officers, said Jo'Ellen Countee, a spokeswoman for the D.C. Emergency Management Agency.

As the buses returned, Countee said, the only evacuees on board were one or two college students who needed to get to Washington.

Council member David A. Catania (I-At Large) said the mission was a success. The convoy delivered food, water, fuel, diapers and medical aid and equipment to evacuees and emergency responders.

The District received about 200 evacuees yesterday, flown in from New Orleans International Airport.

US Economy Takes Big Hit (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, September 7, 2005

As devastating storms go, hurricane Katrina has packed an unusually big punch to the United States economy.

Though the full impact of the Aug. 29 superstorm is still being assessed, the economic brunt differs in at least three major ways from a typical recovery led by armies of insurance adjusters bearing clipboards and checkbooks.

• A region's major city has been entirely displaced, throwing hundreds of thousands of people out of work and casting doubt on the financial future of New Orleans itself.

• The movement of goods through America's heartland has been disrupted, with key ports still closed and the channel of the Mississippi narrowed by the storm.

• Oil and gas drilling platforms, refineries, and pipelines are damaged, and some will take months to bring back on line.

The result is a barrage of challenges likely to affect everything from the US unemployment rate to winter heating costs for months to come. The typical forecast now is for slowing growth rather than outright recession.

With unprecedented prices at gasoline pumps and an unprecedented humanitarian crisis fast rippling outward, the deeper worry is that Katrina's aftereffects could erode consumer confidence.

"That's what we're very concerned about," says Robert Dye of Economy.com. "This is really an unprecedented event."

American consumers have consistently surprised economists in recent years with their buoyancy amid rising debts and difficult job markets. That could happen again, but evidence was mounting even before Katrina that consumer confidence may be weakening in the face of high gasoline prices. The red-hot housing market shows signs of cooling, for example, as "for sale" signs stay up longer in some cities and demand for home mortgages shrinks.

"Consumers are unlikely to be able to rely on their homes for a ready source of cash," as they have in the recent past, concludes Gina Martin, an analyst with Wachovia, a bank based in Charlotte, N.C. This, coupled with "out of gas" signs at service stations, could prompt a pullback in consumer spending, but not a sustained decline, she predicts.

DOJ_NMG_0003406

The prevailing view now is that Katrina will curb the nation's economic growth - which has been running at an annualized rate of more than 3 percent - by perhaps 0.5 percent in the second half of 2005. Then, the economy could get a Katrina stimulus, as rebuilding gets under way in earnest early in the new year.

Still, for now, the storm's shock remains significant and unpredictable, given the magnitude of job losses and the damage to industrial infrastructure.

In the Gulf region, where the effects are concentrated, the human impact begins with a death toll expected to be in the thousands. Countless survivors in one of the nation's poorest regions now face a future with uncertain job prospects and no earthly belongings. Insurance payouts, which eventually may reach $25 billion by some forecasts, will cover only part of the storm's damage.

"In our preliminary analysis, employment levels will not be back to pre- hurricane levels for another six to seven years" in New Orleans, says Mr. Dye.

The city, ranked ninth lowest in the US in median income, faces a twin challenge: Its labor force is now almost totally absent, and the city was already struggling economically before Katrina.

To be sure, many residents will return, eager to revive the cacophony of jazz and jambalaya. But it's also safe to assume that a number of businesses will never reopen - or will relocate for good, Dye says.

The now-displaced labor force, too, "will want to start working as soon as possible," he says, even if it's in Memphis rather than Metairie.

A silver lining, for these workers, is that the national job market has been improving in recent months. Still, their migration onto jobless rolls could yield somber national job reports for several months, predicts economist Nariman Behravesh of Global Insight in Lexington, Mass.

Ripples from Katrina have hit far inland as well, as a disruption of shipping impedes the flow of goods up and down one of the world's most important rivers. Some 60 percent of US grain exports flow down the Mississippi, while imports, from steel to tropical fruits, travel upstream.

The Port of New Orleans, usually one of the nation's busiest, has been scrambling to restore electricity, putting out an urgent call Monday for diesel fuel to run generators. The Mississippi is now open to ships with a draft of 35 feet or less during daylight hours, but it is unclear how soon full-scale traffic will resume.

"It's a major disruption and it's going to continue for a while," says Jerry McReynolds, president of the Kansas Association of Wheat Growers.

Growers in his state, already coping with a six-year drought, now face falling prices for their product, because of the uncertainty about how to ship it to foreign customers. At the same time, Mr. McReynolds says, "Our fuel costs have skyrocketed."

Indeed, it is via energy costs that Katrina reaches into the pocketbook of every American.

Foreign governments have moved to open international reserves, to ease the burden of slowed US oil production. That has helped stabilize crude oil prices below $70 a barrel for now.

From pipelines to refineries, much of Louisiana's energy infrastructure appears to be coming back quickly. But four refineries - representing 5 percent of US capacity - could be off-line for weeks or longer, so the price of gasoline, jet fuel, and other refined products may spike higher than crude-oil prices suggest.

"You don't burn a barrel of oil," says John Tobin of the Energy Literacy Project. "You burn the products that it makes."

Even at $70, the price of oil reflects a new dynamic of tight supply worldwide. Supplies, as a sum of commercial stocks, strategic reserves, and excess capacity, "are going to be at their lowest levels in history by next week," says A.F. Alhajji, an oil expert at Ohio Northern University in Ada.

The ability to transport oil and natural gas from offshore rigs is also impaired.

"Prices are going up," Dr. Alhajji says. "Or at least they will stay high."

Long-Term Impact Depends On Consumers (WP)

By Margaret Webb Pressler And Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003407

The long-term economic impact of Hurricane Katrina will hinge in large part on how U.S. consumers react to the disaster and resulting surge in gas prices. Will they fall into the camp represented by Lisa Kays of the District or Heather Rories of Burke?

Kays, who works in international development, said the hurricane has forced big changes in her spending plans.

"It reinforced to me the need to save, to have cash," Kays said while sitting in a sandwich shop near Dupont Circle. "We've been thinking about buying a car, but after this, I'm like, no, it's not worth it."

Likewise, one of Kays's lunch companions said she and her boyfriend had planned to drive to New York over the weekend but settled on a day trip to Annapolis instead.

But a little farther down Connecticut Avenue, Rories, a librarian for a downtown law firm, said rising gas prices have had no impact on her spending or travel plans. She and her family drove to Charlotte over the holiday weekend, she said, and "every time we stopped, the gas prices had gone up."

"I just felt fortunate we could afford it," Rories said.

Consumer spending on food, clothing, services and big-ticket items accounts or about 70 percent of U.S. economic output. So much is riding on the extent to which Americans change their spending in response to high gas prices.

The surge in gasoline prices in the week ending on Labor Day was virtually unprecedented -- the retail price rose 45 cents, to a nationwide average of about $3.057 a gallon (with prices in the Washington area about 20 cents above that). In inflation-adjusted terms, that's the highest since 1981.

"Of course, we don't know whether the price is going to stay at $3," said Nigel Gault, U.S. economist at Global Insight Inc., a forecasting and research firm. "But the longer prices stay at this level, the harder it is to believe that consumers will just carry on doing what they were doing."

Even before Katrina laid waste to the central Gulf Coast, gas prices were dampening consumption, according to a survey in early May for the National Retail Federation. People with low incomes are those most likely to economize when gas prices rise. That is one reason Wal-Mart Stores Inc. reduced its earnings forecast for the third quarter.

Americans are hardly about to abandon their free-spending ways. Craig Johnson, president of Customer Growth Partners, a retail consultancy in New York, issued a study yesterday showing that after disasters, U.S. consumers tend to be "resilient."

Citing evidence from Hurricane Andrew in 1992; the Northridge, Calif., earthquake in 1994; the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks; and the four hurricanes in Florida last year, Johnson said, "Although the months of the event may briefly stun retail momentum, consumer spending tends to snap back sharply." On average, the firm's data show, retail spending (excluding autos and food service) was nearly 6 percent higher than the year before by the first Christmas after the event.

Katrina, however, knocked out a substantial portion of the nation's petroleum infrastructure, especially refineries that produce gasoline, when gas supplies were already stretched thin. "The larger worry may not be Katrina itself," Johnson said, "but if energy prices were to continue their sharp climb."

Since the price of gas has risen about 70 cents a gallon since early August, keeping it at that level for a year would mean motorists would have to pour an additional $84 billion into gas pumps -- equal to almost 1 percent of their incomes. "So it's not trivial," Gault of Global Insight said.

What people choose to pass up will also affect the severity of the economic impact. Larry Osborne of Forestville said that it costs him $70 to fill up his Cadillac Deville, up from about $35 not long ago, and that as a result he is eating out less. "It's impacted food and entertainment, mostly," he said.

Some economists say that continued strong sales of luxury goods will help offset cutbacks consumers are making on other retail products. But they wonder how long those pockets of strength can hold out as the storm's effects widen.

The storm's impact will come in phases, said Michael P. Niemira, chief economist for the International Council of Shopping Centers. "We haven't really seen the impact from the home heating oil and natural gas use that will kick in in the wintertime."

Storm's Economic Impact Is Felt Around Globe (WSJ)

By Patrick Barta, Marcus Walker and Jon E. Hilsenrath

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003408

The economic waves from Hurricane Katrina are being felt not just in the U.S., but around the globe, particularly in countries such as Indonesia and Italy that already were straining from soaring oil costs before the storm disrupted energy supplies.

In Australia, economists blame Katrina for a roughly 15-cent-a-gallon increase at the pumps. Germany saw gasoline prices jump by about the same amount, and a car drivers' association accused gasoline companies of gouging customers in the hurricane's aftermath. In Asia, government subsidies widely used to shield consumers from high oil prices, which already were costly before the storm, are pressuring government finances and boosting the odds of a slowdown in consumer spending.

Few economists expect the global economy to grind to a halt because of the storm alone. Just as the U.S. has become more resilient to energy shocks in the past two decades, so have many of its trading partners.

But given the U.S. role as the world's economic locomotive, the likely slowing of growth and employment here in the months ahead is likely to restrain growth elsewhere.

"Katrina has made it less likely that there will be [an energy] price fallback and more likely that there will be a price increase," says Michael Mussa, an economist with the Institute of International Economics. "It has made a growth slowdown that was already in the cards probably a little bit steeper and more likely."

In April, Mr. Mussa projected growth in the global economy would slow to an annual rate of just under 4% in 2005 and 2006 from around 5% in 2004. He is sticking to his 2005 projection, but now says growth next year is likely to be a little more than 3%. Morgan Stanley is paring its world growth forecast to 3.7% in 2006 from its earlier 4.1%, primarily because of the accumulated impact of higher energy prices over the past few months.

Though oil prices have returned to pre-Katrina levels, the retreat has come only after a drawdown of emergency reserves in the U.S., Europe and Asia. The shutdown of refineries in the U.S. is putting strain on global gasoline prices, pushing up consumer costs everywhere there are drivers. Many U.S. trading partners depend on U.S. consumers to gobble up their exports of cars, sneakers, appliances and other products. With U.S. households tested by a combination of low savings and rising costs at the pump, the ripple effects of a consumer slowdown in the U.S., if any, will be widespread.

"Should the overextended American consumer falter under the weight of the energy shock -- a distinct possibility, in my view -- China would be on the leading edge," said Stephen Roach, the chief global economist at Morgan Stanley and a well-known "bear" on the economy. "Asian vulnerabilities cannot be minimized."

Even before Katrina, growth had slowed sharply in Thailand. At the Siam Square Mall, a giant complex of shops and restaurants popular among Thai teenagers, stores are reporting weaker sales. Maitong Sonakum, who manages a shoes and handbags shop called Lovely Shoes, said sales have dropped by half since oil prices started rising. The store hung a sign promising discounts of 50% to 80%, "but we still don't have as many customers as before," she said.

China, too, has been grappling with unexpected problems. Because of government rules that force refineries to cap the price they charge consumers for refined products, many Chinese refineries are opting to sell their products abroad where they can get higher prices. That has resulted in gasoline shortages and forced some users to ration fuel or delay travel, which in turn could slow economic growth.

In Indonesia, Southeast Asia's largest economy, worries over fuel subsidies helped push the local currency, the rupiah, to its lowest level in four years last week, forcing officials to raise interest rates and pledge politically explosive fuel-price boosts in the months ahead. On Friday, credit rating agency Standard & Poor's downgraded the outlook on Indonesia's single-B-plus rating to "stable" from "positive."

In India, state oil companies reported a cumulative $280 million loss in the last quarter to pay for oil subsidies, according to UBS. India has raised gasoline prices about 7% in an attempt to ease the burden, but some analysts said it wasn't enough to dispel the worries. India's minister for petroleum and natural gas recently predicted revenue losses due to subsidies at oil companies such as Indian Oil Corp., Bharat Petroleum Corp. and Hindustan Petroleum Corp., could hit about $9 billion in the fiscal year ending March 31.

The effects on America's closest trading partners, Mexico and Canada, are more mixed, because both are net exporters of energy.

DOJ_NMG_0003409

But Europe has its own problems. In Italy, truckers who deliver new cars to dealerships recently walked off their jobs for an entire month to protest higher diesel prices. The strike blocked the delivery of 140,000 new cars and forced Fiat Auto SpA to temporarily shutter all of its Italian factories when it ran out of space to store cars that couldn't be delivered.

Energy-related woes have continued to pile up in recent days. Yesterday Belgian industrial foam maker Recticel SA blamed the higher price of raw materials influenced by the oil market for the company's 35% drop in operating profit during the first half of this year.

Rising energy costs currently are adding about one percentage point to consumer inflation in the euro zone, which is eroding the purchasing power of slow-growing personal incomes in the 12 countries that share the euro. Higher energy prices are making it harder for the European Central Bank to cut interest rates to stimulate the euro-zone economy, despite political pressure from national governments to do so.

With consumer spending forecast to remain weak, Germany's meager economic growth is expected to reach little over 1% this year, leaving it heavily dependent on rising exports -- and therefore consumer demand in the U.S.

OECD Tells Banks To Relax Over Rates (FT)

By Chris Giles

Financial Times, September 7, 2005

The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development on Tuesday urged the world's central banks to adopt a relaxed attitude to interest rates in the wake of surging oil prices and Hurricane Katrina.

Describing the $20-a-barrel rise in oil prices since May as a big economic shock, Jean-Philippe Cotis, the OECD's chief economist, said the ability of economies to shake off its effects would depend on their underlying momentum. The US and Japan were better placed than the eurozone or the UK, he said.

The OECD said the economic effects of Katrina “cannot yet be gauged with any confidence”, although Mr Cotis quoted independent economists who are tending to estimate that it will have a temporary effect, reducing US economic output by 0.25 - 0.5 per cent in the second half of 2005.

The OECD delivered recommendations to each of the four most important central banks, some of which will not be received gratefully.

Mr Cotis said he thought the underlying strength of the US economy left it well placed but the rise in oil prices without any corresponding pick-up in core inflation meant monetary policy tightening could be slowed.

“The Federal Reserve should continue to move back towards neutrality, although possibly at a more measured pace thanhitherto,” Mr Cotis said.

Worried that the Bank of Japan might move away from its zero interest rates, the OECD warned that it should maintain its extremely easy monetary policy for “as long as underlying inflation is not durably positive”.

He also advised the Bank of England to set lower interest rates than would have been the case before the oil price rises.

Steel Prices Could Rise Further As Flooding Stalls Key Materials (WSJ)

By Paul Glader

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

The price of steel used to make cars and industrial equipment is expected to rise by as much as 20% in coming months because New Orleans flooding has limited the supply and distribution of raw materials such as liquid hydrogen and scrap steel.

The increase would be in addition to roughly 20% price increases by steelmakers including Pittsburgh-based U.S. Steel Corp. and Nucor Corp., of Charlotte, N.C., that became effective on Sept. 1 for shipments of key products like hot-rolled coil.

Liquid hydrogen is needed to make higher-quality steels such as galvanized or cold-rolled coils, which are used in products from auto panels to garage doors. Scrap steel is used to make new steel.

As buyers begin stockpiling to avoid higher prices and shortages, prices could escalate by as much as $80 a ton on such products, according to some analysts, although others forecast a more modest increase. Currently, hot-rolled coil, which is used to make cold-rolled coil, costs about $500 a ton. Concrete reinforcing bar, used in construction, also is expected to rise.

DOJ_NMG_0003410

"To the extent that supply becomes somewhat impacted, there could be further increases in steel prices in general as a result of Katrina. But the magnitude of those prices is yet to unfold," says Mark Parr, a steel analyst at KeyBanc Capital Markets in Cleveland.

Steel-company shares are already seeing a boost. Nucor's shares were at $57.65 on the New York Stock Exchange in 4 p.m. composite trading yesterday, up nearly 11%, from $52 a share when Hurricane Katrina first hit the Gulf Coast. U.S. Steel's share price was $43.77 a share in 4 p.m. trading, up about 9% over the same period.

Analysts suggest some larger auto makers may begin looking to ship extra supplies of steel from abroad. Dave Elshoff, a Detroit-based spokesman for DaimlerChrysler AG, says his company is monitoring the situation, but "as of this time, all our suppliers have found alternate sources" of hydrogen.

Steel prices soared last year amid strong global demand. Prices have eased as China's growing steel production contributed to a glut. But in recent months, steelmakers have said they expected price increases as the glut has diminished.

Air Products & Chemicals Inc., a major U.S. producer of hydrogen, says it can't deliver liquid hydrogen to customers because of damage to its plant in New Orleans. The Allentown, Pa., company is uncertain when it can restart production.

Steelmaker Steel Dynamics Inc., of Fort Wayne, Ind., told customers Friday it is suspending future orders of value-added products such as cold-rolled, galvanized and painted sheet-steel products because Air Products was its main hydrogen supplier. U.S. Steel, Nucor and Netherlands-based Mittal Steel Co. said they have alternate supplies of hydrogen and don't expect the shortage to affect them greatly.

Surviving Katrina's Huge Damage Claims (WP)

By Albert B. Crenshaw

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

Hurricane Katrina seems likely to become the most expensive natural catastrophe in U.S. history, but unless insured damages go far higher than the current high-endestimate of $35 billion, the insurance industry should be able to pay the claims without threat to its own solvency, industry experts said yesterday.

Because of the nature of the storm and the type of damage inflicted, private insurers will probably bear only a fraction of the total losses suffered in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama -- estimated at more than $100 billion by Risk Management Solutions Inc., a California firm that does computer modeling of damages from catastrophes.

But taxpayers, insurance ratepayers and others are likely to be feeling the economic effect of the giant storm for years to come, they acknowledged.

And some risk experts are starting to raise the question of how -- or if -- houses or other buildings in low-lying areas such as New Orleans should be rebuilt.

"There is a lot of variability" in loss estimates so far, said Robert P. Hartwig, chief economist at the Insurance Information Institute, an industry group, adding that insurers are expecting more than 1 million claims. Adjusters are already at work in some areas, though not yet in New Orleans.

But "the industry approached the '05 hurricane season in a position of financial strength," following eight months of very strong earnings, he said.

Insurers "were able to bear the $23 billion [in losses] from last year's four storms" in Florida with no significant insolvencies, and "that situation will remain the same this year," Hartwig said.

The $100 billion loss figure includes damages covered by private insurers, those covered by the federal government's National Flood Insurance Program and those not covered by any kind of insurance, often because the owners couldn't afford coverage or because they self-insured. Many municipalities self-insure with roads, bridges and other infrastructure, on the ground they can simply fix anything that goes wrong.

Laurie Johnson of RMS said the company is analyzing satellite images to try to determine how much of the flooding coincided with the coverage area. "When we know much of that flood exposure" was actually flooded, she said, "we will see the loss."

DOJ_NMG_0003411

But ultimately the numbers suggest that $60 billion to $70 billion in property losses from Katrina will have to be absorbed by taxpayers, through government programs and repairs, and by owners of homes and businesses.

The storm will push insurance rates up for some consumers. "It always does, because in the end, who else is there to pay the bill except ultimately the consumer?" said Tom Upton, a financial services analyst with Standard & Poor's in New York. But the Insurance Information Institute's Hartwig said the impact should be confined to hurricane-prone areas. "It does put upward pressure on rates as to higher risk areas," he said. "That's been the case in Florida. But those effects are isolated to the states likely to be impacted."

A key reason is that rates, at least for personal insurance, are regulated by states, and state officials aren't likely to allow a company to raise rates because of risks elsewhere. Regulators in Minnesota wouldn't approve a company's request to raise rates there because of what happened in, say, Florida, Hartwig said.

However, several experts said Katrina will increase companies' and regulators' awareness of the risk involved in coastal areas.

It could be the largest "housing reconstruction project this country has ever known," involving tens of thousands of units, said RMS's Johnson.

But if that is done, how much protection should new units be given?

"Challenge number one is the decision, not 'do we repair the levees to the preexisting level' but 'what is the design scenario we want them built to,' " Johnson said. Noting that there are 350 miles of levees around Lake Ponchartrain and New Orleans, she said "the cost of bringing that up to a design" that could protect the city from a Category 4 or 5 storm "has to be explored, and a benefit-cost analysis has to be done."

"That will really define the rest of the reconstruction project," Johnson said. "The second major decision that follows," she said, is whether there are "certain parts of the city we are not going to rebuild," where it may make sense to buy out those properties and relocate the people.

There is precedent for such action, though on a much smaller scale. Twice in the 1990s following floods in the Midwest, small communities were partly or totally bought out by federal and state agencies and the residents relocated to higher ground.

But in coastal resort areas, the years following severe hurricanes have also brought into sharp relief the continuing conflict that pits developers and their customers who want to live close to the shore against insurers who don't want to underwrite such risks, at least not at a price the developers and homebuyers find acceptable.

Unwilling to either cut off development or drive out insurers, politicians in Florida and some East Coast states have increasingly allowed insurers to add wind or hail deductibles to their policies. These deductibles, rather than flat dollar amounts, are a percentage of the home's value, such as 5 percent. This shifts more risk to the homeowner.

Also, some states have turned to "pools" and other state-sponsored arrangements to provide coverage that would not otherwise be available. Florida's Hurricane Catastrophe Fund, for example, is funded by insurers but backed by the state.

Wall Street Rallies As Crude Prices Ease (FT)

By Stephen Schurr

Financial Times, September 7, 2005

If muted activity last week in the face of Hurricane Katrina was an exercise in restraint, yesterday's market performance could be called a return of animal spirits. Stocks rallied solidly and broadly, with every sector in the S&P 500 posting gains.

The S&P 500 rose 15.38 points, or 1.3 per cent, to 1,233.40, the biggest percentage gain since the recent bottom on April 21. The Nasdaq Composite added 25.79 points, or 1.2 per cent, to 2,166.86 and the Dow Jones Industrial Average increased 141.87 points, or 1.4 per cent, to 10,565.12.

Declining crude prices were a tailwind for equities. Light sweet crude for October delivery fell $1.61 to $65.96 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange; the contract price is off 7 per cent since surging above $70 last week. Hopeful for an interruption in interest-rate increases, Wall Street was also optimistic the rebuilding of the Gulf Coast would stimulate the economy.

DOJ_NMG_0003412

Not everybody was so cheery. Stephanie Pomboy, who runs the research firm MacroMavens, warned that the markets were being cavalier about risk. “The markets are priced for absolute perfection at a time when, in my mind, the imperfections are manifold. It just strikes me that you have an environment that’s highly risky and nobody is paid to acknowledge that.”

For one day, at least, such concerns were cast aside. Every sector on the S&P 500 came up a winner. The real estate index and the retailers index rose more than 2.3 per cent apiece, and even the lagging energy index inched up 0.7 per cent.

Shares of Wal-Mart, which have been reliably moving in the opposite direction of energy prices amid concerns about consumer spending, posted a moderate rally. They gained 2.6 per cent to $45.69, but the shares remain 21 per cent off their 52-week high. Other retailers performed well, with discount-store Dollar General up 1.2 per cent to $18.41 and Target rising 1.5 per cent to $53.96.

Energy stocks lagged but held up; the group lead the market last week amid concerns about soaring energy prices and distribution gridlock. Valero Energy, this year’s strongest S&P component, added 0.9 per cent to $109.41, while Dynegy declined 3.1 per cent to $4.36. The support for energy stocks suggested Wall Street was not convinced the sector’s rally was finished.

Katrina was still affecting the market. Home Depot added 3.4 per cent to $41.71 on the belief that the home-improvement retailer would increase sales in the rebuilding effort. Tenet Healthcare fell 0.6 per cent to $11.93 as its six hospitals in the affected region continued to evacuate patients and employees.

Elsewhere, Chiron added 1.7 per cent to $43.51 after the drug company rejected a bid from Novartis, fuelling Wall Street hopes for a higher offer. Novartis added 0.4 per cent to $49.28.

Apple shares added 5.6 per cent to an all-time high of $48.80 ahead of the consumer-technology company’s plans to launch iTunes for mobile phones. Apple’s stock, which had retreated earlier this year after 2004’s robust gains, now stands at an all-time high.

Investors Gauge Katrina Impact (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

Stocks soared Tuesday as investors sensed relief from two places that have kept equities on a leash this year: oil prices and interest rates.

The surge in stocks has left the three major benchmark indexes well higher than they were before the Hurricane Katrina struck last Monday. An economic report indicating momentum in the service sector ahead of the storm also buoyed stocks.

A sharp decline in oil and gasoline prices gave some hope that an energy shock might be avoided after Katrina disrupted a vital cog in the nation's energy-distribution network. Speculation that the Federal Reserve may pause in its interest-rate tightening campaign at one or more of its meetings this year added further fuel to equities, and boosted shares of financial companies such as American Express and Citigroup, which jumped 2.9% and 1% respectively.

Investors "clearly are responding to the possibility that the Fed will postpone rate hikes until it can assess the damage that has been done to the economy" from Katrina, said Ned Riley of Riley Asset Management.

"The Fed pause is one element of what might be economic stimulus from the rebuilding efforts from Hurricane Katrina," said Kenneth Tower, chief investment strategist at CyberTrader.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 141.87 points, or 1.36%, to 10589.24. Home Depot gained 3.4% amid expectations of higher demand for the home-improvement wares in the rebuilding effort in Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi. Coca-Cola added 1.4% after a Bank of America upgrade to "buy" from "neutral." McDonald's rose 2.4% and Johnson & Johnson gained 1.4%. Wal-Mart Stores, which has suffered from concern that high gasoline prices could eat into its sales, tacked on 2.6%.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index added 15.42, or 1.27%, to 1233.02 and the Nasdaq Composite Index gained 25.79 points, or 1.2%, to 2166.86.

Oil prices slid after last week's decision by industrialized nations to release 60 million barrels of crude from strategic stockpiles. Light, sweet crude for October delivery fell $1.61 to $65.96 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Meanwhile, unleaded gasoline futures shed nearly 13 cents to $2.06 a gallon.

DOJ_NMG_0003413

More than a week after Katrina struck the U.S. Gulf Coast, investors continued to take stock of the economic impact. Some analysts argued that reconstruction will help boost the profitability of a number of companies, such as Home Depot, and help the economy continue to grow.

Others weren't as sanguine. Jeffrey Saut, chief investment strategist at Raymond James, wrote that "the downside risks to the economy have increased" after Katrina. "We think investors are ignoring the potential economic impact of the situation, as well as the potential inflationary impact of the rebuild," he wrote.

Lehman Brothers analyst Chip Dickson said in a note that the hurricane has "increased the level of economic risk," warranting an increase in his recommended cash weighting to 20% from 12.5% and a decrease in equity weighting to 65% from 70%. "Rising energy prices and health-care costs put the consumer under more pressure," he said.

A report showing solid growth in the nation's service sector in August reinforced Wall Street's expectation that the nation's economy was chugging along solidly before the hurricane. The Institute for Supply Management said its index for nonmanufacturing activity rose to 65 from 60.5 in July, well above expectations for a reading of 60. It was it highest reading since April 2004.

The Minerals Management Service, an arm of the Department of Interior, said 28% of drilling platforms and oil rigs remained evacuated in the Gulf of Mexico, down from 40% on Friday. About 70% of oil production and 52% of natural-gas production remains offline, the MMS said.

Still, gasoline prices remain high as several refineries in the Gulf are shut down. AAA on Monday said the nationwide average price of regular unleaded gasoline reached $3.06 a gallon, up more than 30% from $2.31 a month earlier. The storm disrupted roughly one million barrels a day of gasoline output, about 10% of U.S. capacity.

In major market action:

Stocks rose. On the Big Board, where 1.4 billion shares traded, 2,389 stocks rose and 882 fell on Friday. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 1.4 billion shares traded, 2,034 stocks advanced and 1,032 declined.

Bonds declined. The benchmark 10-year Treasury fell 13/32, or $4.06 per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.086% early Tuesday. The 30-year bond was off 1 2/32 to yield 4.357%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar advanced. It traded at 109.72 yen, down from 109.65 yen late Friday, while the euro slipped to $1.2474 from $1.2543.

Stocks Rally With Investors' Outlook (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, September 7, 2005

NEW YORK — The Dow Jones industrial average posted its biggest point gain since early July on Tuesday, bolstered by a sizable drop in the price of oil and evidence that progress was being made in fixing energy-related infrastructure damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

Wall Street sent its most forceful message to date that the initial doomsday scenarios of a national recession and a 1970s-style oil shock are unlikely to come to fruition as a result of the hurricane early last week.

The Dow rose almost 142 points, or 1.4%, to 10,589. It was the Dow's best rally since July 8 and boosted its gain to nearly 200 points, or 1.8%, since Katrina struck Aug. 29.

“Investors are now realizing that their (worst fears) were overblown,” says John Bollinger, president of Bollinger Capital Management.

Wall Street is also benefiting from two key factors that seemed unlikely a week ago:

•Energy prices are retreating. Initially, with little information on how badly oil pipelines, refineries and rigs were damaged, crude oil spiked above $70 a barrel, a record. And some pundits warned of even higher prices.

But the gradual recovery of petroleum operations in recent days has minimized fears of long-lasting supply disruptions, sending the price of crude lower, says Jack Ablin, chief investment officer at Harris Private Bank.

A barrel of crude closed down $1.61 to $65.96 Tuesday. Gasoline futures also fell, raising hopes that pump prices above $3 a gallon gas won't last much longer.

DOJ_NMG_0003414

•There's a possibility that the Federal Reserve might pause or halt its campaign to raise interest rates until it can measure the fallout from Katrina, says Chuck Carlson, CEO of Horizon Investment Services. The Fed has raised its target for short-term rates to 3.50% from 1% since June 2004.

The market's resilience may be proof that "investors have gotten used to the fact that natural disasters do not have long-lasting impact" on the stock market, says Byron Wien, market strategist at Morgan Stanley.

In Katrina's Wake, Law Firm Disaster Teams See Action (LAW)

By Leigh Jones, The National Law Journal

Law.com, September 7, 2005

Much of the New Orleans legal community is in shambles following the devastation from Hurricane Katrina.

Attorneys and staffers at some law firms were still unaccounted for last week, and office buildings and courthouses -- and the documents inside -- remained soaking under water.

Legal professionals said that they thought they had planned for the worst, but until some levees collapsed flooding almost 80 percent of the city after the hurricane hit, they believed they had escaped much of the damage predicted from the massive storm.

"We have never dealt with something of this magnitude, but we're going to have to," said Gregory Bodin, president of the Baton Rouge Bar Association. With offices at the Louisiana State Bar Association and the New Orleans Bar Association flooded, the Baton Rouge organization is serving as the headquarters for the other groups.

The New Orleans area was home to about 7,500 lawyers, Bodin said, which equals about one-third of the state's attorneys. "Most of the lawyers lost their homes, jobs and maybe their practices," he said.

As most phone and electronic communications remained useless after the barriers protecting the low-lying city failed, law firm leaders and court personnel were struggling to find offices and even housing for their workers.

"We're totally unaware of when we might have access to the building," said Charles Landry, managing partner of Jones, Walker, Waechter, Poitevent, Carrere & Denegre's Baton Rouge office. The New Orleans-based firm had 300 people, including 165 attorneys, working at its location on St. Charles Avenue.

Its building "appeared to be sound" said Landry, according to preliminary information he had received, but it was surrounded by water. Landry said that the firm had heard from most of its New Orleans workers, who had evacuated the city before the storm. But it had not made contact with one attorney who had stayed in the city, he said.

The condition of the New Orleans offices of Baker, Donelson, Bearman, Caldwell & Berkowitz was unclear, said firm Chairman Ben Adams. The firm has offices in New Orleans and Mandeville, La., where a total of 70 people work, including about 35 attorneys.

"We don't have them all accounted for yet," Adams said. "Each day we're tracking down more and more people."

'DISASTER TEAM' IN ACTION

The firm's "disaster team" met last week to implement a plan for its displaced workers, which may include opening an office in nearby Baton Rouge, Adams said. Leaders of both firms said that they had backed up electronic data before the storm, but the condition of paper documents was uncertain.

Web sites also were down at many law firms and government offices, or were operating with limited messages. Posted on Jones Walker's Web site last week was an urgent message to New Orleans attorneys asking them to contact the firm's Baton Rouge office.

"We need to know your needs and how to contact you," the message said.

Landry said that workers were using BlackBerry messaging to help make contact, a plan that the firm formulated before the hurricane hit. He said the firm's real estate group was trying to find housing for its displaced workers.

Phelps Dunbar, which is based in New Orleans and had about 90 attorneys at its offices on Canal Street, also posted a message on its Web site announcing that its New Orleans and Gulfport, Miss., offices were closed. It urged employees to call its emergency hotline phone number.

DOJ_NMG_0003415

Atlanta-based Fisher Phillips, which had 14 attorneys working from its New Orleans location before Katrina landed, had obtained photographs of its offices, which showed shattered windows and curtains flapping in the wind. Roger Quillen, managing partner of Fisher Phillips' Atlanta location, said the New Orleans office would stay closed at least until Sept. 15.

The Web site of Tulane University, which houses its law school in New Orleans, included a "current status" report, updated every few hours, notifying readers that it had evacuated its campus. No other information besides the status reports appeared on the school's Web site.

Offices for the Committee on Bar Admissions also were flooded. Those offices contained recent bar examinations, which examiners were slated to evaluate this month.

The Baton Rouge Bar Association was in the process last week of implementing a nationwide lawyer donation program on its Web site. The program, which the Louisiana State Bar Foundation will handle, will enable lawyers and others across the country to assist Louisiana practitioners. Bodin said that eventually the bar associations would like to train local lawyers to help area residents fill out government assistance forms and other documents to obtain financial relief.

Note: For related news, see Kicked Out of the Big Easy by Katrina, the 5th Circuit Heads to Houston.

Social Security Reform 'Off Radar'? (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

With two Supreme Court vacancies and a massive hurricane-relief effort dominating the agenda now, senators said they don't think they will act on Social Security legislation this year, which would be the final blow to President Bush's signature domestic issue.

The Senate was already having major problems agreeing to a Social Security proposal -- even Republicans couldn't agree on whether a bill should include the Social Security private accounts Mr. Bush has pushed for. With recent events, members on both sides of the aisle said chances of action are even more unlikely.

"It's off the radar," said Sen. Gordon H. Smith, Oregon Republican, adding that hurricane relief is much more important now, and Social Security is an issue "we'll eventually deal with" down the line, though not likely this year.

"Social Security? I think not much is going to happen there this year," agreed Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican.

"I can't imagine President Bush is going to go back to it," Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat, said of Social Security.

"That is not likely to be part of any future agenda in Congress," he said, clarifying that he meant not the near-future agenda at least.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican, said he will continue talking to his colleagues to try and reach agreement on a Social Security bill, but conceded the issue now ranks about fourth or fifth on his agenda. His top priorities now are crafting Hurricane Katrina relief legislation, helping fellow Judiciary Committee members fill the Supreme Court vacancies, dealing with must-pass spending bills, addressing budget-reconciliation legislation, and then tackling Social Security.

Mr. Grassley said House passage of a Social Security bill might provide the Senate yet another opportunity to act, but noted even House action isn't certain. "They may not move," he said. "But if they do move, that gives us another bite at the apple."

It's been anticipated that the House would take the lead on Social Security legislation this fall. Last week, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, Texas Republican, said he still hopes to move a retirement-security bill this fall that includes voluntary personal accounts, but he also hedged by saying a floor vote can't be guaranteed until the House Ways and Means Committee produces a bill.

Behind the scenes, rank-and-file House Republicans are divided on whether or not it's wise to act now. Last week, Rep. Jack Kingston, Georgia Republican, a strong supporter of Social Security reform, said House Republicans would likely spend the next few weeks hammering out strategies on hurricane disaster relief, gas prices and illegal immigration. "In that mix, we will need to decide whether we're going to move forward on Social Security or not," he said.

Some Senate Republicans still say action is possible in their chamber this year.

DOJ_NMG_0003416

Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican, said the issue probably "has to be deferred for a while," but isn't dead yet, since there are a group of senators who really want to get something done this year. "It's going to be tough, but I think there's a chance," he said.

Sen. Craig Thomas, Wyoming Republican, agreed action is indeed possible this year, predicting the Senate will produce a bill that begins to fix Social Security's long-term financial problems, but doesn't include personal accounts.

U.S. Agency Funded Opinion Columns (DMN)

By G. Robert Hillman, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON – The Department of Education paid education advocacy organizations to submit opinion pieces to newspapers and produce other ads, brochures and postcards – and many did not disclose their government ties, the department's inspector general has concluded.

"People looking at advertisements or reading their local newspapers would have had no idea that what they were reading was bought and paid for with their tax dollars," said Rep. George Miller of California, the ranking Democrat on the House Education and Workforce Committee who requested the review.

"No matter which way you slice it, that is propaganda," he added Tuesday in a prepared statement.

Mr. Miller had sought the review last January after reports that the department had paid commentator Armstrong Williams $240,000 to promote President Bush's No Child Left Behind initiative. Again, there were no disclosures.

Among the advocacy groups, Inspector General John Higgins concluded the arrangements were not "covert propaganda," though further review was required on one contract.

There was also no evidence, he said, that the contracts were awarded with any "intent to influence public opinion through the undisclosed use of third-party grantees."

Still, Mr. Higgins said, the opinion pieces and other material financed by the department should have disclosed the government relationship, and efforts should be made to recover at least some of the money. Contracts totaling several million dollars were reviewed, but not all were found to violate the disclosure requirement.

Responding, department spokeswoman Susan Aspey cited a letter to the inspector general from Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, who said she agreed with most of the findings and that the department already had moved to "strengthen the grant-making and contracting processes."

Two of the opinion pieces cited by the inspector general were in The Dallas Morning News and another in its Spanish-language newspaper Al Día.

The author, Marcela Garcini of Dallas, director of parent outreach for the Hispanic Council for Reform and Educational Options, said she and her organization had "never had any bad intentions."

Keven Ann Willey, vice president and editor of the editorial page at The News, said the newspaper had solicited the first column in an outreach for diverse parental views and paid Ms. Garcini a freelance writer's fee. The second column was offered by Ms. Garcini, Ms. Willey said, and the newspaper did not pay her.

"We regret there was not greater disclosure in the financial relationship that her organization had with the Department of Education," Ms. Willey said of the second piece. Al Día editors expressed similar regrets.

In the second piece, critical of the Dallas Independent School District, Ms. Garcini said she was "tired of hearing excuses about the lack of funding for schools, particularly under No Child Left Behind."

"We parents must be prepared to transfer our children to other schools that can better serve their needs," she wrote.

Responding to the inspector general's report, Dallas schools spokesman Donald Claxton said, "It would be disappointing to find out the federal government is paying someone to write ugly things about us."

Under another contract with the Education Department, the inspector general said that Kate Walsh, president of the National Council on Teacher Quality, had authored several opinion pieces for other newspapers.

Her organization had not known of the disclosure requirement, she said, and had returned the federal money later and sent letters of apology to the newspapers.

DOJ_NMG_0003417

Staff writer Tawnell D. Hobbs in Dallas contributed to this report.

Ethics Staffing Slow As Panel's Caseload Mounts (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, September 7, 2005

As the House returns from the month-long August recess, the top two Members of the ethics committee, Reps. Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.), face new questions on when they will complete hiring staff for their panel, as well as what cases they will take up once they have investigators in place.

Hastings and Mollohan, chairman and ranking member of the committee, hope to select a new chief counsel/staff director by the end of September or early October, according to sources close to the panel. Mollohan also wants to hire at least two additional investigators before initiating any inquiries, and Hastings is expected to accede to that request.

But the slow pace of hiring signals that the committee will likely not have completed a preliminary investigation of House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) over his dealings with former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff by the end of this year. DeLay then faces the possibility of a second straight election cycle in which the ethics committee releases findings on an investigation of him before voters go to the polls, a daunting challenge for even the most politically astute Member.

Hastings and Mollohan have begun reviewing résumés of applicants for the chief counsel post, said the sources. The new chief counsel will have to be approved by both men, and with the leadership of each party monitoring the vetting process closely, the new counsel will have to be someone viewed as free from any partisan bias.

"The bar is very high for the Republicans," said a senior House Democratic aide. "Any sign of partisan background in a candidate will be met with strong opposition and continue the stalemate of a non-functioning ethics committee, one that is unprecedented and unacceptable."

Once a new chief counsel and additional investigators are in place, the ethics committee is expected to initiate informal probes into DeLay and House Administration Chairman Bob Ney (R-Ohio), both of whom have ties to Abramoff. Abramoff and a former business associate recently were indicted in Florida on federal fraud charges related to their purchase of a Miami-based gambling cruise ship company.

Neither DeLay nor Ney have been implicated in that case, but the two lawmakers face questions about their dealings with Abramoff on other issues, as well as allegations that Abramoff may have improperly funded overseas trips taken by the two men and their aides.

Those two informal probes could become full-blown investigations featuring investigative subcommittees with subpoena power appointed to oversee the inquiries, according to House insiders and ethics experts.

Abramoff's indictment in Florida, however, could present problems for a Congressional ethics probe. Traditionally, the ethics committee has steered clear of cases in which federal or state officials are already investigating Members over allegations of criminal conduct, as was the case last year when the ethics committee declined to look into a case involving DeLay associates already being probed by a Texas grand jury.

But that abstention by the panel is not an ironclad one, and the committee in the past initiated its own probes of former Reps. Bud Shuster (R-Pa.) and Jay Kim (R-Calif.) even as the Justice Department was investigating the lawmakers.

Regarding Abramoff's indictment in Florida, legal experts suggest that case is so specific — centering on alleged efforts in September 2000 by Abramoff and Adam Kidan, his then business partner, to falsify loan documents used to help purchase Sun Cruz Casinos — that the ethics committee could begin its own investigation of DeLay and Ney without jeopardizing the government's case.

"I don't see any problem for the ethics committee on that front," said a GOP ethics lawyer who requested anonymity. "They can do whatever they want."

Where there may be problems, however, is if a Washington, D.C.-based federal grand jury investigating Abramoff over his dealing with American Indian tribes indicts the former lobbyist. Ney, in particular, has faced allegations that he attempted to help Abramoff enact legislation to help one of his tribal clients in return for campaign contributions, a charge that the Ohio Republican has vehemently denied. If Abramoff were indicted by the grand jury over his actions on behalf of Indian tribes, then any probe of Ney could touch directly on that case.

DOJ_NMG_0003418

"Ney, in a weird way, could benefit if Abramoff were indicted again," said the GOP lawyer. "There is no way Abramoff could or would testify before the ethics committee, so it becomes all Ney's side of the story."

Republicans are not alone in facing ethics problems, however. An investigative subcommittee has already been appointed to look into Rep. Jim McDermott's (D-Wash.) leaking of an illegal recorded 1997 phone call between House GOP leaders. McDermott and Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio) have been involved in a long-running legal dispute over the tape, and McDermott could end up having to pay hundreds of thousands of dollars in lawyers' fees in the case. A complaint with the ethics panel against McDermott was filed by Rep. David Hobson (R-Ohio), a close Boehner ally.

Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) also faces questions over potential violations of House ethics rules. Several House insiders predict that the ethics panel will approve a full-blown investigation into whether Conyers improperly allowed partisan political activity by his staff designed to benefit Conyers' wife, who was running for a state office.

Other lawmakers, including Reps. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), John Murtha (D-Pa.) and Maxine Waters (D-Calif.), could also come under scrutiny by the Ethics panel as well. All three have been alleged in media reports to have used their official offices to help out business activities by family members.

Two other Members — Reps. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) and William Jefferson (D-La.) — are the subject of ongoing federal corruption investigations, and the outcome of those probes will have an impact on whether the ethics committee gets involved in either case.

Cunningham is being investigated by a federal task force over his ties to a defense contractor, MZM Inc., and its former CEO, Mitchell Wade. Wade purchased Cunningham's San Diego-area home in 2003 and then later resold it at a $700,000 loss. Cunningham also lived on a yacht berthed in Washington that was owned by Wade. MZM, with backing from Cunningham and other lawmakers, has helped snare more than $160 million in federal defense contracts, mainly in intelligence-related activities. Cunningham serves on the House Appropriations and Intelligence committees. Cunningham, who has stated that he did nothing wrong in his dealings with Wade, has already announced his decision to retire from Congress at the end of next year.

Jefferson is being investigated over his dealings with a high-tech startup company. The Maryland home of a top Nigerian official with ties to Jefferson was searched by the FBI in early August. Jefferson has denied any wrongdoing in the matter.

Both Cunningham and Jefferson have faced searches of their homes and other property by federal agents. In Jefferson's case, federal agents reportedly found a bundle of cash in his freezer, according to the Washington Post.

As is the case with the Abramoff-related probes, the ethics committee will have to move cautiously to not interfere with the Justice Department investigation into either lawmaker, although that does not mean the committee can't begin a probe into either lawmaker on its own.

"Just because the Justice Department is looking into something, that doesn't preclude the ethics committee from investigating as well," warned a senior House Democrat familiar with the situation. "The ethics committee has the authority to do what it must to guard the integrity of the House, and it will do so how it best sees fit."

OTHER NEWS:

Zinc Tumbles 3.7% After Stockpiles Prove Unaffected By Storm (WSJ)

By Emily Parkinson

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

LONDON -- Zinc futures at the London Metal Exchange fell sharply following reports that warehouse stocks in New Orleans were unaffected by Hurricane Katrina.

Zinc for three-month delivery fell 3.7%, or $21, to $1,391 a metric ton, but had rallied as high as $1,452.50, an eight-year high. The market rose earlier in the session after the LME temporarily suspended warrants for zinc stored in New Orleans warehouses and imposed a backwardation limit on the zinc market, the exchange said.

DOJ_NMG_0003419

A market is in backwardation when the futures price is lower than the cash price. LME warrants are documents enabling the holder to take possession of a specified parcel of metal at a specified LME warehouse.

The decision was made in light of the potential effect on the LME markets of flooding in New Orleans following Hurricane Katrina.

The LME said that "to safeguard the orderliness of trading, the exchange has decided temporarily to suspend New Orleans warrants until the situation can be clarified."

In other commodity markets:

CRUDE OIL: Petroleum futures on the New York Mercantile Exchange fell 2.4% as Gulf of Mexico oil production continued to recover in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. The massive government response to the supply disruptions caused by the storm eased traders' concerns about curtailed U.S. production. October crude fell $1.61 to $65.96 a barrel.

GASOLINE: Nymex gasoline futures plunged 6% as some of the U.S. refineries shut by Hurricane Katrina restarted. About half of the affected refining capacity was either back on line or expected back by midweek. A surge in European gasoline imports and a seasonal decline in demand was also seen easing supply tightness. October gasoline futures fell 12.87 cents to $2.0550 a gallon.

Crude Oil Lower After Saudi Price Cut (FT)

By Chris Flood

Financial Times, September 7, 2005

The price reduction on its heavy crude is likely to lead to a production increase by the world's largest exporter. This may be confirmed this weekend when the kingdom nominates its October oil export programme.

The move comes ahead of the meeting of the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries later this month, when Saudi Arabia may push for an increase in the Opec quota from its current level of 28m b/d in an effort to stem the rise in global oil prices.

Saudi Aramco, the state oil company, lowered its monthly crude oil selling prices to the US, Europe and Asia and made the largest cut to the price of its heaviest grades, which are harder to refine, with Arab Heavy down $2.75 for Europe and $2.25 for the United States. The discount of Arab Heavy to the European benchmark is close to the record discounts seen last October of about $14 a barrel.

Although more than two-thirds of US Gulf of Mexico oil production remains closed, according to the US Minerals Management Service yesterday, US energy prices retreated as traders returned after the Labor Day holiday. The October West Texas Intermediate contract fell $1.67 to $65.90. IPE Brent for October delivery declined 19 cents to $64.66 a barrel.

Refiners have until Friday afternoon to submit bids for 30m barrels of crude offered for sale from the US government's emergency stockpile with a base reference price of $68.67 a barrel set for sweet crude and $61.66 a barrel for sour crude.

Nymex October gasoline declined 6.6 cents to $2.1177 a gallon while Nymex October heating oil fell 1.21 cents to $2.0790 a gallon.

Zinc prices hit an eight-year high after the London Metal Exchange suspended delivery against warranted metals stored in New Orleans where almost half of the LME stockpile is stored.

Traders said high inventory levels had prevented prices from rising as fast as other base metals in recent years, but the market was increasingly nervous about availability of supplies.

Three-month zinc prices reached $1,452.50 a tonne before easing back to $1,394.5. Three-month copper edged lower to $3,655.5 a tonne after reaching an all-time peak of $3,725 a tonne on Friday. Analysts expect higher demand for base metals like copper from a surge in reconstruction spending in areas affected by Katrina.

Gold prices eased modestly to $443.95 a troy ounce from Monday's close in London of $445.85 after a bounce in the dollar. Traders said that a correction to lower levels was still a risk due to speculative long positions.

Gulf's Energy Infrastructure Begins To Regain Its Footing (WSJ)

By Thaddeus Herrick, Russell Gold and John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003420

The Gulf Coast network of production platforms, pipelines and refineries hammered by Hurricane Katrina last week took a step toward normalcy yesterday, helping to temper the price of crude oil and offering hope that the worst of the current energy crunch may have passed.

The U.S. average retail price for unleaded gasoline -- having matched an all-time high Monday -- eased about a cent to $3.04 a gallon yesterday, according to AAA, formerly the American Automobile Association, as Labor Day marked the end of the summer driving season. While analysts said it was unclear whether Americans were conserving gasoline, the supply shortages and gas-station lines so far have failed to match those of the oil shocks of the 1970s and 1980s.

"You may not be able to find gasoline where and when you want it," said Geoff Sundstrom, a spokesman for AAA. "But there is gasoline."

The sharp rise in gasoline prices -- and forecasts that oil companies will see increased profitability as a result -- have drawn congressional scrutiny. Leaders of the Senate Energy Committee yesterday said that Congress will "revisit" auto fuel-economy standards and more-flexible leasing of federal offshore land for energy exploration. But Republican lawmakers showed little enthusiasm for Democratic proposals for a federal law on price gouging.

Late yesterday afternoon, benchmark crude for October delivery fell $1.61 to $65.96 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. The drop came as Saudi Arabia slashed prices by more than $2 a barrel on its high-sulfur grades of oil, which now sell for roughly $50 or more a barrel. Because the U.S. temporarily has relaxed tough environmental standards for oil products, refineries may be able to use more high-sulfur Middle Eastern crudes that normally need more refining.

Gasoline futures declined 12.87 cents to $2.055 a gallon in Nymex trading. Natural-gas futures, which have maintained higher levels even as oil has slipped, fell 3.4 cents to close at $11.657 per million British thermal units.

Questions remain about the swirl of pipelines that feed into the southeastern tip of Louisiana. These pipelines are particularly susceptible to the underwater mudslides triggered by Katrina. Mudslides can snap pipelines, moving segments hundreds of feet, and leave them inoperable until they can be reconnected. Similar damage in the wake of last year's Hurricane Ivan reduced production for weeks.

Weather continues to hamper assessment: El Paso Corp., which operates the Southern Natural Gas pipeline system in the gulf, said surveying has been postponed at least until tomorrow Yesterday, a Department of Energy official told the Senate Energy Committee damage hasn't yet been found, though inspections continue.

Also yesterday, the U.S. Coast Guard increased its count of destroyed platforms to 29 from 26. Still, the U.S. Minerals Management Service said that more than 50% of the combined oil and natural-gas production idled in anticipation of Katrina had been restarted. The oil and natural-gas equivalent of 1.6 million barrels a day still was shuttered.

Crews have had adequate time to bring a number of large, oil-and gas-producing platforms and accompanying pipelines back to service. BP PLC said its deep-water Holstein platform, just west of Katrina's path, has resumed production, pumping the oil and gas equivalent of 70,000 barrels a day. Two pipelines that connect Holstein to the shore are running again.

Oil companies are beginning their search for new oil and gas. Anadarko Petroleum Corp. said at least five drilling rigs, moveable floating platforms that can drill wells to depths of about 26,000 feet, have started churning through the earth again. An additional two drillers are being assessed for damage, the company said.

More importantly, perhaps, two critical pipelines carrying fuel to the Northeast U.S. are running again and four of eight refineries in the hurricane's path are in the process of restarting, with Marathon Oil Corp.'s Garyville, La., plant the first of the group to begin processing crude oil into products such as gasoline and diesel.

Still, the hurricane's wrath has laid bare the vulnerabilities of the U.S.'s oil and gas supplies. The region ravaged by Katrina is home to about a quarter of America's oil and natural-gas production -- with pumping platforms far out to sea, refinery complexes that turn crude into gasoline, and pipelines linking them all. The storm temporarily closed down about two million barrels a day of oil-refining capacity, resulting in the loss of one million barrels a day of gasoline output, representing 10% of U.S. capacity.

And while capacity representing 5% of U.S. demand appears likely to restart in coming days and weeks, four refineries that represent the other 5% will be offline for at least a month. Among them are two industry heavyweights: Exxon Mobil Corp's

DOJ_NMG_0003421

185,000 barrel-a-day plant in Chalmette, La., co-owned by Petróleos de Venezuela, and Chevron Corp.'s plant in Pascagoula, Miss., which processes 325,000 barrels of crude oil a day.

Even more, expectations of bigger profits for energy companies, especially refiners, following Katrina, have touched off a political storm. Sen. Byron L. Dorgan, (D., N.D.) said he will introduce a "windfall profits rebate act" today that would penalize oil companies for reaping above-normal profits unless they made new investments in domestic oil and gas production or in oil-refining capacity.

While Democrats slammed the oil industry for alleged "price gouging," several witnesses told the committee that the impact of Katrina on an already tight supply market for gasoline made it extremely difficult to set prices. "Last week was one of the most unusual weeks I've ever been through," said William Shipley, the chairman and chief executive of Shipley Stores, which runs a chain of 26 gasoline-selling convenience stores in central Pennsylvania. He said he ordered price increases of 15 cents a gallon each day because he saw his wholesale costs were rising. "You have to pay for the next shipment and anticipate the increased cost."

Lawmakers also said they plan to take another look at a proposal to allow states to lease land for exploration for natural gas in federal lands offshore.

Guy Caruso, administrator of the DOE's Information Administration, said that "significant numbers of tankers" coming from Europe carrying gasoline should put "some downward pressure" on U.S. prices during the next two to three weeks. His agency predicted that gasoline prices will drop to $2.60 a gallon by the end of October and to $2.40 by next year.

Also yesterday, the Japanese government unveiled plans to release some of its strategic oil reserves held by refiners to the oil market. Shoichi Nakagawa, minister of Economy, Trade and Industry, said Japan will start releasing about 200,000 barrels a day of crude oil and refined products from its oil reserves held by refiners to the market beginning today.

The International Energy Agency, the energy watchdog for industrialized nations, announced Friday that its 26 members, including Japan, would draw on two million barrels a day of oil during the next 30 days to help offset the loss of output and refining capacity in the U.S.

Gas Prices At Pumps Show Signs Of Easing (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj And Jad Mouawad

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

Gasoline prices at the pump inched lower yesterday for the first time since Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast last week, suggesting that fuel costs, while still high, are leveling off and may not lead to as severe an energy shock as once feared.

But even as the surge in prices appeared to be easing, policy makers and consumer groups nationwide increased calls for a host of government interventions to punish those shown to be profiteers, reduce gas taxes and institute price caps.

In Washington, a Senate committee held the first of two scheduled hearings on energy supplies and gasoline prices, which topped $3 a gallon last week after Katrina knocked out vital parts of the nation's energy supply system. [Page C5] At the same time, officials from several states said they were taking forceful measures against what they viewed as price gouging.

Nationwide, retail prices averaged $3.041 a gallon for regular unleaded gasoline yesterday, up significantly from a week ago but down from a peak of $3.057 on Monday, according to AAA. At the wholesale level, gasoline for October delivery fell by 12.87 cents a gallon, or 5.9 percent, to $2.055 after climbing past $2.60 last week on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Crude oil prices fell $1.61 a barrel, to $65.96; last week they closed as high as $69.81.

The stock market also rose as investors sensed some relief on the energy front and expressed more optimism that the Federal Reserve might pause soon in its campaign of regular interest rate increases. The Standard & Poor's 500 index climbed 1.3 percent, to 1,233.39; the Dow industrials gained 141.87 points, to 10,589.24.

While a majority of the gulf's offshore production remained down yesterday, oil companies have been achieving steady gains in restoring output and are moving aggressively to resume wider refining and distribution of oil products.

About 870,000 barrels a day of oil, or 58 percent of the gulf's total output, are still shut down, according to the latest government figures. That is an increase from last week when the storm cut 95 percent of the gulf's production. The region accounts for more than 25 percent of domestic oil production and about 2 percent of global oil supplies.

DOJ_NMG_0003422

Still, a public reaction against sharp gasoline price increases appeared to be rising and some policy makers called for reimposing energy price controls, which were eliminated in the early 1980's.

"We have a million people displaced and we have 100 million Americans that are opening up their hearts and homes," Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, said in a telephone interview yesterday. "We have some people who are trying to take advantage of it for their own personal profit. And we should stop them in their tracks."

Mr. Levin asked President Bush to impose emergency price caps on gasoline until supplies are restored to levels before the hurricane struck.

Most economists are extremely wary of price caps and say they do more harm than good by leading to artificial shortages caused in part by encouraging consumers to buy more gasoline when they should be curbing demand. By contrast, market-driven price increases, as painful as they may seem, help reduce unnecessary driving and bring out additional supplies, allowing the system to return to balance, economists say.

"Let prices do a good job of telling people what cars to drive and how much to drive them and how to spend their weekends," said Stephen P. A. Brown, director of energy economics at the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas. "I don't have any statistics on it, but my understanding was that a lot of people didn't travel this weekend, the roads were a lot less crowded, and $3 gasoline did it."

Mr. Levin dismissed that analysis: "By that logic," he said, "you could raise prices to $10 a gallon and you make sure that people walk." Most consumers cannot choose to stop driving, he said, adding that imposing a short-term cap on prices would not hurt oil companies, which are already making record profits.

State and federal officials say that consumer complaints have soared as they have registered outrage at price increases of 30 to 80 cents a gallon - sometimes more - that gas stations instituted literally overnight last week.

The Energy Department said yesterday it had created a toll-free number, (800) 244-3301, for consumers to lodge complaints about prices. Those complaints will be sent to the Federal Trade Commission, the Justice Department and state attorneys general. Consumers can also complain online at gaswatch.energy.gov.

"While we've largely seen the best of American generosity and unity throughout the recovery effort, we recognize that there are some bad actors that may try to take advantage of the situation," Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman said in a statement.

In Florida, Attorney General Charlie Crist said that his office had dispatched 40 investigators to canvas gasoline stations to see if any were violating a price gouging law that went into effect when Governor Jeb Bush imposed a state of emergency in July just before Hurricane Dennis struck Florida. The statute defines gouging as any price increase in "gross disparity" to what was being charged before.

"It's somewhat subjective, obviously, and intentionally so, I presume," Mr. Crist, a Republican who is running for governor, said. "What we are trying to calculate into the equation are the market forces that are fairly apparent to all of us as it relates to refineries and pipelines and some offshore rigs that have been displaced."

Mr. Crist has already subpoenaed Murphy Oil and Colonial Oil Industries, two independent oil companies with retail outlets in Florida. His office is also coordinating investigations with attorneys general from Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana. In the Midwest, Illinois, Wisconsin and Iowa have undertaken similar joint efforts.

When asked what he thought about economists' view that allowing market forces to set prices served a useful function, Mr. Crist said "being unfair is never appropriate."

"I am not very sympathetic to the economic theory that it's good for people to charge them through the nose," he said.

Economists say they recognize the appeal of that sentiment but also note that without the pain of higher prices consumers might buy more gasoline and make a bad supply situation worse.

"The trade-off is the following: if you keep the price low you have to ration in some other way," said Steven Suranovic, an associate professor of economics at George Washington University in Washington. "And rationing is going to come about in lines forming at gasoline companies and some stations being closed."

Other lawmakers and officials suggested the federal and state governments should reduce or suspend taxes on gasoline purchases. The federal government imposes an excise tax of 18.4 cents a gallon on gasoline; the states, on average, add another 21 cents a gallon in excise taxes. At least 11 states also impose sales and other additional taxes.

DOJ_NMG_0003423

On Friday, Governor Sonny Perdue of Georgia suspended that state's 7.5-cent excise tax and 4 percent sales tax on motor fuels. On Monday, Senators Jon Corzine, Democrat of New Jersey, and Charles F. Schumer, Democrat of New York, offered conditional support for removing the federal gasoline taxes.

Here too, many economists parted with politicians, noting that reducing taxes would also encourage consumers to buy more gasoline.

Some analysts said gasoline prices might have already peaked. "Futures prices have come down and spot prices have gone down, and retail prices have already started to decline," said John Felmy, chief economist at the American Petroleum Institute.

But even though driving demands are expected to ease now that the summer vacation period has ended, prices are likely to remain elevated well above pre-hurricane levels for at least the next few weeks or months as energy companies turn to restoring full refinery operations and begin shifting to greater output of heating oil. Imports of gasoline from Europe and improved offshore production should also help increase supplies within the next few weeks.

Four major refineries are expected to remain out of service for at least the next several weeks. Meanwhile, workers are just beginning to return to offshore platforms - at least 20 of them missing or adrift - and starting to examine underwater pipelines to assess the damage to the gulf's intricate energy infrastructure.

Gas Prices Ease As Gulf Production Up (USAT)

By James R. Healey

USA Today, September 7, 2005

U.S. gasoline prices appear to have peaked as energy operations in the Gulf of Mexico, clobbered by Hurricane Katrina last week, resume production.

Other energy prices also retreated Tuesday. But damage to the economy already could be significant.

“American consumers spent nearly $10 billion more last week on energy than they did in the same week three years ago. That's not sustainable,” energy price consultant Peter Beutel says.

Most Americans — eight of 10 — told USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup pollsters Monday and Tuesday that gasoline suppliers are taking advantage of the hurricane to charge unfair prices. Prices zoomed past $6 a gallon in some areas after Katrina, and average more than $3 currently.

The official view is opposite.

“Energy prices are being set fairly,” James Overdahl, chief economist at the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, said in remarks prepared for a Senate hearing Tuesday. The CFTC regulates exchanges that trade futures contracts for energy and other commodities.

U.S. average for unleaded regular was $3.041 a gallon, AAA said Tuesday. That was down 1.6 cents from a nominal record $3.057 over the Labor Day weekend. The inflation-adjusted record is $3.113, set in March 1981, the U.S. Energy Information Administration says.

“Demand has dropped off the table” as high prices and shortages discourage driving, but it's unclear how long that will last, says Tom Kloza, analyst at the Oil Price Information Service.

Cheapest gas, averaging about $2.74, was in the states hit hardest by Katrina, Louisiana and Mississippi, because of anti-price-gouging regulations and because some “major oil companies froze prices in those areas to assist recovery efforts,” AAA's Geoff Sundstrom says.

Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue signed an order suspending state gas taxes temporarily to keep prices down. Other governors are considering it, and some in Congress are asking for “gas-tax holidays.”

Oil closed Tuesday at $65.96, down $1.61. Wholesale gasoline for October delivery was $2.055, down 13 cents. Gas for immediate delivery was about $2.18 at the gulf, roughly 90 cents cheaper than “the most manic number last Thursday,” Kloza says.

Retail gas prices tend to be 60 to 65 cents a gallon more than the average wholesale prices, EIA says.

DOJ_NMG_0003424

The U.S. Minerals Management Service reported Tuesday that gulf oil production was 616,000 barrels a day, or 42% of normal, up 9% from Monday.

Says Beutel: “Unless Tropical Storm Maria follows in Katrina's footsteps, we may be able to look back on this weekend as the worst of a bad situation.”

Senators Urge Boost In Standards Of Fuel Economy (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

Congress should consider raising fuel-economy standards for all vehicles for the first time in 30 years in light of the gasoline shortages and huge spike in pump prices caused by Hurricane Katrina, key senators said yesterday.

"I believe we must take another look at the CAFE standards," said Sen. Pete V. Domenici, New Mexico Republican and chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, referring to the Corporate Average Fuel Economy rules enacted in the mid-1970s but not updated since.

"We looked at that before, and it was not politically possible. I'm not sure that will be the case after Katrina," he said.

His comments came as the government reported that gas prices last week breached the $3 level for the first time on average nationwide, with the biggest increases seen in Mid-Atlantic states such as Virginia and Maryland, and in the District, where the average price for regular was $3.29 a gallon.

Republicans and Democrats both said they suspected price gouging as gasoline costs soared in the aftermath of Katrina, but they complained that the government doesn't have the ability to prevent such market abuses.

"The American people are being victimized more than any free market would warrant," said Sen. Gordon H. Smith, Oregon Republican.

Mr. Smith and other senators at a committee hearing yesterday said regulators, including the Federal Trade Commission, are not aggressively pursuing price gouging and other market manipulation by energy companies reaping huge profits.

"There are growing concerns that oil companies are making too much in profits at the expense of consumers," Mr. Domenici said.

Some relief at the pump is on the way as the prices of crude oil and wholesale gasoline dropped for a second day in New York trading, and are close to levels that prevailed before the hurricane struck the Gulf Coast, the heart of the nation's oil-producing sector.

Witnesses at yesterday's hearing said pump prices will remain high for weeks and possibly months, however, because the hurricane knocked out about 10 percent of production at oil wells and 5 percent of production at refineries that could take up to a half-year to restore.

Mr. Domenici acknowledged that the energy law his committee drafted and enacted this summer did not go far enough to prevent crises such as the current one, although the Bush administration last week did use the new powers it received to temporarily lift environmental requirements for fuels during emergencies.

"We left some issues out" in the interest of getting the much-debated legislation passed, Mr. Domenici said. "Things that were not politically possible two months ago are now before us."

Sen. Jeff Bingaman, New Mexico Democrat and the committee's ranking member, said he also hopes Congress will revisit whether to require cars, trucks and sport utility vehicles to give better mileage than the current standard, which is 27.5 miles per gallon on average for cars.

Witnesses at the hearing agreed that the sharp spike in fuel prices in the past week shows that Congress needs to rethink policies that have led to an overwhelming dependence on heavy, inefficient cars and trucks at a time of tight supplies and turmoil in world oil markets.

"As Hurricane Katrina has reminded us, we are never more than a disaster away from this type of crisis," said Robert L. Darbelnet, president of AAA, a driver advocacy group.

"If we do not reduce our dependency on fossil fuel or increase our access to a reliable source of it, the narrow margin we rely on for stability will continue to erode."

DOJ_NMG_0003425

Mr. Darbelnet said the improved fuel-efficiency standards for SUVs and light trucks proposed last month by the administration do not go far enough, particularly because they do not "address the largest and heaviest passenger vehicles on the road today."

The Environmental Protection Agency also needs to revise the fuel-efficiency tests that result in estimated miles per gallon for each vehicle on the road, he said. It has been substantially overstating mileage potential by assuming that, among other things, drivers do not use their air conditioners or drive faster than 55 miles per hour.

Since the hurricane struck more than a week ago, the shutdown of nearly all the oil and gas facilities in the Gulf of Mexico has been partially reversed, witnesses said, and the three major pipelines feeding gasoline to the Northeast, Mid-Atlantic and Midwest have been mostly restored to operation.

The availability of fuel to feed into the pipelines will remain a problem, however, as four heavily damaged oil platforms producing about 10 percent of the Gulf oil will take three to six months to repair, said Rebecca Watson, assistant interior secretary for land and minerals management.

Ms. Watson said her office and the oil companies it supervises are working hard to get facilities back in operation, but continue to be hampered by flooding, a lack of power and the loss of workers. Her agency's office in New Orleans had to be closed, for example, and 67 employees remain missing.

Although half of the 1.8 million barrels a day of lost refining capacity should be restored by the end of the week, that still would leave gasoline output about 5 percent lower at a time when fuel is in short supply worldwide, said Guy Caruso, head of the Energy Information Administration.

Some Senators On Panel Ask Angry Questions About Gasoline Pricing And Profits (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6 - Opening a series of Congressional hearings on rising fuel prices, the Senate energy committee vented bipartisan wrath Tuesday over accusations of energy-company profiteering after the Gulf Coast was struck by a hurricane.

"Hurricane Katrina exposed the harsh reality that we have been skirting and skating on thin ice when it comes to this country's energy concentration on the Gulf Coast," said Senator Pete V. Domenici, the New Mexico Republican who is chairman of the panel.

"Why are the oil companies making record profits, and what are they doing with them?" he asked. "Our job is to make sure that one, price gouging, and, two, unfair profiteering and unconscionable profiteering, do not take place and especially does not take place as a result of the hurricane."

With gasoline prices hovering near the peaks set over the weekend, members of Congress say they consider fuel costs the biggest issue on voters' minds. On their first day back from the summer recess they began debating potential remedies with an intensity not seen since the oil shortages of the 1970's.

Lawmakers of both parties were eager to warn oil producers to watch their prices.

Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, said: "The distrust is enormous. I hope somebody out there is listening who controls these prices."

Several senators from both parties called for the Federal Trade Commission to vigorously investigate charges of price gouging. On Wednesday, the commission chairwoman, Deborah Platt Majoras, will testify at a House committee hearing also investigating price increases.

Mr. Domenici said he hoped public reaction might press Congress to pass measures that were excluded from the energy bill passed in July, including new vehicle fuel efficiency standards, the expansion of offshore drilling and support for building new refineries.

Several agreed that the concentration of refineries had created a dangerous dependence on the gulf region to process a large share of the nation's fuel supplies. "We are just in the beginning of the hurricane season," said Senator Lisa Murkowski, Republican of Alaska. "What happens if there is another hurricane?"

DOJ_NMG_0003426

Senator Domenici and Senator Jeff Bingaman, who is also from New Mexico and the ranking Democrat on the committee, agreed to send a letter to President Bush asking him to require government agencies to begin conserving gas in their vehicles, saying that would set an example for consumers.

Democrats called for more aggressive measures. Senator Byron L. Dorgan, Democrat of North Dakota, said he was introducing a bill to tax oil companies for high oil profits and pay a rebate to consumers. "There is nothing about this market that is free," he said, arguing that the OPEC cartel sets prices and that the consolidation of petroleum companies had made the pricing situation worse for consumers.

Senator Maria Cantwell, Democrat of Washington, called on the president to reinstate the emergency powers that expired after the 1970's "to look at this issue of price gouging and look at what level of price increase is realistic."

Republicans on the committee, however, argued that price controls of the 1970's had worsened shortages. Senator George Allen, Republican of Virginia, said Congress should instead consider extending the temporary lifting of some regulations on gasoline contents that the president imposed after the hurricane.

Several others argued for expanding domestic oil drilling in Alaska and offshore. Pointing the finger at environmental regulations he blamed for constricting domestic oil supplies, Senator Larry Craig, Republican of Idaho, questioned his colleagues stern words for the oil companies and other energy producers.

"Is it possible," he asked, "that the anger of the American consumer is misdirected at those who produce it instead of those who deny production?"

Senate Holds Hearing On Gas Price Gouging (AP)

By H. JOSEF HEBERT, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 7, 2005

Sep. 7, 2005 - Senators, both Republicans and Democrats, said Tuesday that they suspect price gouging as gasoline costs soared in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina but complained that the government doesn't have the ability to investigate or prevent such market abuses.

"The American people are being victimized more than any free market would warrant," said Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore., at Senate hearing on the impact of the hurricane on energy prices.

Smith and other senators said regulators, including the Federal Trade Commission, are not aggressively pursuing price gouging and other market manipulation by energy companies reaping huge profits.

Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., chairman of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, which held hearings into the recent price spikes, said Congress needs to give agencies the tools to investigate price-gouging complaints.

"There are growing concerns that oil companies are making too much in profits at the expense of consumers," said Domenici.

Sen. Jon Corzine, D-N.J., said that even as crude prices were declining, gasoline prices at the pump soared by 25 percent. "There's something not right in how the market is working," he said.

Several Democrats called for gasoline price controls.

"The president needs to have emergency powers to halt gas price gouging," said Sen. Maria Cantwell, D-Wash.

Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., said he will introduce legislation for a windfall profits tax on oil companies, with the proceeds used to rebate consumers who have paid huge prices at the pump. He was not optimistic about the proposal's prospects.

"Most likely Congress will do little or nothing but talk a great deal and hold hearings," said Dorgan.

Twenty-three states have price-gouging statutes, but Domenici acknowledged they are "all over the waterfront" as to how they are used. In Virginia, a government must declare an emergency for the law to be used.

The FTC does not have authority over price gouging unless it involves an antitrust or market monopoly issue.

The afternoon of testimony demonstrated that one person's price gouging may be another person's justified price response to changing conditions of supply and demand.

James Overdahl, chief economist for the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, said the agency is stepping up its oversight of the gasoline futures markets but has not seen evidence of price manipulation related to Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0003427

Industry representatives blamed retail-price spikes on the disruption of supplies and the anticipation of shortages.

Separately, the Energy Department said it was expanding its "hotline" for complaints from motorists about price gouging at pumps to including a toll-free number, 1-800-244-3301, that can be used for complaints.

"We recognize there are some bad actors that may be to take advantage of the situation," said Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman. Complaints to DOE are forwarded to the Federal Trade Commission.

Meanwhile, the federal Energy Information Administration told lawmakers that the high gasoline prices triggered by disruptions from Hurricane Katrina were expected to ease in the coming weeks.

Crude prices and wholesale gasoline prices dropped for a second straight trading day Tuesday on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

"We expect gas prices to ease off in the coming weeks" and more Gulf refineries return to operation and more gasoline imports begin coming into the country, said EIA Director Guy Caruso.

Caruso said if recovery of Gulf refineries and offshore production facilities goes as anticipated, EIA projects gasoline prices to average $2.60 a gallon nationwide in the third quarter of this year and $2.40 a gallon next year. The EIA said the average price of regular-grade gasoline soared by nearly 46 cents a gallon to an average of $3.069 nationwide last week.

The Interior Department reported that offshore oil production facilities in the Gulf, though temporarily shut down, avoided extensive, long-term damage from Katrina.

The hurricane disrupted 95 percent of Gulf oil production, a region that accounts for 29 percent of U.S. domestic production.

Interior Assistant Secretary Rebecca Watson said many of those platforms are coming back into operation and that 90 percent of the offshore production facilities in the Gulf avoided extensive, long-term damage.

In Praise Of 'Gouging' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

One test of leadership in a crisis is whether politicians keep cool enough to resist populist furies, especially when it comes to the inevitable economic fallout. Sadly, that's not what we're seeing in the current demagoguery over alleged oil-profiteering.

"Price gouging," says Missouri GOP Governor Matt Blunt, "is unconscionable and illegal ... and should be rooted out and punished." In Georgia, Republican Governor Sonny Perdue has signed an emergency executive order imposing sanctions on service stations that raise their prices too much. In Illinois, Democratic Governor Rod Blagojevich has pledged to prosecute gas companies that profit from the price spike, as has Ernie Fletcher, his Republican counterpart in Kentucky.

Some 20 states, most of them in the south, already have anti-price-gouging laws on their books -- and many governors have declared emergencies to invoke them. These de facto price controls typically place ceilings of between 10% and 25% on how much companies can raise prices in the wake of a natural disaster. In almost all cases such laws are wrong-headed, because they exacerbate supply problems by short-circuiting the price system that matches supply with demand.

As infuriating as higher gas prices will be over the next weeks and perhaps months, there is one economic certainty here: If governments will not allow the price system to ration the demand for gas, a new "price" system will emerge called gas lines, which have already appeared in many locales.

Let's explain why prices have been rising. Katrina has knocked out about 90% of Gulf crude oil production and about 80% of natural gas output. That translates into about two million barrels a day that are not available to consumers, an 11% decrease in supply. This means that in the near term Americans are going to have to consume two million fewer barrels of gas every day, at least until the refineries are brought back on line and increased output and supplies from other nations arrive. The way the market achieves this reduction in consumption is through a higher price.

The argument is also made that energy companies are reaping windfall profits from the Katrina catastrophe. That is in one sense true -- the oil they've already extracted and refined is more valuable now, and we would be pleased to see some of these extra profits donated to the relief effort. But artificially holding down the price of gas makes a bad situation worse.

This is also why many of the nation's governors are misguided, even if well-intentioned, in their attempts to suspend state gas taxes. Given the high demand for gas and constricted supply, this gas tax cut will have one of two undesirable consequences. If the savings are somehow passed on to consumers at the pump, demand will be elevated, thus heightening the risk of gas lines and/or "sold out" signs at service stations. The alternative is that energy companies will keep the market-clearing pump price the same, and pocket the 10 to 20 cents a gallon reduction in the tax -- which would only increase their windfall. Either way, consumers won't benefit.

DOJ_NMG_0003428

So are the gas sellers guilty of "profiteering?" Price gouging laws say companies can't charge significantly more than their "cost." But what matters for wholesalers and gas stations isn't what they paid for the last tanker of fuel but what they expect to pay for the next one. Economists call this the "replacement cost," and any gas station owner would soon be out of business if he charged $2 a gallon for gas that he knew would cost him $2.50 a gallon to replace. As these replacement costs soar, it is entirely appropriate for gas stations to raise prices on a daily, or even hourly, basis.

"If prices do not increase," explained the White House Council of Economic Advisers in a section on "unexpected shortages" its 2004 Report to the President, "consumers do not receive a signal to cut their consumption and suppliers might not have the proper incentives to increase supply adequately."

Anti-gouging laws also punish companies for building excess capacity and reserves in advance of a crisis like the one we're now having. One lesson of Katrina is that we should reward companies for stockpiling oil and gas for the times when it is most urgently needed. Price gouging laws give them no incentive to endure the costs of carrying this excess inventory.

We could fill these pages with all the ways government has undermined U.S. energy security and raised production costs. These include reformulated gas mandates, prohibitions on offshore and Alaska oil drilling, and environmental regulations and price controls that go a long way to explaining why not a single new oil refinery has been built in the U.S. since 1976. Not one -- in 29 years.

These are the longer-term causes of the post-Katrina price increases. And they are energy policy dysfunctions that Congress would do well to fix before the memory of this catastrophe fades. In the meantime we can only hope politicians don't make this crisis worse by engaging in profiteering of their own, at everyone else's expense.

Tom DeLay: No Support To Roll Back Gas Tax (REU-Y2)

Reuters, September 7, 2005

House Republican Leader Tom DeLay said on Tuesday there was no support for rolling back the federal gasoline tax to offset higher prices.

"Absolutely not," he told reporters after a meeting with President George W. Bush on issues related to Hurricane Katrina.

"Now more than ever you're going to need ... that infrastructure, those highway trust funds, to rebuild the bridges that were destroyed, rebuild the railroads that were destroyed. You have to have the infrastructure or you can't have a recovery," DeLay said.

Iran Five Years From Nuclear Arms, Says IISS (FT)

By Peter Spiegel

Financial Times, September 7, 2005

A London-based think-tank which has become a leading authority on the unconventional weapons capabilities of so-called “rogue states” has estimated that Iran could develop enough weapons-grade uranium to develop a nuclear weapon within five years.

But in a 128-page dossier on Iran on Tuesday, the International Institute of Strategic Studies (IISS) also said Iran’s was more likely to build up a production capability over more than a decade and then decide whether to acquire atomic weapons.

The five-year estimate is more aggressive than reported projections of US intelligence agencies, which are believed to have determined Iran is six to ten years away from such a breakthrough. But in spite of a capability to develop weapons-grade uranium by the end of the decade, John Chipman, the IISS director, said that would require Iran to “throw caution to the wind” and ignore the threat of international sanctions, a move Tehran has been reluctant to pursue.

He noted that a more cautious approach – which would involve building a more sophisticated “industrial-scale” centrifuge plant at Natanz – would allow Iran to have a much greater capability to produce the higher enriched uranium needed for weapons in the long-term. Building such a plant would take more than a decade.

DOJ_NMG_0003429

The IISS assessment comes as the 35-member governing board of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) prepares for a crucial meeting on September 19 to decide whether the Iran case should be reported to the UN Security Council for reprimand.

"The logical next step is for this to be reported to the security council," a senior EU diplomat said on Tuesday. The US and Europe face resistance from Russia and China, which argue that Iran has not breached its obligations under the Nuclear non-Proliferation Treaty, which allows it to build a civilian nuclear programme.

The IISS also found that in spite of progress on a centrifuge enrichment programme, it is unclear whether Iran has the capability to actually design and fabricate nuclear weapons from any fissile material it produces.

Moreover, after two years of inspections by the IAEA "Iran does not have any significant stocks of undeclared nuclear weapons-usable fissile materials or is hiding facilities capable of producing such material," said the report.

Although there has been speculation that Iran may have acquired a nuclear design from the network of disgraced Pakistani physicist AQ Kahn, John Chipman, IISS's director, said there is no publicly-available evidence of such a link.

Gary Samore, the former US administration counter-proliferation official who authored the report, declined to comment on any discrepancies between the IISS assessment and official US findings, noting that American intelligence estimates remain classified and reporting on the Bush administration's assessment has been conflicting. Mr Samore added, however, that almost all analysts, including those in the US intelligence community, are relying on a "very similar database" from inspections by the IAEA. Any differences in estimates, he said, are different interpretations of the same data.

"No one can estimate with any precision how long this will take," Mr Samore said, noting there is a long list of hurdles in developing a centrifuge plant that can produce enough "clean" fissile material for a weapon. "Nobody can actually know, including the Iranians themselves, how long it will take to work out those problems."

Nuclear Weapon Is Years Off For Iran, Research Panel Says (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

LONDON, Sept. 6 - A leading British research institute said Tuesday that Iran was at least five years away from producing sufficient material for "a single nuclear weapon," and that it could make one only if it chose to ignore international reaction and "throw caution to the wind."

The researchers, at the International Institute for Strategic Studies, said the conclusions were based on public sources of information, including visits to nuclear sites arranged by Iranian authorities. "Nevertheless," the institute's director, John Chipman, told reporters, "there remains a good deal that cannot be known for certain from the outside."

Dr. Chipman presented the report at a diplomatically delicate time. Iran angered Western negotiators by resuming limited uranium conversion at Isfahan on Aug. 8, ending a suspension of nuclear activities agreed with the European Union last November. And on Sept. 19, the board of the United Nations nuclear watchdog agency is to meet to consider the next step.

Western nations, including the United States, have threatened to refer Iran to the Security Council, where it could face an array of penalties over its nuclear policies.

The United States argues that Iran is using its program to further its ambitions to produce nuclear weapons, but Iran maintains that the program has only peaceful purposes.

The new report broadly concurs with one completed in May by American intelligence agencies, which concluded that Iran was not expected to build a nuclear weapon before the next decade.

The institute's report suggests that Iran has two principal options to produce highly enriched weapons-grade uranium, one at a relatively small pilot centrifuge at Natanz and the other at a planned industrial-scale centrifuge there, which might take more than a decade to build.

"If Iran threw caution to the wind and sought a nuclear weapon capability as quickly as possible without regard for international reaction, it might be able to produce enough highly enriched uranium for a single nuclear weapon by the end of this decade," and then only if it overcame an array of technical difficulties, the report said.

DOJ_NMG_0003430

By contrast, "if Teheran does not feel compelled to acquire nuclear weapons urgently or judges that the risk of breaking out with a marginal capacity is too great, it could wait until it completes the industrial-scale centrifuge plant at Natanz."

While that might take more than 10 years, it would make it easier "to pursue covert enrichment options," the report said.

It said Iran's "ability to produce weapons-grade plutonium seems more distant."

The report described Iran's chemical and biological weapons as "much more difficult to assess." In a section on missiles, it said Iran had deployed up to 72 short- and medium-range missiles and possibly 12 intermediate-range missiles capable of striking targets in Israel, Turkey and southern Russia.

Dr. Chipman said the liquid fuel technology for the missiles had been acquired from North Korea.

"As far as is known, Iran's missile forces are armed with conventional high-explosive warheads," he said, adding that Iran could probably build primitive chemical or biological warheads "if it chose to do so."

Describing the diplomatic calculations, Dr. Chipman said it would be important for negotiators "to apply pressure and create inducements to persuade Iran not to develop a fuel-cycle capability that it could turn later into a weapons program."

"On the other hand, it will be important to apply international diplomacy in such a way that does not inspire Iran to abandon all restraint and seek a nuclear-weapons capability without regard to international repercussions," he said.

Compromise Sought For U.N. Meeting (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 6 (Reuters) - Ambassador John R. Bolton of the United States on Tuesday offered compromise language on development and aid spending and climate change to try to resolve a deadlock over a list of goals being prepared for a world summit meeting here next week.

Washington has long and adamantly resisted the Kyoto Protocol on climate change and the United Nations target for increasing foreign aid, supported by most other members.

But with disagreements on those and many other issues surfacing again as a logjam in the preparation of the goals list, Mr. Bolton said the United States was ready to accept the use of the catch-all phase "millennium development goals" throughout the text, "provided it can be properly defined."

He submitted amendments to the group of 32 ambassadors negotiating over issues to be discussed at the summit meeting, which will be held from Sept. 14 to 16.

The phrase millennium development goals refers to objectives on poverty, hunger, primary education, AIDS and other issues, with specific goals to be achieved by 2015. The goals were generally agreed to by leaders at a summit conference in 2000.

In essence, the United States-proposed language including the phrase would commit world leaders to meet obligations they had undertaken in United Nations climate change agreements, including "for many of us, the Kyoto Protocol," according to Mr. Bolton's prepared speaking notes.

The Bolton Edit (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

What's wrong with the following:

"We are encouraged by recent commitments to substantial increases in official development assistance, while recognizing that a substantial increase in ODA is required to achieve the internationally agreed goals including, by 2015, the MDGs."

If your answer is that it's incomprehensible, you're right. But here's another answer: The statement forms part of the document that is Secretary General Kofi Annan's vision for a reformed U.N. and to which world leaders are supposed to affix their names when they meet next week in New York. It is a product of an opaque U.N. process presided over by a former Minister of Information of Gabon.

And it is antithetical to American interests, which is why new U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. John Bolton has taken a red marker to it and dozens of other misbegotten statements and suggested new language in their place. This is causing consternation in predictable quarters, but we hope Mr. Bolton keeps at it.

DOJ_NMG_0003431

On foreign aid, for example, he wants to stress not just the amount of assistance, which is the main concern at the U.N. Mr. Bolton wants the U.N. to acknowledge what leaders of the G-8 nations recently agreed to, which is that the aid should go "particularly for countries that are making efforts to use resources wisely, strengthen governance, and reduce poverty through sustainable economic growth."

That is, the aid should go to countries that aren't corrupt and will do something useful with it. By the way, the U.S. has increased its development assistance by 90% since President Bush took office, to $19 billion from $10 billion -- a point rarely mentioned by those who carp about U.S. "stinginess."

There's more. In the section on nonproliferation, the U.N. draft offers a windy sentence on the need for progress in disarmament. Mr. Bolton rightly wants to strike that language, which is often used by Iran and other rogue states as an alibi to skirt their nonproliferation commitments. In its place, he suggests: "The proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and their means of delivery, and the possibility that terrorists might acquire such weapons, remain the greatest threats to international peace and security." As Henry Kissinger likes to say, that has the added advantage of being true.

Some of Mr. Bolton's edits seem small but are literally worth hundreds of millions of dollars. The U.N. draft "commends" the Secretary General "to modernize the United Nations, in particular its headquarters." Mr. Bolton deletes the language about headquarters. Why? The U.N. is seeking to move into temporary Manhattan real estate as it renovates its Turtle Bay facility. Government auditors fear a billion-dollar boondoggle there, and believe millions in savings could be realized if the U.N. alters existing plans.

He also focuses on management reform, which will come into special focus with the release today of Paul Volcker's fourth report on the Oil for Food scandal. The report will stress Mr. Annan's multiple supervisory failures, yet Mr. Annan wants the world's leaders to accept his reform plan as a fait accompli before Mr. Volcker's findings are even read, much less considered.

For years, the U.N. has got by on the assumption that nobody, at least nobody in the U.S., is paying much attention. Its defenders have spun Mr. Bolton's efforts as a last-minute rogue operation designed to hurt the U.N. But in fact Mr. Bolton is doing Turtle Bay the favor of taking its words seriously. Those who want something more than a feckless and corrupt world body should welcome his efforts.

White House Questions Israel Construction (AJC/AP)

By Barry Schweid, Ap Diplomatic Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — The State Department said Tuesday it had raised with the Israeli government the approval of construction of 117 houses in the Ariel settlement in the heart of the West Bank.

Spokesman Sean McCormack provided no details, but he left little doubt that the administration was displeased.

"Our views on that issue are well-known," McCormack said. And they were expressed recently to the Israeli government, he said.

"We have had an ongoing discussion on this, as well as other issues, with Israel," McCormack said. "It's a close friend and I'm not going to get into the content of those diplomatic exchanges."

The long-held view of U.S. administrations is that an expansion of Israeli settlements on the West Bank could complicate negotiations with the Palestinians over the future of the territory.

Still, the presence of Israeli settlements in Sinai did not prevent a peace treaty in 1979 in which Israel gave all the territory to Egypt. Nor did Israeli settlements in Gaza stop Israel from relinquishing the territory to the Palestinians.

However, the Palestinians and their supporters suspect Prime Minister Ariel Sharon intends to hold onto much of the West Bank and is expanding settlements to tighten Israel's grip on the area.

Meanwhile, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met Tuesday for a half-hour with Karen Koning AbuZayd, counsel-general of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency, on the post-withdrawal situation in Gaza.

"They had a good meeting," McCormack said.

Arafat's Cousin Is Assassinated (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

DOJ_NMG_0003432

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

JERUSALEM — Unidentified gunmen in the Gaza Strip shot and killed Moussa Arafat, a former Palestinian Authority security chief and a cousin of the late Yasser Arafat, at his home in Gaza City before dawn today.

The brazen assault heightened worries about chaos and factional violence in the Gaza Strip following Israel's withdrawal from all 21 Jewish settlements there. Israeli forces are expected to hand over the Gaza Strip in coming weeks, turning the impoverished enclave into a test of Palestinian rule.

Police and witnesses said the attackers arrived at Moussa Arafat's house in a convoy of cars and began firing rocketpropelled grenades at the home, overwhelming his bodyguards. The men then pulled Arafat, 66, from the house and shot him in the street, witnesses said.

The gunmen also seized Arafat's son, Manhal, a security officer thought to be in his 30s, and drove away. Witnesses reported heavy gunfire during the incident.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility. The Palestinian Authority had no immediate comment; officials said they were investigating.

Arafat, who was sacked as head of military intelligence this year, made numerous enemies during his years as a ranking security official and was viewed by many Palestinians as corrupt.

He had survived several assassination attempts, most recently in October when a car parked nearby exploded as his convoy was leaving the main security headquarters in Gaza City. Arafat was not injured.

The shooting may stem from infighting among the rival forces that have sown disorder in Gaza since Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's death in November.

Moussa Arafat had headed the powerful military intelligence agency since arriving in Gaza in 1994, when the Palestinian Authority was created as a result of the Oslo peace accords.

Over the years, he tangled with Palestinian militants, spearheading a crackdown on Hamas in the mid-1990s.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas removed Arafat from his post but kept him as an advisor.

Transatlantic Divide Deep, Not So Wide, Poll Finds (LAT)

By Sebastian Rotella

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

PARIS — Europeans and Americans have often starkly different views of each other and the world, but agree on some major issues such as promoting democracy and avoiding war with Iran, according to a survey being released today.

As Western leaders try to mend rifts exacerbated since 2003 by the Iraq war, the fourth annual study of European and U.S. public opinion by the German Marshall Fund depicts a complex, wary transatlantic relationship. But the report, an advanced copy of which was given to The Times, also contradicts stereotypes and common wisdom.

Although a majority of Europeans remain hostile to American global dominance and President Bush in particular, they are enthusiastic about the centerpiece of Bush's foreign policy: promoting democracy around the world.

Despite three major terrorist attacks in Europe during the last two years and increased debate about the difficulties of integrating a large Muslim population, Europeans fear terrorism, Islamic extremism and immigration less than Americans do, according to the survey.

And Americans agree with Europeans that the European Union, an economic giant but a military dwarf, should evolve into a global superpower even if that means Europe asserts increasing independence.

The findings reflect the fact that the U.S. and Europe work well together in many places other than Iraq, said John K. Glenn of the German Marshall Fund, a U.S.-European think tank that studies and promotes transatlantic relations.

"The rift over Iraq has taken longer to heal than expected, but things haven't gotten worse," said Glenn, the fund's director of foreign policy, who is based in Washington. "There are very real differences in the way that Americans and Europeans view the world…. You have to separate out the trauma of Iraq, which has been more enduring, more searing if you will, for Europeans than Americans might have expected. The data shows enough common ground that I don't think we are at the beginning of a civilizational split."

DOJ_NMG_0003433

The report compiles polling data from the United States, Britain, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, Slovakia, Spain and Turkey, which straddles the Asian and European continents and aspires to join the EU. Pollsters questioned about 1,000 men and women in each country and identified a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

The questions were designed to take the "temperature" of the transatlantic relationship. If Europe and the U.S. were a married couple, the findings suggest that divorce is not imminent, but aggressive counseling would be a good idea.

Europeans have "moderately warm" feelings toward Americans overall, the survey found. Britons and Italians are the most positive, Spaniards and Turks the most anti-American.

In contrast, the survey found, "Americans give their European allies more positive evaluations." The surge of anti-French feeling after Paris' leadership in opposing the Iraq invasion has apparently abated. American warmth toward France increased for the second year in a row, going from 45 to 53 on a scale of 1 to 100. Because European politics tend to be further to the left than those in the U.S., ideological antipathy to the Bush administration shapes European attitudes.

But Europeans agree with the president's drive for democracy in the Middle East and elsewhere, the centerpiece of his foreign policy in his second term, the survey found.

About 74% of European respondents, compared with 51% of Americans, want their governments to help establish democracy in other countries. The breakdown in responses among Americans was 76% among Republican voters and 43% of Democrats, probably because the latter associate the "democracy promotion" phrase with Bush, Glenn said.

That means European views on the matter resemble those of the GOP, contradicting at least on this issue the image of Democrats as being ideologically closer to Europe.

Both Americans and Europeans favor "soft" tactics such as election monitoring over use of force to spread democracy, the poll found.

"There are unexpected areas where Europeans and Americans can work together if we separate military intervention as an exceptional case from overall policies," Glenn said.

In fact, the Bush administration teams with France and other European allies in hot spots such as Ukraine, where they collaborated in helping reformists take power; Lebanon, where they joined to pressure Syrian forces to leave; and Afghanistan, where European troops play a front-line role.

The public on both continents backs the EU diplomatic approach to the dispute with Iran over Tehran's nuclear ambitions. Only 5% of Europeans and 15% of Americans support a military solution. And slim majorities want human rights reforms in China as a condition for increased trade with Beijing.

Nonetheless, the transatlantic divide widens when it comes to global threats. Americans consistently see the world as a more dangerous place.

"Americans feel significantly more likely to be personally affected by terrorism (71% vs. 53% of Europeans), by the spread of nuclear weapons (67% vs. 55%) and by Islamic fundamentalism (50% vs. 40%)," the report says. At the same time, Europeans worry more than Americans (73% to 64%) about global warming, the survey found.

A key factor for the divergence is the resounding effect on the American psyche of the Sept. 11 attacks, Glenn said.

U.S. Fails To Mend Image In Europe (WSJ)

By Marc Champion

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

LONDON -- Months after President Bush launched a campaign to repair strained relations with Europe, he has made no progress with Europe's public.

An annual survey of opinion in 11 countries published today finds that, while the U.S.'s image no longer is sliding downward, Europeans feel no warmer toward the U.S. than they did a year ago, are no less hostile to U.S. global leadership and still disapprove overwhelmingly of the way Mr. Bush handles foreign policy.

"We found that, despite major efforts to repair relations, there is still a rift in how we view each other and the world," said Craig Kennedy, president of the German Marshall Fund, which conducted the survey of roughly 1,000 people in the U.S. and about 1,000 people in each of nine European Union countries, plus Turkey, in June.

DOJ_NMG_0003434

After his re-election last year, Mr. Bush selected Europe for the first trip of his second term and visited Brussels, home to the EU institutions, and Germany. His new secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, had just visited Paris on her tour to prepare the visit. The efforts were intended to offer an olive branch to the countries that opposed the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003.

With Mr. Bush's fellow leaders, also eager to repair bridges, his outreach seemed to work. Since last year, the U.S. has cooperated closely with France to help push Syria out of Lebanon; it has held out the possibility of World Trade Organization membership to Iran in an effort to help the Europeans negotiate nuclear concessions from that country; and it has gained some credit for Israel's pullout from the Gaza Strip. A disagreement over the EU's plan to lift its arms embargo on China also receded when the EU delayed a decision in June.

For the wider public, however, continuing bloodshed and instability in Iraq dominate. Since the poll was taken, the recent hurricane disaster on the U.S. Gulf Coast also appears to have rekindled distaste for the U.S.'s political system and social values, which are blamed here for leaving thousands of mainly poor and black New Orleans residents behind when the rest of the city evacuated.

"A presidential visit to Europe doesn't counteract all the media attention to the Iraq war," Mr. Kennedy said.

The survey points up some bedrock differences between American and European values. For example, more Americans than Europeans consistently favor the use of force and economic sanctions, while fewer Americans worry about global warming.

Hostility toward U.S. foreign policies also is clear in the 10 non-U.S. countries surveyed: France, Germany, the U.K., Italy, the Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, Spain, Slovakia and Turkey. Some 36% of Europeans think it is desirable that the U.S. exert strong global leadership, while 59% don't -- almost identical to last year and approximately the inverse of findings in 2002. The survey's margin of error was plus or minus three percentage points.

Similarly, 23% of Europeans approve and 72% disapprove of the way Mr. Bush handles foreign policy -- compared with 20% who approved last year and 75% who disapproved. Asked to say how warmly they felt about countries on a scale of 1 to 100, Europeans gave the U.S. 50 -- compared with 52 last year and 64 in 2002. Britons remain warmest to the U.S., at 57, down from 62 last year. Turks remain the coolest, at 28.

The survey also found that European hostility toward EU membership for Turkey is growing as the start of membership talks approaches on Oct. 3. Just 22% of Europeans outside Turkey said its membership would be a good thing, compared with 30% a year earlier.

Zoellick Details Discussions With China On Future Of The Korean Peninsula (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her deputy, Robert B. Zoellick, have begun to explore with Chinese leaders the economic and political future of the Korean Peninsula "because the status quo was not going to hold," Zoellick said in an interview with a small group of reporters yesterday.

China is North Korea's chief patron, supplying much of its energy, and has played an important role in prodding the reclusive communist country to return to six-nation talks about the elimination of its nuclear programs. The talks are in recess but could resume as early as next week.

Zoellick, who held nearly 20 hours of talks on a variety of issues in Beijing in early August, said it was clear the Chinese did not "want a collapsed state on their border," a concern that he suggested had hamstrung Chinese officials in pressing North Korea on its illicit weapons programs. He said that in his talks, he picked up a discussion on the Korean Peninsula's future that Rice had initiated during an earlier trip to Beijing.

"Part of what I was trying to explain to them was that the status quo was not going to hold anyway," Zoellick said. "The status quo wouldn't hold in part because we would have to take defensive countermeasures of various types" against not only Pyongyang's nuclear activities but counterfeiting and other criminal activities. "It's a criminal state," he said.

The effort by Rice and Zoellick appeared to be aimed at reducing the anxiety of the Chinese over a possible reunification of North and South Korea. The North is viewed by China as a buffer against having U.S. troops close to China's border.

DOJ_NMG_0003435

Zoellick also suggested that the United States was interested in using the six-nation talks -- which also include South Korea, Russia and Japan -- as a springboard for creating a multilateral security framework for northern Asia that would mirror organizations in the southeastern part of the continent.

Zoellick said he urged the Chinese to consider scenarios for the Korean Peninsula that "would be benign to us and which would be benign to them." He said he told the Chinese that the United States had always supported reunification and emphasized that "we think it would be healthy if the North Koreans took a Chinese model of economic development."

President Bush postponed a planned visit to the White House today by Chinese President Hu Jintao to continue dealing with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. The visit has not been rescheduled, but Bush and Hu will meet on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly next week.

Zoellick said that the Chinese, preoccupied with managing internal challenges, indicated they were puzzled by the anxiety in Washington over China's economic rise.

He said he tried to explain why China's integration into the world economy had generated such concern, although yesterday he offered a relatively benign interpretation of Chinese intentions in the energy field.

Zoellick said that in a global marketplace, China cannot simply lock up energy resources, as some have feared. He said that if China obtains its oil from Venezuela, a major U.S. supplier, he did not feel the United States would be "threatened . . . because if it is an emergency situation and we had to interrupt the energy flow, would you rather interrupt it in the Caribbean or in Russia?"

He said he did not know if the Chinese deals being struck with countries the United States considers problematic were driven by individual bureaucracies seeking market openings or part of a "strategic plan."

But Zoellick said he warned the Chinese that the deals with such countries as Sudan, Burma and Iran had the prospect of backfiring, from a broader foreign policy perspective, because "what advantage do you really gain over time if you are associated with genocide and guys who are running their countries into the ground?"

Rural Activist Seized In Beijing (WP)

By Philip P. Pan

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

BEIJING, Sept. 6 -- Local authorities on Tuesday seized a rural activist who has been leading a high-profile legal campaign against the use of forced sterilization and abortion in China, in an apparent effort to block him from meeting with senior government officials who had expressed support for his cause.

The detention of Chen Guangcheng, 34, a blind peasant who has been preparing a class-action lawsuit to challenge population-control abuses in the eastern city of Linyi, occurred a few days after he arrived in Beijing for meetings with lawyers and journalists. He was seized just as the Chinese government opened an international legal conference here.

Several men in plain clothes grabbed Chen when he left an apartment building on Tuesday afternoon, witnesses said. The men did not identify themselves, and Chen resisted, shouting for help as they dragged him across a parking lot and pushed him headfirst into an unmarked car with tinted windows, the witnesses said.

A small group of people, upset by seeing the rough treatment, surrounded the vehicle and prevented it from driving away. As two men held Chen down in the back seat, he could be heard screaming and appeared to be in pain.

Residents called Beijing police. Two uniformed officers arrived, consulted with the men who had seized Chen, then cleared a way for the car to leave. The officers said the men who seized Chen were police from China's Shandong province, where Linyi is located. Tu Bisheng, a friend who was with Chen at the time, said local officials from Linyi were also present.

"We feel this is extremely inappropriate," said Li Heping, one of the lawyers working with Chen. He said the Linyi officials appeared to be "taking revenge on him for trying to protect the rights of local citizens and exercising his right to criticize the government."

A spokesman for the Shandong public security bureau said he knew nothing about Chen's detention and declined to accept questions about the case.

DOJ_NMG_0003436

Chen was seized just hours after meeting with a reporter who works for Time magazine, Tu said. Over the past few days, Chen also met with a Washington Post correspondent, diplomats from the U.S. Embassy and several lawyers in Beijing who have volunteered to help him sue officials in Linyi, a city of 10 million located about 400 miles southeast of Beijing.

In March, residents said, the Linyi government began requiring parents with two children to be sterilized and forcing women pregnant with a third child to have abortions. Officials also have been detaining family members of such people who fled, beating them and holding them hostage until their relatives return and submit to the operations, according to residents interviewed in Linyi.

Chen's attempt to organize a class-action lawsuit against Linyi was the subject of a report in The Washington Post on Aug. 27. At the time, officials in Beijing said the practices described by Linyi residents were illegal and expressed support for the lawsuit.

After publication of the article, the National Population and Family Planning Commission, the cabinet-level ministry that manages population growth in China, sent a team of officials to investigate the allegations in Linyi. The investigators tried to meet with Chen, but he had already traveled to Beijing.

In an interview before his arrest, Chen said he was thinking about meeting with commission officials, but was worried about being arrested.

A commission official, contacted by telephone, said the ministry was unaware of Chen's detention and could not immediately comment on it. The official said the ministry would try to contact Shandong authorities to determine what happened to Chen. The ministry considers the Linyi case a priority and will severely punish family planning officials who violate the law, the official said.

Provincial authorities wield tremendous power in China's one-party political system and often disobey ministries in the central government. But the seizure of Chen represents an unusually public act of defiance, which could embarrass the governing Communist Party as it seeks to project an image that it has abandoned coercive methods to limit population growth.

Local officials throughout China began using forced abortions and compulsory sterilization to enforce the one-child policy in the early 1980s, but the central government since the mid-1990s has tried to eliminate such practices and move toward a more flexible system of economic rewards and fines to slow population growth.

Jerome Cohen, a specialist on Chinese law at New York University who is teaching in Beijing this fall, said he met with Chen on Monday night and discussed the risks of the lawsuit with him. Chen was determined to press ahead, Cohen said.

"This seems to be a case of local officials who have blatantly abused their legal powers, and have no legitimate defense against the case he brought against them, resorting to extralegal methods to cut off his ability to pursue justice," Cohen said. "It's very, very sad, and another example of how rough the legal situation is in rural areas."

For First Time, Egypt Has More Than 1 Presidential Candidate (USAT)

By Charles Levinson

USA Today, September 7, 2005

CAIRO — Egyptians will have a choice for the first time in their country's 7,000-year history when they vote for a leader at polls today. But a majority appear likely to vote for the man who has ruled this country for the past 24 years.

President Hosni Mubarak, 77, who is running for a fifth six-year term, is backed by a formidable party machine and a regime that controls the media, the economy and the government.

“No one seriously doubts that Mubarak is going to win a fifth term in Egypt's first competitive presidential elections," says Michael C. Dunn, editor of The Middle East Journal, a quarterly publication of the Middle East Institute. “Because of the nature of the elections — the high bar for independent candidates, which virtually prevents their running, and the restrictions on who may run from a recognized party, which prevents Muslim Brotherhood candidates from standing under another party banner — many dismiss the whole exercise. It is certainly not a competitive race in any normal sense."

Mubarak has been elected four times, but always in single candidate yes-no referendums. In February, facing growing pressure at home and abroad, he announced that Egypt would hold its first multi-candidate presidential election.

DOJ_NMG_0003437

Of the nine men challenging Mubarak, only two are widely known. Noman Gomaa, 71, leads the weak Wafd Party. Ayman Nour, 41, is a lawyer who took the helm of the 11-month-old Tomorrow Party, which is competing against long-established and well-organized parties. Both are self-identified liberals. The Muslim Brotherhood, a better organized Islamic opposition group, has been banned for 50 years.

Egypt is contending with double-digit unemployment and inflation. Still, many voters remain loyal to Mubarak. In a region beset by conflict, Mubarak has guided Egypt through a period of protracted stability. Egyptians who remember the wars and tumult of earlier eras say they are thankful to Mubarak.

"I care about my children, and we haven't had a war," says Eid Tilib, 57, a teacher with rutty scars on his legs and arms from the 1967 and 1973 wars against Israel. "I know Mubarak is old, and there are problems. There is unemployment. But Mubarak has protected my children, so I must protect him."

Today's vote follows three weeks of rare political openness. During the 19-day campaign, opposition candidates toured the country freely, staged public rallies and railed against corruption, unemployment — and even Mubarak. A few years ago, few dared to publicly criticize the president. "This is a total mindset change for the country that is going to enrich the political system," says Hossam Badrawi, a Mubarak campaign official.

However, a government-appointed election commission has been given unimpeachable powers over the vote. It rejected a court ruling allowing independent monitors. A higher court then supported the commission's decision. The government also has ignored requests by the Bush administration to allow international observers.

Angry over the refusal to allow monitors, hundreds of judges, the traditional overseers of Egyptian elections, have begun to speak out. They say there is nothing to prevent widespread fraud. .

"Egyptians are no longer afraid," says Saad Eddin Ibrahim, a democracy advocate jailed by the regime in 2000 after he pointed out electoral fraud. Ibrahim, speaking Tuesday at the Woodrow Wilson Center for International Scholars in Washington, said Egypt still doesn't have democracy as it is known in the West. "That will take another generation," Ibrahim says.

Germans Lean To Right (CSM)

By Andreas Tzortzis

The Christian Science Monitor, September 7, 2005

BERLIN - A few days after the only TV debate between Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and his conservative challenger Angela Merkel in the run-up to Sept. 18 elections, the verdict was almost unanimous.

The media-savvy chancellor had, as expected, won the exchange, according to flash polls. But Germans elect parties, not the main candidates. And for three months, those poll numbers have shown Mr. Schroeder's Social Democratic Party (SPD) a good 10 points behind Ms. Merkel's Christian Democratic Union (CDU) - pointing to a growing likelihood that the former East German physicist will end the chancellor's seven-year rule.

In a campaign that has taken cues from US-style spin and image-shaping, a Merkel win would bring a shift to the right that promises better communication with the US, a critical voice in the pledge to include Turkey in the European Union, and - most important - a more aggressive approach to Germany's greatest problem: the economy.

Seven years since he made his promise to bring down unemployment to less than 3 million, the country's jobless number more than 4.7 million.

The economic situation, and the political defeats it has caused his party in several state elections over the past year, is what prompted Schroeder in May to call for elections one year early.

For the roughly 30 percent of people who polls show as undecided, Sunday's debate offered little that is new. The flash polls conducted after the debate showed people had more or less expected each candidate to perform as they did: Schroeder was confident and jovial; Merkel, not as warm, but very authoritative.

The impressions gell with the packaging that hordes of advisers and campaign staff for the country's two major parties had fashioned for their lead candidates at rousing party congresses and flashy stump speeches ahead of Sunday's debate. If the methods employed - campaign theme songs, bus tours throughout the country, even call centers - look familiar, it's because they are. In shaping their candidates and messages, the parties are increasingly borrowing methods fashioned and perfected in the United States, say former media advisors and analysts.

DOJ_NMG_0003438

"The Americanization of German campaigning is, above all, a professionalization of the campaigns," says Michael Spreng.

In 2002, Mr. Spreng managed the conservative candidate Edmund Stoiber's failed campaign bid to unseat Schroeder as chancellor. The election marked the first time in Germany candidates held televised debates with one another. Spreng sent an assistant to the US to research debate rules and watch videotape of past debates.

The 2005 campaign has seen even more borrowed elements from the US. Merkel's campaign team has set up a professional call center to handle queries from voters, and a so-called "rapid response" team that contradicts inaccuracies made by Schroeder in speeches or attacks on his opponent, says a CDU campaign official.

The conservatives' party congress, held on Aug. 21, featured a one-and-a-half-hour performance by singers from the musical "Queen" and the arrival of Merkel to raucous cheers and a sea of orange placards bearing the name "Angie," a very un-German nickname given the candidate by her campaign and likely designed to broaden her appeal.

"It was completely new in the party's history," says the official. "Almost the entire party congress was designed with show and television in mind. It was pretty modern for a conservative, white-bread party like ours."

Like the party's use of the Rolling Stones song "Angie" at stump speeches, the congress was designed to lend a little flash to a candidate who voters think of as capable, but uninspiring, says the official. "We wanted to stir up some emotions," he says.

The SPD offered a toned-down version of their party congress last week in order to serve as a contrast to the conservatives. Campaign manager Kajo Wasserhoevel said the party will use grass-roots methods like canvassing - that the SPD first learned by watching John F. Kennedy's campaign in 1960 - in the final weeks. But the party will continue to personalize the campaign, building on Schroeder's high popularity ratings in an effort to sway voters to his party.

"We want to show his strengths, his courage in reforming the country and his work for peace," says Mr. Wasserhoevel.

Some critics say this type of personalization is strange in a political system where the party, not the individual, is the focal point and worry about a campaign future based on style, not substance. But campaign veterans like Peter Radunski, a political consultant and former campaign manager for Chancellor Helmut Kohl, say it's the natural development in the age of television, and with a candidate as telegenic and accomplished in front of the camera as Schroeder.

"You could call it Americanization, but you could also call it a modernization," says Mr. Radunski. "If there's television, then you should use it."

There are some things German strategists will never be able to copy. Broadcast rules restrict campaign ads to being shown only on select channels in the evening time, sparing voters an avalanche of campaign spots.

German campaigns will also never be able to match the money shelled out by US Democrats and Republicans. Germans typically don't contribute to campaigns, and the 25 million euros ($31 million) the SPD is planning to spend and the 23 euros million the CDU will spend, pale in comparison to the figures spent on the other side of the Atlantic. Even if they had such cash, Spreng says a complete adoption of American campaign tactics would be a waste of money.

"It's never going to be as showy as in America," says Spreng. "The voters understand it's part of a show ... but they know not to mix more politics and show business. The Germans are more fact-based and skeptical."

Venezuela Seizes Idled Plant Of Heinz Subsidiary (WSJ/DJN)

By Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

CARACAS, Venezuela -- Alimentos Heinz, a Venezuela subsidiary of H.J. Heinz Co., said a government takeover of an inactive tomato-processing plant in recent days lacks legal backing.

The company, which makes Heinz ketchup, yesterday said the government never notified it of a possible takeover or of any plans to expropriate the plant.

"We hope the reasons for these actions are clarified since the company has received no notice from the authorities about the intervention/expropriation," the company said.

Heinz officials couldn't be reached for additional comment.

DOJ_NMG_0003439

The plant, in the state of Maturin, wasn't operating because low market demand and low prices didn't make it feasible to keep it running, the company said. Company officials are seeking a meeting with Vice President José Vicente Rangel and Agriculture Ministry officials to discuss the problem, the statement added.

A Venezuelan state governor ordered the military to seize the inactive plant late last week.

State officials said the takeover sought to protect the plant from looting.

President Hugo Chávez has warned that idle land and company assets could be declared as "public interest" and expropriated. His government already has seized the assets of two failed companies by first sending in troops to secure the assets and then approving an expropriation in Congress.

The Chávez government has recently taken over the grain-storage facilities of Alimentos Polar, the largest food company in Venezuela. Polar also is disputing the takeover.

Why Japan Seems Content To Be Run By One Party (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

TOKYO, Sept. 6 - The Liberal Democratic Party, which has governed Japan nearly continuously for half a century, appears headed for another victory in the general election on Sunday - a big one, if polls are correct.

And this will delay, again, the start of a new political era in which power is transferred regularly from one party to another, as it is in other democracies.

Japan's democracy is East Asia's oldest, but its ruling party has held power almost as long as the Communist parties in China and North Korea. Younger democracies in South Korea and Taiwan have already experienced changes in ruling parties, and the underpinnings of democracies, from vibrant civil societies to strong, independent news media, appear to be flourishing there more than they are here.

Since calling an early election last month, Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi has shrewdly refashioned the image of the Liberal Democrats into the party of reform by fielding telegenic women as candidates and portraying opponents of his signature postal privatization bill as reactionaries. The main opposition Democratic Party, whose gains in recent years now face erosion, has looked on helplessly.

In the past, when issues were rarely raised in campaigns, politicians ran simply by promising favors to supporters, said Masayasu Kitagawa, a former Liberal Democratic lawmaker, independent governor of Mie Prefecture and now a professor at Waseda University.

"The relationship was that of patron and client," Mr. Kitagawa said. "This was not actually democracy, but rather the opposite of democracy."

To encourage political accountability and voter awareness, Mr. Kitagawa has been the leading proponent of election "manifestoes" detailing parties' agendas. The word and concept was little understood in the general election two years ago, but it has taken root this time, with both main parties proffering their manifestoes.

"I'd be satisfied if the introduction of manifestoes made Japanese realize that what they had believed to be democracy was an illusion," he said.

The illusion was formed in 1955 with the foundation of the Liberal Democratic Party, which focused single-mindedly on turning Japan into an economic power. With strong support from the United States and the powerful bureaucracy, as well as effective pork-barrel politics, the party's grip on power went unshaken for decades.

Internal factions vied for power, but decisions were made and some prime ministers even chosen in backroom deals. Because of the cold war and Japan's military dependence on the United States, the longtime opposition, the Socialists, were never taken seriously.

Voters feared that "the friendly Japan-U.S. relationship would be destroyed and Japan would become poor once more if the L.D.P. government collapsed and the Socialists came to power," said Eiji Oguma, an associate professor of policy management at Keio University.

DOJ_NMG_0003440

A split inside the party led to a 10-month ouster from power in 1993. During that brief period, however, a coalition of minor parties pushed through far-reaching reforms, including changing multiseat districts into single-seat ones, that would eventually weaken the dominance of the Liberal Democrats.

The present main opposition Democratic Party, which was formed in 1998, has been gaining voters in recent years, especially in urban areas. But the half-century rule by a single party has stunted the growth of Japanese democracy, experts say, and its effects are still being felt today.

Civil society remains weak. Although private organizations focusing on welfare and international aid have mushroomed in recent years, those delving into delicate issues, like human rights, freedom of information and the workings of government, wield little influence. Japanese feel little personal connection with their country's democracy, said Yukiko Miki, executive director of Information Clearinghouse Japan, a private group that fights to gain access to government-held information.

"Japanese citizens are ultimate free riders," Ms. Miki said. "Support from citizens is necessary to form a base for democracy, but Japanese people don't seem to feel they are the ones who should support civil society."

The Liberal Democrats' grip on power has also limited the dissemination of information. For instance, the Internet has raised interest in elections elsewhere and was widely credited with helping propel South Korea's president, Roh Moo Hyun, to power in 2003. But here in one of the world's most wired countries, election law bars Web sites from promoting candidates for a specific election and candidates from renewing their home pages during the 12-day campaign period.

The Liberal Democrats have maintained the restrictions because their core supporters tend to be older and are not likely to be heavy Internet users.

Yoshito Hori, an entrepreneur, recently created the YES! Project, a Web site that encourages young Japanese to vote and discuss politics. "By using the Internet, you can reach people in their 20's to their early 40's, people who were uninterested in politics," Mr. Hori said.

With no history of power alternation, the mass media tend to stick to the Liberal Democratic Party's line. In this election, the press has ignored issues like Mr. Koizumi's policy toward Asian countries or his deployment of troops to Iraq that would likely hurt the party at the ballot box. (The opposition Democratic Party has said it would withdraw Japanese troops from Iraq and repair relations with its Asian neighbors.) Since April 2004, no major Japanese news organization has sent a journalist to cover the Japanese troops in Samawa, in southern Iraq.

Just as these pillars of Japanese democracy tend to be tenuous, experts doubt the soundness of the main Democratic Party opposition. The party, made up of former Liberal Democrats, Socialists and other groups, famously lacks unity and could disintegrate if it loses badly.

But Park Cheol Hee, an expert in Japanese politics at Seoul National University, said a more mature democracy was set to emerge here.

"This is the last stage of one-party rule," Mr. Park said. "I don't think the L.D.P. will rule for another 50 years - possibly another 5 or 10. The Democratic Party might fail this time, but they will try again. This will eventually produce a competitive, two-party system and lead Japan to a true democracy."

As Japan Votes, Aid To Countryside Hangs In Balance (WSJ)

By Sebastian Moffett And Ginny Parker Woods

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

HIWA, Japan -- In elections this Sunday, Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi is betting he can win a mandate to engineer a shift no other Japanese leader has ever dared. His goal: To cut off the decades-long tradition of propping up Japan's declining countryside, and channel resources into the nation's successful cities and industries instead.

To achieve that vision, Mr. Koizumi plans to dismantle one of the countryside's biggest crutches, the huge and unusual post office, which in addition to selling stamps also acts as a bank and insurer. It is a vast network of 26,000 offices with 280,000 public employees, plus $3 trillion in savings and life-insurance deposits. The deposits are typically funneled into public-spending projects that have boosted rural economies.

DOJ_NMG_0003441

That system has long been a boon to remote villages like Hiwa in the mountains of western Japan. Hiwa's 600 residents are mainly elderly and get around on electric wheelchairs. Its only industry is rice farming.

Hiwa has benefited from many public-works projects through the post office, such as a new tunnel and a smooth road partly connecting the village to a neighboring town -- even though there's hardly any traffic. When the weather is bad, the local postmaster helps residents by withdrawing their cash from the post-office bank and delivering it to their doors.

"It would be tough if the post office went away," says 88-year-old Shizue Miura, who walked 20 minutes to the post office recently to withdraw money. Without the branch, Ms. Miura says she would have to travel more than six miles to the next village to get her money from a different branch.

Mr. Koizumi says bitter medicine is the only way for Japan to survive. The country's central government stoked rural economies for more than three decades with road and bridge projects, trying to haul up the countryside to city levels of prosperity. But the attempt to invigorate the rural economies failed. The spending added to snowballing national debt, which is now 163% of gross domestic product, the highest level among major industrialized nations. In the U.S., national debt is 66% of GDP, according to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development.

So Mr. Koizumi is withdrawing support for villages like Hiwa. Since taking office in 2001, he has promoted a small-government recipe for Japan, slashing subsidies to the regions. "They said there's no money anymore," says Katsumasa Miyake, who leads policy planning for the prefecture government of Shimane, where Hiwa is located. "Part of the process of putting the national finances right is that the regions have to suffer."

Mr. Koizumi is betting Japan's future on proven successes. That means big cities like the capital Tokyo, which is emerging from the nation's "lost decade" of economic gloom and is bustling with new office and shopping developments. It also includes private corporations, many of which have reported record profits over the past two years, spurred by deregulation and lowered corporate taxes that Mr. Koizumi put in place.

Mr. Koizumi's attempt to overhaul Japan is crucial to the world's second-largest economy. The country entered a long slump in the early 1990s after its stock and property bubbles burst. When Mr. Koizumi took office, prices of land, industrial products and consumer goods were falling steadily in the economy-shrinking phenomenon known as deflation. Japan's financial system was also jammed with bad loans made during the bubble era.

Since 2003, the economy has brightened, fueled by corporate cost cutting and surging exports to China's roaring manufacturing sector. Mr. Koizumi's policies have also helped. Following a bank-cleanup package in 2002, bad loans are now less than half their 2002 total of $480 billion. Unemployment has fallen to 4.4% from a 2002 peak of 5.5%. The economy grew 2% in 2003 and 1.9% in 2004, and economists are expecting similar growth this year.

Still, Japan's fast-aging population and declining birthrate are causing a long-term decline in the size of the total work force. With fewer workers, the country could find it hard to grow. One solution is to use resources more efficiently so each Japanese worker produces more.

Mr. Koizumi called the election last month after failing to pass bills to privatize the post office. He has vowed to revive the plan if he wins. In the bills, Mr. Koizumi proposed splitting the post office into four separate and privatized businesses -- one each for mail delivery, banking services and insurance, with a fourth handling employee salaries and managing post-office properties. If the plan had been put in place, postal workers would have lost their civil-servant status. The privatization process would have kicked off in 2007, and the post office would sell shares in its four companies by 2017.

The bills were rejected largely because of the workings of parliamentary politics. The main opposition Democratic Party of Japan voted against the bills because they favor a different form of post-office privatization. In a crucial swing vote, some rebel lawmakers from Mr. Koizumi's ruling Liberal Democratic Party also opposed the bills.

Postal privatization has since gained public support because Mr. Koizumi's risky and dramatic decision to call an election over the issue appealed to voters. According to the most recent poll by the daily newspaper Sankei Shimbun, 38% of respondents supported Mr. Koizumi and the LDP, compared with just 20% for the opposition Democratic Party. If his party and a coalition fail to win a majority of seats, Mr. Koizumi says he will resign, clouding the future of his plan.

All of this leaves provinces like Shimane on edge. The prefecture thrived under Japan's old system. With its local industries -- silver mining and charcoal -- long dead, Shimane received a steady flow of public-works projects from the central government, some of which were financed by savings in the post-office bank. The prefecture has two airports, even though it is sparsely populated. Public investment is 15.7% of the prefecture's gross domestic product, compared with 2.1% for Tokyo, according to the San-in Economics and Management Institute, a research center affiliated with Shimane's biggest bank.

DOJ_NMG_0003442

But these projects failed to spark momentum. One airport has just four flights a day. A 50-acre industrial estate set up near Hiwa in 1997 attracted one company. The estate is now being converted into a prison complex. Five years ago, a city government built a $60 million bridge to a nearby island with 324 inhabitants. It said it planned to build a fish breeding center there, but the facility hasn't materialized.

Since Mr. Koizumi took office, the value of public works in Shimane has been cut sharply. In 2004, the spending fell to $998 million, down 32% from $1.5 billion in 2002. It is set to halve again by 2008.

While reducing subsidies to the regions, Mr. Koizumi has lowered corporate taxes and boosted tax breaks for technology investments. In response, more than 760 large Japanese manufacturers surveyed by the nation's Ministry of Economy, Trade and Industry recently said they plan to increase domestic capital investment by 21% in the fiscal year through March 2006 over the previous year. Foreign firms such as Pfizer Inc. and Cisco Systems Inc. are also increasing their investment in Japan. Mr. Koizumi has "crafted a lot of policies that benefit companies," says Yoshiharu Obata, an official at the Keidanren, Japan's largest business organization.

As Shimane struggles, Tokyo is thriving. Tokyo's land prices began rising this year for the first time in 13 years, while Shimane's continued to fall. Tokyo's population has grown to 12.2 million, up 5.2% from 11.6 million in 1997. Shimane's population has fallen 20% to 749,000, down from a 1955 peak of 929,000. A quarter of its residents are over 60, making Shimane Japan's oldest prefecture.

The migration to cities will likely increase as Japan's population declines and ages, says Hiroyuki Tada, general manager of the Space and Environment Institute, a research institute at Mitsui Fudosan Co., one of the country's largest real-estate developers. He says the elderly will relocate to urban areas where medical care is concentrated. Younger people are also moving to cities to find jobs.

That trend is apparent to Shimane resident Toshimitsu Fukushima. The 70-year-old worked for telephone company Nippon Telegraph & Telephone Corp. in Shimane's biggest city, Matsue, where he met his wife nearly half a century ago. He maintained wireless equipment and she worked in the telephone exchange. "Fifty years ago there were more jobs," he says. "Now there is no need for those kinds of jobs."

All three of Mr. Fukushima's children have moved to the Tokyo area. His son, Masao, 41, works for a big shipping company and says in an interview that he plans to spend his working life in the city. He envies high-school friends who stayed in Shimane for their spacious homes with yards, while he lives in a small apartment in central Tokyo. But, he says, "I couldn't return home to Shimane if I wanted to -- there's hardly any work there."

Shimane voters are split over Mr. Koizumi's plans. In the past, they always delivered an LDP representative to the national parliament in Tokyo. But this time, postal reform has complicated matters.

Mr. Koizumi is refusing to let the rebel LDP politicians who voted against the postal bills to stand as party candidates. One of those is Shimane politician Hisaoki Kamei, 65, who is now running as a candidate for a small, newly formed party in the western part of the prefecture, which includes Hiwa.

Mr. Kamei's posters call him the "Friend of the Common People." He doesn't like Mr. Koizumi's administration, which he says has widened the gaps between the city and country, large and small business, and the rich and poor. "You have to have public infrastructure that allows people everywhere -- in the cities and the country -- to have the same quality of life," he says. "Otherwise, the countryside is just going to become harder and harder to live in."

Mr. Kamei's opponent, the official LDP candidate, is Wataru Takeshita, half-brother of a former prime minister. Mr. Takeshita supports postal privatization.

One voter, Kazuharu Shimogaki, is president of a construction company in central Shimane, and did well out of Japan's old system. At its peak in 1995, his company, Shimogaki Construction Co., generated $5.5 million of revenue from publicly funded civil-engineering projects.

DOJ_NMG_0003443

Today, such work brings in just a tenth of that amount. Mr. Shimogaki has branched out to new businesses like growing blueberries, which are popular among Japan's elderly after reports several years ago that the fruit may be good for eyes.

Mr. Shimogaki accepts the days of big public works projects are over, and thinks it's time to move on and develop new businesses rather than cling to the past. So he has decided to vote for Mr. Takeshita as a way of backing Mr. Koizumi. "Japan has come to a turning point," he says.

In Hiwa, many residents aren't as confident. Mr. Koizumi's postal bills provided some funds to maintain the post-office network. But because a privatized organization would have to try to make a profit, village locals assume those funds wouldn't last. Eventually, many believe, branches such as Hiwa Post Office would disappear.

Hiwa Postmaster Chikashi Teramoto, the local postmaster for the past 16 years, won't say which way he plans to vote. But the 46-year-old admits to being concerned about the future of the shrinking village. The automated teller machine at the local agricultural cooperative, the only one in the village besides the one at the post office, is scheduled to disappear next year. After that, without the post office, villagers would have to travel through a 1.5-mile tunnel to the next village to withdraw their pension money.

"What would happen if a wheelchair battery went dead in the tunnel?" Mr. Teramoto says.

On a recent outing, Mr. Teramoto surveyed Hiwa. An elderly couple struggled to gather the first rice of their harvest from a paddy field. He pointed to a building that looks inhabitable. "That's an empty house," he said. "They've gone to Osaka," the biggest city in western Japan. Further along the road, he pointed again: "They've gone to Hiroshima."

Chirac's Illness Remains A Mystery, Despite Official Details (NYT)

By Katrin Bennhold And Elisabeth Rosenthal, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

PARIS, Sept. 6 - After a series of minimalist medical bulletins describing President Jacques Chirac's stay in a Paris hospital, it is still a public mystery what kind of neurological malady has befallen him, although French military doctors at this point certainly know the diagnosis, independent experts said.

Because of the French tradition of secrecy regarding the health of its leaders, it is unclear if Mr. Chirac is suffering from a minor condition or a potentially life-threatening illness. He has not been seen on television since his admission.

The terse phrases officially released have sought to play down the illness, but they have often sounded like a contradiction in terms, talking of a "little vascular accident," and a "slight vision problem," which nonetheless merited a week's hospital stay.

A vascular accident means a problem with a blood vessel, which is almost always serious - or a signal of something serious to come. It includes strokes, torn blood vessels and clots that block vessels, causing damage to the eye or brain.

The most detailed official bulletin said only that Mr. Chirac had suffered from "a small-sized hematoma, explaining the isolated and limited character of his vision trouble." It did not say anything about the location of the hematoma, a pool of blood that has leaked outside blood vessels, or the cause.

Experts said the details that had been released did not add up to a clear-cut diagnosis. "The whole story is hard to put together," said John Pike-Spellman, professor of Neurology and Radiology at Columbia Presbyterian Hospital in New York.

But several neurologists agreed that Mr. Chirac had most likely suffered a small stroke at the back of the brain, as a result of high blood pressure, that is now slowly resolving. "If it was a small hemorrhage in that part of the brain it would explain the visual symptoms, that could be limited and settled down quickly," said Dr. Peter Rothwell, professor of clinical neurology at Oxford University.

He said the main reasons for hospitalization were to run tests and to control the patient's blood pressure in order to prevent subsequent incidents. After such strokes there is statistically a 10 percent to 20 percent chance of a second stroke in the next year, Dr. Rothwell said.

Dr. Olivier Simon, a neurologist at Bichat Hospital in Paris, said that when a brain vessel ruptured under the force of high blood pressure, the onset of symptoms was usually sudden, as it appears to have been for Mr. Chirac on Friday night. "We see this pretty regularly around here," he said. "A small artery probably burst in the posterior part of his brain, which is mostly linked to vision."

DOJ_NMG_0003444

After a full day of meeting and receptions last Friday, Mr. Chirac developed a bad headache and vision problems in one eye. It was presumably rather extreme, since he called the doctor. "The president is of a school where you don't complain about pain, you deal with it," an aide said.

He was admitted to Val de Grâce Military Hospital that night, although the hospitalization was not reported to the press or even government officials until the next day. Aides said he still tentatively planned to travel to a summit meeting at the United Nations in New York next week, although the foreign minister or prime minister would take his place if doctors advised against it.

President Chirac's sudden illness has reignited a debate about the secrecy traditionally surrounding the health of France's head of state.

The news media, opposition leaders and even politicians from the president's own political camp have sharply criticized his office for the sparse and vaguely phrased health updates issued in the past four days.

"In France, we practice a cult of secrecy which would have done the Kremlin in the former Soviet Union proud," Le Monde said in an editorial on Tuesday.

If Mr. Chirac has not had a stroke, other conditions that may explain the symptoms are bleeding in an eye itself, or the rupture of a brain aneurysm, a weak and bulging area of a blood vessels.

Leaking aneurysms tend to announce themselves with a severe headache and neurological symptoms - although those symptoms are seldom limited to a bit of vision loss in one eye. Instead they are generally catastrophic events that lead to death or severe disability.

Free Speech For Turkey (WP)

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

Orhan Pamuk, one of Turkey's most acclaimed writers, is facing up to three years in prison. His offense, according to the state prosecutor? "Public denigrating of Turkish identity." Specifically, Mr. Pamuk told a Swiss newspaper in February that certain topics were off-limits for discussion in Turkey -- citing the massacre of Armenians in 1915 and the more recent conflicts between Turkish security forces and Kurdish separatists. "Thirty-thousand Kurds were killed here, 1 million Armenians as well. And almost no one talks about it," he said. "Therefore, I do."

As mild as these comments sound to American ears, they touched off a firestorm in Turkey, where the government line is that the Armenian deaths were the consequence of war, not genocide, and public discussion of the issue is hazardous. The uproar over Mr. Pamuk's remarks, which included death threats and burnings of his books, culminated with the filing of the criminal case under Article 301/1 of the Turkish Penal Code, which applies criminal penalties to "a person who explicitly insults being a Turk, the Republic or Turkish Grand National Assembly." Under Turkish law, Mr. Pamuk isn't even permitted to comment on the charges before his case is heard in December.

The prosecution of Mr. Pamuk is, of course, outrageous; the charges should be dropped as soon as possible. The ill-advised use of this ill-advised provision to punish Mr. Pamuk contravenes Turkey's commitment to comply with the free-speech provisions of international agreements such as the European Convention on Human Rights. It's exactly the wrong signal for Turkey to be sending as Europe debates its admission to the European Union. As Mr. Pamuk's translator, Maureen Freely, wrote in the British newspaper the Independent, "There is no doubt that it will raise questions about the wisdom of Turkey's EU membership bid. How can it possibly claim to be a European country if it has such laws on the books, and if public prosecutors can bring such cases?"

This reaction, indeed, may be exactly what those pushing for a prosecution intended; the timing of the charges, as European ministers meet in Wales to discuss Turkey's membership, is suspicious. That makes it even more important for the national government, though it doesn't control the prosecutor who brought the case, to do what it can to halt this case and others like it. Turkey has made important strides in protecting freedom of expression in recent years, including reforming its penal code. The charges against Mr. Pamuk underscore how far it still has to go.

DOJ_NMG_0003445

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 2005 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Terrorist Had Plans For London Attacks (WT/UPI) 4
Briton To Urge Europe To Tighten Security (LAT) 4
Man Held In California Terrorism Probe Pleads Not Guilty (SACBEE) 5
Terror Suspect Pleads Not Guilty To Conspiracy Charges (KNBC-TV) 5
Boca Doctor Charged With Supporting Al Qaeda Denied Bail (MH) 7
Government's Doctors: Man Accused Of Mall Bomb Plot Faked Illness (ABJ/AP) 7
U.S. Resident Held In Iraq Is Freed (LAT) 8
The Guantanamo Trials (WP) 9

Homeland Response:

Coast Guard Raids Moored Harbor Vessels (MHCA) 10
Rebuilding Begins Where Terror Struck (WP) 11

War News:

U.S. Attacks Insurgent Targets In Iraq (AJC/AP) 12
U.S. Forces Give Iraqis Full Control Of Najaf (WP) 13
Hussein Confessed To Massacre Order, Iraqi President Says (NYT) 14
With Death At Their Door, Few Leave Iraqi City (WP) 15
Iraqi Army Takes Control Of Najaf (LAT) 16
Gunman Kills 'one Of The Best' Explosives Experts (USAT) 17
Intimidation, Attacks Take Toll On Contractors In Iraq (USAT) ... 18
Sadr City Success Story (LAT) 19
Iraq President Says Saddam Confessed To Crimes; U.S. Hits Bridges (USAT/AP) 21
Oil-For-Food Probe: UN Needs Overhaul To Stop Fraud (WP) .. 21
Panel Hits U.N. On Oil-for-food Failures (WT) 22
Annan Failed To Curb Corruption In Iraq's Oil-for-Food Program, Investigators Report (NYT) 23
U.N. Naysayers Greet 60th Anniversary With Biting Documentary (NYSUN) 25
U.S. Resident Freed From Baghdad Prison (WP) 26
Iraq And The Arabs (WSJ) 26
Baseball In Iraq: As Pastimes Go, It's Anything But (NYT) 27
Saudis Kill Top Militant, Ending Skirmish With A Qaeda Cell (NYT) 28
Surge In Saudi Oil Income Seen Aiding Fight On Terror (WT) ... 29
1st Afghan At U.S. Academy Sees Move As Way To Help His Country (USAT) 30
Despite War, Cadets Line Up For West Point (USAT) 30

DOJ:

Medals Of Valor To Be Given To Families Of 9/11 Heroes (STNIA) 32

Corporate Scandals:

Enron Defendants Cry Foul (WP) 32
Sweden Will Prosecute Ex-CEO Of Insurer Skandia (WSJ/DJN) 33
The Debate On Auditing Must First Clarify Its Purpose (FT) 34
Morgan Director Resigns, A Sign That A Reorganization Is Likely (NYT) 35
Firm Sues To Block Mutual Fund Fee Inquiry (NYT) 35
Morgan Stanley To Pay To Settle Complaint (FINDLAW/AP) 36

Criminal Law:

Legal Experts Call Current Law A Poor Fit For Leak Prosecutions (WP) 37
Former City Official Gets 30 Months In Prison (HC) 38
Embattled Lee Quits Plan Board (DMN) 38
Lee Resigns From Plan Commission (WFAA-TV) 40
Ribadu, FBI Meet In U.S. (NDI) 40
'What FBI Took From Atiku's US Home' (THISDAY) 41
Monitor: City Defying Ban On Political Hiring (CHIST/AP) 42
State Spent $478,385 To Check Guardrails (TENN) 43
Man Charged In Killings Of Sex Offenders (NYT) 43
Man In Wash. Murders Tries To Plead Guilty (TLPA) 44
Man Admits To Killing 2 Sex Offenders, Cites Idaho Case (LAT) 45
Lawyers Protest Court Venue For Prison-bus Killing (BSUN) 46
Judge Finds FBI Not Liable For Bungling Call From Killer (BOS) 47
Judge Dismisses Suit Against FBI (BOS) 48
U.S. Supreme Court Is Asked To Decide If It's Proper To Let Sleeping Jurors Lie (LAW) 48
Millions More In Bogus Cigarettes, Cash Seized By Feds (NSDY) 49
Gotti Was 'A Street Boss,' Prosecutors Say In Closing (NYT) 49
Prosecutors: Gotti Son Ordered Sliwa Attack As Part Of Criminal Reign (NYNSDY) 50
Prosecutor: Gotti's Son Ordered Sliwa Hit (AP) 51
Trial Of 'Junior' Gotti Draws To Close In New York (REU) 51

PartyGaming Shares Plunge As Growth Rates To Slow (Update5) (BLOOM) ... 52
Betfair Makes Online Odds On AC Milan, Hillary Clinton, Weather (BLOOM) ... 53

Civil Law:

Pols To Court To Stop NJ Base Closing (WINS) ... 58
General Dynamics Loses Suit (WP) ... 59
Attorney-Client Privilege Doesn't Shield Company In Suit (LAW) 59

Civil Rights:

Voter ID Opponents To Monitor Elections (AJC) ... 61
Feds Tour Juvenile Justice Center (WJZ-TV) ... 61
Gay-Marriage Bill Narrowly Passes California Assembly (LAT) .. 61
'Marriage' Bill OK'd, Goes To Arnold (WT/AP) ... 62
Calif. Lawmakers Pass Gay Marriage Bill (NYT/AP) ... 63
Democrats And Labor Get Redistricting Vote On Ohio Ballot (NYT) ... 64

Antitrust:

Unipol Gets Antitrust OK For BNL Bank (BOS) ... 65
Endesa Rejects Gas Natural's Bid (WSJ) ... 65
Court Cases Don't Scare Music File Swappers Away (USAT) ... 66
Refiners' Merger Good For Business, Not Consumers (WP) ... 67

Environment:

E.P.A. To Bar Data From Pesticide Studies Involving Children And Pregnant Women (NYT) ... 68
National Parks Grapple With Surge Of Illegal Off-road Vehicles (CSM) ... 69
Bonilla Bill Targets Eminent Domain (HILL) ... 70
Let Nature Help (LAT) ... 70

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Medical Marijuana No Influence On Teen Use (UPI) ... 71
Pot Use Down Where Medical Use OK (LAT) ... 72
Jury's Still Out On Narcotic's Effects (BOSH) ... 72
Truck Driver Pleads Guilty To Trafficking (LUFNEWS) ... 73
Mexico's Fox To Border Drug Lords: Who's Tougher? (REU) ... 73
Spain Tops Table Of Cocaine Use (GUARDIAN) ... 74

Tax:

U.S. Expects To Indict At Least 12 More Over KPMG Shelters (WSJ) ... 74
US Sees More Defendants In KPMG Tax Case (REU) ... 75
U.S. To Widen Inquiry Of KPMG Tax Shelters (NYT) ... 75
The Squeezing Of Lawyer-Client Privilege (NYT) ... 76
Many Families Miss Tuition Tax Breaks (USAT) ... 78

Congress-Administration:

Bush: List For Second Vacancy 'Wide Open' (CO) ... 79
Bush Pledges Wide Search For Court Seat (WP) ... 79
Bush Hints At Gonzales For Court Opening (WT) ... 81
Gonzales Is Mentioned In Supreme Court Remarks (NYT) ... 82
Pressure Rises With Roberts Hearings Set For Next Week (LAT) ... 83
The Right Wants A Woman (HILL) ... 84
NJ Judge Mentioned As Possible Supreme Court Nominee (AP) 85
Target Date Is Set For Committee Vote On Roberts (WSJ/DJN) 86
Hearings Set For Monday (RC) ... 87
Senate Sets Date For Roberts Confirmation Hearings (WT) ... 87
Specter Asks; Roberts Answers, For The Most Part (WP) ... 88
Roberts Confirmation Hearing Set For Monday (REU-Y2) ... 88
Katrina Thrusts Government's Role To The Fore In Confirmation Battle (KRT) ... 89
Will Roberts Choose Candor Or Silence Before Senate? (LAW) 90
Inside Politics (WT) ... 91
For Chief Justice, A Final Session With His Court (WP) ... 92
Roberts, Rehnquist Compel Comparisons (USAT) ... 93
Former Aide Roberts Helps Bear Rehnquist's Coffin (USAT) ... 94
Chief Justice's Death Hits O'Connor Hard (USAT) ... 95
Bush And First Lady Visit Rehnquist's Coffin At Court (NYT) ... 96
Rehnquist's 'Strong Legacy' Hailed (WT) ... 96
Rehnquist's Legacy (USAT) ... 97
Ironies Abound As Rehnquist Leaves Us (USAT) ... 98
A Defender Of Independent Courts (NYT) ... 99
Newsview: White House Falls Out Of Step (NSDY/AP) ... 100
Bush Resists Immediate Probe Into Katrina Response (REU) . 101
For Bush, A Deepening Divide (WP) ... 102
Bush Pledges To Stay On Top Of Relief Effort, Says It's Improving (USAT) ... 103
Bush Counters Criticism Of Federal Relief Effort (LAT) ... 104
Bush Promises To Seek Answers To Failures Of Hurricane Relief (NYT) ... 106
Bush To Probe Storm Response (WP) ... 107
GOP Begins Damage Control (WT) ... 109
Storm Upheaves Bush's Second-term Agenda (USAT) ... 110
Hurricane's Toll Is Likely To Reshape Bush's Economic Agenda (NYT) ... 112
Bush Praises Americans' Aid To Hurricane Victims (WT) ... 113
Bush Taps Cheney To Assess Recovery Effort (LAT) ... 113
'Rays Of Light' In New Orleans (USAT) ... 115
Bush Will Rebound From Katrina Missteps (HILL) ... 115
A Swamped Nation-builder (LAT) ... 116
A CEO's Weaknesses (WP) ... 117
The 'Stuff Happens' Presidency (WP) ... 117
Osama And Katrina (NYT) ... 118
Haunted By Hesitation (NYT) ... 119
Katrina's Global Lessons (WP) ... 120
First Estimates On Katrina Costs For Washington Hit $200 Billion (WSJ) ... 121
Leaders Push To Make Sure Blacks Given Fair Share Of Rebuilding Jobs (USAT) ... 123
New Orleans Mayor Orders Forced Evacuation (AJC/AP) ... 124
New Orleans Levees Patched, Army Starts Pumping Water (Update6) (BLOOM) ... 126
Huge Pumps Start Draining Toxic Floodwater From City Runoff Flowing Into Pontchartrain May Threaten Lake's Health (USAT) ... 128
Flooding Recedes In New Orleans; U.S. Inquiry Is Set (NYT) .. 129
FEMA Director Faces His Own Storm Of Controversy (USAT) 131
Michael DeWayne Brown: Facing Blame In A Disaster (NYT) .. 132
Right City, Wrong State (CNN) ... 133

DOJ_NMG_0003448

Coast Guard's Chief Of Staff To Assist FEMA Head Brown (WP)133
FEMA Chief Sent Help Only When Storm Ended (AP) 134
Witt Makes Presence Known In La. (HILL)..... 135
We Can't Afford Not To Plan For Catastrophes (USAT) 136
FEMA Fails Its Core Mission (WT) 137
It's Not A 'Blame Game' (NYT) 137
Convoy To Chaos (WP)..... 138
Congress Should Share A Big Part Of The Blame For Katrina Response (RC) 139
Mayor Slams Blanco For Stalling (WT)..... 140
Congress Investigates 'woeful' Response To Katrina (FT) 141
Lawmakers Prepare Katrina Probe, Financial Aid (REU)..... 142
Members Of Congress Return From Recess, Call For Probes (USAT) 143
Fuming Congress Plans A Battery Of Hearings (DMN) 143
Deconstructing Katrina (WP) 145
Storm Rages In The Wake Of Katrina (HILL) 146
Parties Divided Over Katrina Response (RC)..... 147
New Exit Plan: Thanksgiving (RC)..... 149
Experts Warn Of Katrina Identity Theft (WP/AP)..... 150
U.S. Officials Warn Against Hurricane Aid Scams (REU) 151
Four Held In Scam Soliciting Money (WT)..... 151
Government Works To Arrange Places For The Displaced (USAT) 152
Residents Will Be Forced To Leave (WT/AP) 153
Together In Houston: 'We're Going To Survive As A Family' (WP)..... 154
Stunned By Scope Of Destruction, Couple Wonder Whether To Begin Rebuilding Home (USAT)..... 156
Barbara Bush Calls Evacuees Better Off (NYT)..... 157
Amid One City's Welcome, A Tinge Of Backlash (NYT) 157
Hundreds Of Storm Survivors Arrive In Capital (WP)..... 159
Offers Of Aid Immediate, But U.S. Approval Delayed For Days (WP)..... 160
U.S. Declines Some Foreign Offers Of Hurricane Aid (WT)..... 161
A Foreign Aid Twist: U.S. Gets, Others Give (USAT)..... 162
Bush: Aministration Looking To Help Schools Absorb Kids Displaced By Katrina (AP) 163
Across Nation, Storm Victims Crowd Schools (NYT) 163
Hard Lessons For Kids Starting Class Far From Home (AP).... 164
Katrina Forces Children To Start School Again In Georgia (AP)165
Student Displaced By Hurricane Instant 'Rock Star' At Local School (MINNST)..... 166
Texas Expecting Up To 60,000 New Students (DMN) 167
Local Schools Open Doors For Displaced (WT)..... 168
Top Pentagon Brass Defend Response Time (USAT)..... 168
Katrina, Iraq Aid Efforts Hit Same Hurdles (WSJ) 169
Navy Pilots Who Rescued Victims Are Reprimanded (NYT) 170
IRS Offers Relief To Katrina Victims (WSJ)..... 171
Storm Giving Outpaces That Of 9/11, Tsunami (USAT) 173
In Katrina's Wake, Generosity (USAT) 173
A Mission Of Mercy To Houston (WP)..... 176
New Orleans Bus Convoy Returning Mostly Empty (WP)..... 177
US Economy Takes Big Hit (CSM)..... 177
Long-Term Impact Depends On Consumers (WP) 178
Storm's Economic Impact Is Felt Around Globe (WSJ)..... 179
OECD Tells Banks To Relax Over Rates (FT) 180
Steel Prices Could Rise Further As Flooding Stalls Key Materials (WSJ) 181
Surviving Katrina's Huge Damage Claims (WP)..... 181
Wall Street Rallies As Crude Prices Ease (FT) 182
Investors Gauge Katrina Impact (WSJ) 183
Stocks Rally With Investors' Outlook (USAT) 184
In Katrina's Wake, Law Firm Disaster Teams See Action (LAW)184
Social Security Reform 'Off Radar'? (WT) 185
U.S. Agency Funded Opinion Columns (DMN) 186
Ethics Staffing Slow As Panel's Caseload Mounts (RC) 187

Other News:

Zinc Tumbles 3.7% After Stockpiles Prove Unaffected By Storm (WSJ) 189
Crude Oil Lower After Saudi Price Cut (FT) 189
Gulf's Energy Infrastructure Begins To Regain Its Footing (WSJ)190
Gas Prices At Pumps Show Signs Of Easing (NYT)..... 191
Gas Prices Ease As Gulf Production Up (USAT) 193
Senators Urge Boost In Standards Of Fuel Economy (WT)..... 193
Some Senators On Panel Ask Angry Questions About Gasoline Pricing And Profits (NYT)..... 194
Senate Holds Hearing On Gas Price Gouging (AP)..... 195
In Praise Of 'Gouging' (WSJ) 196
Tom DeLay: No Support To Roll Back Gas Tax (REU-Y2)..... 197
Iran Five Years From Nuclear Arms, Says IISS (FT) 197
Nuclear Weapon Is Years Off For Iran, Research Panel Says (NYT) 198
Compromise Sought For U.N. Meeting (NYT/REU)..... 199
The Bolton Edit (WSJ) 199
White House Questions Israel Construction (AJC/AP)..... 200
Arafat's Cousin Is Assassinated (LAT) 200
Transatlantic Divide Deep, Not So Wide, Poll Finds (LAT) 201
U.S. Fails To Mend Image In Europe (WSJ) 202
Zoellick Details Discussions With China On Future Of The Korean Peninsula (WP) 202
Rural Activist Seized In Beijing (WP)..... 203
For First Time, Egypt Has More Than 1 Presidential Candidate (USAT) 204
Germans Lean To Right (CSM) 205
Venezuela Seizes Idled Plant Of Heinz Subsidiary (WSJ/DJN) 206
Why Japan Seems Content To Be Run By One Party (NYT) ... 206
As Japan Votes, Aid To Countryside Hangs In Balance (WSJ) 208
Chirac's Illness Remains A Mystery, Despite Official Details (NYT) 210
Free Speech For Turkey (WP)..... 211

DOJ_NMG_0003449

TERRORISM NEWS:

Terrorist Had Plans For London Attacks (WT/UPI)

By Pam Hess, United Press International

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

MOSUL, Iraq -- A terrorist captured near the Syrian border last month had a computer "thumb drive" that contained planning information about the July 7 suicide bombings in London, according to a U.S. military officer.

Col. Robert Brown, commander of the 1st Brigade 25th Infantry Division in Mosul, said that the man was captured north of Qaim in western Iraq and that authorities had connected him to the al Qaeda terrorist network.

It is the first evidence of a link between the London bombs and terrorists in Iraq, but fits with other evidence of a growing presence in Iraq by al Qaeda, which has taken responsibility for the British attacks.

Qaim, a Euphrates River border town, fell under the control of fighters claiming allegiance to Osama bin Laden's terrorist organization Monday, according to tribal members, officials, residents and others quoted yesterday by the Associated Press.

The sources said members of the group led by terror chief Abu Musab Zarqawi had killed U.S. collaborators and imposed strict Islamic law, posting a sign at an entrance to the town declaring, "Welcome to the Islamic Republic of Qaim."

Col. Brown declined to discuss the specific nature of the information on the thumb drive -- a miniature data storage device that plugs into a computer's USB port -- but said it indicated al Qaeda involvement in the attacks on London's bus and subway system.

"I don't think anyone's done a good enough job explaining" the relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda, he said.

The Arabic language satellite channel Al Jazeera last week aired parts of a videotape in which al Qaeda's second-in-command, Ayman al-Zawahri, took responsibility for the blasts, thought to have used a potent but easily manufactured homemade explosive called TATP.

The same video carried a recorded statement by one of the four British Muslims who killed themselves and 52 others in the near-simultaneous attacks. The London bomber also cited his admiration for Zarqawi.

Bashar al-Naher, an adviser to Iraqi Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, told The Washington Times that he had not heard about the Mosul discovery but said, "This does not surprise me. We are noting a pattern of involvement by [Iraqi hard-liners] in terrorist plots abroad."

The U.S. Central Command estimates that about 100 to 150 "foreign fighters" enter Iraq each month. These men are responsible for the great majority of suicide bombs, the most devastating weapon the insurgents and terrorists have in their arsenal.

Most such attacks are coordinated by Zarqawi's group, which calls itself al Qaeda in Iraq. Zarqawi claims allegiance to al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, but little is known about the level of direct cooperation between the groups.

Briton To Urge Europe To Tighten Security (LAT)

By John Daniszewski

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

LONDON — Britain's chief law enforcement official will call on European leaders today to put biological data into passports, visas and identity cards, share airline passenger lists and retain telecommunications records to help fight international terrorists and organized crime.

Concerns for safeguarding liberties must be weighed against the right of law-abiding people to be protected from crime and terrorist attacks, Home Secretary Charles Clarke will argue, according to an advance text of his remarks released to reporters before his address to the European Parliament in Strasbourg, France.

The British proposals to the EU come during a time of heightened fear of terrorism in Europe after the July 7 bombings of the London transportation network. They also coincide with growing public doubts about the merits of further European integration; this spring voters in France and the Netherlands rejected a proposed European constitution.

Drawing a connection between the issues, Clarke in his speech argues that a rising "Euro-skepticism" on the continent is in part due to doubts among ordinary people that European institutions are effective and sufficiently tough to protect them.

One solution he proposes is for Europe to adopt practical steps for police and security agencies to collect and share intelligence data and use them in cross-border prosecutions.

"This European Parliament, as well as national parliaments throughout Europe, needs to face up to the fact that the legal framework within which we currently operate makes the collection and use of this intelligence very difficult and in some cases impossible," Clarke plans to tell his audience. "The rules that currently govern our law enforcement bodies seriously inhibit their ability to protect us against criminals."

DOJ_NMG_0003450

As an example of how laws undermine police efforts, Clarke cited regulations in some European countries that oblige telecom companies to destroy data on phone calls and electronic messages if they have no business purposes. Such information can be instrumental for police to establish links between suspects and to dismantle criminal networks, he argues.

Clarke says he hopes Britain's proposals will lead to "hard-headed discussions and practical agreement."

Britain recently assumed the presidency of the European Union, a post that rotates every six months.

Discussing his speech with reporters in London on Tuesday, Clarke said he was seeking to strike the right balance between preserving civil liberties and protecting the public. "It seems to me we have to give the same rights to those humans who want to be able to travel without being blown up on an underground train … as we do to the defendants," he said.

If European governments agreed to put "biometric data" into passports, visas and identity cards, Clarke said, the information would be "an important means of ensuring that people have the identity which is genuinely theirs, and [are] not stealing other identities as some criminals or terrorists seek to do."

Clarke's suggestion that national and European courts must be pragmatic and sensitive to public opinion in weighing whether to deport terrorist suspects could run into opposition from legislators who fear undermining the European Convention on Human Rights, which forbids extraditing or deporting suspects to countries that practice torture.

Britain, which wants to deport radical Islamic clerics that it accuses of fomenting hatred and violence, is in the process of negotiating bilateral agreements with several countries promising that deported prisoners would not face ill treatment, Clarke said.

Although opponents argue that the agreements would not be respected, Clarke said the existence of such an agreement between sovereign governments ought to be enough to satisfy European courts.

"The judges need to understand that the people of Europe and people of Britain will not for a long time accept that action cannot be taken against people who are offering a real threat to our way of life and who are seeking to destroy it," he told the reporters Tuesday. "That is a message I shall send very strongly indeed."

Man Held In California Terrorism Probe Pleads Not Guilty (SACBEE)

By MICHAEL R. BLOOD, Associated Press Writer

The Sacramento Bee, September 7, 2005

SANTA ANA, Calif. (AP) - One of four men indicted in an alleged terror plot against California targets pleaded not guilty to federal charges Tuesday.

Hammad Riaz Samana, a 21-year-old Pakistani national, said only a few words as he appeared with hands shackled to his waist before U.S. Magistrate Judge Arthur Nakazato.

Trial was set for Sept. 27 before U.S. District Judge Cormack Carney, but a postponement was expected.

Samana and the others were indicted last week on charges of conspiring to wage war against the U.S. government through terrorism.

Federal prosecutors allege the plot targeted military facilities, synagogues and other Los Angeles-area sites. Authorities claim the four men were a cell of a California prison gang of radical Muslims.

Named with Samana in the indictment were Levar Haley Washington, 25; Gregory Vernon Patterson, 21; and Kevin James, 29. All but Samana are American born and Muslim converts.

Outside court, defense attorney Timothy Lannen described Samana as a hardworking, upstanding person.

"He's a peace-loving, respectful young man," Lannen said to reporters.

The attorney said Samana is a dean's list student at Santa Monica College and was working two jobs. Samana only met the others named in the indictment a few months ago, Lannen said.

When the case plays out the public will recognize "the decent young man that he is," Lannen said of his client.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Kevin Smith said that "the indictment speaks for itself" and that the investigation was continuing. He said he expected the other men to be arraigned later this month.

Prosecutors allege that Washington, Patterson and Samana robbed gas stations to finance plans to target military sites, synagogues, the Israeli Consulate and the El Al counter at Los Angeles International Airport. Patterson bought a rifle. Samana received "firearms training and physical training," according to the indictment.

James, an inmate at California State Prison, Sacramento, is suspected of being the mastermind. He founded the radical group Jamiyyat Ul-Islam Is-Saheeh, or JIS. Washington converted to Islam while imprisoned there on a robbery conviction.

Terror Suspect Pleads Not Guilty To Conspiracy Charges (KNBC-TV)

DOJ_NMG_0003451

KNBC-TV, September 7, 2005

SANTA ANA, Calif. -- A Pakistani man accused of plotting a terrorist campaign in the Southland -- using gas station holdups to fund the attacks -- pleaded not guilty Tuesday in Santa Ana to conspiracy-related charges.

Aug. 17 Images: FBI: Former Inmate Visited Mosque To Recruit For Alleged Plot

Hammad Samana, 21 -- who has permanent-resident status -- denied charges of conspiracy to levy war against the U.S. government through terrorism; conspiracy to kill members of the U.S. military; conspiracy to kill foreign officials and conspiracy to use firearms in a crime of violence.

U.S. District Magistrate Judge Arthur Nakazato set a trial date of Sept. 27 and a status conference of Sept. 19. He assigned the case to U.S. District Judge Cormac Carney.

According to a federal grand jury indictment, Samana plotted with Kevin James, the founder of a group called Jamiyyat Ul-Islam Is-Saheeh -- or JIS -- and two other Southland men, Levar Washington and Gregory Patterson.

U.S. authorities allege the defendants intended to use money taken in holdups in Los Angeles and Orange counties to buy weapons and make other purchases needed to carry out attacks on local National Guard and Israeli facilities, according to court papers.

Samana is accused of participating in two of the 11 gas station robberies listed in a six-count federal grand jury indictment: a robbery on June 12 in Playa Del Rey -- in which Patterson was allegedly armed with a shotgun -- and a robbery on June 21 in the city of Orange.

Patterson and Washington were arrested July 5 after allegedly using shotgun to rob a Chevron gas station in Fullerton.

Four people who were in court during the arraignment of Samana, who is being held without bail, declined to comment outside the courtroom.

Defense attorney Timothy Lannen issued a statement about his client outside the courtroom and refused to take questions.

"He is a peace-loving, respectful young man," Lannen said.

Samana is on the dean's list at Santa Monica College, Lannen said, and "when arrested was working two jobs to support his family."

In response to the attorney's description of Samana, Assistant U.S. Attorney Kevin Smith said the lawyer "is free to characterize his client any way he wished.

In "plain terms," Smith said, Samana is accused of "conspiring to kill" U.S. military personnel, Israel officials and Jewish people at targeted synagogues.

Smith said he expects Patterson and Washington to appear for arraignment on Sept. 12. They are being held in the Men's Central Jail in Los Angeles, while James is set for arraignment on Sept. 26. He is being held in state prison.

Smith declined to provide additional details not specifically mentioned in the indictment, but did say that "We have charged everyone that could or should be charged based on the evidence."

In November, James, while in prison, allegedly recruited Washington, who was serving a robbery sentence, to join JIS, according to the indictment.

After Washington was paroled from a state prison late that month, James told him to recruit five individuals without felony convictions and "train them in covert operations," prosecutors allege.

Washington allegedly recruited Samana and Patterson, fellow attendees of the Jamat-E-Masijidul Islam mosque in Inglewood. At some point, Washington allegedly "reaffirmed his allegiance ... by pledging his loyalty until death by martyrdom."

According to authorities, Samana is the only one of the four not born in the United States.

Before the arrests, the defendants had been "on the verge of launching the attacks," which "had the potential to cause significant bloodshed," U.S. Attorney Debra Yang said in a news conference last week.

James, 29, preached that members of his group had a duty to "target for violent attack any enemies of Islam, or `infidels,'" including the U.S. government and supporters of Israel, the indictment states.

Samana and Patterson allegedly used the Internet to research the locations of military recruitment offices, Jewish events in the months of July and August and research on the Israeli consulate in Los Angeles, including the identity of specific Israeli officials.

James will remain in state prison, serving a sentence for being a prisoner in possession of a weapon, until transferred to federal custody, Smith said.

James, who was originally incarcerated for attempted robbery, allegedly founded JIS while behind bars in 1997. If convicted of all the charges, the defendants face life prison sentences.

Authorities say the investigation began slightly more than eight weeks ago when Torrance police received a tip concerning a string of gas station robberies in Los Angeles and Orange counties.

After tailing Washington, 25, and Patterson, 21, for two days, Torrance officers allegedly saw them rob a gas station in Fullerton.

Police then arrested the pair and searched a South Los Angeles apartment they shared. That search turned up materials that led police to believe the men might be plotting attacks, said Torrance police Chief James Herren.

According to the indictment, the synagogue attacks were planned to coincide with the Jewish high holy days of Rosh Hashana and Yom Kippur "in order to maximize the number of casualties to be inflicted."

The 10-day high-holyday period starts Oct. 3, the first day of Rosh Hashana, the Jewish New Year, and ends Oct. 12 on Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement, which is regarded as the holiest day on the Jewish calendar.

Authorities said they believed some targets would have been attacked soon if the arrests had not taken place.

Authorities are not aware of any current threat based on what was learned during the investigation, said Randy Parsons, acting assistant head of the FBI's Los Angeles office.

Boca Doctor Charged With Supporting Al Qaeda Denied Bail (MH)

By EVAN S. BENN

The Miami Herald, September 7, 2005

A federal judge in New York denied bail Tuesday for a Boca Raton doctor charged with conspiring to support al Qaeda.

Dr. Rafiq Sabir, 51, will continue to await trial in a maximum-security prison, his attorney, Ed Wilford, said.

"I indicated to the court that we had $1.5 million ready to be secured" for bail, Wilford said in a telephone interview after the hearing.

But U.S. District Court Judge Loretta Preska denied the motion, ruling that Sabir would pose a flight risk if granted bail.

Wilford said he will appeal the decision.

A federal grand jury handed up a one-count indictment June 27 against Sabir and Tarik Shah, an alleged co-conspirator who will be tried with Sabir. Shah, 42, also is being detained without bail.

The indictment supported the government's allegation that the men pledged an oath of loyalty to Osama bin Laden and his terrorist network on May 20.

An undercover FBI agent posed as an al Qaeda recruiter and secretly recorded Sabir and Shah reciting an alleged oath of allegiance on May 20.

Prosecutors claim that Shah, a martial-arts instructor, and Sabir, a medical doctor, promised to use their skills to help train and treat jihadists.

Federal agents arrested Sabir at his Boca Raton home on May 28, a few days before he was scheduled to fly to Saudi Arabia.

Both men pleaded not guilty to the charge of conspiring to support a terrorist organization. If convicted, they would face 15 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Attorneys for Sabir and Shah have said their clients, both U.S. citizens who are Muslim, committed no crime.

"In this case, I think we have a clear-cut violation of Dr. Sabir's First Amendment right to freedom of speech," said Wilford, who has previously represented defendants facing terrorism charges.

Sabir's previous attorney, Lighthouse Point lawyer Khurrum Wahid, said Tuesday that a full caseload forced him to hand over the Sabir case to Wilford.

At Tuesday's hearing, prosecutors said a third defendant would likely be added to the case against Sabir and Shah, but those two men will not face additional charges.

The man, Mahmud Faruq Brent, of Baltimore, was arrested Aug. 4 and charged with conspiring to support a terrorist organization. The government claims Brent and Shah are associates and that Brent went to Pakistan and trained to become a jihadist fighter.

Sabir and Shah are scheduled to be back in court Oct. 17 for a status conference.

Government's Doctors: Man Accused Of Mall Bomb Plot Faked Illness (ABJ/AP)

Associated Press

Akron Beacon Journal, September 7, 2005

COLUMBUS, Ohio - Mental health experts who examined a Somali man accused of plotting to bomb a shopping mall have concluded he was faking when he became a wild-eyed defendant who tapped his head on a table, mumbled and giggled in court.

Documents made public last week from two analysts at the Federal Medical Center in Rochester, Minn., said Nuradin Abdi was pretending to be mentally ill.

DOJ_NMG_0003453

Abdi told psychiatrists that Hillary Rodham Clinton and Teresa Heinz Kerry would represent him in his terrorism trial.

He sometimes refused to shower, or he showered with his clothes on. Although a devout Muslim, he tore up a copy of the Quran and shoved the pieces into a toilet.

"We believe such behaviors were calculated attempts to appear severely mentally ill," forensic psychologist Andrew Simcox and staff psychiatrist Daniel Shine Jr. said in their report.

However, another psychiatrist requested by Abdi's defense attorney because the first report came from a federal agency said it's possible that Abdi has a "legitimate psychosis."

Abdi's lawyer, Mahir T. Sherif, said Tuesday the second analysis was done by forensic psychiatrist Dr. Robert Phillips, who previously testified in the case of President Reagan's shooter, John Hinckley Jr.

According to Sherif, Phillips reported that Abdi showed "clear signs of severe mental illness," particularly since he ate his own feces while imprisoned.

Abdi, 33, has pleaded innocent to charges of conspiring to aid terrorists and lying to gain political asylum in the United States as a refugee. His trial is scheduled for Sept. 26.

Abdi's attorneys have sought to bar statements he made to authorities in which he admitted to falsifying immigration documents and planning to blow up an undetermined Columbus-area shopping mall.

U.S. District Judge Algenon Marbley has said he will rule before the trial but indicated he would not discount the statements Abdi made with a lawyer at his side.

Prosecutors accuse Abdi of obtaining travel documents in 1999 by telling officials he planned to visit Germany and Saudi Arabia when he actually went to a military-style training camp for terrorists in Ethiopia.

Federal agents arrested Abdi on Nov. 28, 2003, after convicted al-Qaida operative Iyman Faris told them Abdi suggested shooting up a shopping mall.

Marbley last month criticized federal agents for arresting Abdi without a warrant.

Agents testified they were unable to get a warrant for the arrest because information leading them to have probable cause was classified and they wanted to act before the holiday shopping season.

Sherif argued Abdi's arrest was illegal and he was coerced and mistreated.

Investigators said Abdi was polite and cooperative during the interviews.

Officials said Abdi went from a model prisoner to one who abused himself, failed to communicate appropriately and had to be watched.

Simcox and Shine said Abdi had reason to feign mental illness, to avoid being tried on charges that could send him to prison for decades.

They said Abdi had no history of mental illness, that the onset of the symptoms was convenient, that the symptoms didn't match those of legitimate illness and_ testing didn't support a finding of mental illness.

By the time Abdi left the center in August 2004, he was acting normally again, they said.

His lawyer has a theory for Abdi's apparent turnaround. Sherif said his client's mind began to heal and he was "brought back to reality" after being allowed his first visits with family members and his legal counsel.

Abdi now is in the Franklin County jail.

U.S. Resident Held In Iraq Is Freed (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

More than two months after authorities cleared him of suspicion in a mortar attack on a United States base in Baghdad, an Iraqi man was released Tuesday from military custody, just days before government lawyers were due in court to answer questions about his captivity.

Tuesday's release of Numan Adnan Al-Kaby, a longtime lawful U.S. resident, from a military prison outside Baghdad marked the second time in two months that authorities freed a captive in Iraq within a week of the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California filing a federal lawsuit in Washington.

Mark Rosenbaum, legal director of the ACLU's Southern California chapter, said he was pleased that Al-Kaby had been released but disturbed that the prisoner had been held two months after a military review board first declared him an "innocent civilian."

"The U.S. government does not want to appear in front of a federal judge and answer questions about their indefensible detention policies in Iraq. This is a military and executive scandal," said Rosenbaum, who believes that more people are being held illegally by the U.S. military in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0003454

A Pentagon spokesman, speaking on condition he not be identified, said, "I certainly understand the frustration people would feel by what they perceive is a delay, but it's a delay out of necessity, making sure that we are not releasing someone who is a threat to the security of Iraq or the Iraqi people."

Al-Kaby, 38, was originally taken into custody in April after calling in sick the day of a mortar attack on the base where he was doing construction work. He strenuously denied any advance knowledge of the attack, and was cleared by a military review board on July 4, but not released.

On Aug. 31, the ACLU filed suit after learning of Al-Kaby's situation from Los Angeles filmmaker Cyrus Kar, who also was freed from a Baghdad prison with the ACLU's intervention. The Times ran a story on Al-Kaby's detention the same day.

The suit was due to be heard Thursday in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C. But late Friday afternoon, Justice Department attorneys in Washington, led by Assistant Atty. Gen. Peter D. Keisler, filed papers seeking a 23-day delay to respond to the ACLU's suit.

The Justice Department did not mention that Al-Kaby had been cleared July 4, but said the ACLU suit raised "novel factual and legal questions."

In a motion filed Sunday, the ACLU issued a sharp retort: "The only truly novel question here is chilling … whether a determination of innocence of a lawful permanent resident by a military tribunal may be arbitrarily voided or ignored such that liberty becomes illusory."

On Tuesday, Col. James Coyne, staff judge advocate for the multinational force in Iraq, filed a declaration saying the military had held Al-Kaby past July 4 based on "new factual information." He did not provide details.

However, Coyne said that on Friday — just two days after the ACLU filed suit — the military had conducted another review and again recommended that the captive be freed.

The ACLU suit asserted that Al-Kaby was being held in violation of the U.S. Constitution, the Geneva Convention and international law.

As part of the suit, friends and relatives filed declarations stating that Al-Kaby was a Shiite whose family had long been opposed to the Sunni regime of Saddam Hussein. He fled Iraq in 1991 following the first Gulf War, and spent three years in a refugee camp in Saudi Arabia before coming to the U.S. and gaining political asylum.

He settled in Kalamazoo, Mich., where he opened a small restaurant with his cousin Haider Al-Saedy.

In 2003, both men applied for U.S. citizenship. Al-Kaby provided assistance to the FBI "to assist the government in the U.S. invasion of Iraq and even took a polygraph test to prove that the information he gave was truthful," the ACLU suit said.

After U.S. forces toppled Hussein, Al-Kaby decided to return to his native land to rejoin family members.

The day of the mortar attack, Al-Kaby had taken the day off so he could take his brother to buy a car in Baghdad, the ACLU contended.

Kar met Al-Kaby while both were incarcerated at Camp Cropper in Baghdad — where Saddam Hussein also is being held. Kar was released July 10 after being held captive in Iraq for 55 days.

In a court declaration last week, Kar said both he and Al-Kaby had received identical letters from the U.S. military declaring that each man was an "innocent civilian."

ACLU attorney Ranjana Natarajan said that if the government "had new information on Al-Kaby, it did not bother to tell the court what it was," in papers filed last week.

Her colleague Rosenbaum added, "The so-called new evidence is a transparent fabrication, intended to provide a fig leaf to cover five months of solitary confinement of an innocent man. This is an administration whose trademark is incompetence and indifference to human suffering."

The Guantanamo Trials (WP)

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

The Pentagon announced changes last week to the military tribunals that it has been trying to set up at the Guantanamo Bay naval base -- for years now -- to try terrorist suspects on war crimes charges. The tribunals, known as commissions, so far have been a total failure. Not a single detainee has been actually been put on trial. The system has been mired in litigation. There are serious problems of fairness and appropriate process for defendants who could face long prison terms or even the death penalty. The administration's changes improve the system in subtle but important ways, moving it closer to the system of courts-martial by which the military tries its own soldiers. But they don't entirely fix the problems.

The most substantial change in the new order separates the function of the commission's presiding officers from its other members. Under the previous order, all commission members functioned as both judge and jury. Under the new order, the presiding officer will function as the judge, responsible for rulings on matters of law -- though the other members of the commission could still override a decision concerning whether to admit certain evidence. The other commission members would decide guilt and sentencing, decisions in which the presiding officer would not participate. In addition, the order tightens a bit the right of the accused to be present at trial, subject to the need to protect classified information -- a largely symbolic change. And more important, it requires that if any material is withheld from the accused because of national security concerns and a reasonable summary cannot be provided, that material must be excluded from trial if its admission as evidence would preclude a fair trial.

Important differences remain between the commissions and true courts-martial, differences that leave the commissions wanting. The commissions still lack any direct appeal to the federal court system, which is a significant flaw. Their rules of evidence are more relaxed as well. But the more the commissions come to resemble courts-martial, the less sense it makes for the military to create a justice system from scratch rather than using the one it already has -- in which Americans and the international community have high confidence.

The administration's explanations on this point are increasingly less persuasive as time goes on. Al Qaeda operatives, officials note, did not fight according to the laws of war and, as a consequence, are not entitled to the privileges of honorable soldiers -- one of which is trial before court-martial. This is true enough. But is it really worth years of delay and litigation in order to bring defendants to trial under conditions whose fairness many people will doubt? The military also argues that commissions afford the government certain flexibility with respect to classified information and security that could not be easily handled in a court-martial. Again, that's true, but if Congress were to get involved and authorize courts-martial for accused terrorists, it could tinker with the model for these highly specialized circumstances.

At this stage, the critical matter is for fair rules to be clearly written in law. While the commissions are getting better, they still constitute a system in which the executive branch writes the rules (and rewrites them in midstream if need be), carries out the trials, hears the appeals and executes the sentences without input from the other two branches. Even if the commissions were perfectly designed -- and they still are far from that -- this would not be the best way to bring accused terrorists to trial.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Coast Guard Raids Moored Harbor Vessels (MHCA)

By Virginia Hennessey

Montery (CA) Herald, September 7, 2005

The Coast Guard boarded and inspected close to 30 vessels, many of them docked, in Monterey Bay over the Labor Day weekend in a operation that raised the eyebrows of some local boaters and the ire of one.

The operation -- conducted in conjunction with the Monterey County Sheriff's Office, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration -- netted one arrest in Moss Landing Harbor and terminated the voyages of five vessels that were deemed unsafe.

In all, 28 boats, many of them live-aboard vessels that were moored in the harbors, were boarded and 31 citations were issued. One angry boater said Coast Guard officers came aboard his boat in Moss Landing Harbor late Friday citing authority under the Patriot Act.

In an e-mail to The Herald, Lowell Jones of Moss Landing said the Coast Guard did a "blanket boarding" in the harbor, "searching boats, and invading people's privacy at 10:30 p.m. They justified this intrusion by citing the Patriot Act.

"The locals are not happy, and the boating community as a whole has expressed concerns over privacy relating to such dockside boardings of legal live-aboard residents," he wrote.

Coast Guard officials said the operation was not in response to any particular law enforcement report and that search warrants are not required for such inspections.

"It wasn't a drill. But it wasn't in response to any Homeland Security threat we received," said Gabriel Flesher, chief of the Coast Guard's San Francisco division, which oversees Homeland Security issues in the area. "The exercise was developed as a random operation with local law enforcement agencies (and) we have the authority to board dockside."

Lt. Todd Moe of the Coast Guard's Monterey division said the operation was directed at boating safety during the busiest boating weekend of the year and was authorized under maritime law dating to the 1700s, which gives the Coast Guard jurisdiction over federal waters, including waterways that lead to the open seas.

Jon Copley, chief of the Coast Guard's law enforcement division in San Francisco, said he would be "very surprised" if one of the agency's officers cited the Patriot Act.

The U.S. Code allows the Coast Guard to "make inquiries, examinations, inspections, searches, seizures, and arrests upon the high seas and waters over which the United States has jurisdiction, for the prevention, detection, and suppression of violations of laws of the United States. For such purposes, commissioned, warrant, and petty officers may at any time go on board of any vessel subject to the jurisdiction... of the United States, address inquiries to those on board, examine the ship's documents and papers, and examine, inspect, and search the vessel and use all necessary force to compel compliance."

DOJ_NMG_0003456

Moe said "99 percent of the feedback" he'd received was positive and that the operation resulted in the safest Labor Day on record on the Monterey Bay. The Coast Guard was called out to only one incident.

Safety violations that were cited included boats lacking floatation and fire-extinguishing devices and proper documentation. Moe said he did not know the identity of the one man who was arrested by the Sheriff's Office possession of marijuana and an illegal weapon. The deputies involved in the arrest were not available on Tuesday.

Harbormasters in Monterey, Moss Landing and Santa Cruz said they were not notified in advance of the operation. Moss Landing Harbormaster Linda McIntyre said she supports the Coast Guard's efforts to improve safety on the bay, but added that she'd never known the agency to do "door-to-door" inspections of docked vessels.

She said she had received complaints by some residents, but heard others praise the guard.

Monterey Harbormaster Steve Scheiblauer said in his 30 years as a harbormaster in Monterey and Santa Cruz, he'd never heard of any law enforcement agency randomly searching vessels being used as homes. Like several other harbormasters, Scheiblauer was under the impression the Coast Guard's blanket boarding authorization applied only to vessels that were underway.

"That is, on the face of it, pretty preposterous. They can board boats when they're underway. But when a boat is tied up, particularly as a residence, I don't think there's any probable cause to go aboard and search. As a random search, that would be very controversial, I would think, among the public."

Kimbra Eldridge, operations manager of the Santa Cruz Harbor, said her agency does not board boats "unless we have a particular cause."

Reports of the Coast Guard's operation also came as a surprise to Eric Endersby, chief harbor patrol officer in Morro Bay Harbor.

"The Coast Guard has the authority to board any vessel that's underway," he said. "But boats in slips are not underway and my understanding was the Coast Guard didn't have authority to board a boat that's tied up in a slip."

"That's a little scary," he added.

Andy Turpin, senior editor at Latitude 38, a widely read sailing magazine in Marin County, said Coast Guard boardings in the San Francisco Bay Area were an "accepted annoyance."

"It's common to be boarded and it's something you have to put up with," he said.

The practice was even more common during the height of the "zero tolerance" drug wars, he said, but even then, the Coast Guard did not randomly board docked boats.

"I have never heard of that happening up here," he said. "Before 9/11, when they had a little more time on their hands, they would come to a marina and offer free safety inspections and give you a sticker to keep you from being boarded on your Sunday sail."

Rebuilding Begins Where Terror Struck (WP)

By Michelle Garcia

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

NEW YORK, Sept. 6 -- The first phase of rebuilding on the 16 acres of Lower Manhattan leveled by the Sept. 11 attacks began yesterday with a ceremonial groundbreaking for a new $2.2 billion transportation hub, highlighted by the release of two doves representing "peace and rebirth."

Five days before the four-year anniversary of the 2001 terrorist attacks, federal and state officials celebrated the first phase of reconstruction at a site still considered a cemetery by survivors.

"Today, we begin to take back a site and restore something that was taken away from us on September 11," said Anthony Coscia, chairman of the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the site.

The transportation hub, designed by Spanish architect Santiago Calatrava, will link commuter trains from New Jersey, ferries and the city subway system. Officials estimate 250,000 people a day will stream through the transportation hub after its scheduled completion in 2009.

"New York is taking off again and set to soar to greater heights than ever before," said U.S. Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta, speaking in the 70-foot pit where the city's tallest buildings once stood.

The transportation hub is being financed by federal grants of $1.9 billion and by $300 million raised by the Port Authority. In the next six months, a total of $10 billion in new construction will get underway, said Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R). The planned projects include an underground memorial and the 1,776-foot Freedom Tower.

DOJ_NMG_0003457

Construction of the transportation hub will begin next week. Families of Sept. 11 victims requested that the building's footprints remain uncovered for a 9/11 commemoration ceremony planned for the weekend, said Steve Coleman, a spokesman for the Port Authority. Workers will then lay a protective cover on the steel footings of the twin towers.

The design and intent of the rebuilding effort have been a focus of conflict and controversy. Some families of Sept. 11 victims waged a campaign against two museums planned for a new cultural center, charging they planned to host exhibits critical of the U.S. government.

Some officials at the ceremony drew parallels between the task of rebuilding the World Trade Center site and the challenges facing the Gulf Coast in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

"Let what we are doing be a beacon to the people of New Orleans," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.). "They should always know there is always hope, hope that is represented today by the rebuilding."

WAR NEWS:

U.S. Attacks Insurgent Targets In Iraq (AJC/AP)

By Robert H. Reid, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 7, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq — U.S. jets struck targets Tuesday near the Syrian border where al-Qaida has expanded its presence, and civilians fled fighting in the northern city of Tal Afar, complaining they were running short of food and water.

To the south, U.S. troops handed the Iraqi army control of a Shiite city that saw bitter fighting last year — a sign of the uneven pattern of insecurity in this fragmented country.

The U.S. command also said four more Americans had been killed in action.

The airstrikes took place near Karabilah, about 185 miles west of Baghdad and one of a cluster of towns near the Syrian border used by foreign fighters to slip into Iraq.

In the first attack, Marine F/A-18 jets dropped bombs shortly after midnight on two bridges across the Euphrates River that the U.S. command said insurgents used to move fighters and arms toward Baghdad and other cities.

Hours later, a Marine jet destroyed a building used by insurgents to fire on U.S. and Iraqi troops, a U.S. statement said. One Iraqi soldier was wounded when Marines and Iraqi soldiers stormed the building, killing two foreigners and arresting three, it said.

Late Tuesday, Iraqi civilians reported a suicide bomber struck a checkpoint in Haditha, 60 miles east of Karabilah. There were no reports of casualties.

The airstrikes occurred about six miles east of the border city of Qaim, major parts of which have fallen under control of al-Qaida-linked foreign fighters.

Iraqi officials and residents say al-Qaida in Iraq, led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, took over parts of Qaim after residents fled fighting between tribes supporting and opposing the insurgents.

The U.S. military maintains a presence in the area, but U.S. officers have complained privately that they don't have enough American and Iraqi troops to secure Qaim.

Elsewhere, thousands of civilians fled Tal Afar, a predominantly ethnic Turkomen city 260 miles northwest of Baghdad where U.S. and Iraqi soldiers are trying to wrest control from insurgents.

Plumes of smoke rose from the city, which sits along a major trade and smuggling route to Syria. Ambulances were seen carrying at least 10 wounded civilians toward nearby Mosul.

Some of those who fled sought refuge in the village of Taha, where local officials scrambled to provide for about 700 families. Some of the refugees disputed claims by Iraqi officials that foreign fighters had joined local insurgents in the fighting inside Tal Afar.

"We did not see any strangers like Saudis, Syrians or others," said Hazem Mohammed Ali, deputy chairman of a Turkomen association in Tal Afar. "The people are suffering from lack of food stuff, drinkable water and blankets, because it is getting cold during the night here."

One U.S. soldier was killed Monday in Tal Afar, the military reported. Two others died Tuesday in a roadside bombing in Baghdad, and another was killed the day before near Ramadi west of Baghdad.

The deaths brought to at least 1,893 the number of U.S. military personnel who have died since the war began in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

Despite the fighting, security is better in Shiite Muslim areas of central and southern Iraq, including the holy city of Najaf, scene of heavy combat last year between American soldiers and Shiite Muslim extremists.

DOJ_NMG_0003458

But the Shiite clerical hierarchy mediated a truce, and the area was deemed peaceful enough for U.S. forces to hand over one of their bases in the city to Iraq's army. The transfer of Forward Operating Base Hotel means Iraqis are fully responsible for security in the city.

During a ceremony Tuesday, Lt. Col. James Oliver handed the ceremonial keys to the base to the new Iraqi commander, Col. Saadi Salih al-Maliky. About 1,500 Iraqi soldiers from the 2nd Battalion, 1st Brigade, 8th Division marched by.

U.S. troops relocated to a base outside the city in case their help is needed in a major security crisis.

The move is the first step in a plan to gradually hand over areas once Iraqi forces are deemed capable of ensuring security. The goal is for the United States and its international partners to begin drawing down their troop numbers next year and focus on the insurgency-ridden Sunni Arab areas to the north.

"This is indeed a very important day for the province of Najaf," said Brig. Gen. Augustus L. Collins, commander of the 155th Brigade Combat Team. "It gives me great pleasure to say the Iraqi army in Najaf can control the area."

U.S. and Iraqi officials also hope a new constitution, which goes to the voters in an Oct. 15 referendum, will weaken the insurgency by luring Sunni Arabs into political participation.

However, Sunni negotiators rejected the proposed charter last month and vowed to defeat it in the referendum. The bitter, protracted talks appeared to raise tensions among Iraq's ethnic and religious communities.

U.S. Forces Give Iraqis Full Control Of Najaf (WP)

By Saad Sarhan And Omar Fekeiki

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

NAJAF, Iraq, Sept. 6 -- The U.S. military pulled hundreds of troops out of the southern city of Najaf on Tuesday, transferring security duties to Iraqi forces and sticking to a schedule that the United States hopes will allow the withdrawal of tens of thousands of its forces by early spring.

The handover came as Marine F/A-18 jets bombed two bridges near the Syrian border, hitting infrastructure in an area where insurgents have maintained effective control despite off-and-on offensives by U.S. forces. Insurgents have used the bridges to move fighters and arms across the Euphrates River toward Baghdad and other cities, the U.S. military said.

In the same area, U.S. warplanes later destroyed a building that insurgents had used to fire upon American and Iraqi troops, a U.S. military statement said. At least two suspected foreign fighters were killed, the military said.

Suspected insurgents in the same western province, Anbar, kidnapped the son of the new governor in Ramadi, the provincial capital, officials said Tuesday. Insurgents kidnapped the previous Anbar governor in May; he was killed in a U.S. attack on the house where he was being held.

U.S. Marines have a force of about 5,000 to cover the province's 24,000 square miles. American officers in Anbar say the Marines are too few to bring the province under control, but U.S. and Iraqi officials say the U.S. raids have helped disrupt the flow of bombs and recruits into the rest of Iraq.

Roadside bombs killed two American service members Tuesday, one in Baghdad and one in Ramadi, the U.S. military said.

In Baghdad, meanwhile, President Jalal Talabani told al-Iraqiya television that former president Saddam Hussein had confessed to crimes, including killings, committed on his orders. Talabani said he had been told by an investigating judge that "he was able to extract confessions from Saddam's mouth."

"Saddam deserves a death sentence 20 times a day because he tried to assassinate me 20 times," Talabani said, recalling his days as a Kurdish rebel leader. Hussein is scheduled to face trial on Oct. 19 for his role in a 1982 massacre of 143 Shiite Muslims in the town of Dujail.

The handover ceremony in Najaf marked the first transfer of an entire city from U.S. to Iraqi military responsibility this year. The raising of the Iraqi flag at a former U.S. base was "pretty much putting the city of Najaf in Iraqi control," Lt. Col. Steve Boylan, spokesman for the U.S. military, said in Baghdad.

U.S. forces will continue to support Iraqi troops in an advisory role and with logistics, Boylan said.

Najaf has been the scene of relatively few insurgent attacks. In August 2004, U.S. and Iraqi forces here launched a major assault to disarm the Mahdi Army, a militia loyal to the Shiite cleric Moqtada Sadr that had staged two uprisings against the U.S. military presence in Iraq. The assault claimed dozens of lives from both sides and ended only when Iraq's most influential cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, ordered Sadr to rein in his fighters.

Tensions surged again last month when clashes erupted between Sadr's men and Iraqi Interior Ministry forces seen as loyal to a rival Shiite bloc, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq. Nineteen died in those battles.

"There's always [the] possibility of little spurts of violence here and there," Boylan said, but for U.S. forces now, "the top priority is foreign fighters and the Iraqis who support them."

DOJ_NMG_0003459

About 400 U.S. soldiers left the base in Tuesday's handover, Lt. Col. James Oliver, commander of Forward Operating Base Hotel, told reporters, and "more will leave in the future."

The United States, which has 138,000 troops in Iraq, is pushing for major withdrawals to begin in early spring. Iraqi and U.S. officials had identified Najaf as one of the first places where the United States could draw down its forces. Other cities in the heavily Shiite south, and in the Kurdish north, are likely to be next.

The mostly Shiite Iraqi force assuming command here immediately renamed the post Base Karrar, or Base Warrior, a reference to one of Shiite Islam's most important figures, Ali, a cousin of the prophet Muhammad.

"Our forces are capable of defending the city," said Abdul Hussein Abdulridha Abtan, Najaf's deputy governor. "They are able to defeat the biggest terrorist operation."

Some residents of Najaf welcomed the handover.

"It is a happy event for Iraqis when we take care of our affairs, not the occupier," said Mustafa Hamdani, 19, a university student. "But we want them to continue [to] train our soldiers."

Others, however, expressed concern.

"It's true we would prefer not to have U.S. forces in the city -- but we need them," said boutique owner Aqil Farhan, 25. "The Iraqi forces are not capable of maintaining security yet."

Hussein Confessed To Massacre Order, Iraqi President Says (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 6 - The deposed Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein has confessed to crimes in meetings with investigators for the special tribunal that will try him later this year, President Jalal Talabani said in a televised interview Tuesday night. But a lawyer for Mr. Hussein's family dismissed the statement as a "fabrication."

Speaking on the state-run Iraqiya network, Mr. Talabani, a Kurd, said investigators have told him the "good news" that Mr. Hussein had confessed to ordering the Anfal massacre against the Kurds in northern Iraq in 1988 and to ordering other executions.

"He confessed about the Anfal executions, and the orders issued by his name," Mr. Talabani said. "Saddam should be executed 20 times."

It was not clear from the interview whether Mr. Talabani was saying that Mr. Hussein had acknowledged that his actions were criminal or that the former leader had merely admitted he had ordered killings he believed were proper. In the past he has not denied that he ordered people killed.

After the broadcast, a lawyer for Mr. Hussein's family criticized Mr. Talabani's remarks and suggested in an interview with The Associated Press that his statements had been false. Claims of a confession "comes to me as a surprise, a big surprise," said the lawyer, Abdel Haq Alani. He said Mr. Hussein had made no mention of a confession during a meeting with his Iraqi lawyer on Monday.

Mr. Alani added, "Is this the fabrication of Talabani or what?"

Fighting against Sunni Arab insurgents continued in western and northern Iraq. Some residents fled the northern insurgent stronghold of Tal Afar as fighting continued between American and Iraqi forces and insurgents who have controlled much of the city for almost a year. Residents complained of severe food shortages, and news services reported that the fighting had killed and wounded civilians and that residents had been bracing for a new round of combat.

Insurgents used a large roadside bomb to kill one American soldier in Tal Afar on Monday, the military said. American troops have been fighting since May to wrest control of the city from insurgents who moved in after the military largely abandoned Tal Afar last year.

In western Iraq, military jets launched two airstrikes against insurgents near the Syrian border on Tuesday, the latest assault against militants who control much of the desolate badlands of western Anbar Province that are home turf to the most hardened elements of the Sunni Arab insurgency.

Shortly after midnight on Tuesday, jets bombed two bridges near the town of Karabila that insurgents had used to transport foreign fighters and weapons into central Iraq, a statement by the United States Marines said. Hours later, jets flattened a "foreign fighter safe house" near the bridges after a gun battle with marines there that killed two insurgents, another statement said.

In contrast to the military's normally more upbeat assertions about progress curbing the insurgency, the first statement noted that western Anbar residents have "experienced an increased level of violence at the hands of Al Qaeda in Iraq terrorists."

DOJ_NMG_0003460

In central Baghdad, two American soldiers were killed Tuesday morning and two more were wounded when insurgents attacked their vehicle with a large roadside bomb. Another American soldier died Monday in Ramadi, the provincial capital of Anbar, when his vehicle was struck by a roadside bomb.

In other violence, the Iraqi police found four bodies in a sewage duct in southern Baghdad on Tuesday afternoon, according to an official at the Iraqi Interior Ministry. The official also said that shortly after 9 p.m., attackers shooting from a car window opened fire on people gathered at a Sunni mosque in northern Baghdad, killing three and wounding two. There were also unconfirmed reports that the son of Anbar Province's governor had been kidnapped from his college.

Iraqi officials say Mr. Hussein's first trial is expected to begin Oct. 19, when he faces charges that he ordered the killing of nearly 150 men and boys from the Shiite village of Dujail, 35 miles north of Baghdad, after a failed assassination attempt against him there in 1982.

If convicted, Mr. Hussein could be hanged soon afterward, eliminating the need for other prosecutions of charges of crimes against humanity, Iraqi officials have said. Those charges include ordering the Anfal massacre, where tens of thousands of Kurds were gassed or otherwise killed and dumped into mass graves, and the suppression of the Shiite uprising in southern Iraq in 1991, when 150,000 people were killed and bulldozed into graves.

Across many parts of Iraq with heavy Sunni Arab populations - especially in western Anbar - Iraqi security forces are far from being able to battle the insurgency on their own. But in the Shiite-dominated south, a battalion of 1,500 Iraqi troops formally assumed control of the holy city of Najaf, where Shiite insurgents fought fierce battles with American troops just last year.

The American 155th Brigade Combat Team handed over control of the main military encampment in Najaf, Forward Operating Base Hotel, to Iraqi troops during a ceremony on Tuesday.

The American commander, Brig. Gen. Augustus L. Collins, said the "Iraqi Army in Najaf can control the area," according to a pool report of the ceremony. But the general also emphasized that a contingent of American troops would remain based nearby in case the Iraqi forces needed help.

"Although we are transferring authority at this F.O.B., we will still be here to help the people of Najaf," he said.

With Death At Their Door, Few Leave Iraqi City (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

TALL AFAR, Iraq, Sept. 6 -- On one side of the concertina wire lining an avenue stood 100 U.S. troops, five Bradley Fighting Vehicles and two M1-A1 Abrams tanks. Across the street were about 1,000 men, women and children of this embattled northwestern city.

The military had warned in leaflets dropped by helicopter and messages played over loudspeaker Tuesday morning that it would soon raid the insurgent-controlled neighborhood of Sarai, east of the city center, and asked civilians to evacuate through checkpoints in the southern part of town. But the Sarai residents, most of them Sunni Turkmens, insisted they would either flee northward or remain in their homes, come what may.

After an eight-hour standoff marked by a cycle of negotiation, miscommunication, occasional gunfire and flashes of anger, one family, about 17 people, agreed to leave the city with a military escort, after a U.S. commander gave the crowd "one final chance." The rest retreated into Sarai, vowing to take their chances.

"A lot of people are just barricading themselves in, which is a big mistake," said Staff Sgt. George Kakeletris, a psychological operations soldier who drove a Humvee all day up and down the avenue, which the military calls Bel Air, blaring messages in Arabic from speakers mounted on the roof.

About 5,000 U.S. and Iraqi soldiers entered Tall Afar four days ago in an offensive aimed at dislodging insurgents. Fighting has been sporadic so far. One U.S. soldier has been killed, along with at least 200 suspected insurgents, said Col. H.R. McMaster, commander of the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, which is leading the assault.

Five civilians were killed Tuesday when a suicide bomb detonated near an Iraqi army checkpoint. Four days of small-scale raids and house-to-house searches have allowed troops to encircle Sarai, where commanders here believe insurgents have massed.

The Iraqi government has asked the military commanders to minimize civilian casualties in this highly volatile region. A U.S.-led invasion of Tall Afar one year ago this month outraged the Turkish government, which argued that the assault victimized Turkmens, who share ethnic ties with Turks. When the U.S. withdrew, insurgents returned, capitalizing on anger over the offensive to consolidate control over the city, which has also been marred by sectarian violence between Sunni and Shiite tribes.

"Steps are being taken to ensure that this is done with the least possible amount of harm done to civilians," McMaster said.

But several Sarai residents said they had been warned that Shiite residents or policemen, who are concentrated in southern Tall Afar, would attack if they left in that direction.

DOJ_NMG_0003461

"I would rather die from American bombs in my home with my family than walk south," a man in a gray dishdasha , or robe, and white head scarf explained to soldiers. "People are saying the Shiites will kill you or kidnap you. That is a disgrace."

The evacuation of Sarai, the oldest section of Tall Afar and a web of narrow streets where fighting is expected to be difficult, was supposed to help prevent civilians from being hurt or killed during the offensive's final phase. The military strung nearly a mile of concertina wire along Bel Air, on the northern edge of the neighborhood, on Sunday to encourage people to migrate south, where it had established checkpoints to prevent insurgents from fleeing undetected. Among 200 people who followed instructions and fled south Tuesday, soldiers discovered a man suspected of being an insurgent who was dressed as a woman, complete with prosthetic breasts.

For the military, problems began at 8 a.m. Tuesday when soldiers who had spent the night in an abandoned house awoke to about 300 Sarai residents who had picked their way across the wire and were sitting in the street outside the house, asking how they could get out of Tall Afar.

The soldiers escorted the crowd back to the other side of the wire but found that at least 500 other people were waiting to come across. To block them, they placed tanks and Bradleys along Bel Air and sent soldiers with rifles to the roofs overlooking the street.

Men who identified themselves as tribal leaders of the people attempting to flee would periodically walk across the street -- which is pockmarked with dozens of craters caused by explosions -- stepping gingerly over the wire to negotiate with soldiers. Some residents said that their relatives were too sick or frail to travel south of the city or that their tribe was located in the north so they needed to go in that direction. Others said they actually lived outside Sarai but had spent the night in the neighborhood and were trapped by the concertina wire. The soldiers refused to let them pass.

"I am sure 99 percent of you are good people who are telling us the truth," Capt. Alan Blackburn, commander of the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment's Eagle Troop, 2nd Squadron, which was policing the area around Bel Air, told one of the men who wanted to go north. "But I am sure that there are a few people in that crowd who are not good people. And we don't have the facilities here to check them. You have to go south."

"I am not going unless you drive me in a tank," the man said. "There are no bad people in Sarai. If you come with me, I will take you to all the houses and you can see. The bad people are the Shiites in the south."

Late in the afternoon, the soldiers relented and offered a compromise. They told the residents they could exit to the north if they agreed to board military trucks bound for a base just outside the city where they could be processed and then released if they proved not to have ties to the insurgency.

"It sounds like a trick to take us south to the Shiites," one man said.

"We will go only if we can drive our own vehicles," another countered.

About 3 p.m., Lt. Col. Christopher Hickey, the Squadron commander, arrived to make a final plea. "I am trying to help you to get out of a very dangerous situation. You are going to be in danger if you stay here, I am telling you," he said. "Please, this is your last chance."

As he turned away from the crowd, one family emerged, with nine adults carrying baggage and eight children in tow. "Anyone else?" Hickey asked, beckoning. "Okay, then we will save these people," he said, and walked away.

Iraqi Army Takes Control Of Najaf (LAT)

By Ashraf Khalil And Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

NAJAF, Iraq — U.S. troops withdrew from this holy city in southern Iraq on Tuesday, an initial step in the military's effort to pull back from the country's urban centers and turn over authority to Iraqi forces.

Under waving Iraqi flags, U.S. commanders formally turned over control of Forward Operating Base Hotel, a square, concrete-walled American base on the edge of Najaf, a shrine city about 100 miles south of Baghdad that saw intense fighting last year.

"The Iraqi army is operating successfully throughout the region," said Lt. Col. James Oliver, the outgoing base commander, as he handed over the ceremonial keys to the base. "They are fully independent and capable of responding to all security needs. We are now here in a strictly advisory mode."

Najaf's hand-over scarcely could have been imagined last summer, when thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops fought a pitched, three-week battle in the city against the militia forces of radical Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr after the rebels seized control of several shrines. Hundreds died and much of the Old City was destroyed.

Calm was restored after followers of Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, Iraq's leading Shiite cleric, marched on the city and brokered a resolution. Since then, violence has flared sporadically in Najaf — just two weeks ago, six people were killed when clashes erupted between Sadr's forces and another Shiite faction — but commanders decided the situation had stabilized enough to warrant Tuesday morning's transfer of authority.

DOJ_NMG_0003462

The withdrawal is partially symbolic because U.S. forces will maintain a sizable force at Forward Operating Base Duke, a much larger facility about 20 miles away. But the move is an important psychological benchmark because the U.S. military presence in Iraq's holiest city has long been a sore spot for Shiites in Iraq and around the world.

Najaf Police Chief Gen. Abbas Karim Moadel hailed the hand-over as "a historic moment" and a tribute to the growing capability of the Iraqi security forces.

The Hotel base, renamed Camp Karrar, is one of two dozen turned over to the Iraqi security forces so far, U.S. Army spokesman Lt. Col. Steve Boylan said.

Before the transfer ceremony, soldiers of the Shiite-dominated Iraqi battalion chanted, "We stand for Iraq!" and "Saddam is a coward!"

Despite Oliver's statement that the U.S. remained only in an "advisory mode," several Iraqi soldiers said they expected U.S. forces to continue regular patrols in Najaf. It "remains to be seen" whether U.S. patrols would continue, Boylan said.

Some Najaf residents expressed a hope that the American troops would stick around a while longer. A complete American withdrawal from Najaf could spark violent competition among different Shiite factions within the police and army, said Haidar Sayid Salman, owner of a stationery store in the Old City.

"I trust them to fight terrorism, but their loyalty is not to the government," Salman said, referring to Iraqi security forces. "I wish we were ready for [independence], but we're not."

As the transfer of authority in Najaf proceeded Tuesday, violence was reported in the capital and restive Al Anbar province.

In Baghdad, two U.S. soldiers were killed and two others injured Tuesday morning when their vehicle hit a makeshift bomb and rolled over.

On Monday, a Marine assigned to the 2nd Marine Division in Al Anbar was killed by an improvised explosive during combat operations in Ramadi. Names of the dead were withheld pending family notification.

Fighting continued late Monday night near the Syrian border, where battles broke out last month between two rival tribes, one aligned with the Iraqi government and the other with insurgents led by Jordanian-born militant Abu Musab Zarqawi.

In a midnight attack, U.S. warplanes bombed two small bridges spanning the Euphrates River near Karabila. Military officials said insurgents used the bridges to move foreign fighters and equipment to central Iraq.

Marine F/A-18D jets damaged the bridges with concrete-filled bombs but did not destroy them, the military said.

In a related raid, U.S. troops attacked a nearby safe house that they said was being used by foreign fighters.

Two suspected foreign fighters were killed and three were arrested, U.S. officials said. One coalition soldier was wounded by "friendly fire."

Gunman Kills ‘one Of The Best' Explosives Experts (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, September 7, 2005

BAGHDAD — Haqy Asaad made a living snipping wires off bombs around Baghdad.

He was once flung back from the force of a roadside bomb that detonated prematurely, killing a colleague but only slightly wounding him.

In July, he carefully defused an explosives vest worn on a would-be suicide bomber outside the Green Zone, the fortified area housing U.S. and some Iraqi government offices.

He earned the nickname “Robot” from U.S. advisers for his dogged disarming of insurgents' bombs and was profiled in USA TODAY in July.

Asaad, an explosives expert with the Interior Ministry, was killed last week, not by bomb shrapnel but from a gunshot wound to the gut.

Gunmen ambushed him down the road from his home in southern Baghdad on Aug. 30. Officials are investigating the incident but believe Asaad was targeted by insurgents because of his job, said Brig. Hussein Muhssin, his supervisor.

Asaad was the eighth person in his unit to be killed either by bombs or insurgents. “I lost one of the best members of our department,” Muhssin said. “He was so devoted to his work, very daring, brave and smart. But he was always in a rush. I warned him so many times our work needs to be cautious, accurate.”

U.S. troops operating in Iraq are working to hand over security responsibilities to Iraqi units such as Asaad's. An increasing number of Iraqi troops are manning checkpoints, policing streets, leading raids on suspected insurgent hide-outs and disarming roadside bombs.

DOJ_NMG_0003463

Unlike U.S. troops, however, who live in heavily fortified camps, many Iraqi security personnel return home each night to regular neighborhoods, leaving them susceptible to attacks from guerrillas.

Asaad, 38, was part of the 13-member Criminal Investigations Directorate/Explosives Ordnance Detachment. He was paid the equivalent of $330 month, a large salary by Iraqi standards, to disarm roadside bombs and car bombs discovered before they detonated.

Asaad had worked as an explosives expert with the Interior Ministry under Saddam Hussein. He lost his job in 2003, when former members of the ruling Baath Party were expunged from government under the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority, Muhssin said. But U.S. military officials rehired him last fall and dispatched him to Florida for explosives training, he said.

Armed with little more than a pocket tool, Asaad grew adept at defusing roadside bombs, the weapon of choice for insurgents, Muhssin said. He learned how the devices worked and would mouth the common Muslim refrain — "There is no god but Allah, and Mohammed is the messenger of Allah" — before each crucial snip, Asaad said in the USA TODAY article.

Each month, he would hand over to U.S. explosives experts about 120 munitions — including mortar and artillery shells — collected from defused roadside bombs, said Maj. Alayne Conway, a spokeswoman with the Army's 3rd Infantry Division, which worked with Asaad.

"I can't just leave these bombs in all these neighborhoods," Asaad said in July. "I want to live in a peaceful Iraq someday."

In July, Asaad neutralized a bomb worn by a would-be suicide bomber. The bomber had been hit with shrapnel from another suicide bomber, leaving him nearly unconscious. Asaad disarmed the bomb and slipped the vest off the assailant to the cheers of U.S. and Iraqi personnel watching from a distance near the main entrance to the Green Zone.

"He was setting a standard for other Iraqis to follow," Conway said. "He knew that if he didn't do it, no one else would."

Asaad's success at his job was also making him a target among insurgents. He had received several threats the past few months, Muhssin said.

The latest one, scribbled on a sheet of paper and dropped in the garden outside his home last month, called him a "traitor and spy" and warned he would be killed if he didn't quit his job, Muhssin said.

On Aug. 30, Asaad called in sick, complaining of stomach pains. As he took a walk from his home in Baghdad's Dora neighborhood, witnesses saw two cars full of men, their faces concealed behind scarves, approach Asaad, Muhssin said. One jumped out and shot Asaad in the abdomen.

Asaad's wife called the police and accompanied her husband to Baghdad's Yarmouk Hospital, Muhssin said. In the back seat of the police car, Asaad told her to take good care of herself and their three children, ages 8, 15 and 17.

He died upon arrival at the hospital.

Intimidation, Attacks Take Toll On Contractors In Iraq (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, September 7, 2005

BAGHDAD — Attacks on contractors working on U.S.-funded projects in August reached one of the highest levels in the past year.

Insurgents killed seven contractors and injured 11 last month, according to the U.S. Project and Contracting Office in Baghdad. Sixteen more contractors were suspected or confirmed kidnapped.

"August was real bad," said Karen Durham-Aguilera, director of programs in the contracting office. "We've had to stop projects because of it."

August was the second most violent month since the contracting office began keeping records on the violence in September 2004. The worst was November, with nine deaths.

Most of those attacked were Iraqis working on U.S.-funded projects. Of the 34 people who were killed, wounded or went missing in August, 32 were Iraqis. None was American. Iraqi contractors, who rarely have security, are more vulnerable to attack than U.S. and some foreign contractors, who generally travel in armored convoys with armed security.

An important part of U.S. strategy in Iraq is to rebuild its aging infrastructure as a way of winning over Iraqis and undermining the insurgency. But insurgents are interfering with this by targeting contractors.

Security costs have chewed away at the $18.4 billion appropriated by Congress last year for reconstruction in Iraq. Last year, $5 billion of that was redirected to training and equipping Iraq's security forces, a move that resulted in the cancellation of some projects and scaling back others.

"Security is our biggest challenge," said Brig. Gen. William McCoy, an Army Corps of Engineers commander in Iraq. "We're losing a lot of contractors to a campaign of intimidation and terror."

Most recently, an Iraqi contractor recruiting security guards for reconstruction projects in Mosul was kidnapped last week and later killed, said Lt. Col. Stanley Heath, an Army Corps of Engineers spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0003464

In another incident, a supervisor for a Fallujah police station project was killed in his home on Aug. 19. The murder of the Iraqi supervisor prompted the contractor to halt construction on that and three other Fallujah police stations, Heath said.

A terrorist known as Abu Bakr, who leads a splinter cell of al-Qaeda in Iraq, specializes in disrupting reconstruction and is behind many of the attacks, McCoy said.

"He goes to sites, handing out workers a letter saying, 'I know where you live, and I'll kill you and your family,' " McCoy said. "He's out there kidnapping and killing these people."

Despite the threat, reconstruction projects continue. The Army Corps of Engineers says more than 1,700 projects have been completed since June 2004.

Sadr City Success Story (LAT)

By T. Christian Miller

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

BAGHDAD — Crammed into armored Humvees heaving with weapons, Lt. Col. S. Jamie Gayton and his soldiers were greeted by a surprising sight as they rolled into one of Baghdad's poorest neighborhoods.

Men stood and waved. Women smiled. Children flashed thumbs-up signs as the convoy rumbled across the potholed streets of Sadr City.

It was a far more welcoming scene than the urban war zone of a year ago, when U.S. troops and black-clad guerrilla fighters battled in the narrow alleys of the squalid slum.

"We're making a huge impact," Gayton said as his men pulled up to a sewer station newly repaired with U.S. funds. "It has been incredibly safe, incredibly quiet and incredibly secure."

Sadr City has become one of the rare success stories of the U.S. reconstruction effort, say local residents, Iraqi and U.S. officials. Although vast swaths remain blighted, the neighborhood of 2 million mostly impoverished Shiites is one of the calmest in Baghdad. One U.S. soldier has been killed and one car bomb detonated in the last year, the military says.

The improvements are the result of an intense effort in the wake of the street battles last August with fighters loyal to anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr. Within a month, U.S. officials decided to make Sadr City a showcase for rebuilding, and increased spending to $805 million in a neighborhood long neglected under Saddam Hussein.

Having covered the U.S. reconstruction effort in Iraq for the last 22 months, I decided to take a measure of progress by going back to the same people I interviewed last August, in addition to talking with U.S. and Iraqi officials involved in the program.

Their stories provide insight into why the rebuilding of Sadr City is an impressive, if imperfect, accomplishment in Iraq, where many projects remain incomplete and U.S. promises unfulfilled.

Unlike elsewhere in Iraq, where the reconstruction fell under the purview of a hodgepodge of U.S. civilian agencies, the American military provided sustained, focused leadership in a limited geographic area. That focus provided the oversight needed to coordinate the military's efforts with those of the U.S. Agency for International Development and the Pentagon's Project and Contracting Office, the primary reconstruction agencies.

The rebuilding also held more immediate significance among mid-level commanders in the field than among higher-level Pentagon officials preoccupied with fighting the war. The field officers focused on short-term, high-visibility projects such as cleaning up trash and digging wells, instead of massive new water treatment plants or power stations that take years to build. They also hired local Iraqi contractors, who in turn employed many of the militia members who had once battled U.S. troops.

Finally, unlike the U.S. multinationals contracted to build large infrastructure projects, the military did not have to rely on expensive security contractors for protection. That enabled soldiers to more easily communicate with Iraqis, monitor progress and overcome problems.

The results can be seen in the life of Ahmed Kadhem, who spent much of August 2004 huddled with his family inside their home as the war raged outside. The family had limited electricity, no water and no sewer connection.

A year later, his family remains without those basic services. But he has seen improvements all around him. And he is ready to give the Americans a chance.

"There is some movement," he said last month. "People have taken note."

The effects of the U.S. effort were apparent on a recent visit to Sadr City.

At the newly repaired sewer station, a local family guarding it greeted Gayton like an old friend; he had visited several times before.

Haita Zamel showed Gayton how the local sewer authority was fixing a problem that had developed in one pump. She proudly showed off the small home that had been built on the site to replace a dilapidated trailer where her family of six once lived. She even asked Gayton for computer software to teach English to her children.

DOJ_NMG_0003465

"When you tell me something, I know you'll do it," she said, clutching tightly at the white scarf covering her head. "To the last day of our life, we are with you. Us and all of our neighbors."

Gayton and his men clambered back into the Humvees and moved on. A few minutes later, he ordered his driver to make a random stop in front of a group of stores where water lines had been installed. He wanted to make sure the water was flowing.

As a crowd gathered, the shop owners acknowledged better water. But they complained about electricity, saying that power lines were being installed at nearby shops but not theirs.

Gayton smiled. The military had divided Sadr City into four segments, each targeted for different improvements such as new sewers or clean water. That way, each area saw the improvements going on in the others, providing proof of progress and an incentive to remain cooperative.

"Everything happens one step at a time," Gayton told the men.

"We have to cooperate with the Americans. We know," said shopkeeper Amed Ali Ibrahim.

But the continuing risks were evident a moment later. As Gayton and his men roared away, one soldier, fearing a possible car bomb, fired into the ground to warn a vehicle that was getting too close.

Still, at each of half a dozen stops, the complaints were tempered by friendly banter and acknowledgment of improvements.

Residents and workers praised a health clinic being built at another site. But then they pointed in anger at a huge puddle of sickly green sewage blocking the entrance. Gayton promised to prod the Iraqis to make repairs.

"We are suffering," one worker, Jabbar Abed Khalef, told Gayton. Batting away flies, Khalef held up his shoes, coated in black muck. "Our children are sick. The road is blocked. It's a disaster."

But a moment later, Khalef was praising the U.S. for working more quickly than the Iraqi government.

"We know that if the Americans don't do it, the Iraqi government will take a long time," he said.

At the end of the run, Gayton appeared pleased. A tall, fit man with an easy command of figures, he appeared excited whenever the convoy passed a garbage truck at work. He said the investment made by the U.S. had paid dividends.

Last year, soldiers at Gayton's base were the target of more than 1,000 mortar strikes. This year, there have been none. There have been a handful of attacks on U.S. troops, mostly gunfire, and no clashes so far with Sadr's militiamen.

Gayton does not claim that the reconstruction alone has led to the decrease in violence. And he acknowledges that the militia members may well rise up again if commanded by Sadr.

But Gayton believes that fewer people will heed the call this time.

"Our goal is to provide them with hope so they see that tomorrow is better than today," he said. "We want them to look to the left and the right and say, 'Hey, joining hands with the [Iraqi] government and the coalition [forces] is going to help us more so than anybody else.' "

Kadhem doesn't deny progress. But it's easy enough for him to see the problems that remain.

His home is a one-story cinderblock house just off Sadr City's main drag. The potholed boulevard slices through the 8-mile-square district, a ragged sprawl of low-slung homes and dingy shops. Street vendors hawk everything from fat, ripe watermelons to AK-47s. Cars, trucks and horse-drawn wagons choke intersections. Sheep and goats wander through the filth.

Last August, Kadhem and his family of four were trapped in their house, a long, narrow structure with a threadbare rug, bare concrete floors and a fluorescent light that flickered to life during the rare occasions when electricity flowed.

The frequent blackouts meant that the temperature inside soared to 130 degrees. The stench of a pool of sewage just outside wafted in on the occasional hot, humid breeze.

"They said they were going to fix many things, and still nothing has happened," Kadhem said at the time, with fighting in the streets outside. "If the Americans had done well, most people would be with the Americans and we would not have these problems."

A year later, the blackouts are more frequent; his water remains undrinkable. The pond of sewage is gone — but that's only because Kadhem and his neighbors took up a collection and paid a private contractor to come and clean it up.

"No government has helped us," said Kadhem, a slight man with a Van Dyke pointy beard and a quick, broad smile. "We have helped the government."

Kadhem remains suspicious of the American presence in Iraq. Still, when members of Sadr's militia came around with a petition demanding the withdrawal of the Americans, Kadhem and his wife did not sign.

"We refused to sign not because we love the occupiers or to be your friends, but I really believe that if the Americans leave Iraq now, it'll be chaos," Kadhem said. "Nobody loves the occupier. But there's no alternative."

Despite his hesitance, Kadhem acknowledged that things had gotten better.

His four children can play in streets now free from fighting. Among other evident improvements, Kadhem and his wife, both teachers, have seen their schools painted, books and supplies donated and new classrooms and bathrooms built.

DOJ_NMG_0003466

But Kadhem has benefited most in two ways: First, and most important, Hussein's ouster has meant new opportunities for once-repressed Shiite Muslims. And second, his pay increased tenfold because of a state worker salary hike implemented under L. Paul Bremer III, the U.S. civilian administrator in Iraq at the time.

Kadhem took the extra money and his newfound freedom and decided to open a business.

A talented carpenter, he opened a workshop in northern Baghdad, where services are markedly better because they weren't subjected to deliberate neglect during Hussein's rule. The streets are paved, and clean water comes from the tap.

He now spends every free moment from his teaching career at the store, a narrow garage on the first floor of a home in a middle-class neighborhood of Sunnis and Shiites. In one corner sits a graceful, curved headboard made of wood imported from Malaysia. In another sits a partially completed bedroom set, built from a picture in a catalog.

On one recent morning, several customers stopped by to check on the progress of their orders. Kadhem's son and two other employees flitted in and out, carrying wood, sodas and supplies. Sawdust flew through the air and a generator chugged to power a band saw.

Kadhem proudly showed off his venture. As a young man, he had always wanted to be an artist. Now, he was finally putting his skills to use in woodworking.

Kadhem said that for the first time, he could imagine a future for his children better than his own.

"Things are different. Before, we felt afraid. Now, there is freedom and we feel there will be a solution and it will be better," he said. "At this stage, we have to endure.

"The change from a dictatorship to a democracy is not easy."

Iraq President Says Saddam Confessed To Crimes; U.S. Hits Bridges (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, September 7, 2005

BAGHDAD — Iraq's president said Tuesday that Saddam Hussein had confessed to killings and other crimes committed during his regime.

President Jalal Talabani told Iraqi television that he had been informed by an investigating judge that “he was able to extract confessions from Saddam's mouth” about crimes “such as executions” that the ousted leader had personally ordered.

Saddam's lawyers couldn't be reached for comment.

Talabani said that some of the confessions involved cases under investigation but he gave no specifics. Saddam faces his first trial Oct. 19 for his alleged role in the massacre of Shiites in Dujail in 1982. He could face the death penalty if convicted.

Also Tuesday, the U.S. military said four more Americans had been killed in action. One U.S. soldier was killed Monday in Tal Afar. Two others died Tuesday in a roadside bombing in Baghdad, and another was killed the day before near Ramadi west of Baghdad, U.S. command said.

The military also said Marine jets on Tuesday attacked two bridges across the Euphrates River near the Syrian border to prevent insurgents from moving foreign fighters and munitions toward Baghdad and other cities.

The airstrikes took place near Karabilah, about 185 miles west of Baghdad and one of a cluster of towns near the border used by foreign fighters to slip into Iraq.

Marine F/A-18 jets dropped bombs shortly after midnight on two Euphrates bridges. Hours later, a Marine jet destroyed a building used by insurgents to fire on U.S. and Iraqi forces, a military statement said.

One Iraqi soldier was wounded when Marines and Iraqi troops stormed the building, killing two foreigners and arresting three others, the statement said.

In Tal Afar, civilians were fleeing the city, 260 miles northwest of Baghdad, where U.S. and Iraqi soldiers have launched an offensive. Plumes of smoke could be seen rising from the city, which sits along a major trade and smuggling route to Syria.

“The people are suffering from lack of food stuff, drinkable water and blankets,” said Hazem Mohammed Ali, deputy chairman of a Turkomen association in Tal Afar.

To the south, U.S. forces handed the Iraqis control of the Shiite city, Najaf, once a scene of bitter conflict between American troops and militiamen. The transfer of U.S. Forward Operating Base Hotel means Iraqis are fully responsible for security in the city.

Oil-For-Food Probe: UN Needs Overhaul To Stop Fraud (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 6 -- The U.N. Security Council and Secretary General Kofi Annan failed to adequately manage and police the $64 billion U.N. oil-for-food program, creating a permissive environment that enabled Saddam Hussein's government in Iraq to take billions of dollars in illicit kickbacks, according to the findings of a U.N. investigation to be released Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0003467

The report by Paul A. Volcker, the former U.S. Federal Reserve chairman who heads the U.N. Independent Inquiry Committee, will portray a largely dysfunctional, leaderless international effort to operate the humanitarian relief effort for Iraq from December 1996 until the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003. Volcker will urge world leaders attending a Sept. 14 summit on U.N. reform to support steps to strengthen the quality of independent oversight of the organization's spending.

"To settle for less, to permit delay and dilution, will invite failure, further erode public support, and dishonor the ideals upon which the United Nations is built," says the preface of Volcker's report.

The document, which is expected to exceed 700 pages, is the fourth and most comprehensive report by Volcker's panel and will summarize previously published findings while offering new details of abuses in the program.

Among those conclusions, the report will say that Iraq's neighbors, including Jordan, Turkey and Syria, violated U.N. sanctions by smuggling billions of dollars of Iraqi oil from Hussein's government, U.N. sources said. The report will also fault key Security Council members, including France and Russia, for impeding efforts to reform the oil-for-food program. And it will criticize the United States for doing too little to discourage allies in the region from violating the sanctions and by abetting the smuggling of Iraqi oil by Jordan immediately before the invasion, the sources said.

"The committee report documents how differences among member states impeded decisions, tolerated large-scale smuggling, and aided and abetted grievous weaknesses in administrative practices within the [U.N.] Secretariat," says the preface, which was released Tuesday. "As the years passed, reports spread of waste, inefficiency, and corruption, even within the United Nations itself. Some was rumor and exaggeration, but much -- too much -- has turned out to be true."

The U.N. program was established to allow Iraq, which was under a U.N. trade embargo following its 1990 invasion of Kuwait, to sell oil and use the proceeds to buy food and medicine and pay billions of dollars in war reparations. The report to be issued Wednesday says the program achieved "important successes" by improving nutritional and health standards and by undermining Hussein's efforts to build weapons of mass destruction. But it says the United Nations allowed Hussein to abuse the program by bribing U.N. officials and by forcing hundreds of companies to pay kickbacks in exchange for the right to trade in oil and humanitarian goods. The abuses cast a "dark shadow" over the program, Volcker's report says.

The oil-for-food scandal has triggered federal criminal investigations and several congressional probes of the United Nations' management of the program. The U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York has charged two Russian nationals with wire fraud and money laundering. One of them, a U.N. procurement officer who has pleaded guilty, was cited in a previous Volcker report for soliciting a bribe from a Swiss company seeking to do business in the oil-for-food program and for receiving more than $950,000 in bribes from contractors in other U.N. programs.

Volcker's new report will sharply criticize Annan's oversight of the oil program as lax, citing "serious instances of illicit, unethical, and corrupt behavior" by U.N. officials under his watch. The report will draw attention to administrative shortcomings by the nine U.N. humanitarian agencies, including the U.N. Development Program and Habitat, the main housing agency. It also will accuse the 15-nation Security Council of providing "uncertain, wavering direction" to U.N. officials running the program. "Neither the Security Council nor the Secretariat leadership was clearly in command," the preface states.

Annan conceded in an interview with the BBC on Monday that "mistakes were made" in managing the program, but he insisted that there were "concessions that had to be made to get Saddam Hussein to agree."

"I accept responsibility for inadequacies and failures," he told the BBC. But "when it comes to Iraq, on this issue, no one is entirely covered in glory. . . . Honestly, I wish we had never been given that program, and I wish the U.N. will never be asked to undertake that kind of program again."

The Volcker panel singled out Annan's son, Kojo, for abusing diplomatic privileges extended to his father. The report claims that Kojo Annan received a $3,000 loan in 1998 to buy a $39,000 Mercedes-Benz from an executive of a Swiss company, Cotecna, that was trying to do business with the United Nations through the oil-for-food program, according to a member of Volcker's staff.

The report will also assert that Kojo Annan obtained thousands of dollars in diplomatic benefits -- including breaks on taxes and customs fees -- from the transaction by falsely claiming that he was purchasing the car for his father, according to the staff member. The sale was first reported by Time magazine. Efforts to reach Kojo Annan's attorney last night were unsuccessful.

Panel Hits U.N. On Oil-for-food Failures (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

NEW YORK -- An outside accounting of the U.N. oil-for-food program strongly criticizes the world body for failures ranging from a lack of oversight by the Secretariat to political interference from the Security Council, which established it.

The Independent Inquiry Committee (IIC) is expected to formally absolve U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan in the awarding of a key contract to his son's former employer when it issues its final report today.

But a five-page preface, which became public yesterday, makes clear that the commission, headed by former Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker, will not spare Mr. Annan's administration from a harsh assessment of its management capabilities.

The 1,000-page report comes only a week before world leaders gather at the United Nations for a summit devoted to strengthening and defining the organization for the 21st century.

"The committee reports reveal serious instances of illicit, unethical and corrupt behavior with the United Nations," according to the IIC, which also finds "wholesale corruption" by companies doing business with Saddam Hussein.

The IIC was created by Mr. Annan, authorized by the Security Council, and financed with $35 million from the same aid program it is investigating.

In three previous reports, the IIC investigated the quest for kickbacks and bribes by former U.N. officials, detailed misuse of funds and document-shredding by senior officials, and chipped away at management structures that failed to catch wrongdoing.

Today's report will examine the roles of the U.N.'s administrative staff, the Secretariat, in managing the program, and the nine primary U.N. agencies that carried out the humanitarian and reconstruction work in Iraq.

It also will address the political sensitivities that compromised the Security Council's ability to make important decisions; the "grievous absence" of effective auditing and management controls; and the inability to track expenditures across agencies and programs.

"The inescapable conclusion from the committee's work is that the U.N. organization needs thoroughgoing reform -- and it needs it urgently," the authors conclude.

The panel suggests that the secretary-general create a post of chief operating officer to oversee administration and coordination.

The Security Council, which winnowed Iraq's shopping list and vetted contracts from vendors through a committee, comes in for plenty of criticism.

From the beginning, the council allowed Saddam's regime too much power over the design and implementation of the program, it says. In an unusual move, diplomats were allowed to control program operations rather than just give advice.

At the end of the day, the IIC finds, neither the council nor the Secretariat was in clear control.

"When things went awry -- and they surely did when troublesome conflicts arose between political objectives and administrative effectiveness -- decisions were delayed, bungled or simply shunned," the report says.

U.N. officials yesterday declined to comment on the preface. But Mr. Annan told the British Broadcasting Corp. this week that the organization had been ill-equipped to take on a project as complex as the oil-for-food program.

"I suspect that there will be lots of criticism," Mr Annan said. "Honestly, I wish we were never given that program."

The IIC, found that the program did, in fact, accomplish its two primary objectives -- feeding ordinary Iraqis who were hurt by U.N. sanctions, and depriving Saddam of weapons of mass destruction.

But with charges of waste, inefficiency and corruption "those successes fell under an increasingly dark shadow," the preface says.

Although the report will run close to 1,000 pages, the panel stresses that investigators from 28 countries still don't have a complete picture.

"Constraints of time, concerns for personnel security in Iraq and lack of full cooperation by some member states and individuals means that examination of some parts of the program have been less detailed than others," the forward says.

Annan Failed To Curb Corruption In Iraq's Oil-for-Food Program, Investigators Report (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 6 - A yearlong investigation has concluded that Secretary General Kofi Annan failed to curb corruption and mismanagement at the United Nations, but it did not find evidence to support charges that he improperly influenced the scandal-tainted oil-for-food program.

"His sins were ones of omission basically; there were things that he might well have done and should have done that he didn't do," a senior investigator said Tuesday.

Typical of the lapses, the investigator said, was Mr. Annan's failure to look more thoroughly into the activities of his son, Kojo Annan, to see if his working for a company that received an oil-for-food contract posed a conflict of interest for his father.

The committee, led by Paul A. Volcker, a former chairman of the Federal Reserve Bank, found no evidence that Kofi Annan knew about the contract, but it found instances where Kojo Annan did try to influence it, and in general exploited his father's name, the investigator said.

In one incident, he said, Kojo Annan bought a new Mercedes using his father's name, which yielded him a diplomatic discount and enabled him to import the vehicle to Ghana without paying import duty.

The report, to be released on Wednesday, also details an instance in which Mr. Annan's predecessor, Boutros Boutros-Ghali of Egypt, was the target of an effort to exploit the oil-for-food program.

It says that an Iraqi-American businessman, Samir Vincent, and a Korean lobbyist, Tongsun Park, tried to pass $1 million to Mr. Boutros-Ghali but that there was no evidence that Mr. Boutros-Ghali had received or agreed to receive the money.

The report says that Iraq also tried to secure another high level contact at the United Nations in 1997 when Mr. Park invested $1 million of Iraqi money in a company controlled by Maurice Strong, a Canadian entrepreneur then serving as Mr. Annan's coordinator for United Nations reform. The committee said it found no evidence that Mr. Strong himself was involved.

Mr. Vincent pleaded guilty earlier this year to federal charges of illegal lobbying for Iraq. Mr. Park, who was also charged, is believed to be in South Korea. Mr. Strong stepped aside from his post as Mr. Annan's special envoy to North Korea because of past associations with Mr. Park, and the United Nations announced in July that his contract would not be renewed.

Mr. Volcker is to present the results of his $34 million inquiry to Mr. Annan and the Security Council in an open hearing on Wednesday.

The general conclusion of the 860-page report, the fourth and most definitive from Mr. Volcker's panel, is that the United Nations is inefficient, over-politicized, corrupt and in desperate need of immediate repair.

"The inescapable conclusion from the committee's work is that the United Nations organization needs thoroughgoing reform - and it needs it urgently," says the report's five-page preface, which was made public by The Associated Press.

The report comes a week before more than 170 presidents and prime ministers are due at the United Nations to update goals from the 2000 millennium summit conference and to approve sweeping changes to the way the United Nations is run.

The much disputed $64 billion oil-for-food program was intended to ease the effects of sanctions on the 27 million Iraqis by supplying them with food and medicine in exchange for letting Saddam Hussein export oil. But its manipulation by Mr. Hussein and illicit profits it generated for the Iraqi government caused it to become a lightning rod for critics of the United Nations, and provoked calls from Republican lawmakers in Washington for Mr. Annan's resignation.

Mr. Annan's spokesman, Stéphane Dujarric of France, said Tuesday that Mr. Annan intended to fill out his term, which ends in late 2006.

The report, while criticizing Mr. Annan, acknowledges that the United Nations Charter gives him the responsibility of being the chief administrative officer without the resources to meet the demands.

"Whatever the founders had in mind, the secretary general - any secretary general - has not been chosen for his managerial or administrative skills, nor has he been provided with a structure and instruments conducive to strong executive oversight and control," the preface says.

In an allusion to the widespread cronyism at the United Nations, it says that a secretary general must see to it that personnel choices are based on "professional competence" rather than on "narrow political interests of member states."

"The reality is that the secretary general has come to be viewed as chief diplomatic and political agent of the United Nations," the preface says. "The present secretary general is widely respected for precisely those qualities. In these turbulent times, those responsibilities tend to be all-consuming. The record amply reflects consequent administrative failings."

The investigator who described the report said the committee had produced conclusive figures showing that the amount of Mr. Hussein's profits from kickbacks and surcharges connected to the oil-for-food program amounted to $10.99 billion, while smuggling amounted to $1.8 billion.

The preface said the committee had found "instances of illicit, unethical and corrupt behavior" among lower ranking United Nations staff members in the field, but the investigator said the report would not detail it.

"You had thousands of new employees over there, hired on the spot without much vetting, with transactions made only in cash," he said. "You're living in a corrupt environment, you're pushed by political pressures, but whether senior officials are involved is another question. We're neutral on that. We have not been able to pin any of it down."

According to the preface, "wholesale corruption" took place among private companies that were manipulated by Mr. Hussein's government. The committee plans a separate report next month detailing the companies and the abuses.

In the only instances of corruption that the Volcker committee has uncovered at headquarters, Benon V. Sevan of Cyprus, the former executive director of the program, was accused last month of banking at least $147,000 in kickbacks and a procurement officer, Aleksandr V. Yakovlev of Russia, was found to have solicited a bribe, unsuccessfully, from a program contractor.

DOJ_NMG_0003470

Given the United Nations' international responsibilities, it is critical that it combat corruption, the preface said.

"Corrosive corruption, private and public, has been far too common, not least in the member states in which the United Nations has programs of economic and humanitarian assistance," the preface said.

Standing in the way of this, it said, was the "absence of a strong organizational ethic, an ethic that should permeate at its leadership and staff if the United nations is to command the respect upon which its work depends."

The investigator said he had sometimes asked himself whether the charges of corruption had been exaggerated.

"You can say, what the hell did you expect in a program this complicated, an international organization, political differences, it's kind of run of the mill and after all, the program was kind of successful getting food in there, maintaining sanctions," he said.

"But then another point of view is that the U.N. is the U.N., and they better try to meet very high standards because, with the sheer corruption in this world, maybe a good example by the U.N., considering all the corrupt places they have to work in, would help."

U.N. Naysayers Greet 60th Anniversary With Biting Documentary (NYSUN)

By Meghan Clyne

New York Sun, September 7, 2005

As the United Nations prepares to commence the 60th session of the General Assembly next week with a three-day summit on institutional reform, some of the world body's critics have readied suggestions of their own. An hour-long documentary film, "Broken Promises: The United Nations at 60," uses this year's milestone as an occasion to chronicle the organization's failings since its inception, and to raise questions about whether the world body should perpetuate itself for another 60 years.

The film, set for nationwide release this month, is the brainchild of an actor and activist, Ronald Silver, and the president of the Citizens United Foundation, David Bossie. Citizens United is a Washington, D.C.-based conservative advocacy organization that, among its other activities, produced "Celsius 41.11," one of the documentary films to emerge last year as a rebuttal to Michael Moore's "Fahrenheit 911." Mr. Bossie is a former chief investigator for the House of Representatives.

In "Broken Promises," Mr. Bossie turns his investigative instincts to the United Nations, to provide a "broad look ... to show just what the U.N. has successfully and not so successfully done in the last 60 years." The film, Mr. Bossie said, documents the world body's failures to intervene in massive human-rights abuses over the decades, and touches on recent financial scandals, including oil for food and the organization's proposed $1.2 billion renovation of its headquarters at Turtle Bay.

The documentary, which Mr. Bossie said cost around a half-million dollars to make, contains interviews with a diverse assortment of commentators. They include an Israeli politician and former Soviet dissident, Natan Sharansky; a former chief of the U.N.'s peacekeeping mission in Rwanda during the 1994 genocide, Romeo Dallaire, who is a retired Canadian general; a former Senate majority leader, George Mitchell, who, along with a former House speaker, Newt Gingrich, serves on an American congressional task force on U.N. reform, and the spokesman for Secretary-General Kofi Annan, Stephane Dujarric.

Among the issues the film addresses are the United Nations' failure to prevent genocide in Cambodia, in Bosnia, in Rwanda, and, most recently, in Dar fur, and the world body's failure to stand up to the murderous regime of the former Iraqi tyrant Saddam Hussein. The world body's treatment of Israel, too, is discussed, including its determination in 1975, in the form of resolution 3379, that Zionism is racism. Closer to home, the documentary features coverage of the organization's proposed renovation plans and the opposition from state lawmakers that has stalled U.N. hopes of expanding the Turtle Bay campus.

Two of the key players in that drama are also featured in the film: New York State Senator Martin Golden, Republican of Brooklyn, and the developer Donald Trump. Messrs. Golden and Trump testified before Congress about the renovation project in July, when Mr. Trump said the proposed costs of the refurbishment were exorbitant and offered to manage the project himself for a fraction of the price.

Mr. Bossie said "Broken Promises" would be the first documentary to turn a critical eye toward the world body, adding that he hoped it would bring another perspective to the discussions surrounding the 60th anniversary. Mr. Silver said that while U.N. reform has been a subject of ample discussion among journalists, politicians, and academics of late, part of the film's goal was to include in that dialogue American taxpayers, who, since they shoulder 22% of the world body's operating costs, have a special interest in ensuring that it lives up to its promises.

"We wanted to make it watchable and enjoyable regardless of how much information people had about the U.N.," Mr. Silver told The New York Sun, adding that he hoped a broadly accessible film would heighten public interest as debate over the United Nations escalates in coming weeks, with the imminent release of a report by the former Federal Reserve Board chairman, Paul Volcker, on the oil-for-food investigation, and of a report from the International Atomic Energy Agency on Iran's nuclear-weapons program.

DOJ_NMG_0003471

Mr. Silver, in a phone interview Saturday, said his desire to document the United Nations' shortcomings on film was born of a long-running disillusionment. Growing up in Manhattan, Mr. Silver said, the United Nations was for him a source of pride, a nearby symbol of triumph over tyranny and a beacon of global optimism.

"The U.N. meant the birth of Israel," Mr. Silver added, referring to U.N. resolution 181, which in 1947 established the state of Israel.

Even in better, earlier times, however, the institutional makeup of the United Nations boded ill for the world body's ability to carry out its stated mission, Mr. Silver said. "Broken Promises," he said, examines some of these structural flaws, which, over decades, resulted in the United Nations' corruption. He cited, in particular, giving two of five permanent seats on the Security Council to the Soviet Union and Communist China.

Messrs. Bossie and Silver both said "Broken Promises" is not intended to propagate a particular political agenda, to advocate elimination of the United Nations, or to act as a hit piece on the world body. Indeed, Mr. Silver said he was surprised and impressed by the level of cooperation from the United Nations, which granted the production team extensive access to its Turtle Bay facilities, Mr. Silver said.

The public will have its first glimpse of the film on DVD next week, when the documentary is released to coincide with the opening of the General Assembly on September 13, Mr. Silver said. The New York City release will take place September 27 at the AMC Empire Theater in Times Square. Those unable to catch the film on the big screen can visit www.brokenpromisesmovie.com, Mr. Bossie said, where, starting next week, they will be able to download a trailer and film clips. The Web site will also be a portal for ordering the DVD, which sells for $19.99 and will be available in stores next month.

U.S. Resident Freed From Baghdad Prison (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

An Iraqi-born U.S. resident was released from a U.S. military prison in Baghdad yesterday, two days before a scheduled hearing on why the U.S. government had continued to detain him after clearing him of involvement in a mortar attack.

The government's decision to free Numan Adnan Al-Kaby comes less than a week after lawyers filed suit demanding his release. A federal judge had scheduled a hearing on Al-Kaby's case for Thursday afternoon, but the government yesterday asked that it be canceled and the complaint be dismissed as moot.

Al-Kaby was arrested in April in Baghdad after a mortar attack on U.S. forces, but in July a military tribunal concluded he was not involved and recommended his release. In court papers filed yesterday, Justice Department lawyers acknowledged that Al-Kaby had been declared not guilty, but they said the military received additional information shortly after that decision and completed its investigation Friday -- two days after Al-Kaby's lawsuit was filed. Officials formally concluded he could be released to his family in Iraq yesterday.

Al-Kaby was a neighbor in prison of Cyrus Kar, an Iranian American filmmaker who was arrested in May on suspicion that he was involved in a terrorist plot. Like Al-Kaby, Kar was cleared by a military panel and recommended for release but remained in jail until days after his family filed suit in July.

One of Al-Kaby's attorneys, Mark Rosenbaum of the American Civil Liberties Union's Southern California chapter, called the government's explanation "a baldfaced lie" and charged that the government was covering up a "huge scandal" involving illegal detention of potentially hundreds or thousands of innocent people in Iraq.

"It certainly makes you wonder how many more people have been sitting in military jails for weeks and months after they know the person is innocent," said Arthur Spitzer of the ACLU's Washington office.

The Justice Department declined to comment.

Iraq And The Arabs (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

One of the world's unremarked scandals is how little help Iraq's new government is getting from its fellow Arabs. And now Iraq's elected leaders are becoming increasingly vocal about that fact. On Monday Iraq President Jalal Talabani scored Arab leaders for their minimal-to-nonexistent diplomatic presence in Baghdad, and their failure to offer condolences or help in the wake of last week's stampede that left nearly 1,000 dead.

"We stood with our Arab brothers in their hard times," he said. "For instance, we sent a letter expressing our condolences on the terrorist attack which claimed a lot of innocent lives in Sharm el Sheik."

It's a fairly open secret, of course, that most Arab autocracies -- even supposedly "moderate" ones like Egypt -- are alarmed at the precedent of a successful Iraqi democracy. Still, it takes chutzpah to declare, as Arab League Secretary-General and former Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Moussa did recently, that Iraq's new constitution is a "dangerous" document. We don't recall the Arab League voicing such concerns about Iraq's old regime, which was run by a man who recognized no limits on his power.

DOJ_NMG_0003472

Encouraging Arab help in Iraq would seem to be a job for the State Department. But if Foggy Bottom isn't up to it, perhaps the White House should authorize U.S. Ambassador John Bolton to inform Arab nations -- whose heads of state will visit the United Nations next week -- that their relations with the U.S., and especially future economic and military assistance, depend on it.

Baseball In Iraq: As Pastimes Go, It's Anything But (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq - The opening pitch of the Northern Regional Junior Baseball Tournament last March was a slow ball that struck the dirt an inch behind home plate, bounced into the catcher's face mask and knocked him to the ground.

For anyone focusing on details, like skill, it may have seemed an inauspicious start. But to the players and the two dozen spectators, most of whom did not know the difference between a ball and a strike, the moment underscored something far more important: Baseball had come to Iraq.

Founded in the fall of 2003 by Ismael Khalil Ismael, a shop owner in Baghdad, the national league has grown to 26 full-fledged baseball teams in 18 provinces stretching from Nineveh in the north to Basra in the south. Using hand-me-down gloves and other cast-off equipment, much of it donated from the United States, the teams play on sandy lots, rutted pastures and soccer pitches.

"I'm doing it for the history of Iraq," he declared.

If this were the full outline of the league's narrative, it would be a rare, happy story for this troubled country. But like Iraq since the American invasion, the league, after less than two years in existence, has itself been torn by political infighting and charges of malfeasance that have cast its future into doubt.

And as if that were not enough, Mr. Ismael said he had been menaced by people who have who accused him of supporting an American cultural export.

"I'm under huge pressure," he said. "There is no freedom and democracy here. There is only plotting and conspiracy."

Mr. Ismael, 40, a former member of the national judo team, said he first heard of baseball when he was a child. His father had been working with an American contracting company building a dam near the northern city of Sulaimaniya, and the American workers would play.

The sport had also popped up at some private grade schools around the country, he said, though it never extended beyond physical education class.

In 1994, a cousin working at the Iraqi Embassy in Washington, sent him a supply of bats, balls and gloves - "enough for a team," recalled Mr. Ismael, whose physique these days is less outfielder and more home plate umpire.

But fearful that his interest in a decidedly American sport would antagonize Saddam Hussein, he shelved the idea. "My friends advised me not to fulfill my dream because I might be interrogated or put in prison," he recalled on a recent afternoon while sitting in one of four clothes and gift shops he owns in the lobby of the Babylon Hotel.

After the fall of Mr. Hussein's government, Mr. Ismael felt free to start the baseball league. In visits to sports clubs and college campuses, he mustered interest in the new sport, and held his first practice in November 2003.

In July 2004, the National Olympic Committee of Iraq admitted the league as a member and since then has budgeted more than $50,000 to support it. Called the Iraqi Baseball and Softball Federation, the league also includes 15 women's softball teams and a national baseball team, which has yet to play an international game.

The Olympic committee's contribution, Mr. Ismael said, helps to pay for equipment, salaries for himself ($150 per month) and his vice president ($60 per month), a $25 per month honorarium for each player on the national team, team travel and clinics for players, coaches and umpires.

Mr. Ismael said the amount was not enough to cover all the league's expenses and he says he has contributed thousands of dollars of his own to keep the organization alive. The scarcity of resources is so bad, he said, that teams in Baghdad need to practice on alternate days because there is not enough equipment to go around.

League officials have been particularly conflicted about whether they should approach the most obvious source of financing - the American authorities here - and how they might go about it.

On one hand, Mr. Ismael points out, he desperately needs help, both financial and instructional. But on the other hand, he does not want to appear to be supported by the Americans, thereby inspiring attacks by insurgents.

He has already received menacing cellphone calls and two e-mail notes from strangers questioning his devotion to what one writer, a Saudi man, bitterly called "an imported sport."

DOJ_NMG_0003473

That opposition - and the threat of something worse - has put Mr. Ismael in an unfortunate dilemma: a higher profile could invite more problems, yet without promotion the league can not grow.

"I've said this more than once: We are not bringing weapons of mass destruction to Iraq," he sighed. "We're only playing a simple game."

In spite of the threats, he has had surprisingly little trouble finding players. More than 200 people have attended his seminars and clinics, which he offers without charge.

"I like it because it's a new game in Iraq and it's exciting" said Yassir Abdullah, 21, a muscular second baseman on Baghdad's Salam, or Peace, team and a third-year student at the College of Athletic Education at Baghdad University. Like many players, he has caught only glimpses of American baseball in the background of movies.

The league took a bad turn in July when 15 players filed a complaint with the Olympic committee accusing Mr. Ismael of using the league's minibus for personal business and of providing them with substandard food and lodging during a road trip to Sulaimaniya. The committee has opened an investigation into the allegations.

A high-ranking committee official, Salman Abdul Hamza, suggested that the details of the league had probably overwhelmed Mr. Ismael. "He's a hard worker; he's doing a good job," Mr. Hamza said. "But some people may do good things in their job but administratively are not successful."

Mr. Ismael denies the charges and says they are part of an attempted power grab by people envious of his successes. At the same time, he has accused the president of the Olympic committee, Ahmed Assamarai, of underfinancing the sport in retribution for his refusal to allow Mr. Assamarai's son to run the league.

The spokesman for the Olympic committee denied that Mr. Assamarai had ever insisted that his son be put in charge of the league. Mr. Assamarai's son, the spokesman pointed out, lives in Britain.

The new season is supposed to begin sometime in September when the weather begins to cool down - Mr. Ismael said there was no particular opening day. The summer heat has made any regular practices absolutely unbearable, though on a recent afternoon, Mr. Ismael assembled a squad, including several players from the south, to put on a demonstration for a visiting reporter.

The players laid out the bases at the edge of a fallow soccer pitch, where the grass had grown to shin height and was full of dust from sand storms. A herd of cows and sheep grazed nearby. The players drew from a communal stockpile of gloves - most do not own their own - and took turns batting and running the bases.

There were a lot of wild throws, and few hits made it out of the infield. The shortstop was out of position, playing nearly on top of second base, and for some reason everyone referred to the catcher as "the umpire." Many players in the league said they had never seen the sport played by non-Iraqis; even Mr. Ismael has only seen college or professional players from abroad on instructional DVD's and videos.

But there was no shortage of enthusiasm. Ali Muhsen, the 27-year-old captain of the national team, said afterward that he dreamed of one day traveling to the United States with the Iraqi national team and playing the Americans.

Asked if beating the Americans was also part of the plan, he smiled bashfully and shook his head no.

The conversation went on but Mr. Muhsen remained silent, apparently reconsidering his answer.

"Inshallah," he finally said. "I hope."

Saudis Kill Top Militant, Ending Skirmish With A Qaeda Cell (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

DAMASCUS, Syria, Sept. 6 - Saudi security forces finally overwhelmed a cell of militants holed up in a house in the Persian Gulf city of Dammam on Tuesday, ending a three-day siege. The bloody firefight was the latest in a string of confrontations between militants and security forces throughout the country.

Late Monday, the Interior Ministry announced that security forces had killed two militants on Sunday, including the No. 3 most-wanted militant in Saudi Arabia, Zaid Saad Zaid al-Samari, who was sought in connection with numerous attacks.

The militants took refuge in the seaside house on Sunday night and held security men at bay with heavy arms until Tuesday.

An Interior Ministry source, quoted by SPA, the official Saudi news agency, said security forces completed the operation in the Almubarakia neighborhood of Dammam by midday Tuesday. The agency said 4 policemen had been killed, 10 wounded and an unspecified number of militants killed.

"The security forces are currently securing and clearing the site where burnt remains are scattered," SPA reported.

A spokesman for the ministry said the gunmen were affiliated with a "deviant group," meaning Al Qaeda.

DOJ_NMG_0003474

Gunfire and explosions rocked the neighborhood for hours on Tuesday as security officers dropped from helicopters and laid siege to the villa.

At one point, an explosion blasted debris, and smoke billowed out of a neighboring building, The Associated Press reported, and then there was silence.

The three-day siege forced the closing on Monday of the United States Consulate in Dhahran, about 15 miles away.

In recent months, Saudi security forces have found themselves in almost weekly confrontations with militants. Since May 2003, Islamic militants have carried out numerous attacks, suicide bombings and kidnappings in the kingdom, including an attack on the United States Consulate in Jidda, mainly singling out Westerners in a bid to hamper the country's economy.

Surge In Saudi Oil Income Seen Aiding Fight On Terror (WT)

By Rasheed Abou-alsamh

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

JIDDA, Saudi Arabia -- Record oil prices have sent Saudi revenues soaring and contributed to a sixfold increase in stock prices, but ordinary citizens are just beginning to feel the benefits, financial analysts say.

Economists hope that in time the surge will produce more and better jobs for young Saudis, reducing their interest in joining al Qaeda-linked terrorist groups that have been battling the government.

A midyear financial report by the Samba Financial Group, one of the largest and most profitable private banks in the kingdom, said oil revenue this year is expected to reach $157 billion, a 48 percent increase over 2004's oil revenue of $106 billion.

The Saudi stock market, meanwhile, has seen its capitalization grow from $82.1 billion at the end of June 2002 to $517.6 billion at the end of June 2005, or an increase of $435 billion in just three years.

"The increased wealth is beginning to trickle down to ordinary Saudis," said Ihsan Buhuleiga, a leading economist and member of the Shura Council, in an interview with The Washington Times.

While some economic analysts have expressed worries over an overheating stock market, Mr. Buhuleiga said he hoped to see the surge of new listings continue.

"The number of companies currently listed are only 80. In Oman, they have double that number. More Saudi companies should be listed, as this will encourage more job creation," he said.

Job creation is something the Saudi government desperately wants to achieve in order to stop young, unemployed Saudi men from being lured into joining terrorist groups.

While some foreign critics of the Saudi government worry that some of the increased oil revenues will find their way into the pockets of the terrorists, Anthony Cordesman, a specialist in Saudi affairs at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, thinks the new revenues will allow the Saudi government to both battle the insurgents and develop the country.

The spurt in oil revenue may also help the ruling al-Saud royal family to secure its popularity.

On Aug. 22, the government announced a 15 percent increase in the wages of all government employees, a move ordered by newly enthroned Saudi King Abdullah to garner popular support and to inject money into the local economy.

Even before the salary raise, Saudis had seen their per-capita gross domestic product grow from $7,437 in 1998 to $11,052 in 2004. Samba estimates per capita GDP in 2005 to reach $13,603.

However, Mr. Buhuleiga warned that the government must avoid spending profligately and establish a buffer fund to tide the country over during leaner times.

"We don't know where oil prices will be in five years from now. We need to create a public budget-stabilization fund, in which all oil revenue is deposited, in order to finance budget deficits," he said.

"I don't think we want to be in the situation again of having to borrow money from our pension funds to cover our deficits. The government regularly overspends its budget by 15 [percent] to 20 percent. They should stop doing so. We need fiscal responsibility."

Saudi Arabia's current total population is 26 million of which more than 5 million are foreign workers. Mr. Buhuleiga cites this as evidence of the kingdom's overwhelming dependence on foreign labor to keep the economy growing.

"It is not going to be the normal state of things in the next three years. We should be talking about developing the citizen. We need to learn from the extremely hard lesson we had in 1998 when oil went below $10 a barrel. We must continue with economic reforms to maintain our competitive advantage," the economist said.

Government spending on infrastructure and education was cut back in the late 1990s owing to the low oil prices on international markets.

The government began to catch up by allocating $21.3 billion toward building new roads, water-desalination plants and schools through 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0003475

1st Afghan At U.S. Academy Sees Move As Way To Help His Country (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, September 7, 2005

WEST POINT, N.Y. — The U.S. Military Academy accepted its first cadet from Afghanistan last month as that country takes its initial steps toward building a professional military after decades of war and unrest.

Shoaib Yosoufzai wears a slight smile, even after an all-night march that caps six weeks of training. The 20-year-old, who grew up under harsh Taliban rule, wants to learn to build bridges, dams, power plants and roads for his ravaged country.

"I want to study civil engineering so that I can work on practical things," Yosoufzai says. "We need that in my country. We need professional officers."

The U.S. Military Academy has taught international cadets for more than a century. Since it began tracking foreign students in 1889, West Point has had 324 international graduates from dozens of countries, says Capt. Robert Romans, the academy's international admissions officer.

Among them: Fidel Ramos, who became president of the Philippines; Anastasio Somoza, later the president of Nicaragua; and Jose Maria Figueres, who went on to become president of Costa Rica.

The Defense secretary decides which countries are invited to participate. Currently there are 140 countries eligible to send cadets to West Point, the Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md., and the Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs.

West Point has a limit of 60 international cadets a year. It currently has 55.

Yosoufzai's father, Hamdullah Yosoufzai, is a colonel in the Afghan army and dean of its new military academy. West Point officers have advised their Afghan counterparts in how to train cadets.

They're starting almost from scratch.

The Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan in 1979. Guerrilla forces chased out the Soviets 10 years later and toppled the communist government there in 1992. Factional fighting among warlords followed. In 1996, the Taliban, backed by neighboring Pakistan, seized Kabul, the capital, and installed a fundamentalist Islamic government that sheltered terrorists. A U.S.-led coalition ousted the Taliban in 2001 after the Sept. 11 attacks.

U.S. forces in Afghanistan recognized Yosoufzai as West Point material, and the U.S. Embassy in Kabul recommended him for admission, Romans says. Yosoufzai spent a year at the University of Nebraska at Omaha, polishing his English and adjusting to the USA.

"He had a little trouble at first with our food," Romans says. "Not a lot of burgers and fries in Afghanistan."

Yosoufzai agrees the transition has been rough at times.

"It is hard," he says. "I miss my family, my country, my friends. But if you can succeed here, you can succeed anywhere."

He says he wants to return to Afghanistan and help it make the transition to a modern society.

He's proved a quick study and today counts a young man from Burke, Va., as one of his best friends.

"I feel very proud to be his roommate," says Steve Hojnicki, 18, who, like Yosoufzai, comes from a military family. His father, Leon, belongs to the West Point Class of '81.

"Shoaib's country is going to need everything that this institution has to offer," Hojnicki says.

Despite War, Cadets Line Up For West Point (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, September 7, 2005

More than 10,000 applied for this year's 1,200 slots;

students 'prepared to accept the risks' of military service

WEST POINT, N.Y. — Geryah White, fresh from a 15-mile overnight march over rocks and gullies, stretches her legs and pronounces herself ready for more.

The challenge before her is four years of academic and military training at the U.S. Military Academy followed by five years of active duty in the Army.

"It's more mentally tough than physically tough," White, 19, says after her first six weeks at West Point. "It's just a matter of going one step further than you thought you could. I'm ready for the challenge. I'm ready for more."

White and the 1,200 other members of the West Point class of 2009 have the grades and test scores to get into almost any top school — one that wouldn't bring compulsory military service after graduation. Instead, they accepted this challenge, their eyes wide open to the dangers as American soldiers return home in flag-draped caskets or maimed by roadside bombs.

DOJ_NMG_0003476

The Army and Army National Guard are expected to miss their 2005 recruiting goals by several thousand new soldiers, but interest in West Point hasn't flagged. Applications reached 12,692 in 2003. They're down to 10,733 this year but still high by historical standards, says Lt. Gen. William Lennox, West Point's superintendent.

“These kids are volunteers,” says Lennox, who refers to the new class as the first of the post-9/11 generation. “They know about Iraq, Afghanistan, the war on terror.”

The message is driven home when they apply to the academy.

“We convey to them the dangers by being very frank about the job of being a lieutenant, probably being in harm's way with what's going on in the world,” says Col. Michael Jones, director of admissions at West Point.

A graduate of the academy receives a commission as a lieutenant.

The news of casualties in Iraq is unavoidable, and Kristina Dionne, 18, of Raymond, N.H., pays attention to it.

News of the death of the first female graduate of the academy since 9/11 reached the young cadets just days after they were formally admitted. First Lt. Laura Walker was killed with another soldier in Afghanistan when their Humvee struck a land mine Aug. 18.

“It's always something to think about,” says Dionne, who hopes to study Arabic and Russian and specialize in military intelligence. “But West Point trains you to handle it better than anywhere, and you have to be prepared to accept the risks.”

Parents, particularly mothers in the past few years, have expressed anxiety about military service, Jones says. Yet their children still come. Alumni say the cadets' attitude is patriotism mixed with a thirst for adventure and a youthful feeling of invincibility.

Col. Don Sando, West Point class of '81, says the new cadets may be aware of the dangers but feel they're immune to them.

Sando, based at Fort Benning, Ga., says he has seen enough 18-year-old infantry privates to know that many believe they're “bulletproof, indestructible.” He also sees “a basic motivation for adventure” among the young soldiers as well as a desire to serve their country.

The same holds true at West Point, he surmises.

“I suspect their motivations are as varied as there are faces in the crowd,” Sando says. “But I believe the fact that West Point offers so much more than an undergraduate education — to develop leaders of character for a lifetime of service — goes a long way.

“And the notion of selfless service remains strong in the American culture.”

John Wheeler, a 1966 academy graduate and Vietnam veteran, put it this way: “They may be just 15, 16 or 17 years old when they make that decision. But being young is no bar to figuring out the things that matter most in life.”

Family influence can sway a decision to attend West Point. Jeffrey Caslen, 19, has watched his father climb the ranks to brigadier general.

“I've been an Army brat my whole life,” says Jeffrey, who plans to study engineering. “This seems like a natural choice. There won't be the distractions here that there are at other colleges.”

Brig. Gen. Robert Caslen, class of '75, deputy director for the War on Terrorism at the Pentagon, beams a smile at his son.

“As a dad in the Army, I'm humbled that he chose to follow the same path,” the general says. “I'm anxious, too. There are huge demands and incredible sacrifices. His mom is tremendously nervous, too. It's one thing for her to see me off to combat and another with her son. She knows up close and personal the sacrifices.”

Gerald and Ann White recall signs at an early age of the woman daughter Geryah would become.

Gerald White remembers a take-charge little girl pulling herself up as a toddler and taking her first steps unaided. Ann White says Geryah tugged on a basket of laundry at age 2, insisting on carrying the load.

“She wanted everything in the right place,” Ann White says. “She's always had that inner drive to succeed.”

It came as no surprise, the Whites say, when their daughter announced her interest in West Point after attending a college fair in Tampa.

“She didn't have to do this,” Ann White says. “She had a choice of great universities, and she chose West Point.”

Gerald White has seen a photo of his daughter emerging from a room filled with noxious gas during her training this summer. She is grim-acing, but she got through it.

“When I saw that, I thought, ‘She can hang. She can hang,' ” he says. “She's a strong, determined, tough young lady. She's going to serve her country well. She's a soldier.”

As the first rays of peach-colored sun begin to burn off the fog obscuring the Hudson River Valley gorge, the new cadets sling 50 pounds of gear to the ground and take a break on the dew-slick grass on the steep grade of Victor Constant Ski Slope.

White says she thrives on challenges, physical and mental. That's what appealed to her about West Point, where she plans to study psychology and compete in track.

DOJ_NMG_0003477

She has calculated the dangers of military service, noting that the casualty rate is “very low in Iraq,” and says she's comfortable with the risks.

Since the 9/11 attacks, 26 West Point graduates have been killed in action.

“It comes with the job. You can't be naive about it,” she says. “But you could get hit by a bus walking down the street, too.”

Sweaty, smelly and smiling, the new cadets swill Gatorade. White gathers her gear and prepares to march again after a brief break.

“You know what they say,” she jokes. “It sucks to be here now, but it will be great to be from here in four years.”

DOJ:

Medals Of Valor To Be Given To Families Of 9/11 Heroes (STNIA)

By TERENCE J. KIVLAN

Staten Island Advance (NY), September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Dozens of Sept. 11 family members are expected to travel here Friday to receive the Congressional Medal of Valor on behalf of the more than 400 firefighters and police officers killed at the World Trade Center.

The medals will be awarded by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez in a ceremony at the Justice Department.

Relatives of the fallen first responders were notified of the event by Justice Department officials by telephone late last week. Free air fare was made available for the family members through a travel agency in the city.

Advertisement

Among the relatives planning to attend was Joanne Barbara of West Brighton, whose husband Gerard, a battalion chief, was among the 343 firefighters who died at Ground Zero.

She said in an interview that she had mixed feelings about the event.

"Of course, it will be an honor to accept the Medal of Valor for my husband," she said.

But Mrs. Barbara said the Justice Department should have informed the families of the ceremony much sooner. "Our weekend is going to be very emotional as it is," she said, referring to the 9/11 anniversary. "And they just added another event to it that we didn't know about."

"We are not just to put on exhibition," said Mrs. Barbara. "We have feelings."

Congress created the medal in 2001 to honor public safety officers who displayed "exceptional courage." Winners are selected through a peer review process conducted by an advisory board of ex-police officers and firefighters.

Congress specifically authorized the issuance of the medal to the first responders killed in the 9/11 rescue efforts at the World Trade Center and the Pentagon in legislation passed in 2002. It was co-sponsored by Republican Rep. Vito Fossella

A total of 428 rescue workers were killed at Ground Zero, including 37 Port Authority cops, 23 city police officers, three state court uniformed officers and two federal agents.

Among those killed were 78 firefighters from Staten Island, one city police officer and two Port Authority cops.

Altogether, 442 public safety officers died in the 9/11 attacks. They were certified by Gonzalez to receive the valor award in July.

The list was compiled from the list of 9/11 rescue workers whose relatives received benefits from the Public Safety Officers Benefits Program. The program provides tax-free payments of $250,000 to the families of first responders killed in the line of duty.

Terence J. Kivlan is Washington correspondent for the Advance. He may be reached at terence.kivlan@newhouse.com

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Defendants Cry Foul (WP)

By Carrie Johnson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

Defense lawyers for former Enron Corp. executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling have complained for years about the government's hard-nosed tactics in pursuit of their clients.

Now they are hoping for support from an unlikely source: the federal judge overseeing next year's fraud trial against the two.

DOJ_NMG_0003478

U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III has scheduled a hearing in Houston for tomorrow to examine why only four former Enron employees have agreed to meet with the defense team. The judge has raised the prospect, employed in other cases, that he could privately inform a limited number of potential witnesses that they have nothing to fear by speaking with Lay's and Skilling's lawyers.

The judge's action comes in response to defense claims, made public yesterday in court filings, that prosecutors abused their power by warning Enron employees that it was not a "good idea" to help Skilling and Lay. A government lawyer also advised a critical, unidentified witness to "get rid" of his or her lawyer if the lawyer continued to talk with the defense, the brief said.

A grand jury continues to investigate misconduct at Enron, and prosecutors have said in court papers that they consider 114 people "unindicted co-conspirators."

Lake has not ruled that prosecutors at the Justice Department's Enron Task Force acted improperly. Even so, the judge said last week, Lay and Skilling had identified "a problem I am persuaded exists" in advance of a trial only four months away.

"Both sides have to have access to witnesses in order to try a case," Michael Ramsey, a defense lawyer for Lay, said in a telephone interview.

Daniel M. Petrocelli, Skilling's lead trial counsel, told the judge at a hearing in May: "There's hundreds of witnesses, and we can't get to anybody, and we need some relief."

Nearly three dozen former employees and those who did business with them have been charged with crimes in the Enron investigation. Several key figures, including finance chief Andrew S. Fastow and investor relations director Mark E. Koenig, pleaded guilty and agreed to testify against their former superiors.

The clash over access to witnesses is merely the first in a series of battles for control of the courtroom, the media and potential jurors who will be selected in January, experts said.

"As a general matter, witnesses refusing to talk to the defense is a huge problem," said Barry Boss, a partner at Cozen O'Connor LLP in the District who is not involved in the Enron case.

Unlike in civil cases, defendants who are charged with crimes do not automatically receive copies of written statements and information that witnesses provide to the government.

"The defense really doesn't have any clout" to force people to talk, said Stephen A. Saltzburg, a George Washington University law professor. Such concerns are increasingly common in sophisticated cases, he said. Defense lawyers for former WorldCom Inc. chief executive Bernard J. Ebbers cited similar problems as a basis for an appeal of his conviction for fraud and making false statements.

Lay, Skilling and former chief accountant Richard A. Causey, who is on trial with them, do have some guidance about the evidence marshaled against them -- in part because of the vast impact of Enron's 2001 collapse. The company's bankruptcy examiner filed several weighty reports citing e-mail messages and other documents. Congressional reports flagged other materials the government may use in its prosecution. And depositions of witnesses continue in shareholder lawsuits against Enron executives.

Defense lawyers for Skilling and Lay, however, say that 56 witnesses have invoked their constitutional rights against self-incrimination in connection with the civil case. Prosecutors have sought to postpone depositions of others, including Sherron Watkins, who sent Lay an anonymous letter in 2001 warning him that the company could implode in a wave of accounting fraud.

The Justice Department filed a motion late yesterday calling the defense brief "inflammatory."

"The government respects the right of any witness to meet or not meet with whomever they want," Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said. "The majority of witnesses in this case are represented by experienced counsel who are in the best position to advise them on whether to meet with the government or defense counsel."

Sweden Will Prosecute Ex-CEO Of Insurer Skandia (WSJ/DJN)

By Maria Akerhielm, Louise Nordstrom and Janina Pfalzer, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

STOCKHOLM -- Swedish state prosecutor Christer van der Kwast decided to prosecute Lars-Eric Petersson, former chief executive officer of insurer Skandia AB, for two cases of "severe" breach of trust.

Mr. Petersson was fired by Skandia in 2003 for his involvement in the lifting of a cap on a bonus-payment program to executives. The charges against him won't have any bearing on the 44.9 billion kronor ($6.02, or €4.83 billion) takeover bid for Skandia filed last week by Old Mutual PLC. The Old Mutual offer has to be approved by the Swedish company's board before Sept. 23.

Mr. Petersson's attorney, Torgny Wetterberg, told Dow Jones Newswires he doesn't understand the prosecutor's reasoning. In his view, the preliminary investigation should have been discontinued.

"As I see it, there are insufficiencies in the presented circumstances, and we find it peculiar that the prosecutor has made the assessment that there is intent in this case," Mr. Wetterberg said. He added that he was confident that a trial would lead to an acquittal.

Officials from Skandia weren't available to comment.

The state prosecutor said he will decide in early October whether he will prosecute two other former Skandia executives, Ola Ramstedt and Ulf Spaang.

Mr. Petersson is being prosecuted for abusing his position of trust when he, as Skandia's CEO, lifted the cap on the bonus program Wealthbuilder without approval from Skandia's board, the prosecutor said.

Mr. Petersson is alleged to have set payment of the program 185 million kronor above the amount authorized by the board. This, the prosecutor said, has caused considerable damage to the company, and, therefore, the crime is "severe."

The prosecutor said the second charge against Mr. Petersson relates to retirement payments.

Without approval from Skandia's board, he added retirement benefits under which his own benefits would always reach at least 97.1 million kronor, the prosecutor said.

Parallel to the civil process against Mr. Petersson, Skandia is currently involved in arbitration against him, relating to his involvement in benefiting from the lifting of the payment cap of the bonus program. The company is seeking 300 million kronor in compensation from Mr. Petersson. It had previously said it expected the outcome of the arbitration to be reached early next year.

The Debate On Auditing Must First Clarify Its Purpose (FT)

By Clare Canning and James Roberts

Financial Times, September 7, 2005

The statutory audit continues to generate headlines, with reforms being either supported or attacked. Expectations of the audit process can rapidly exceed what can reasonably be delivered. There is a danger that misconceptions about the audit's role will lead to counterproductive attempts to bolster the robustness of the audit opinion.

Take the debate over the effect of the introduction of international accounting standards, which partially replace the concept of "true and fair view" by "presents fairly". Some investor groups have argued that this undermines the robustness of the audit opinion, through a shift away from the traditional UK approach of over-arching judgments based on general principles towards a US style of "tick box" or rules-based audit processes.

The Financial Reporting Council has come out firmly against these concerns with a vote of confidence in the system, rejecting the notion that these technical reforms have weakened the UK audit. Ultimately it will be for the courts and regulatory bodies to determine whether this is the case. What seems certain, however, is that the FRC is unlikely to have won over all its detractors. Is there not a danger that the problem underlying this debate is the more fundamental issue of what it is that the investor and business communities think auditors do? What is the statutory audit designed to safeguard against? Until these questions are addressed and there is clarity between service providers and consumers, issues about the niceties of any particular reform seem academic.

Some of those expressing concerns appear to expect the audit to function like a form of commercial guarantee; a bastion against corporate scandal and a blanket protection for the company and its directors against their own commercial mismanagement. These expectations are misplaced. This firm has defended many misconceived lawsuits brought against auditors over the years. The problem often arises because the claimant has a skewed view of the auditor's role. The audit is not an exercise in verifying or double checking commercial management. Auditors do not underwrite a company's commercial viability. It is easy to forget that primary responsibility for safeguarding against corporate scandal can only lie with the business principals. One cannot help but surmise that the focus on the audit role is largely aimed, certainly in the context of litigation, at what is perceived to be behind the auditor – its deep pocket.

Let us assume that what the business community realistically understands it has from an audit is, not an insurance policy against any commercial error, but an opinion that a company's financial statements show a true and fair view at a particular point in time. Are the government's proposals to introduce a limited form of proportionate liability by contract for auditors then to be welcomed? No other professional is required in the same way to accept unlimited legal liability. Refusing limitation would only seem likely to encourage the profession to focus on the ticking of boxes to avoid the exposure of subjective judgments. Allowing auditors some scope to limit their liability should help to resist any trend for auditors to seek refuge in form over substance in the audit process.

The government is also considering introducing a criminal offence of "recklessly" giving an audit opinion. What exactly is involved in recklessness in this context is hard to define and even harder to apply. The mere risk of a prosecution may destroy an auditor's career. If, as is likely, the offence were to result in a risk of criminalisation in a swathe of circumstances, this too would create irresistible pressure towards form over substance. Excessive criminalisation would also frustrate swift and effective operation of the regulatory regime and civil litigation.

DOJ_NMG_0003480

How unattractive does auditing need to become before the big four and others find it impossible to recruit quality staff and encourage their best partners to stay in audit? It may be that there is more that unites auditors, investors and the public when it comes to what will really bolster the giving of robust audit opinions. Conversely, initiatives based on unrealistic expectations will only fuel more speculative, expensive and ultimately unsuccessful litigation. That cannot be in the investment communities' interests.

Clare Canning is head of commercial litigation and James Roberts an associate in the commercial litigation team at Barlow Lyde & Gilbert, who currently act for Ernst & Young in the Equitable Life litigation

Morgan Director Resigns, A Sign That A Reorganization Is Likely (NYT)

By Landon Thomas Jr.

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

Michael A. Miles, a Morgan Stanley director with close ties to the former chief executive, Philip J. Purcell, has resigned from the board, the bank said yesterday.

The move, which was expected, is the latest signal that the new chief executive, John J. Mack, intends to reorganize a board that during the battle over Mr. Purcell's leadership became a lightning rod for criticism and remains the target of several shareholder lawsuits.

A former chief executive of Philip Morris, Mr. Miles, 66, was one of the original directors of Dean Witter when the investment bank was spun off from its parent, Sears, in 1993.

As head of Morgan's nominating committee, Mr. Miles was an architect of a board that included several former chief executives, many of whom lived in the Chicago suburbs, who defended Mr. Purcell in the years after the Dean Witter Morgan Stanley merger.

"I believe there is always a need for change and refreshment in any organization," Mr. Miles said in his letter of resignation.

A longtime director with years of boardroom experience - at one time he was on seven boards in addition to Morgan Stanley - Mr. Miles was one of Mr. Purcell's closest advisers during the bitter dispute with the group of eight dissident executives who were calling for Mr. Purcell's resignation.

From the beginning, Mr. Miles defended Mr. Purcell's record and, even as other directors began to waver, he remained a vocal critic of the campaign being waged by the retired executives, known widely as the group of eight.

While his resignation is the first since Mr. Mack became chief executive, another director with ties to Mr. Purcell, Edward A. Brennan, the former chief of Sears, will not stand for re-election next year because he will have exceeded the board's age limit of 72.

Mr. Mack has already welcomed three new directors - Charles H. Noski, a former chief financial officer at AT&T; Roy J. Bostock, a former advertising chief executive; and O. Griffith Sexton, a former Morgan Stanley executive and professor of finance at Columbia Business School.

Firm Sues To Block Mutual Fund Fee Inquiry (NYT)

By Riva D. Atlas

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

J.& W. Seligman & Company, a New York investment firm, sued the state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, yesterday, asserting that he had overstepped his authority in his investigation of improper trading in Seligman's mutual funds.

The lawsuit, filed in Federal District Court in Manhattan, seeks to suspend Mr. Spitzer's ability to investigate "allegedly excessive advisory fees paid to Seligman."

Seligman, founded in 1864 and one of the nation's oldest investment firms, is one of the few mutual fund managers that have yet to reach a settlement with Mr. Spitzer regarding market timing in its funds.

Market timing - the rapid trading in and out of mutual funds - has been the focus of an investigation made public by Mr. Spitzer two years ago this week.

The attorney general and other regulators have accused fund managers of permitting favored investors to make short-term trades, even when their public filings indicated that they discouraged the practice.

A long list of fund companies have agreed to ban the practice, and to pay about $3 billion worth of fines, restitution and fee reductions to investors harmed by the trading.

DOJ_NMG_0003481

In recent months, however, some parties have begun to challenge Mr. Spitzer in the mutual fund investigation and beyond. In June, a jury found against the attorney general on most charges in a criminal case against a former broker at Bank of America, Theodore C. Sihpol III. Mr. Spitzer had accused Mr. Sihpol of helping Canary Capital Partners, a hedge fund, in market timing.

The same month, certain banks, including J. P. Morgan Chase, sought to prevent Mr. Spitzer from investigating whether the banks were charging excessive interest rates on mortgages to minorities. A court hearing is scheduled for today in Federal District Court in Manhattan on the matter.

A few months after Mr. Spitzer's mutual fund investigation became public, Seligman agreed to pay nearly $2 million to investors in three of its mutual funds where there had been rapid trading. It also said it would reduce fees on one of those funds by 0.05 percent for two years beginning in June 2004.

Despite the voluntary fee cuts, Mr. Spitzer's investigation continued, because he believed that the actions the firm had taken were not sufficient, a person briefed on the investigation said. That person said he could not speak for attribution because the talks were confidential.

Seligman reached a tentative agreement in August with Mr. Spitzer's office and the Securities and Exchange Commission, but talks broke down after Mr. Spitzer "sought to impose operating conditions on Seligman which were unacceptable to Seligman," the lawsuit said.

Mr. Spitzer's office wanted Seligman to appoint an independent monitor to review how the fund's managers negotiated fees, the lawsuit said. Seligman said monitoring its fees "is the regulatory province of the S.E.C., and only the S.E.C.," the lawsuit said.

After the talks broke down, Mr. Spitzer issued a series of subpoenas in late August against directors and executives at Seligman in an effort to pressure Seligman into agreeing to his terms, the lawsuit said.

Requiring a third party to review how fees are set has been a condition of all of Mr. Spitzer's settlements with fund companies to date, said David D. Brown IV, director of the attorney general's Investment Protection Bureau and the person overseeing the day-to-day operations of the mutual fund investigation.

The fee reductions, however, have been criticized by officials at the S.E.C., who have said it is not the role of the government to set prices.

Even with the fee reductions, expenses at many Seligman funds are above average, Mr. Brown said, citing data from Morningstar, a research firm that tracks mutual funds. "Why don't they want to join other mutual fund companies in reducing inordinately high fees?" he said.

Expenses at Seligman funds, on average, are 1.93 percent of assets, according to Morningstar, compared with an average of 1.47 percent at large fund companies. Performance at many Seligman funds has also been weak.

Last year, Seligman named a new chief investment officer, John B. Cunningham, who is making positive changes at the firm, said Todd Trubey, a Morningstar analyst.

"He came in to clean things up and we have found him to be a pretty straight shooter," Mr. Trubey said. For now, Morningstar is willing to give Seligman the benefit of the doubt, even with this lawsuit, Mr. Trubey said. The research firm plans to meet with Seligman executives within the next few days, he said.

Morgan Stanley To Pay To Settle Complaint (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, September 7, 2005

(AP) - WILMINGTON, Del.-Morgan Stanley Inc. has agreed to pay $700,000 to settle a complaint brought by the state Department of Justice regarding improper trading in a Delaware couple's brokerage account, officials said Tuesday.

The bulk of the settlement will be paid to the Wilmington couple to reimburse them for losses incurred, authorities said.

The Division of Securities filed a formal complaint in 2003 against the brokerage firm and two brokers, George Coughlin and Argie Economou who worked in a Morgan Stanley branch office in Burlington, Vt.

The complaint alleged that Morgan Stanley, through Coughlin, executed more than 500 unauthorized transactions and more than 70 "unsuitable" transactions in the couple's account. The complaint also alleged that Morgan Stanley and Economou, who was Coughlins immediate supervisor, failed to properly supervise Coughlins trading activities, in violation of Delaware securities laws.

As part of the settlement, Morgan Stanley and the brokers named in the complaint neither admitted nor denied the allegations.

DOJ_NMG_0003482

CRIMINAL LAW:

Legal Experts Call Current Law A Poor Fit For Leak Prosecutions (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

Convictions for leaking sensitive government information to the media are almost as rare as sightings of the ivory-billed woodpecker.

Only twice have government employees gone to prison for such misdeeds. And legal experts say prosecutors will have a hard time putting away anyone in the administration for violating the Intelligence Identities Protection Act in the revelation of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity in 2003.

The bar for breaking the 1982 law is high. Whoever makes the disclosure must know that the person was a "covert agent" and must intentionally reveal the agent's identity to someone not authorized to know it.

There is, however, another statute that federal officials have used to go after government leakers. Some legal experts say it is not out of the question that prosecutors in the Plame case could bring it out again -- although it, too, seems a long shot.

The provision, Section 641 in Title 18 of the U.S. Code, nominally deals with prohibitions on the embezzlement of public money, property or records for private use. It typically would be used to go after a federal employee who, say, absconds with government laptops.

Prosecutors used the statute -- somewhat creatively, legal experts say -- to help build successful cases against Samuel L. Morison, a former Navy intelligence analyst who was sentenced to two years in prison in 1985 after being convicted of espionage and theft in leaking secret U.S. spy satellite photographs to a British magazine, and Jonathan Randel, a former Drug Enforcement Agency intelligence research specialist who in 2003 was sentenced to a year in prison for selling restricted information.

The statute "is used by the government from time to time in lieu of not having a criminal prohibition on leaking classified information, generally," said William Banks, a national security law expert at Syracuse University. "It isn't a good fit, but it's the best available."

Kevin M. Goldberg, a partner at Cohn and Marks LLP in Washington and an expert on First Amendment issues, said that prosecutors might try to use it.

"I think that's a really bad precedent to set, however," Goldberg said. "Essentially, you are just creating almost an Official Secrets Act in which all government information belongs to the government, and can never be given out to a member of the public."

Morison, who worked at the Naval Intelligence Support Center in Suitland, sent Jane's Defence Weekly, for which he moonlighted as an editor, three photographs of the first Soviet nuclear aircraft carrier under construction at a Black Sea shipyard. His attorneys unsuccessfully argued that their client was a supporter of President Ronald Reagan and bigger defense budgets who wanted to publicize the Soviet threat.

Randel provided information from a DEA database to the Times of London newspaper indicating that the name of Lord Michael Ashcroft -- a dual citizen of Britain and Belize who was treasurer of the Conservative Party -- was in agency files used in investigations of drug trafficking.

The newspaper cited the information in stories on Ashcroft and his business dealings in Belize, stories that Ashcroft complained falsely suggested that he was a target of DEA investigations into drug trafficking. (After Ashcroft filed a libel suit, the paper published a statement saying there was no evidence he had been suspected of any drug-related crime.) Prosecutors said Randel was paid $13,000 for the information, which was sensitive but not classified. The newspaper said the money was to cover Randel's expenses and time when he traveled to Britain to help the newspaper prepare a defense to Ashcroft's libel suit.

At Randel's sentencing, U.S. District Judge Richard W. Story of the Northern District of Georgia said: "This is like the drunk driver who gets home without killing somebody. . . . No agent was killed as a result of the information that was leaked and no investigation was compromised, but the risk that was created was certainly there. And that is of grave concern."

In an essay published July 15 on CNN.com, former Nixon White House Counsel John Dean argued that White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove could be vulnerable on the same grounds. Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper has said that Rove told him in 2003 that Plame, the wife of President Bush critic Joseph C. Wilson IV, worked for the CIA, but that Rove said nothing about her being a covert operative.

DOJ_NMG_0003483

"Rove had no idea what the specific consequences of giving a reporter the name of a CIA agent [about whom he says he knew nothing] would be," Dean wrote. ". . . [I]f the risk Randel was taking was a 'tremendous' risk, surely Rove's leak was monumental." Rove has said he did nothing illegal.

Several experts disagree with Dean's assessment, saying the embezzlement statute is an especially poor fit for the Plame case. For one thing, it requires that there be an intent to convert the purloined property or record -- the "thing of value" -- to one's use or gain. Morison was paid as an editor for Jane's. Randel got money from the Times of London. But political gain does not count, the experts said.

"This is for people who steal public property. This is used all the time, but not for situations like this," Banks said. "Because there isn't anybody in this for gain -- for pecuniary gain -- I think it's a bit of a stretch."

Victoria Toensing, a Washington lawyer who helped write the Intelligence Identities Protection Act, said prosecutors would "absolutely never" try to use the embezzlement statute in the Plame case.

Dean "is trying to put the stepsister's foot in Cinderella's shoe," she said. "What was converted? . . . Where is the 'value' given to Karl Rove? . . . The story shouldn't even be written, because it's so off the wall to give it any credence."

Former City Official Gets 30 Months In Prison (HC)

By Harvey Rice

Houston Chronicle, September 7, 2005

A former Houston city official was sentenced to two years and six months in federal prison today for accepting cash and gifts from businesses seeking her influence in gaining lucrative city contracts.

The sentencing of Monique McGilbra, former head of the city Building Services Department, follows a three-year sentence she received Friday in Cleveland, Ohio, for accepting bribes from a Cleveland businessman.

McGilbra, 41, is the second Houston city official to plead guilty in a continuing investigation that began in Cleveland and expanded to include Houston and New Orleans.

Oliver Spellman, 51, chief of staff to former Mayor Lee Brown, received probation and a $10,000 fine Friday in Cleveland federal court for taking a $2,000 bribe from a Cleveland consultant.

U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore said McGilbra's Houston sentence will run at the same time as the Cleveland sentence, meaning she will spend no more than three years in prison.

McGilbra was more repentant in her statement to Gilmore than in her statement to U.S. District Judge James Gwin in Cleveland, who was unmoved when she told him that having expensive tastes shouldn't be a crime.

"I'd like to say how regretful and sorrowful I am," McGilbra told Gilmore. "I'll spend the rest of my life trying to make amends for that."

U.S. marshals took McGilbra into custody on orders from Gwin, but Gilmore said McGilbra could be released until ordered to report to prison if Gwin agreed to reconsider his order.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Edward Gallagher and Mary Butler, a prosecutor with the Department of Justice's public integrity unit, told Gilmore McGilbra was cooperating in an ongoing investigation.

"We are striving to discover the extent of corruption and we are not going to leave any stone unturned," Gallagher said outside the courtroom.

In return for agreeing to cooperate with the government, McGilbra pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud.

She admitted she received numerous gifts from representatives of the Keystone Group, controlled by Houston businessman Andy Schatte, including $1,000 in cash in a box containing champagne, use of a condominium for a ski trip to northern California, tickets to professional football games and a Neiman Marcus gift certificate on her birthday.

McGilbra admitted she accepted cash payments from her then-boyfriend, a consultant for the Keystone Group, and agreed to split a $250,000 cash bonus with him if the Keystone Group won a fire-station contract with the city.

She also admitted to using her influence to secure a consulting agreement for her boyfriend with an energy company she had helped obtain a city contract.

After clinching the energy company contract, she asked for and received financial assistance from a contractor seeking consulting work under the energy company, she admitted.

Gifts she received from the energy company and the contractor included $6,000 in cash, a $700 gift certificate from Louis Vuitton, and tickets to the Lion King worth about $1,000, according to the sentencing agreement.

harvey.rice@chron.com

Embattled Lee Quits Plan Board (DMN)

By Emily Ramshaw, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 7, 2005

File / DMN D'Angelo Lee

Embattled City Plan Commissioner D'Angelo Lee stepped down over the holiday weekend, more than two months after he fell under scrutiny in a far-reaching FBI investigation and days before a second City Council vote over whether to remove him.

Mayor Pro Tem Don Hill, who nominated Mr. Lee to the commission in 2003 and, until this weekend, had vowed to keep him in his post, accepted Mr. Lee's resignation in a memo sent out Tuesday morning. The city secretary did not receive an official resignation letter from Mr. Lee on Tuesday.

"He has been a visionary for economic development in the Southern Sector of Dallas, however his primary objectives are to clear his name and to develop his private business interests," wrote Mr. Hill, who did not return phone calls. "Achieving these objectives is very difficult in the present environment. This decision to resign from the City Plan and Zoning Commission is in the best interest of his family and our city."

Mr. Lee, Mr. Hill, and five other city officials – council members James Fantroy, Leo Chaney and Maxine Thornton-Reese and Plan Commissioners Melvin Traylor and Carol Brandon – have been named in federal subpoenas served at City Hall.

Mayor Laura Miller, who led the charge to remove Mr. Lee from the City Plan Commission after allegations surfaced that he was not reporting gifts and was voting on zoning cases where he was being paid as a consultant, said Tuesday that the resignation should have occurred "a few months ago."

Also Online

Chris Heinbaugh reports

She said it's going to take a lot of hard decisions "to make sure that we restore public trust at City Hall."

"He has now stepped down, and that's a really good step forward," Ms. Miller said.

Mr. Lee did not return phone calls on Tuesday. But his attorney, Doug Greene, said the pressure finally got to Mr. Lee.

"He respected Don Hill and didn't want to bring any ill repute on him or the citizens of Dallas," Mr. Greene said. "Based on that, and based on the spiraling investigation and reports, he thought it would be prudent for everyone at this point if he resigned."

The mayor spearheaded a City Council vote last month to forcibly remove Mr. Lee. It failed, with a majority of council members voting to delay the matter three weeks and wait for the city's Ethics Commission to rule on Mr. Lee.

In the meantime, two ethics complaints were filed against Mr. Lee, and a preliminary Ethics Commission hearing was set for Sept. 16.

On Saturday, four days before today's rescheduled council vote on Mr. Lee, The Dallas Morning News reported that Mr. Lee had nearly $1,600 in unpaid traffic violations since 2000, and, as such, was ineligible to serve on the Plan Commission. Mr. Lee also had reported different birthdays – within one day and one year of one another – on city nomination forms, The News reported.

Mr. Greene said Mr. Lee took care of the fines over the weekend.

"He posted bond on those, and they're in the process of being handled," he said.

His explanation of the birthday discrepancies was less clear.

On various public documents, Mr. Lee listed his birth date variously as Dec. 22, 1965; Dec. 23, 1966; and Dec. 23, 1965.

Mr. Greene said Mr. Lee told him he was born at midnight on the night of Dec. 22-23, 1965, and therefore celebrated both days as his birthday. As far as the mistaken year, he said, Mr. Lee told him someone must have made a typographical error. The birth dates were written by hand.

Mr. Greene said he doubted the Ethics Commission would proceed with a hearing on the complaints against Mr. Lee, considering the resignation. But Assistant City Secretary Deborah Watkins said the complaints would still be heard.

"If there's a complaint filed, whether they are a current or former city official, we will hear the complaint," she said.

Mr. Lee is not the only city official named in federal subpoenas to leave the Plan Commission. Mr. Chaney said Tuesday he would not renominate Mr. Traylor, who is employed by Southwest Housing, a development company under scrutiny in the FBI probe.

"I believe in Mr. Traylor. It's not because of" the FBI investigation, said Mr. Chaney. He has asked District 7 resident Ann Bagley to serve on the Plan Commission and said he would nominate Mr. Traylor to the municipal library board. "I'm shaking things up. I just want to provide others with the opportunity to serve."

Ms. Brandon, who represents District 8 on the Plan Commission, will not be relieved of her post, Mr. Fantroy said.

"Don't even think about it," he said.

Mr. Lee should have stepped down "a long time ago," said council member Bill Blaydes, one of two people who filed ethics complaints against him. "The city benefited greatly by him doing so."

But Mr. Lee's resignation is only one step, Ms. Miller said. Today, she will reveal a slate of proposed reforms to clean up the city's zoning process – rules that, if approved, would require plan commissioners and City Council members to be vested in citywide land-use decisions.

Too often, Ms. Miller said, elected and appointed officials defer to the district representative when deciding complicated and controversial zoning cases, rather than learning the details and voting their convictions.

"I think if you put them all together, it really changes how we do business with zoning at City Hall," Ms. Miller said. "And those changes need to happen."

WFAA-TV (Channel 8) reporter Chris Heinbaugh contributed to this report.

Lee Resigns From Plan Commission (WFAA-TV)

By CHRIS HEINBAUGH

WFAA-TV, September 7, 2005

A key figure in the FBI investigation at Dallas City Hall has resigned.

City Plan Commissioner D'Angelo Lee submitted his resignation to Council member Don Hill. In a news release, Hill said he is regrettably accepting Lee's resignation.

Lee's business interests and activities as a City Plan Commissioner have been at the core of the FBI investigation.

Hill's memo said Lee's focus is clearing his name and developing his business interests. Hill said Lee can't do that in the present environment.

Hill said says Lee's resignation is in the best interest of his family and the city.

Three weeks ago, a sharply divided City Council refused a request from Mayor Laura Miller to remove Lee from the Plan Commission. The item was to be reconsidered on Wednesday.

Many Council members said they were pleased that Lee's decision will avoid another potential fight.

"Nobody likes a divided city," said Council member Elba Garcia. "I think that we'll need to move forward, work together, and make the best that we can for the city."

"This will help," Councilman Mitchell Rasansky agreed. "Surely it isn't going to hurt, but it should have been done several months ago."

Lee has reportedly has been driving a car belonging to someone else, and allegedly accepted fees from groups with business before the City Plan commission.

Lee is not the only member of the City Plan Commission who will be leaving his post.

Melvyn Traylor, whose name appeared in a recent subpoena, will not be back. City Council member Leo Chaney said he will not reappoint Traylor to the job.

Chaney insisted it was part of an overhaul of his appointee and had nothing to do with the FBI investigation.

The mayor is presenting a controversial package of reforms for the city plan commission.

"...There are some things going on behind the scenes that are not appropriate," she said. "And hopefully with these plan commission recommendations and city council recommendations tomorrow for reform, we won't have those problems anymore."

As for Don Hill, he said in light of the human tragedy caused by Hurricane Katrina, he would not answer questions today about Lee's resignation.

E-mail cheinbaugh@wfaa.com

Ribadu, FBI Meet In U.S. (NDI)

By Tony Eluemunor (Abuja) and Habib Aruna (Lagos)

Nigeria Daily Independent, September 7, 2005

Economic and Financial Crimes Commission (EFCC) chairman, Nuhu Ribadu, has been holding meetings with the United States Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) to intensify the search for corrupt Nigerian public officials.

He was in the U.S. last week to meet with senior government and FBI officials and to exchange information on the activities of Nigerian politicians, especially governors being investigated for corrupt practices.

Ribadu, according to sources, was sighted in Maryland and Washington D.C. where he had meetings with U.S. officials (in the company of an EFCC investigator) to obtain additional information on the property deeds of some governors and pass details to the INTERPOL.

He also used the visit to obtain more information on the raid the FBI carried out last month on the property of Vice President, Atiku Abubakar.

The search of his home in Maryland attracted national attention in Nigeria last week.

It was linked to the investigation of Congressman William Jefferson, whom Atiku had hosted during his visit to the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0003486

But Ribadu, who returned later in the week, reportedly achieved little success due to the national outcry generated by the slow response of the American Government to the destruction of New Orleans by Hurricane Katrina.

Besides, the FBI has tarried in its investigation of Jefferson who incidentally hails from New Orleans.

"The FBI is threading carefully in pursuing new leads in the investigation against Jefferson because of the sensitive nature and political dimension it might take", a source explained.

In any case, Daily Independent has obtained a list of what the FBI seized during the raid.

The document, titled "Receipt for Property Received/Returned/Released/Seized", was signed by the leader of the FBI team.

It stated that the items included

· 1A envelope with house sketch.
· Employee schedule information and employee contact information.
· 2005 appointment book.
· Possible list of camera locations.
· Software and operation manual for DVR.
· Kalatel digital recorder.
· Multiplayer.
· Manila envelope containing miscellaneous papers with William Jefferson's return address.

Atiku's family lawyers supplied Daily Independent with the document.

They deplored the attempt by some newspapers to sensationalise the issue through the "fabrication of falsehood".

'What FBI Took From Atiku's US Home' (THISDAY)

By Kunle Akogun

This Day (Nigeria), September 7, 2005

The Office of Vice President Atiku Abub-akar yesterday rele-ased a list of items taken away from Maryland, US home by operatives of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) during their August 3 raid.

In an e-mailed press statement titled "What FBI Took From The Atiku Family House" and signed by his deputy Press Scretary, Mohammed Yakub.

The Vice President's office listed the items as including: 1A envelop with house sketch, employee schedule information and employee contact information, green standard diary, 2005 appointment book and possible list of camera locations.

Other items are software and operation manual for DVR, Kalatel digital reco-rder, multiplexer as well as manila envelop containing miscellaneous papers with William Jefferson's return address.

According to the statement, the document containing the report of FBI search was jointly signed by the FBI officials and a representative of the Atiku family.

THISDAY checks revealed that the release of the document entitled "Receipt for Property Received/Returned/Released/Seized" dated August 3, 2005, might not be unconnected with the need to refute publication in a weekly newsmagazine that during the search of Atiku's house in Maryland, USA, FBI agents found some documents on payments to American congressmen through William Jerfferson, an eight-term member of the US congress.

The statement from the Vice President's office quotted Atiku's family lawyers and added that the content of the FBI document was made public to reassure members of the public and disabuse their minds of what it called "the fabrication of falsehood".

It noted that at the time of conducting the search on Atiku's house, the FBI agents "certified that the (listed items) above represents all that was obtained by special agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, US Department of Justice."

The Vice President's family lawyers deplored the attempt by some newspapers to sensationalise the issue through the "fabrication of falsehood", the statement added.

On August 27, American newspapers were awash with stories of the FBI raid of the Maryland, US residence of Vice President Atiku Abub-akar.

The raid, according to the papers, was part of a probe into whether eight-term congressman William Jefferson made payments to top Nigerian and Ghanaian officials.

A source familiar with the investigation said subpoenas showed federal agents were looking for records indicating whether Jefferson paid, offered to pay or authorized payments to Nigerian or Ghanaian government officials, The Times-Picayune said.

Agents were seeking documents related to Jefferson's dealings with Atiku and the vice president of Ghana, Aliu Mahama. Jefferson returned from a five-day visit to Ghana in mid-July, about three weeks before the FBI raided his homes, according to the newspaper.

DOJ_NMG_0003487

The subpoenas focused in part on a telecommunications deal Jefferson was trying to engineer in Nigeria over the past year, according to documents and those familiar with details of the investigation.

Sources familiar with the telecommunications deal said Jefferson was attempting to smooth the way for iGate Corp., a small Kentucky company, to offer its high-speed broadband technology to Nigeria's fast-growing telecommunications market.

In its reaction the Federal Government immediately said security agencies had been directed to investigate the matter which it described as an individual affair. However, in his reaction, Atiku had said that no wrong doing had been established against him.

Atiku in and a statement signed by Yakub, acknowledged that his US home was raided by the FBI following a visit by Congressman Jefferson, who unknown to him then was under investigation.

The Vice President later disclosed that he had before Jefferson's visit received a letter from Nigeria's Ambassador to the United States, Dr. George Obiozor, requesting that he look into the business dealings between the NITEL, another unnamed Nigerian firm and an American company.

He said since the business had not been sealed he immediately gave instructions to one of his aides that the letter be forwarded to the Minister of Communications, Chief Cornelius Adebayo, for necessary action and advice.

He said Jefferson's visit to his Maryland home while he was on vacation in the US, was a follow-up to the letter he received from Obiozor.

Monitor: City Defying Ban On Political Hiring (CHIST/AP)

By MIKE ROBINSON, ASSOCIATED PRESS

Chicago Sun-Times, September 7, 2005

Chicago officials have been basing hiring decisions on political clout and not merits, defying a court-ordered ban on patronage employment, a federal monitor said Tuesday.

Court-appointed monitor Noelle Brennan urged sweeping changes at City Hall, including requiring top officials to swear under penalty of perjury that hirings aren't based on politics.

Brennan made the recommendations in an 11-page report to U.S. District Judge Wayne R. Andersen on how to enforce the decades-old Shakman Decree that bans the use of patronage.

"We did find that the city has been substantially noncompliant with the Shakman Decree for a significant period of time," Brennan said in delivering the report to Andersen.

Brennan's conclusions reinforced long-standing claims by critics of City Hall that the 1983 decree issued in a lawsuit brought by attorney Michael Shakman has been violated almost since its inception.

Daley's former patronage chief, Robert Sorich, and another former city official, Patrick Slattery, are under federal indictment in an 18-month investigation of hiring abuses.

Brennan's report brought immediate praise from city Corporation Counsel Mara Georges, who promised to continue to work with the court-appointed monitor and help her to get information.

"We are there to facilitate the process and give her whatever information she requires," Georges said. But in response to questions from reporters she said that the city would continue with its effort to have a federal appeals court overturn the Shakman Decree.

"That case is just a strong as it ever was," Georges told reporters.

Shakman, himself, said the preliminary report was "a very good first step at addressing how to eliminate the culture of corruption and clout in city hiring and promotion practices."

Andersen said he wants fast progress on making changes in the way the city does its hiring and asked both Brennan and Georges to be back next month to update him on the process.

The use of patronage in city hiring and promotions has been at the heart of the so-called Chicago Machine for decades. Numerous precinct captains who get out the vote for the regular Democratic organization on Election Day have jobs on the city payroll.

In recent years, City Hall watchers have said that money to pay for television advertising has become much more important in winning elections than such doorbell-ringing foot soldiers.

But recent court hearings have made it plain that political officials still place a high premium on getting jobs for those who turn out the vote.

Among other things, Brennan found that available jobs are not always posted and frequently filled based on political factors. She said applicants without clout have been largely ignored.

The mayor's office of intergovernmental affairs-- the political high command-- has been excessively involved in the hiring process, Brennan said. She said unqualified applicants who have political clout often get consideration for jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0003488

And the city has been unresponsive to complaints about violations, she said.

She said the city should immediately hire additional employees for the Department of Personal so that it can act as a buffer between political officials and the job applicants. She said that she should have a role in hiring the new employees for the department.

Brennan said she should be notified of new hires and there should be random auditing of some of the hires to determine if there was compliance with the Shakman Decree. There should also be an order barring retaliation against anyone assisting in her work, Brennan said.

State Spent $478,385 To Check Guardrails (TENN)

The Tennessean, September 7, 2005

The Tennessee Department of Transportation said yesterday that it spent $478,385 to inspect every inch of guardrail across the state for evidence of improper installation, but the state won't say what was found.

Efforts are under way to repair any deficient guardrails.

Some of the state's guardrail companies are under scrutiny by the FBI, the Tennessee Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. Transportation Department and the state on suspicion of installing guardrail posts shorter than required lengths.

Evidence began to surface in January after an anonymous tip from a guardrail employee. As additional evidence came to light, TDOT deployed teams in May to inspect more than 4,000 miles of state highway guardrails. The state inspection wrapped up Sept. 1, said Kim Keelor, a TDOT spokeswoman, adding that the results of the review are not being made public as ordered by the state attorney general's office.

"We will try to recoup as much of that money as possible, through legal recourses, from contractors involved in installing any guardrail found to be deficient," Keelor said.

The findings are confidential for litigation reasons, said Sharon Curtis-Flair, spokeswoman for the attorney general's office.

"Like TDOT, we're always concerned about the public's safety," Curtis-Flair said. "We're going to see to it that the (guardrails) get fixed as quickly as they can."

Keelor said TDOT crews are beginning to "pull, check, and replace if needed, any guardrail terminals that were flagged as possibly being deficient."

This phase of the guardrail improvements is expected to take until the end of the year.

Man Charged In Killings Of Sex Offenders (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

A man who told the police that he had found his victims on a sheriff's department Web site was arraigned yesterday in the killings of two convicted sex offenders in Bellingham, Wash.

Investigators said the man, Michael A. Mullen, was upset by a child abuse case in Idaho that involved a repeat sex offender.

They said Mr. Mullen, 36, telephoned the 911 center in Bellingham on Monday to confess to a double killing in which a man posing as an F.B.I. agent visited the home of three known sex offenders and told them they were on a hit list and in danger.

One of the three left for work, and upon returning found the other two, Hank Eisses, 49, and Victor Vasquez, 68, dead from single gunshot wounds to the head.

After calling the police to confess to the killings on Monday, Mr. Mullen surrendered to the authorities. He was arraigned in Whatcom County Superior Court yesterday, just hours after the police charged him with two counts of first-degree murder.

"I can't think of another set of circumstances out there where such a killing has occurred," said Lt. Craige Ambrose of the Bellingham Police Department.

Mr. Mullen said that he had been planning the murders for some time, officials said, and that he was upset over killings in Idaho in which a sex offender is charged.

A common theme in the interview was the case in Idaho, Lieutenant Ambrose said, adding: "He was upset that a sex offender killed a family and abducted the kids. He said that a couple of times. That was one of the things that may have triggered this."

The Idaho case involved a repeat sex offender, Joseph E. Duncan III, who is accused of fatally beating three people with a hammer in a house outside Coeur d'Alene and then abducting two children. One of the children, Shasta Groene, 8, was with Mr. Duncan when he was arrested. The body of her brother, Dylan, 9, was found two days later.

DOJ_NMG_0003489

Mr. Mullen told the police that he searched the Whatcom County sheriff's sex offender Web site. The site includes addresses for the convicted offenders, with the number of the street address partly withheld. He focused on the home of Hank Eisses, who lived with the two other sex offenders.

Mr. Mullen, who the police said "selected at least one of the two victims," went to the Eisses house on Aug. 26, posing as a federal agent. The police said he wore a black ball cap with the F.B.I. insignia and a dark blue jump suit.

The roommate who escaped harm, James A. Russell, 42, has been moved to an undisclosed location.

Kit Bail, the regional administrator for the Washington Department of Corrections, said the authorities had contacted other sex offenders in Whatcom County and advised them to screen visitors and request identification.

"We are letting them know about the potential threats and giving them some perspective on what can make them safe," Ms. Bail said.

The authorities said they had not determined whether Mr. Mullen was acting alone. Letters sent to a newspaper and television station in Bellingham just after the killings warned that more sex offenders would die.

"We did, of course, take the letters seriously since we already had two people killed," Ms. Bail said. "The letter claimed there was a conspiracy, threatened the lives of other sex offenders and suggested the notion that there was a vigilante out there, seeking other targets."

Washington's sex offender registration law is 15 years old and like the laws in other states, tries to monitor the rehabilitation of sex offenders returned to the county of their convictions and the risk presented by them.

Corrections officials had been satisfied with the progress of Mr. Eisses, Mr. Vasquez and Mr. Russell, who was the most recent to move into the Bellingham house.

"They were what we called a success story," Ms. Bail said. "They had lived there for a number of years and although neighbors were not particularly happy about it, they all knew them. There had been no community problems and they had not reoffended."

Man In Wash. Murders Tries To Plead Guilty (TLPA)

By Donna Gordon Blankinship

Times Leader (NE PA), September 7, 2005

BELLINGHAM, Wash. - A man arrested in the shooting deaths of two convicted child rapists tried to plead guilty Tuesday before he had even been formally charged.

Police believe Michael Anthony Mullen might have targeted the men in reaction to a notorious case in Idaho in May in which two children were abducted and one was slain.

"Can I have a speedy trial?" Mullen asked a court official, via closed circuit television from jail, during a preliminary hearing Tuesday. "I would like to plead guilty."

Prosecutor Mac Setter said Mullen would be formally charged with the murders Wednesday. Whatcom County Superior Court Commissioner David Thorn set bail at $1 million and scheduled Mullen's arraignment - when a formal plea may be entered - for Sept. 16.

Police said Mullen, 35, called them on Monday to turn himself in and later confessed to killing Hank Eisses and Victor Vazquez in their home on Aug. 27.

The hearing revealed that Mullen may have had help on the day the two men died. Setter said an unidentified woman whom he described as a witness had driven Mullen to and from the scene.

Mullen may have been motivated by the case of Joseph Edward Duncan, a convicted sex offender who is accused of killings and child abductions in Idaho, police said.

"One possible reason was the case in Idaho," Bellingham Police Lt. Craige Ambrose told The Associated Press. Ambrose wouldn't elaborate, and Setter refused to discuss possible motives.

Police said they believe Mullen's claim that he killed the Bellingham sex offenders because he knew details only the killer would know: the caliber of the weapon used, and that the victims were each shot once in the head.

"Mullen also said that he had planned the murders for some time and that on July 13, 2005, he had accessed the county sheriff's sex offender Web site, and from that selected at least one of the two victims," according to a police statement.

As is typical in Washington, the sheriff's Web site lists the residences of sex offenders who are required to register with local authorities.

Mullen has a criminal record but no history of violence, Ambrose said.

In the Idaho case, Joseph Edward Duncan is accused of fatally beating three people with a hammer in a home outside Coeur d'Alene in order to abduct two children for sex.

DOJ_NMG_0003490

He was arrested July 2 at a restaurant with one of the children, 8-year-old Shasta Groene. Remains of her 9-year-old brother, Dylan, were found in a Montana forest two days later.

According to police, Mullen said he mailed a letter about the Bellingham killings to several news outlets last week. The Bellingham Herald, the daily newspaper in this college and mill town of about 71,000, reported Thursday that the letter threatened other sexual predators.

Eisses, 49, and Vazquez, 68, were both classified as Level 3 sex offenders, the type considered most likely to re-offend.

Their bodies were found by a roommate, also a sex offender, who said a man wearing a blue jumpsuit and a cap that said "FBI" came to the house, told them he was an FBI agent and said he wanted to discuss their status as sex offenders.

The supposed federal agent told them that one of them was on a "hit list," police said.

The roommate said he left while the FBI impostor was still there and he found the bodies when he returned about four hours later.

Vazquez was convicted in 1991 of molesting several relatives, according to court documents. He was released from prison about two years ago and remained under supervision.

Eisses was sentenced to 5 1/2 years in prison in 1997 for raping a 13-year-old boy. He was released from supervision about two years ago, said Kit Bail, Corrections Department field supervisor for the county.

Man Admits To Killing 2 Sex Offenders, Cites Idaho Case (LAT)

By Tomas Alex Tizon, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

SEATTLE — The man who confessed to slaying two registered sex offenders in Bellingham, Wash., told police that he was outraged by the recent case of Joseph Edward Duncan III, a convicted sexual predator being held in Idaho.

Michael Anthony Mullen, 36, made a brief court appearance Tuesday in Whatcom County Superior Court, about 80 miles north of here, after turning himself in to Bellingham police Monday afternoon.

Mullen, a longtime resident of Whatcom County with a history of petty crimes, faces charges in the Aug. 26 shooting deaths of Hank Eisses, 49, and Victor Vasquez, 68. Both victims were Level III sex offenders, considered the most likely to commit similar crimes again. Mullen's arrest all but ended fears that a vigilante was on the loose targeting other registered sex offenders in the Bellingham area.

"It's a relief that he's not running around anymore with who-knows-what on his mind, probably more of the same," said Bellingham Mayor Mark Asmundson, who was informed of Mullen's arrest minutes after it happened.

Police said Mullen called 911 from a Bellingham restaurant and confessed to the murders. He was arrested and questioned for "hours and hours," said Bellingham police Lt. Craige Ambrose.

Investigators said Mullen provided details of the crime that only the killer would know, such as the caliber of the weapon and the way in which each victim was shot: once in the head. Ambrose said that during the interview Mullen repeatedly "came back around to the Idaho incident," referring to the Duncan case.

"Let's just say he was influenced by what happened there," Ambrose said.

Duncan, a 42-year-old convicted sex predator from Tacoma, Wash., is in Kootenai County, Idaho, awaiting trial in the slayings of four people and the kidnapping of two children in May near Coeur D'Alene, Idaho. Duncan is being investigated in the deaths of other children across four states, including California.

Less than two weeks after Duncan's case made national headlines, police said, Mullen got on a Whatcom County website that listed the names and addresses of all Level III sex offenders in the county.

Eisses and Vasquez lived with a third sex offender in a little green house on Northwest Avenue.

According to earlier reports, a man entered the victims' home, just north of downtown Bellingham, impersonating an FBI agent. He told the men that there was a hit list targeting sex offenders and that he was there to warn them.

The third occupant left for work with the man still in the house. When he returned home from work, he found his housemates dead. Eisses had been convicted of child rape and Vasquez of child rape and molestation. Both men had committed their crimes in Whatcom County.

On Aug. 31, five days after the slayings, the Bellingham Herald received a letter from someone claiming responsibility for the killings and threatening to kill all other Whatcom County sex offenders designated as Level III. The county has 31 registered Level III offenders, including four in Bellingham, which has a population of 71,000.

Police said Mullen had confessed to sending the letter and told investigators that more letters would soon be arriving at other media outlets. Ambrose said he did not know the content of those letters.

Ambrose said Mullen, standing 6 feet 5 and weighing about 250 pounds, had no known history of violence but had an extensive history of theft and other property crimes. Mullen had no permanent address, police said.

DOJ_NMG_0003491

The slayings stirred debate over the 1990 state law requiring sex offenders to register their addresses. Washington was the first state to pass such a law, which is intended to help the public keep track of dangerous sexual predators. In 1994, Congress mandated that states create registers of sex offenders. Now all 50 states have their own version of Washington's Community Protection Act.

Supporters say the public has a right to know about such offenders, but opponents argue that publicizing exact addresses invites vigilantism and prevents sexual offenders from leading normal lives.

Lawyers Protest Court Venue For Prison-bus Killing (BSUN)

By Lisa Goldberg

The Baltimore Sun, September 7, 2005

The night Philip E. Parker Jr. was killed, the crime scene was on the move.

As a prison bus rumbled through the darkness on a winter night, passing through four Maryland counties and into Baltimore on a 75-mile trek to the city's Supermax prison, Parker was strangled and left slumped between rows of seats.

A fellow inmate was charged in Baltimore County with murder, which suggests that investigators believe the crime occurred there. But attorneys for the man, Kevin G. Johns Jr., say Parker likely died elsewhere -- and legal observers say a judge's ruling could be a matter of life and death.

"Baltimore County seeks the death penalty much, much, much more frequently than any other venue, so certainly on the defense side, you don't want to be in Baltimore County," said Byron L. Warnken, a University of Baltimore law professor.

The death penalty is never mentioned in court papers challenging Baltimore County prosecutors' right to try Johns, 22, but it lurks under the surface.

In 2002, researchers from Columbia, Rutgers and New York universities ranked Baltimore County second among large counties nationwide in the rate at which convicted murderers are sentenced to death. A University of Maryland study released a year later found that the county dominates the state in death-penalty cases and that prosecutors there are 13 times more likely to seek the death penalty than are prosecutors in the city.

"The stakes are very high for Mr. Johns," said Douglas Colbert, a University of Maryland law professor.

A hearing to determine which jurisdiction should try the case was originally scheduled for last month but was delayed because of the illness of one of Johns' lawyers. Last week, Baltimore County Circuit Judge Thomas J. Bollinger postponed the matter until the first week of January and set a trial date for July 31.

While Johns' case might seem an apt one for any prosecutor to consider seeking the death penalty -- he has previously been convicted of two murders, one inside and one outside prison -- the decision for many jurisdictions often comes down to a question of resources, court observers say.

In other areas, "there are so many factors that enter that decision," Colbert said.

William C. Brennan Jr., one of Johns' lawyers, would not comment beyond the court filings in the case.

Evidence conflicts

Exactly what led authorities to choose Baltimore County as the place to charge Johns is still unclear. Prosecutor S. Ann Brobst said there is "ample evidence" that Parker was killed in Baltimore County, but she would not discuss the specifics.

A termination notice for one of the correctional officers involved in the transport notes that "the trip proceeded without apparent incident" until the bus reached the area of Security Square Mall in the county, where one officer said he saw Johns switch seats "and became suspicious that there was a problem."

Johns and Parker, 20, were among more than 30 inmates and five correctional officers on the bus as it traveled along Interstate 70 from the Maryland Correctional Training Center near Hagerstown to the Maryland Correctional Adjustment Center, also known as Supermax, during the early-morning hours of Feb. 2.

Johns' lawyers argue in court filings that the strangling likely took place in Howard County -- although they also point to statements from inmates on the bus that alternately place the act in Washington, Frederick and Howard counties.

Johns said in an interview with authorities that the attack took place about 15 minutes after the bus left the Hagerstown prison, according to a defense brief.

Evidence points to the attack taking place before the bus reached Baltimore County, making that jurisdiction the wrong venue for the case, the lawyers wrote.

Case is 'trickier'

What makes the case unique is the lack of certainty about the most basic of details, legal observers say.

"Your normal murder occurs within a particular boundary, on a street corner or in a person's home -- not in a moving vehicle -- so it's very clear where the crime scene is," said defense attorney Margaret Mead, who unsuccessfully argued a decade ago to have a client's trial moved to Baltimore City based on similar circumstances. When a moving car or bus is involved, "that's when it gets trickier."

DOJ_NMG_0003492

In Mead's previous case, a woman was fatally stabbed in 1995 while traveling from the city to the county on northbound Interstate 83. Two women were charged after they were seen dumping the body of 30-year-old Myra Harrison in northern Baltimore County.

Mead said it would have been better for her client, Latina Rose Smith, to be tried by a city jury. Her client was not facing the death penalty but was afraid of facing a Baltimore County jury, she said.

"I think it was a better jury pool [in the city] to have listen to the dynamics between these women," she said.

Previous case set mark

But Mead lost her motion at the Baltimore County Circuit Court level and, later, in a reported opinion by the Court of Special Appeals that set the benchmark for determining venue in a case -- allowing the state to use a less stringent standard of proof to determine where a case should be tried.

The state only has to show that the crime occurred "close enough to the county boundary" when the evidence is ambiguous, Colbert said.

To prevail in the Johns case, the defense will have to prove a timeline of events and the location of each, Mead said.

"What's going to be hard is getting any precise location of where death occurred," she said.

Inmate made threat

Parker's mother, Melissa Rodriguez, said she worries that people have forgotten her son as the focus shifts to Johns.

The day before Parker's death, Johns said in open court that he would likely kill again if he didn't get the psychiatric help he needed. He was sentenced to life without parole for the death of his 16-year-old cellmate at a hearing in which Parker was called to testify on his behalf.

Several correctional officers were fired or disciplined after the killing on the bus.

Parker, who was serving a three-year sentence for unarmed robbery at the time of his death, had about 15 months left before his release, his mother said.

'I just want it done'

Rodriguez would not say whether she was in favor of the county's decision to seek death for Johns but said she doesn't want the case to move now. Doing so would take away the Baltimore County-based support system she's already come to rely on, she said.

"It already started there. I know the people there, and I feel comfortable with them," she said. "I just want it done and over with."

Judge Finds FBI Not Liable For Bungling Call From Killer (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, September 7, 2005

A federal judge ruled yesterday that the FBI can't be sued over a clerk's bungling of a call from Gary Lee Sampson when the killer offered to surrender on bank robbery charges, just a day before going on a murderous rampage four years ago.

US District Judge Reginald C. Lindsay dismissed a $10 million lawsuit filed by the family of one of Sampson's three victims, 69-year-old Philip McCloskey, of Taunton.

In a 24-page opinion, the judge wrote that federal law protects the government from being sued for negligence because former FBI clerk William H. Anderson was exercising his discretion when he disconnected Sampson's call to the FBI's Boston office on July 23, 2001, and failed to tell anyone about it.

The FBI's broad discretion to decide whether to investigate or apprehend someone "encompasses the discretion of an individual officer like Anderson to report or not report a particular call," Lindsay wrote.

McCloskey's son, Scott, said it was ridiculous that the FBI has no legal responsibility, even though Anderson was sentenced to six months in prison for lying under oath when he initially denied taking Sampson's phone call.

"He was made accountable for his mistake, so why can't the FBI be held accountable for their mistake?" said Scott McCloskey, of Plymouth.

After Sampson pleaded guilty to federal carjacking and murder charges, a jury recommended in December 2003 that he be executed -- making him the only person ever sentenced to the federal death penalty in Massachusetts. He's currently on death row at the federal prison in Terre Haute, Ind., while he appeals his sentence.

The Abington native admitted that he carjacked McCloskey in Weymouth on July 24, 2001, and forced him at knifepoint to drive to Marshfield, where he walked him deep into the woods, tied him up, and stabbed him 24 times.

Three days later, Sampson carjacked 19-year-old Jonathan Rizzo, of Kingston, outside a Plymouth restaurant. He forced the college sophomore to drive to Abington, where he tied him to a tree in the woods and repeatedly stabbed him.

Sampson then fled in Rizzo's car to New Hampshire, where he broke into a vacation home on Lake Winnipesaukee and stabbed 59-year-old Robert "Eli" Whitney to death when he arrived to cut the lawn.

Sampson called police and surrendered the next day after breaking into a ski chalet in Plymouth, Vt., and setting off a burglar alarm. Then, Sampson, who was wanted for bank robberies in North Carolina, revealed that he had called the FBI's Boston office from a convenience store in Abington the day before going on his rampage and offered to surrender.

Sampson said he waited outside the store for several hours, but the FBI never showed up.

"They didn't even make an attempt to come and arrest him," Scott McCloskey said. "If they did show up and caught him they would have got all kinds of glory for catching this bank robber . . . and my father would still be alive."

Anderson, who had been filling in for a switchboard operator at lunchtime, said he had inadvertently disconnected Sampson's call when trying to switch it to an agent.

FBI officials said at the time that the bureau doesn't record its calls and didn't have the ability to track the lost call.

The McCloskeys also named Sampson, who is indigent, in the suit and were seeking $25 million in damages from him. The judge ruled yesterday that if the McCloskeys want to go forward against Sampson they must take their suit to state court.

Brockton attorney Kevin Reddington, who represents the McCloskeys, said he'll review the judge's decision with the family and then decide whether to appeal it. He added, "We believe the government owes a duty of protection to its citizens."

In his ruling, Lindsay also rejected the McCloskeys' claim that the FBI had a responsibility to protect the public from Sampson.

The judge wrote that in an unrelated lawsuit brought against the FBI by the family of Debra Davis, one of the victims of South Boston crime boss James "Whitey" Bulger, he'd concluded that the government had a duty to protect the public because Bulger was a longtime informant.

However, Lindsay wrote that the FBI had no special relationship with Sampson that obligated the government to control Sampson's conduct, because he was neither an informant nor in FBI custody.

David V. Kirby, the United States attorney for Vermont, who defended the government against the lawsuit, declined to comment yesterday on Lindsay's ruling.

But in its motion seeking dismissal of the suit, federal prosecutors wrote that the FBI could not have foreseen that Sampson would commit murders after his phone call was disconnected.

"Plaintiffs simply cannot establish that any alleged negligence by the FBI actually or proximately caused McCloskey's murder," the prosecutors wrote.

Judge Dismisses Suit Against FBI (BOS)

The Boston Globe, September 7, 2005

BOSTON --A lawsuit against the FBI filed by the family of one of Gary Sampson's victims has been dismissed by a federal judge, who ruled that the government is protected from such suits despite bungling Sampson's offer to surrender.

U.S. District Judge Reginald C. Lindsay on Tuesday threw out the $10 million suit filed by the family of 69-year-old Philip McCloskey, who was one of Sampson's three victims during his interstate murder spree four years ago.

The judge, in a 24-page decision, said federal law protects the government from being sued for negligence because former FBI clerk William H. Anderson was using his discretion when he disconnected Sampson's call, and failed to notify anyone.

Sampson had called the FBI to surrender to bank robbery charges, but the call was disconnected. Sampson waited several hours for the FBI to arrest him outside a convenient store a day before his rampage.

He later admitted to killing two Massachusetts men and a New Hampshire man.

Scott McCloskey, the victim's son, told The Boston Globe that Anderson was held responsible -- he was sentenced to six months in prison for lying under oath when he initially denied taking Sampson's call -- but not the FBI.

"He was made accountable for his mistake," McCloskey said, "so why can't the FBI be held accountable for their mistake?"

A drifter who grew up in Abington, Sampson confessed to killing McCloskey, Jonathan Rizzo, 19, of Kingston, and Robert "Eli" Whitney of Meredith, N.H., in July 2001. His weeklong crime spree ended with his capture in Vermont.

A jury in December 2003 sentenced Sampson to death. He is being held in a federal prison in Terre Haute, Ind., while he appeals the death sentence.

U.S. Supreme Court Is Asked To Decide If It's Proper To Let Sleeping Jurors Lie (LAW)

By Mary P. Gallagher, New Jersey Law Journal

Law.com, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003494

New Jersey's public defender wants the U.S. Supreme Court to issue a bright-line rule that a defendant's due process right to a fair trial is violated when jurors fall asleep during testimony.

Several jurors allegedly dozed off during Roy Higinia's October 1996 drug-possession trial in Essex County, N.J. The transcript shows that Assistant Deputy Public Defender Rafael Gomez, at a sidebar just prior to cross-examining a police detective, told the judge that four or five jurors were "deep asleep" and some were "falling asleep" during his opening.

Superior Court Judge Julius Feinberg said he had not noticed and the case would continue but he would "wake them up, if necessary." He then asked the jurors if the room was too hot and when one answered "a little bit," he had the windows opened.

The trial proceeded and Higinia was convicted and sentenced to five years in jail.

The Appellate Division rejected the argument that the defendant was entitled to jurors who have heard all the evidence. In State v. Higinia, A-5515-02, decided March 21, Judges Francine Axelrad and Rudy Coleman said Feinberg took "proper remedial measures" by opening the windows after surveying the jury. Further, since defense counsel did not request anything more at the time, the issue could not be raised on appeal.

They also found no prejudice because the alleged napping occurred during direct testimony by a prosecution witness and the jurors were awake for the cross-examination. The New Jersey Supreme Court denied certification on May 25.

In the petition for certiorari filed Aug. 23, Assistant Deputy Public Defender Lon Taylor said the appeals judges ignored state precedent that places an affirmative duty on the trial court to assure an attentive jury. Taylor asked the Court to rule that a sleeping juror is per se a structural error not amenable to harmless error review and so requires reversal.

The petition points out that Higinia, who admitted possessing cocaine, claimed that police fabricated the distribution charges and that jurors who slept through police testimony would miss the chance to assess credibility based on factors like body language and demeanor.

Sleeping jurors are not uncommon. A 1996 survey of state and federal judges by Vanderbilt Law Professor Nancy King found that 69 percent of the 562 respondents had seen at least one in an estimated 2,300 cases during the preceding three years.

Rachel Sacharow, a spokeswoman for the state Division of Criminal Justice, declined comment last week, saying her office had not yet seen the petition.

Millions More In Bogus Cigarettes, Cash Seized By Feds (NSDY)

Long Island Newsday, September 7, 2005

NEWARK, N.J. -- In the weeks since federal authorities said they smashed a smuggling ring that brought counterfeit cash, cigarettes, and drugs into the U.S., additional raids have netted $5 million more in bogus cigarettes and $2 million more in fake U.S. currency.

Operation Royal Charm, in which 87 Asians and U.S. citizens were arrested in mid-August, netted $4.4 million in high-quality fake $100 bills, more than 1 billion counterfeit cigarettes worth $42 million, and hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of ecstasy, methamphetamines and Viagra, officials said.

At the time of the arrests, officials said some of the cigarettes were made in China and the money appeared to have been produced in North Korea.

Since the arrests, authorities seized an additional $1.8 million worth of cigarettes in southern New Jersey on Aug. 21, followed by a seizure of $2.7 million worth of cigarettes the next day at Port Elizabeth, according to the FBI.

On Aug. 23, approximately $2 million in counterfeit U.S. currency, commonly referred to as "super notes," were seized by Taiwanese and American authorities in Kaohsiung, Taiwan, authorities said.

And on Aug. 24, more cigarettes worth more than $500,000 were seized in northern New Jersey.

Some of the arrests were made when alleged smugglers expected to attend a lavish wedding aboard a yacht in Atlantic City but were instead transported into the hands of federal agents.

Gotti Was 'A Street Boss,' Prosecutors Say In Closing (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

John A. Gotti, the prince of the Gambino crime family, ordered the 1992 kidnapping of the Guardian Angels founder, Curtis Sliwa, because he regarded himself as "the street boss of his own government," a federal prosecutor said yesterday in his closing argument in Mr. Gotti's racketeering trial.

Summing up the government's case in the four-week trial, the prosecutor, Joon Kim, said Mr. Gotti would not have been satisfied to "write a letter to the editor" with his complaints about Mr. Sliwa's tirades against the Gotti family on his morning radio show on WABC-AM.

DOJ_NMG_0003495

"Instead of engaging in a public debate, Gotti responded in the Gambino crime family's native language: violence," Mr. Kim said.

Mr. Gotti, the son of John J. Gotti, the late Gambino boss, is on trial in Federal District Court in Manhattan on broad racketeering-conspiracy charges that include the June 19, 1992, attack on Mr. Sliwa. Mr. Sliwa was abducted in a New York taxicab and shot in the leg and abdomen at point-blank range before escaping through an open window.

Mr. Kim pointed to corroboration in testimony about the attack by two former Gambino members, Michael DiLeonardo and Joseph D'Angelo, who said he was the driver of the cab.

The prosecutor concluded his three-hour summation assailing Mr. Gotti's defense argument that he withdrew from organized crime after he was arrested in 1997 on earlier racketeering charges. Mr. Gotti pleaded guilty in 1999, and has served more than six years in jail.

"This argument is simply nonsense," Mr. Kim said. "You've seen no evidence of withdrawal."

To comply with a five-year statute of limitations on the charges, the prosecutors must show that Mr. Gotti continued to commit crimes with the Gambino organization after July 1999 - while he was in Ray Brook federal prison in upstate New York. Mr. Kim pointed to testimony from Mr. DiLeonardo that he complied in mid-2000 after Mr. Gotti asked him for $50,000 in loan sharking funds that Mr. DiLeonardo had been holding. Mr. Lichtman, Mr. Gotti's lawyer, is to sum up his defense today.

Also on trial are Louis Mariani, accused of extortion and securities fraud, and Michael Yannotti, charged with shooting Mr. Sliwa, among other crimes. Mr. Mariani's lawyer, Charles Carnesi, said the turncoat witnesses had all shown they were liars.

"They spit out a story and the prosecutors and the F.B.I. decide not to check the story and it becomes the truth," Mr. Carnesi said. "The game is rigged."

Prosecutors: Gotti Son Ordered Sliwa Attack As Part Of Criminal Reign (NYNSDY)

By Patricia Hurtado, Staff Writer

New York Newsday, September 7, 2005

A federal prosecutor contended Tuesday that John "Junior" Gotti's claim that he retired from mob life after his 1999 guilty plea is "ridiculous and sounds like a way to get a pass for a lifetime of crime."

In closing arguments to the jury after the month-long trial, Assistant Manhattan U.S. Attorney Joon Kim said that while Gotti pleaded guilty to federal racketeering charges in April 1999, he never stopped committing crimes as Gotti lawyer Jeffrey Lichtman asserted.

Kim said Gotti was appointed the "street boss" of the Gambino crime family after his father, mob boss John Gotti, was imprisoned in 1992.

Kim also said Junior Gotti was so enraged by comments radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa made about the "Dapper Don" that Junior Gotti dispatched two thugs to inflict a beating on Sliwa so severe "he would have to be scraped off the ground."

"In Gotti's mind he was not a normal citizen obliged to obey the law," Kim said of the younger man. "He believed he was special because he had become the street boss of his own government, a government which had its own set of rules and law, whose only purpose is to make money and commit crimes."

Kim cited the testimony of Joseph D'Angelo, a former Gambino soldier, who testified as a government witness that Junior Gotti dispatched him and Michael Yanotti to kidnap Sliwa and put him in the hospital.

"In Gotti's government, there is no right of free speech," Kim said.

Yanotti, charged with conspiracy and attempted murder for shooting Sliwa during the foiled kidnapping, is on trial with Gotti.

D'angelo testified Gotti oversaw nearly every aspect of the Sliwa attack, and yesterday, Kim reminded jurors that when D'angelo balked at attacking Sliwa, Gotti said: "I want it to be personal. I want him to know we had our hands on him."

And Kim asserted that testimony from other mobsters who once were close to Gotti, including former best friend Michael DiLeonardo, proved that Gotti continued his life of crime behind bars and reaped millions of dollars from the Gambinos' extortion of unions and construction firms and through loan sharking.

"We've seen no evidence of withdrawal," Kim said. "Instead, we've heard Gotti continued to receive illegal proceeds and benefits through 2001."

Kim said that six months after Junior Gotti was incarcerated he sent a message to subordinates to "push out" thousands of dollars in loansharking for the mob. Gotti later used mob proceeds to purchase commercial property on Hempstead Avenue in Queens Village, Kim said.

Lichtman is to deliver his closing arguments today.

Charles Carnesi, a lawyer for Gotti another co-defendant, Louis Mariani, a reputed Gambino associate, told jurors in his closing arguments yesterday that there was no evidence his client reaped millions of dollars from illicit Gambino operations.

Mariani is charged with racketeering, loansharking and stock fraud.

Prosecutor: Gotti's Son Ordered Sliwa Hit (AP)

By MICHAEL WEISSENSTEIN, The Associated Press

AP, September 7, 2005

NEW YORK (AP) — New York was buzzing about Gambino crime boss John Gotti in the spring of 1992, and radio host Curtis Sliwa didn't hide his disdain for the "Dapper Don."

Calling the boss "America's No. 1 drug dealer," Sliwa infuriated the late mobster's son and protege, John A. "Junior" Gotti, a federal prosecutor said Tuesday as the younger Gotti's racketeering trial drew to a close.

Gotti "didn't respond like an ordinary citizen," Assistant U.S. Attorney Joon Kim said in his closing argument. "Instead of engaging in public debate, Gotti responded to Sliwa's words in the Gambino family native language: violence."

Advertisement

The younger Gotti sent thugs to beat Sliwa with baseball bats, Kim said. But Sliwa didn't shut up, so two mobsters were dispatched to pick him up in a stolen cab, the prosecutor said.

As Sliwa struggled to escape, a hitman opened fire, leaving the Guardian Angels founder weak and bleeding in the back seat, Kim said.

Sliwa escaped by throwing himself out the cab window but other Gambino family rivals were not as lucky, Kim said, describing the machine-gun slaying of two other men, one killed simply because he was with the intended target.

Defense attorneys claim the younger Gotti, 41, had nothing to do with Sliwa's shooting and other attacks and quit the mob after a 1999 racketeering conviction.

But Kim called that argument "simply nonsense," saying Gotti was "a man who used his name to get to the top of this criminal enterprise ... a man who used his position in the family to line his pockets with millions of dollars in illegal money."

Gotti continued to meet with gangsters, take their tribute money and plot crimes in the years after his purported renunciation of the mob life, Kim said.

"You've seen no evidence of withdrawal," he told jurors.

Gotti's alleged role in the Sliwa attack is part of racketeering charges that could keep him in prison for up to 30 years. Gotti's attorney was to begin his summation Wednesday.

The elder Gotti was sentenced to life in prison in 1992 and died in prison in 2002.

Sliwa described the cab attack to jurors in gruesome detail last month, recounting how a masked gunman hiding in the front passenger seat "popped up like a jack-in-the-box," swore at him and began shooting.

Wounded in the stomach and bleeding profusely, Sliwa discovered the cab had been rigged so he couldn't open the back doors. He said he saved himself by throwing himself into the front seat and out the passenger window as the cab sped down the street.

"He would be dead if he didn't somehow leap out the window of a speeding cab," Kim said.

The trial has also featured the testimony of Michael "Mikey Scars" DiLeonardo, one of the highest-ranking Gambinos to become a cooperator.

Trial Of 'Junior' Gotti Draws To Close In New York (REU)

By Christine Kearney

Reuters, September 7, 2005

NEW YORK (Reuters) - The son of late mob boss John Gotti ordered a vicious attack from prison on the founder of the Guardian Angels anti-crime patrol as retribution for comments the man made about Gotti's father, prosecutors said on Tuesday.

John A. Gotti, also known as "Junior," rose to become the "street boss" of the Gambino crime family for most of the 1990s after his father, known as the "Dapper Don," went to prison, prosecutor Joon Kim told the jury in closing arguments at Gotti's federal trial in Manhattan.

Kim said the younger Gotti ordered an attack in 1992 on Curtis Sliwa that left the Guardian Angels' founder bloodied in a taxi cab with multiple bullet wounds after Sliwa made derogatory comments about his infamous father on his talk radio show.

In an attack on Sliwa a few months earlier, three thugs pummeled him with baseball bats, the prosecutor said.

"He (Gotti) sent his underlings to do his dirty work for him," said Kim. "Gotti responded to Sliwa's words in the Gambino family's native language: violence."

In the racketeering trial, Gotti faces a number of charges, including conspiracy to commit securities fraud, extortion of construction businesses and loan sharking, as well as the attempted kidnapping of Sliwa. If convicted, he faces up to 30 years in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0003497

Jeffrey Lichtman, Gotti's defense attorney, has argued that his client turned away from crime since pleading guilty to racketeering charges in 1999. Lichtman described Gotti as a devoted father of five who drove a minivan and changed diapers.

Lichtman has said the prosecution's case was based on an array of untrustworthy witnesses who agreed to testify against Gotti so that they could get lighter prison terms.

Kim told jurors the array of mob turncoats who testified during the trial, including the driver of the taxi, Joseph D'Angelo, was "powerful, corroborating evidence." Sliwa provided colorful testimony, in which he described how he used the back seat of the taxi like a trampoline to escape through the window.

"He told you in frightening detail what happened to him that morning," Kim told jurors, noting how Sliwa described "blood oozing out of his body and soaking his shirt."

"Curtis Sliwa was shot in the stomach and the leg at point blank range. He would be dead if he didn't somehow leap out of the window of a speeding cab," he said.

The prosecutor said Gotti's contention he wanted out of organized crime after pleading guilty to racketeering charges in 1999 in a separate case was "nonsense" and that he continued to commit crimes from prison following the earlier plea.

Gotti's defense attorney planned to present closing arguments on Wednesday.

The elder Gotti died in prison in 2002.

PartyGaming Shares Plunge As Growth Rates To Slow (Update5) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 7, 2005

Shares of PartyGaming Plc, the online poker operator that sold $1.9 billion of stock in a June initial public offering, fell as much as 37 percent to below the IPO price after the company said revenue growth is slowing.

The stock dropped as much as 58.75 pence to 98 pence in London, wiping about 2.4 billion pounds ($4.4 billion) from the company's market value. The shares, which were sold to the public at 116 pence each, were at 105 pence at 12:50 p.m. local time. Stock of competitors including Sportingbet Plc also fell.

PartyGaming's share sale was more than three times subscribed by investors on expectations that the increased popularity of online poker will spur growth in an industry that's expanded 10-fold in three years. The company's revenue gains are slowing as more operators seek to enter the market, adding to competition.

``There were some clear dangers in relation to the valuation of this company and our concerns have been realized,'' said Henk Potts, a London-based fund manager at Barclays Private Clients, which manages the equivalent of $45 billion. ``PartyGaming is all about its growth potential, and some investors decided to bet on the growth rather than consider the potential slowdown.''

Profit rose 25 percent in the first half, PartyGaming said today in a statement, as revenue gained 81 percent. The company incurred costs of $62.3 million related to its stock sale.

World Series of Poker

The drop in PartyGaming's share price has redressed the ``hype'' that caused the stock to gain after the IPO, said Paul Leyland, an analyst at Seymour Pierce in London.

``The market has misinterpreted what's actually just happened in the same way that it misinterpreted that poker was going to the moon ad infinitum initially,'' said Leyland, who doesn't have a formal recommendation on the stock.

Gibraltar-based PartyGaming, formed in 1997, said revenue growth in July and August was slower and weaker than expected. This may have been caused by the later screening of the World Series of Poker, which this year started on Aug. 23, Chief Executive Richard Segal said on a conference call. The event, aired by Walt Disney Co.'s ESPN, began last year on July 6.

``We may have revenues which are slightly lower than what we had initially anticipated based on a softer pick-up in the third quarter,'' Finance Director Martin Weigold said on the call. ``That may just be a blip, it may be a trend.''

The poker industry has swelled as events such as the World Series of Poker have encouraged more people play games such as Texas Hold'em on line. About 29,000 players competed for more than $103 million of prize money at this year's tournament in Las Vegas.

`Highly Competitive'

The number of days on which regular users played poker rose 59 percent in July and August from the same period last year, slowing from a 102 percent gain in the first half, Segal said.

PartyGaming said customer retention rates are falling as more casual players come on line. Competition is increasing in the market, which is 51 percent-controlled by Gibraltar-based PartyGaming. Empire Online Ltd., which helps poker and casino Web sites win customers, also had an initial public offering in June, and 888 Holdings Plc, the world's largest Web casino operator by number of visitors, is planning a $500 million share sale.

``The market has been highly competitive for some time and remains highly competitive," Segal said.

A spokesman for 888 said the company's IPO plan remains on track and amid ``very positive feedback" from investors.

According to research company Christensen Capital Advisors, growth in online poker will slow to 60 percent in 2006 from 130 percent in 2005, and to 30 percent in 2007. The industry grew to $1 billion in 2004 from $90 million in 2002, Christensen says.

Gaming companies have raised $4.5 billion selling shares over the last 12 months. Sportingbet sold stock twice in the period, raising a total of $220 million, Bloomberg data show.

First-Half Results

Shares of Sportingbet, the owner of Paradise Poker, fell as much as 18 percent in London today. Stock of Ukbetting Plc, which operates Ukbettingpoker.co.uk, dropped as much as 9 percent.

PartyGaming said first-half net income rose to $171 million, or 4.5 cents a share, from $136.5 million, or 3.6 cents, a year earlier. Earnings before interest, tax, depreciation and goodwill amortization rose 70 percent to $257.7 million.

Revenue, 92 percent of which comes from fees for poker games played on the company's Web site, increased to $437.4 million, PartyGaming said. Sales in the U.S. gained 77 percent, while growth outside the U.S. more than doubled.

The company makes 87 percent of its revenue in the U.S., where the Justice Department considers online gambling illegal.

Dresdner Kleinwort Wasserstein cut its 2006 estimate for earnings before interest, tax and amortization by 12 percent to $622 million, according to a research note.

Segal said the company is ``monitoring developments" at Empire Online after Sportingbet said yesterday that it may make a takeover offer.

To contact the reporter on this story: Paul Jarvis in London at pjarvis@bloomberg.net. Last Updated: September 6, 2005 08:11 EDT

Betfair Makes Online Odds On AC Milan, Hillary Clinton, Weather (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 7, 2005

On a rainy July afternoon on the opening day of Glorious Goodwood, a two-century-old British horse- racing extravaganza, cricket star Michael Atherton is mingling in the box rented by Betfair, an online gambling site that processes 2 million wagers a day, six times the trades on the London Stock Exchange.

Betfair co-founder Andrew Black, 42, sneaks in two hours late, flinging a blue tie around his neck to conform to the ``jacket and tie" dress code.

``I'm still feeling rough," Black quips. Twelve hours earlier, he'd dressed up as a jockey with a cap and leather whip to celebrate the fifth birthday of his company, London-based Sporting Exchange Ltd., which operates under the Betfair name.

Black has more than one reason to celebrate. In June, Betfair hired Morgan Stanley, the world's largest securities firm, and Goldman Sachs Group Inc., the second-biggest adviser for global acquisitions, to look into its financial options, including a potential initial public offering.

Given the valuations of gambling companies that have gone public in the past six months, Betfair would be worth as much as 600 million pounds ($1.1 billion), says Martin Oelbermann, a director at Munich-based research firm MECN GmbH. The valuation takes Betfair's profit of 17.1 million pounds for the year ended in April and applies the price-earnings multiples of online gaming companies such as Empire Online Ltd., which directs gamblers to poker Web sites.

``The Internet has proven to be a fantastic medium for gambling," says Richard Carter, an equities analyst who covers the leisure industry at London-based brokerage Numis Corp.

Gambling Bubble?

Carter says as many as seven Internet gambling companies may sell shares to the public this year. ``Every online gambling sector is growing faster than its land-based counterpart," he says, comparing Internet gaming to traditional betting shops and casinos.

The hubbub surrounding Betfair and the host of new gambling sites recalls the Internet bubble of the late 1990s, says Paul Leyland, an analyst at London-based brokerage Seymour Pierce Ltd.

``For these valuations to hold, there is an assumption that all companies in the medium to long term can grow at double-digit rates," Leyland says. ``We are skeptical."

Yesterday, shares of PartyGaming Plc, which runs PartyPoker.com, the world's biggest poker site, plunged 33 percent to 105 pence, below the IPO price of 116 pence, after the company said revenue growth is slowing.

PartyGaming's Slowdown

Gibraltar-based PartyGaming went public in June, raising 1.04 billion pounds. It was the U.K.'s biggest IPO since Reading, England-based Yell Group Plc, which publishes Yellow Pages directories, raised 1.2 billion pounds in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0003499

Chief Executive Officer Richard Segal said on yesterday's conference call that the number of days during which regular users played poker rose 102 percent in the first half of 2005 from the same period a year earlier. In July and August, the pace slowed to 59 percent, he said.

In addition, the revenue that each active player generates is falling because casual gamblers are joining and they play less frequently. ``The market has been highly competitive for some time and remains highly competitive," Segal said.

Online gaming generated $8.2 billion in revenue last year, or about 3 percent of the $243 billion global gambling market, according to New York-based research firm Christiansen Capital Advisors.

Betfair Stands Out

The online poker market alone soared to $1 billion in 2004 from $92 million in 2002. While revenue at traditional casino and gaming companies is likely to edge up 3 percent a year through 2009, revenue at online companies will surge about 22 percent annually to reach about $23 billion in that year, Christiansen predicts.

Oelbermann says Betfair stands out from competitors. He compares it to EBay Inc., the San Jose, California-based online auction house that matches buyers and sellers in a global marketplace.

Betfair charges nothing to a person who offers a wager. It takes a maximum cut of 5 percent of a winning bet. The strategy eliminates the bookmaker, the agent who offers odds and accepts bets for a fee.

In traditional casinos or gambling sites, customers play against the house, which builds a profit margin into the odds, making it hard to win, Black says.

In contrast, Betfair is a betting exchange -- an inspiration Black says he took from his stint in 1995 trading U.S. equities and learning about the New York Stock Exchange.

Split-Second Timing

A person who accesses Betfair's Web site can offer a bet and set the odds. If the odds are attractive, other bettors will take the counter position. This happens with split-second timing, and it's anonymous. Everybody has funds in the system to back their wagers. Transactions are reconciled immediately after the event is completed.

Betfair's 300,000 clients can -- and do -- bet on anything, from whether New York Senator Hillary Clinton will win the 2008 Democratic Party presidential nomination and how high home prices will rise in the U.K. to who will win MTV's best dance video and how hot the British summer will be.

Recent bets slightly favored Clinton's nomination, had housing prices reaching an average of 157,000 pounds to 158,999 pounds by December 2005, had Jennifer Lopez winning in the Best Dance Video category and were against temperatures reaching 100 degrees Fahrenheit (38 degrees Celsius).

In May, Betfair notched a company record of more than 10 million pounds of wagers on one event when the U.K.'s Liverpool soccer club came back from a 0-3 deficit against Italy's AC Milan to win the European Champions League final on penalty kicks.

`First-Mover Advantage'

``You can't beat the first-mover advantage," says Oelbermann, referring to the benefit he says Betfair and EBay have gained by being the first to strike it big from profits on client transactions. ``Nobody will be able to beat Betfair unless the management makes a massive mistake."

The gambling craze is spurring action on the acquisition front. Sportingbet Plc, which operates an online casino, accepts sports wagers and runs poker games, announced on Sept. 5 that it's in talks to buy Empire Online, which is based in the British Virgin Islands. Empire's shares have risen 44 percent this year to 252 pence yesterday. Sportingbet shares have gained 64 percent to 311 pence.

``The next wave of activity will be mergers and acquisitions," predicts Nigel Payne, Sportingbet's CEO. ``There will be 50 M&A deals in the next two years."

Getting big quickly may be the best way to ensure survival. Sporting Options Plc, a betting exchange like Betfair, filed for bankruptcy protection with debts of 5.4 million pounds in November 2004.

Failed Bet

Started in May 2002, Sporting Options took a maximum cut of 3 percent on a winning bet, less than Betfair's 5 percent ceiling. By 2003, losses had widened ninefold to 1 million pounds. The company struggled to attract 5,500 customers, less than one-tenth of Betfair's regular monthly clients.

Black, who provided a 3.5 million-pound bailout for Sporting Options customers and took on some of the company's bets, declined to comment on plans for a Betfair IPO. He prefers to talk about how his company lets him do what he knows best. ``I read somewhere that to be a successful entrepreneur means being able to do things that you don't like," Black says as he watches half a dozen horses speed by Betfair's box. ``That's not me. I don't like to do things that I don't like."

DOJ_NMG_0003500

From his earliest years, conforming was never part of Black's agenda. His grandfather was Sir Cyril Black, a teetotaler who campaigned against gambling as a Conservative Party Member of Parliament for Wimbledon, south of London.

Exeter University

The younger Black was expelled from Exeter University in southwestern England after he spent time gambling rather than studying.

He stacked shelves at a do-it-yourself store and toured Europe as a golf caddy -- a circuitous route to becoming a gambling mogul who's shaking up the old guard. Last year, Betfair processed $10 billion of wagers. Its strategy of taking a cut of every winning bet translated to a 63 percent jump in profit in the recent fiscal year. Revenue soared 61 percent to 107 million pounds.

Black says Betfair avoids legal headaches by taking no bets from residents of the U.S., a hotbed for online gamblers that produced 87 percent of PartyGaming's $600 million in revenue last year.

U.S. Laws

In April 2003, Deputy Assistant Attorney General John Malcolm told the Crime, Terrorism and Homeland Security Committee of the U.S. House of Representatives that if online gambling companies accept bets from customers in the U.S., they are violating federal laws.

``While the United States can indict these companies or the individuals operating these companies, it may be difficult to bring them to trial in the United States,'' Malcolm said.

In his testimony, Malcolm referred to the 1961 Federal Interstate Wire Act. The act states that it's illegal to use a ``wire communication facility,'' referring to a telephone, to transmit bets across state borders. Congress developed the act to stop organized crime involvement in sports gambling, says Lawrence Walters, a lawyer at Weston, Garrou, DeWitt & Walters in Altamonte Springs, Florida, who has advised the online gaming industry.

``The government has used the Wire Act as a threat against anyone providing services such as payment processing or advertising to the online gaming companies,'' Walters says. ``Even if they are empty threats, public companies are not going to take a chance.''

Spitzer's Role

In June 2002, New York-based Citigroup Inc., the biggest issuer of credit cards at that time, reached an accord with state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, agreeing not to process transactions made at online casinos and other Internet gambling operations. Banks followed suit.

MBNA Corp., the Wilmington, Delaware-based bank that Bank of America Corp. has agreed to buy; Chase Manhattan, now part of JPMorgan Chase & Co., the third-largest U.S. bank; and Wells Fargo & Co., the top U.S. home equity lender, have agreed not to process online casino transactions. American Express Co., the fourth-biggest U.S. credit card issuer, prohibits cardholders from using their cards to gamble on line worldwide.

In July 2002, Spitzer subpoenaed PayPal Inc., the payment provider owned by EBay, questioning its use for online wagers. PayPal agreed to end payments for online gambling. U.S. Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra declined to comment on specific online gambling companies or cases. ``Our view is that online gambling in the United States is illegal,'' he says.

`Not Illegal'

PartyGaming's Segal says his company isn't doing anything wrong. ``We are satisfied that what we are doing is not illegal,'' he says.

Segal says he bases his reasoning on a court case in Louisiana and a ruling by the World Trade Organization. In 2001, Judge Stanwood Duval of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana in New Orleans dismissed a case against the world's second-biggest credit card brand, MasterCard International Inc. The suit asserted that MasterCard had run afoul of the Wire Act when it let customers use their cards to gamble and lose money at online casinos. The claimants argued that they shouldn't have to repay their debts because online gambling is illegal.

``At this point in time, Internet casino gambling is not a violation of federal law,'' Duval ruled. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, also in New Orleans, affirmed the decision in November 2002.

Address Required

Then, in April 2005, the Geneva-based WTO's appellate body said that because a number of U.S. states allow online gaming on lotteries and some permit online betting on horse racing, it was difficult for the U.S. to justify banning online gaming internationally.

Betfair customers must give their address to register and submit bank details to deposit money into their account before they can wager. ``We don't accept bets from customers with a U.S. address or U.S. credit card,'' says CEO Stephen Hill, 44, sitting in a corner room in the company's glass and steel offices overlooking the Thames in West London.

DOJ_NMG_0003501

On its home turf, Betfair is irritating traditional betting houses. David Harding, CEO of William Hill Plc, the U.K.'s biggest gambling company, says Betfair fosters unlicensed bookmaking because it lets anybody act as a bookmaker. The U.K. requires that bookmakers hold a permit from the Betting and Licensing Committee of a local Magistrates' Court.

`Perfectly Fine'

``If I go into a pub and offer to take bets from the public, I'd be arrested,'' Harding says, adding sarcastically, ``I do it on my computer, then that's perfectly fine.''

In addition, Harding says, some regulated bookmakers use Betfair to avoid paying the U.K. racing levy. U.K. law mandates that bookmakers pay as much as 10 percent of their gross profits to the horse-racing industry. When a licensed bookmaker offers a bet on Betfair, he avoids paying that tax, Harding says.

``No overheads and no taxes to pay means that bookmakers using Betfair can offer better odds,'' he says. Betfair itself is subject to the U.K.'s 30 percent corporate tax and 15 percent gross-profits tax on its take of customers' winnings.

The rise of online casinos is also prompting debate about gambling addiction. People who gamble on the Internet may be more likely than traditional gamblers to have a problem, says Guy Clark, chairman of the nonprofit, Washington-based National Coalition Against Legalized Gambling.

Gambling Behavior

Clark cites a report by University of Connecticut psychologists George Ladd and Nancy Petry, who studied the gambling behavior of 389 people. They found that almost 11 percent were problem gamblers and more than 15 percent met the criteria for pathological gamblers, showing an inability to resist the impulse to gamble. The study further identified those with Internet gambling experience as having the most serious addictions.

``There is an awful lot of opposition to foreign online gambling companies becoming pervasive across the U.S.,'' Clark says.

Black grew up around traditional betting shops, the smoke- filled parlors where anyone can wager on a sporting event -- mostly horse races or football matches. The son of a property developer, Black attended Kings College, a private school for 7- to 18-year-olds in Wimbledon, the same district that his grandfather represented in Parliament. He got the nickname ``Bert'' when a teacher mistakenly called him by the wrong name.

Even as Black's grandfather legislated against drinking and gambling, Black's father took his 8-year-old son to the Goodwood racetrack in the Sussex countryside.

Hooked on Excitement

Black says he became hooked on the excitement and the tactics for picking winners -- an avocation that hurt his studies when he enrolled at Exeter to study mathematics in 1981. The university expelled him two years later for failing some of his exams, he says.

``I got good grades in the ones I did take,'' Black says, declining to say which ones those were.

Black followed with part-time jobs. In between, he tried to perfect his gambling to make a living betting on horses and playing bridge. In 1984, Black met his best friend, Jeremy Wray, at the Young Chelsea Bridge Club in London's Earls Court neighborhood.

In 1986, Black's brother Kevin, who was five years younger, contracted a brain infection that left him a paraplegic. Kevin died in 1988. Black says he decided to seek a regular job, joining the London branch of Track Data Corp., a New York-based financial information services company.

20-Pound Combination

All the same, he kept up his visits to the bookies. In 1992, he made his first big gambling profit. Black walked into his local bookmaking shop in Broadgate, near the Liverpool Street train station.

He put down a 20-pound combination bet on two horses named Party Politics and High Low to win the so-called spring double in the Grand National and Lincoln Handicap races. Both horses won, and Black scooped up 25,000 pounds. ``That was a very good day,'' Black says with a smile. ``That allowed me to quit my job.''

He tried his hand at professional gambling and got bored. In 1995, he joined Boxall Asset Management Ltd., a private money management company in London. The firm, which has since disbanded, traded U.S. equities and derivatives. Black traded U.S. stocks, learning how a financial exchange operates.

He quit after he had a falling out with his boss, he says, and got married and set himself up writing computer database programs for Internet companies such as Deckchair.com, an online travel agency. ``I could come up with creative solutions, which was more valuable than my coding skills,'' Black says.

`Take It or Leave It'

The idea for Betfair popped up in 1998 when Black was writing software for the British government's GCHQ, part of its intelligence service. After work, he'd think about how to translate what he'd learned about stock trading to sports betting.

``On the NYSE, everyone bids and offers against everyone else," Black says. ``You put your bid on the board, and anyone can come and post their bid. But bookies set the price, and you can either take it or leave it."

Black began toying with the idea of a site that would allow bettors to bypass bookies and to bet not only on an outcome but also against an outcome, much like shorting a stock. The project foundered until the death of his father in 1999. While his brother's death spurred Black to get a full-time job, his father's death jolted him to pursue his betting-site idea.

``So many people go through life with great ideas and never do anything about it," Black says. ``I had to take a chance."

Business Plan

Black put up 50,000 pounds of his own money and persuaded Jeremy Wray's younger brother to join him. Edward Wray, now 37, was a trader in debt capital markets at J.P. Morgan & Co. in London and could provide management know-how and open doors to raise new capital, Black recalls thinking.

With a business plan in hand, the pair visited venture capitalists in London. At the peak of the dot-com boom, they found no takers. One reason was that a company called Flutter was peddling a similar idea. Josh Hannah, 34, and Vince Monical, 35, former Bain & Co. management consultants from San Francisco, had beaten Black and Wray by getting to the venture capitalist community first.

``We tried to raise money and failed miserably," Wray says. ``Flutter had been there ahead of us."

Like Betfair, Flutter's site removed the bookmaker from the gambling equation. Unlike Betfair, Flutter was aiming for the casual bettor. ``It was about creating a community and a way of settling disputes you make with a friend in a pub or at work," says Hannah, who now runs a San Francisco online information service called Ehow.com and is the entrepreneur-in-residence at Menlo Park, California-based Benchmark Capital, which funded EBay. Venture capitalists loved Flutter.

30 Million Pounds

Hannah raised 30 million pounds from Benchmark, Geneva-based Index Ventures and Zurich-based UBS Capital. Black's idea of an exchange focusing on gamblers found no takers.

``Maybe they looked at me and thought I was past my sell-by date," he says. ``If you think Flutter is likely to be the leader, then you back it."

Wray and Black turned to friends and family and scraped together 1 million pounds in increments as small as 25,000 pounds. Flutter went on line in May 2000. Betfair followed four weeks later. The timing was propitious. Betfair's first day was Oaks Day, a major horse-racing event in the U.K. The company hired an actor to parade in a coffin around Russell Square in central London with a banner that read ``death of the traditional bookmaker."

`Liquidity and Size'

Betfair took in almost 1,000 pounds in bets on the horse race. Black says he knew he had a hit.

``Flutter was designed by management consultants who knew the Internet," he says. ``I knew gambling. I had been thinking about this for years."

In a few months, Betfair had about 95 percent of the betting exchange market based on volume of bets, says Simon Holliday, a partner at Global Betting & Gaming Consultants, a research firm in Wolverhampton, England.

Flutter's Hannah says he realized he'd been outflanked. ``This market is about liquidity and size," he says. ``It made sense to combine the two companies."

Hannah recalls that the decision to merge Betfair and Flutter happened over beers. The two combined in December 2001. The new company took the Betfair name, and Edward Wray became CEO. Fifteen months later, in April 2003, Betfair was handling 50 million pounds of bets a week and had increased its employees to 200 from 20. The company won a Queen's Award for Enterprise for ``outstanding innovation in the sports betting market."

Professional Gamblers

Betfair's arrival is spawning a new breed of professional gamblers. Jonathan Gale, 36, quit his job in the City of London, where he worked writing programs to determine options pricing at Deutsche Bank AG and other banks. He now spends as much as eight hours a day in an office 100 yards from his north London house, betting on intraday price movements of stock indexes using four computers and sophisticated software for program trading.

``With Betfair, your transactional costs are nil because you only pay a commission on your winnings," says Gale, who says he doesn't regret leaving his job. ``In the past 18 months, I haven't had a losing week."

Black is taking his company on the road. In Australia, Betfair has joined with Kerry Packer, the country's richest man, who owns Melbourne's Crown Casino. In July 2004, Black and Packer applied for a license to operate a betting exchange.

Australian Opposition

The local companies aren't in a hurry to put out the welcome mat. Michael Piggott, CEO of wagering at Melbourne-based Tabcorp Holdings Ltd., Australia's biggest gaming company, says Tabcorp has always opposed betting exchanges.

DOJ_NMG_0003503

``Licensed bookmakers are the only people that can accept bets," Piggott said via e-mail. ``That has been a cornerstone of maintaining integrity in the conduct of racing. The public cannot offer to accept bets."

In the U.K., Betfair has joined forces with Yahoo! Inc., operator of the world's most-visited Web site. Yahoo Betting provides a stripped-down version of Betfair aimed at casual gamblers. It offers a limited number of categories and no wagers on financial indexes or exchanges.

William Hill's Harding wants the U.K. government to tax Betfair on the volume of transactions that cross its exchange rather than on its profits. In March 2004, U.K. Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown said the Treasury would review the tax treatment of betting exchanges and their clients. A decision is expected in November, as part of the Treasury's pre-budget report, Betfair's Hill says.

Offshore Move?

Should the report be unfavorable to Betfair, Hill says, the company will give up its U.K. headquarters. ``If we have to pay more taxes, we'll move offshore," he says.

Betfair already has a license to operate in Malta, which charges gambling companies a 0.5 percent tax on their revenue. ``We'd like to be in the U.K. because it offers many advantages," he says, noting that the country's regulatory environment for financial companies would help investors feel safe investing in Betfair.

Regulation, taxes and concerns about gambling addiction all loom as Betfair and other online gaming sites strive to keep their growth streaks alive. The longest odds may be on Betfair's ability to prove that online gambling isn't another Internet bubble ready to burst.

To contact the reporter on this story: Kambiz Foroohar in London at kforoohar@bloomberg.net. Last Updated: September 6, 2005 21:20 EDT

CIVIL LAW:

Pols To Court To Stop NJ Base Closing (WINS)

WINS, 1010 AM, New York, September 7, 2005

(1010 WINS) (TRENTON) Lawyers for several New Jersey politicians made their plea Tuesday for a judge to issue a ruling that could keep Fort Monmouth open despite a federal commission's recommendation to close it.

U.S. District Judge Mary L. Cooper told them that she would rule quickly _ but did not specify exactly when.

Timing may be of the essence for the judge, who could order the base removed from the list of installations be closed, keep it on the list or set up future hearings on the matter.

By federal law, a list of recommendations for which military installations to close must be submitted to President Bush by Thursday. Bush has pledged to pass the list on to Congress without making any changes.

Congress can only vote the closures up or down. In past rounds of base closures, Congress has always accepted the commission's plan.

A lawyer for the government argued in a hearing Tuesday that if there is a time for the court to intervene in the Base Realignment and Closure Commission's process, it is not now.

Justice Department lawyer Carl Nichols said it's too early for those who believe Fort Monmouth should not be shuttered to make their case, in part because the president and Congress have not approved the closures.

``At that point, and at that point only, would we know Fort Monmouth would be closed," Nichols said.

Last month, BRAC recommended closing or consolidating 62 major military bases and 775 smaller installations across the country.

Among them, only the Fort Monmouth came with an asterisk: Fort Monmouth should be closed, the commission said, only if doing so would not interfere with the fort's work supporting the war on terror.

The closing would mean the loss of thousands of military and civilian contractors' jobs at a base where research is conducted. Fort Monmouth is headquarters of the U.S. Army's Communications Electronics Command, which designs radios, computers and software that keep troops in contact with each other.

Lawyers for a coalition including U.S. Sens. Jon Corzine and Frank Lautenberg, acting Gov. Richard J. Codey and other political and union leaders argued that BRAC did not follow six of Congress' eight criteria when it decided to close Fort Monmouth.

The effort to use the courts to save Fort Monmouth is probably a long shot, the lawyers conceded. But lawyer Frank G. Capece said Cooper's announced intention to issue a written opinion instead of an oral one gave some hope.

DOJ_NMG_0003504

Corzine insisted the lawyers ``leave no procedural stone unturned,'' Capece said, and pursuing a lawsuit now leaves open the possibility of further action later.

General Dynamics Loses Suit (WP)

By Renae Merle, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

A federal jury in Greenbelt yesterday ordered General Dynamics Corp. to pay $129.9 million to its onetime partner, Final Analysis Communication Services Inc., a small satellite firm, according to officials for the two companies.

The verdict concluded a seven-week trial in U.S. District Court that included appearances by some of the defense industry's biggest players, including Nicholas D. Chabraja, General Dynamics' chief executive; and Gordon R. England, the former General Dynamics executive who is now acting deputy secretary of defense.

The case centered on whether General Dynamics violated agreements to help Lanham-based Final Analysis develop a $400 million project to launch low-flying satellites for data transmissions, including paging and text message services.

James J. McGuire, attorney for Final Analysis, said the jury ordered General Dynamics to pay a total of $137.9 million but also ordered Final Analysis to pay $8 million under a counterclaim, netting $129.9 million for the smaller company.

General Dynamics is awaiting a final decision by the court, said spokesman Kendall Pease. The judge has asked for briefs from both sides, he said. General Dynamics argued in court that a power struggle between the company's founders contributed to the problems, according to the transcripts.

In the midst of the telecommunications boom in 1998, Final Analysis forged what executives hoped would be a critical partnership with Falls Church-based General Dynamics. The large defense contractor, best known for building tanks and submarines, would buy a 30 percent interest in the smaller company and help with the engineering work. Final Analysis launched three test satellites and was once valued at $400 million to $600 million, according to court documents.

But by 2000, as the telecommunications boom turned into a bust, General Dynamics had backed out, Final Analysis argued in its breach of contract lawsuit. When General Dynamics stopped work on the project, the firm's parent company, Final Analysis Inc., fell into bankruptcy without ever having launched a working satellite or started its service, McGuire said.

Final Analysis is appealing the loss of its Federal Communications Commission license and hopes to use the money the jury awarded to rebuild its business, McGuire said.

Attorney-Client Privilege Doesn't Shield Company In Suit (LAW)

By John Council, Texas Lawyer

Law.com, September 7, 2005

For years, it has been nearly impossible for in-house counsel at Texas companies to bring whistleblower suits against their employers, because companies could claim that the attorney-client privilege protected important evidence from disclosure in such litigation. But a recent 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decision changes all that.

The Aug. 24 ruling concerns an appeal of an administrative dismissal of a whistleblower complaint filed by an in-house lawyer. The 5th Circuit held in Willy v. Administrative Review Board, U.S. Department of Labor that the U.S. Department of Labor's Administrative Review Board incorrectly dismissed the in-house lawyer's complaint, after the board determined that a key piece of evidence needed to prove his allegations could not be disclosed because of the attorney-client privilege between the lawyer and the company.

The 5th Circuit remanded the case to the Administrative Review Board, noting that the case had "endured an odyssey through administrative and judicial tribunals" including four appeals to the 5th Circuit.

Coastal Corp. fired Donald J. Willy, then an in-house environmental attorney with the Houston-based company, after a series of events in 1984, according to the 5th Circuit opinion. Willy wrote two reports in 1984, referred to in the opinion as the Belcher Report, in which he concluded that one of the company's subsidiary oil companies was exposed to liability for allegedly violating several federal environmental statutes. Willy's supervisors disagreed with some of his conclusions in the Belcher Report and asked him to delete references to some of the alleged violations, which he refused to do, according to the opinion.

Coastal fired Willy after his supervisors accused him of contacting state regulatory officials about environmental matters at a Corpus Christi refinery owned by Coastal, the opinion noted.

In October 1984, Willy filed a complaint with the U.S. Department of Labor, alleging that Coastal violated federal whistleblower laws by firing him in retaliation for writing the Belcher Report -- allegations the company denied.

The company alleged the Belcher Report was protected by attorney-client privilege and refused to produce the report as part of the litigation.

DOJ_NMG_0003505

Nevertheless, an administrative law judge allowed into evidence two draft versions of the Belcher Report that Willy had in his possession.

After a series of dismissals and reversals of dismissals by administrative law judges of Willy's complaint, in February 2004, the Department of Labor's Administrative Review Board (ARB) issued a final decision and dismissal order. The board concluded that there was no exception to the attorney-client privilege that would allow the Belcher Report to be admitted into evidence; therefore Willy could not prove his complaint.

The 5th Circuit found that the ARB incorrectly ruled that Willy could not introduce the Belcher Report.

"The case law amply demonstrates the narrower proposition that the attorney-client privilege only prohibits a party from simultaneously using confidential information as both a shield and sword," wrote Judge Jacques Wiener in an opinion joined by Judges Patrick Higginbotham and Rhesa Barksdale.

"Stated differently, the 'shield and sword' analogy is conjunctive; it does not stand broadly for the proposition that an attorney may never use confidential information offensively," the judges concluded.

20+ YEARS

Willy, who coincidentally has been employed as a federal administrative law judge in Houston for the past 10 years, says he's pleased with the ruling.

"Look at the Constitution. The Fifth Amendment says you have a right to due process," Willy says. "How can you not have a right to due process because of your occupation?"

Willy represents himself in the case and argued it at the 5th Circuit. Judicial canons prevent judges from representing other people in court but permit judges to represent themselves. Another lawyer who had represented Willy dropped out of the case years earlier, Willy says.

"It's almost impossible to find someone to represent you in a case that's been pending for 20 years," Willy says. "I was forced to handle it, because there was no one else to handle it. It would be impossible for me to acquaint them with the case," which he says contains thousands of pages of documents.

J. Richard Hammett, a partner in the Houston office of Baker & McKenzie who represents Coastal, did not return two telephone calls seeking comment before press time on Sept. 1. Mark Edward Papadopoulos, a U.S. Department of Labor attorney who represents the agency in the case, declines comment.

Michael Maslanka, a partner in the Dallas office of Ford & Harrison who defends companies in employment suits, says Willy is a big deal for in-house counsel who want to sue their employers -- especially when the opinion is put in the context of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, which strengthened financial audit requirements in an attempt to prevent corporate fraud.

"This is a very empowering case for corporate counsel who believe they've been retaliated against under Sarbanes-Oxley," Maslanka says. "It removes a huge obstacle for them."

Maslanka says he has successfully used the attorney-client privilege to defend companies in Sarbanes-Oxley suits filed by in-house counsel. But Willy gives in-house counsel the same ability to file whistleblower cases against their employers as other employees have, Maslanka says.

"I think the lesson to draw from this is, if you haven't already done so, you make sure you have avenues where corporate counsel can register concerns with corporate governance," Maslanka says.

"The same good management techniques that stop other lawsuits from getting filed now apply to corporate counsel," Maslanka says. "Human resources has to treat corporate counsel as a potential plaintiff and listen to their concerns."

Rob Roby, a corporate defense attorney and partner in Dallas' Gwinn & Roby, says the opinion may have a chilling effect on a company's relationship with its own in-house counsel.

"I think it could be very critical in hindering communications that management thought would remain confidential. That's the real value of the attorney-client privilege," Roby says. "The goal is to have candid communication to stop things before they happen or fix them once they have happened."

Ken Molberg, a partner in Dallas' Wilson Williams & Molberg who represents employees in employment disputes, applauds the opinion.

"It's a common-sense approach, frankly. It says people in those positions are entitled to the protection under the law just like other people," says Molberg, president of the Texas Employment Lawyers Association.

"It really has broader implications. There are a series of cases out that circumscribe the rights of HR people who aren't even lawyers from using documents that will help their cases," Molberg says. "This speaks very loudly to that line of judicial reasoning."

DOJ_NMG_0003506

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Voter ID Opponents To Monitor Elections (AJC)

By Carlos Campos, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 7, 2005

Several groups opposed to a new law requiring voters to show state-issued photo ID at the polls announced Tuesday plans to monitor local elections on Sept. 20.

The Rev. Joseph Lowery, head of the Coalition for the People's Agenda, said monitors will "make sure there's no abuse of citizens who want to exercise their right to vote."

Thirty-three Georgia counties and two cities are holding elections Sept. 20. Most are referendums for special purpose local option sales taxes, including one in Cobb County, but some include races for city council posts. Augusta voters will select a replacement for Democratic state Sen. Charles Walker, convicted earlier this year of federal fraud charges.

Volunteers plan to conduct exit polls asking people if they were denied the opportunity to vote due to a lack of photo ID. The Mexican-American Legal Defense Fund has set up a toll-free hotline to field voter complaints: 1-877-462-5333.

Lowery was joined at the announcement by Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin and representatives of MALDEF, ACLU Voting Rights Project, the NAACP and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

The new law was passed by the General Assembly earlier this year. Supporters say it is intended to curb fraud by requiring voters to show a government-issued photo ID, such as a driver's license, state ID card, a public college ID or U.S. passport. Previously, voters were allowed to show non-photo identification, such as utility bills.

Opponents maintain the law will make it harder for poor people, the elderly and college students to vote. And they allege the law violates the Voting Rights Act, though it has received approval from the U.S. Justice Department.

Feds Tour Juvenile Justice Center (WJZ-TV)

WJZ-TV, CBS 13, Baltimore, MD, September 7, 2005

(WJZ) Baltimore, MD Continuing troubles and constant complaints about the Juvenile Justice Center bring federal investigators to Baltimore today.

Federal investigators fromthe Department of Justice will spend nine days inside the Juvenile Justice Center downtown.

The state run facility is under scrutiny after a series of complaints of youths being mistreated among other issues.

The Hickey School will close in November.

Meantime, a report on the Justice Department's visit this fall -- should be ready by early next year.

Right now, about 130 young offenders are housed inside the Juvenile Justice Center.

Gay-Marriage Bill Narrowly Passes California Assembly (LAT)

By Nancy Vogel

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

SACRAMENTO—The California Legislature made history Tuesday as the Assembly passed a bill to legalize same-sex marriage. With no votes to spare, California's lawmakers became the first in the United States to act without a court order to sanction gay unions. The measure was approved after three Democratic lawmakers, who abstained on a similar proposal that failed in June, changed their minds under intense lobbying by bill author Assemblyman Mark Leno (D-San Francisco) and gay and civil rights activists.

The bill, which would change California's legal definition of marriage from "a civil contract between a man and a woman" to a "civil contract between two persons," now goes to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger. The governor has signaled that he will veto it.

Tuesday's partisan vote came after 23 lawmakers spoke for an hour and a half, many of them describing the historic importance of their action, others relating intensely personal stories.

In a moment of high drama, with dozens of gay-rights supporters watching from the Assembly gallery, Salinas hesitated for several seconds as the tally hung at 40 "ayes" — one short of passage. Then, having promised Leno months ago that he would not let the bill fail if it garnered 40 votes, Salinas pressed the "aye" button on his desk, making the final vote 41-35. Those seconds "seemed like an eternity," said Mark Guzman of El Dorado Hills, as he and his partner of 14 years, J. Scott Coatsworth, celebrated in the Capitol rotunda after the voting.

Assemblymembers Tom Umberg of Anaheim, Gloria Negrete-McLeod of Chino and Simon Salinas of Salinas provided the key votes. Assemblymember Mervyn Dymally (D-Compton), who had missed the Assembly floor vote in June, also helped the bill prevail.

DOJ_NMG_0003507

Assemblyman Jerome Horton, (D-Inglewood), one of the lawmakers who abstained in June when Leno's bill failed 37-36, withheld his vote again Tuesday. Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia (R-Imperial City) abstained after having voted "no" in June. Assemblyman Joe Baca, Jr. (D-Rialto) also abstained Tuesday.

Two of the lawmakers who switched their votes from abstain to "aye" said in floor speeches that they were glad for another chance.

Umberg elicited applause and whoops in the otherwise hushed chamber when he described why he had changed his mind. He said he had been "cajoled, been harassed, been harangued and been threatened" by friends over the issue.

"This is one of those time when history looks upon us to see where we are," said Umberg. "Ten years from now, there are a handful of issues that history will record where we stood and this is one of those issues."

"History will record whether we pushed a bit, took the lead to encourage tolerance, to encourage equality to encourage fairness," he said.

"The constituency I'm concerned about is a very small one," said Umberg, "and that's the constituency of my three children, should they decide to look back on my record ... and reflect on where I was when we could make a difference."

Negrete-McLeod similarly said she regretted abstaining in June.

The fight over same-sex marriage will now shift to the governor's office -- and to the courts and perhaps the ballot box. A case testing the legality of gay marriage is moving toward the state Supreme Court, and opponents of same-sex marriage are trying to qualify two different initiatives to ban gay marriage for the ballot next year.

Leno characterized gay marriage as the most important civil rights issue of the 21st century. He enlisted Dolores Huerta, co-founder of the United Farm Workers of America, and Alice Huffman, California president of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People, to help him lobby undecided lawmakers.

Huerta said she spoke to Salinas last week and "went back to our old culture, the Latino culture."

"Respecting other people's rights is peace," she said. "Respecting other people's rights to marry who they want is a constitutional right, it's a human right and it's a privacy right. I said to Simon, 'You've got to be a leader . . . .You've got to have courage.' "

Opponents of same-sex marriage call Leno's bill unconstitutional, saying that it overturns what voters put into law five years ago when they passed Proposition 22 by 61%. That initiative stated that only marriage between a man and a woman is valid and recognized in California.

"The only word I can see here is prostitution," said Randy Thomasson, president of the nonprofit Campaign for Children and Families. "Instead of obeying the votes and the constitution, the Democratic politicians have prostituted themselves to the homosexual marriage agenda. It's not gay, it's bad."

After Leno's bill fell three votes short of passing the Assembly in June, he inserted the gay marriage legislation into a bill about marine research that was pending in the Senate. That bill, AB 849, cleared the Senate on Thursday, also with the minimum number of votes necessary.

Some Republicans, none of whom voted for Leno's bill, downplayed the historic significance of the vote and said gay marriage is not an issue of civil rights.

Others criticized Leno for reviving the bill after the June defeat and called homosexual marriage immoral.

"The institution of marriage transcends political fads," said Assemblyman Ray Haynes (R-Murrieta). "We are talking about an institution that has been defined for thousands of years . . . and we are being asked to engage in a great social experiment."

Leno said he optimistic that Schwarzenegger has an open mind on his bill, which the governor has until Oct. 9 to veto or sign. He noted that public opinion on gay marriage is evenly split, 46% to 46%, in California based on a recent poll by the Public Policy Institute of California.

"I believe this is a governor who at his core is a libertarian on issues of social matters," said Leno, "and that he is very fair -- minded."

"I think he also takes the longer, rather than shorter, view of history," he said.

After the Assembly vote, Schwarzenegger spokeswoman Margita Thompson said, "The people spoke when they passed Proposition 22.

"The issue subsequently went to the courts. The governor believes the courts are the correct venue for this decision to be made, " Thompson said. "He will uphold whatever decision the court renders."

'Marriage' Bill OK'd, Goes To Arnold (WT/AP)

By Steve Lawrence, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003508

SACRAMENTO, Calif. -- The California Legislature yesterday became the first legislative body in the country to approve same-sex "marriage," as homosexual rights advocates overcame two earlier defeats in the Assembly.

The 41-35 vote sends the bill to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who had no comment on the bill when it cleared the Senate last week, in what was widely seen as a symbolic vote at the time because of lower house's earlier rejections.

His office did not immediately respond late last night to a call seeking comment.

Although Mr. Schwarzenegger generally favors homosexual rights and domestic partnerships, he said in a 2003 interview with radio talk-show host Sean Hannity: "I think ... marriage is something that should be between a man and a woman."

He also criticized the San Francisco mayor's issuance of marriage licenses to same-sex couples in February 2004, saying they "fail to meet legal standards." California voters approved a ballot referendum defining marriage as the union of a man and a woman.

The bill's supporters compared the legislation to such earlier campaigns as women's suffrage and the eradication of slavery.

"Do what we know is in our hearts," said the bill's sponsor, San Francisco Democrat Mark Leno, who is homosexual. "Make sure all California families will have the same protection under the law."

Mr. Leno's bill had failed in the Assembly by four votes in June, but he was confident he could get it through on a second try after the Senate approved a same-sex "marriage" bill last week.

Democratic Assemblyman Paul Koretz called the opposite-sex definition of marriage "the last frontier of bigotry and discrimination, and it's time we put an end to it."

Assemblyman Tom Umberg, a Democrat who abstained when another homosexual "marriage" bill fell four votes short in June, said he was concerned about what his three children would think of him if he didn't join those "who sought to take a leadership role in terms of tolerance, equality and fairness."

But opponents repeatedly cited the public's vote five years ago to approve Proposition 22, an initiative to keep California from recognizing same-sex "marriages" performed in other states or countries.

"History will record that you betrayed your constituents and their moral and ethical values," Republican Assemblyman Jay La Suer said.

The vote was hailed by homosexual advocates, including Geoff Kors, executive director of Equality California, a backer of the bill.

"As the debate today shows, love conquers fear, principle conquers politics and equality conquers injustice, and the governor can now secure his legacy as a true leader by signing this bill," Mr. Kors said.

California already gives same-sex couples many of the rights and duties of marriage if they register with the state as domestic partners.

Massachusetts' highest court ruled in November 2003 that the state constitution guarantees same-sex couples the right to "marry." The nation's first state-sanctioned, same-sex "weddings" began taking place in May 2004.

Vermont began offering civil unions in 2000, after a ruling by the state's Supreme Court. Earlier this year, Connecticut became the first state to approve civil unions without being forced by the courts.

Regardless of what the governor does, California's debate over homosexual "marriage" will continue on several fronts.

A state appeals court is considering challenges to a lower court ruling that overturned California laws defining marriage as the union of a man and a woman. Opponents of same-sex "marriage" are trying to qualify initiatives for the 2006 ballot that would amend the state Constitution.

Calif. Lawmakers Pass Gay Marriage Bill (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

Filed at 12:28 a.m. ET

SACRAMENTO, Calif. (AP) -- The California Legislature on Tuesday became the first legislative body in the country to approve a bill allowing same-sex marriages, but the measure faces an uncertain future with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger.

There were loud cheers by gay-rights activists in the Assembly gallery as lawmakers voted 41-35 to approve the bill and send it to the governor. The Assembly had twice defeated similar legislation.

A spokeswoman for the Republican governor said Schwarzenegger believes the issue should be decided by the courts, not by his signature on legislation. A state appellate court is considering appeals of a lower court ruling that overturned California laws banning recognition of gay marriages.

"He will uphold whatever the court decides," Schwarzenegger spokeswoman Margita Thompson said.

DOJ_NMG_0003509

Gay-marriage supporters nonetheless rejoiced the victory. They compared the legislation to earlier civil rights campaigns to eradicate slavery and give women the right to vote.

"As the debate today shows, love conquers fear, principle conquers politics and equality conquers injustice, and the governor can now secure his legacy as a true leader by signing this bill," said Geoff Kors, executive director of Equality California, a backer of the bill.

The bill, sponsored by San Francisco Democrat Mark Leno, had failed in the Assembly by four votes in June, but Leno was confident he could get it through on a second try after the Senate approved a same-sex marriage bill last week.

"Do what we know is in our hearts," Leno said. "Make sure all California families will have the same protection under the law."

Assemblyman Tom Umberg, a Democrat who abstained in the vote in June, said he was concerned about what his three children would think of him if he didn't join those "who sought to take a leadership role in terms of tolerance, equality and fairness."

But opponents repeatedly cited the public's vote five years ago to approve Proposition 22, an initiative put on the ballot by gay marriage opponents to keep California from recognizing same-sex marriages performed in other states or countries.

"History will record that you betrayed your constituents and their moral and ethical values," said Republican Assemblyman Jay La Suer.

Randy Thomasson, president of the Campaign for Children and Families, a conservative group opposed to the bill, said Schwarzenegger should announce immediately that he would veto the legislation.

"Schwarzenegger can't afford to sign the gay marriage license bill," he said. "He'll actually become a hero to the majority of Californians when he vetoes it."

California already gives same-sex couples many of the rights and duties of marriage if they register with the state as domestic partners.

Massachusetts' highest court ruled in November 2003 that the state constitution guarantees same-sex couples the right to marry. The nation's first state-sanctioned, same-sex weddings began taking place in May 2004.

Vermont began offering civil unions in 2000, after a ruling by the state's Supreme Court. Earlier this year, Connecticut became the first state to approve civil unions without being forced by the courts.

Regardless of what action the governor takes, California's debate over gay marriage will continue on several fronts.

A state appeals court is considering challenges to a lower court ruling that overturned California laws banning recognition of gay marriages. And opponents of same-sex marriage are trying to qualify initiatives for the 2006 ballot that would amend the state Constitution to ban same-sex marriages.

Democrats And Labor Get Redistricting Vote On Ohio Ballot (NYT)

By Dean E. Murphy

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

The Ohio secretary of state announced yesterday that a series of election-related constitutional amendments had qualified for the November ballot, including one intended to strip Republican elected officials of their control over drawing legislative districts.

The amendments are sponsored by Reform Ohio Now, a coalition dominated by Democrats, unions and watchdog groups. It celebrated the announcement and said a statewide campaign to win approval in November had begun.

"It's not like we're posting yard signs yet, but we're close to that," the campaign manager of Reform Ohio Now, Scarlett Bauder, said. "Right now the time is ripe for reform."

The State Supreme Court rejected last month a Republican-backed move to disqualify the measures, but a second suit by a former Republican state senator is to be heard tomorrow in an appeals court in Columbus.

The former senator, Richard H. Finan, wants the amendments declared invalid because Secretary of State J. Kenneth Blackwell allowed Reform Ohio Now to use out-of-state signature gatherers.

Mr. Finan has said the redistricting measure, if approved, could cost Republicans in Ohio 6 of their 12 seats in Congress and would probably inspire similar Democratic-backed efforts in other states dominated by Republicans.

A spokesman for the Ohio First Education Fund, a group founded by Mr. Finan, said Republicans were moving forward with fund-raising in case they lost the court battle.

The spokesman, David L. Hopcraft, said the campaign was drawing money from outside the state because of Ohio's significance as a swing state in presidential elections, though he did not give specific dollar amounts.

"If the issues make it to the ballot," Mr. Hopcraft said, "we will have a vigorous campaign that speaks to the ballot-box power of every Ohioan, which we think is clearly threatened under these amendments."

DOJ_NMG_0003510

"These issues," he added, "are being backed by people who did not like the results of the last election and want to nullify Ohio's vote."

Ms. Bauder said Reform Ohio Now, which has raised $1.2 million, had enemies on both sides of the aisle.

"To me, that says it is true reform, because people in both parties don't like it," she said.

Mr. Blackwell, a Republican, has said that the signature gatherers acted legally, but that Attorney General Jim Petro, also a Republican, had sided with Mr. Finan in the court case.

"Ohio law clearly says the right to petition our state government in this manner belongs solely to the citizens of Ohio," Mr. Petro said in filing court papers last week.

The secretary of state's office said Reform Ohio Now had collected 353,094 valid signatures, 30,000 more than required. A spokesman, Carlo LoParo, said the amendments were submitted as a package but would appear as four separate ballot measures.

The redistricting amendment calls for an independent commission that would replace state lawmakers in determining the boundaries of legislative districts. The other amendments would lower some campaign contribution limits, extend early voting to all voters and transfer oversight of elections to an appointed election master from the secretary of state's office.

ANTITRUST:

Unipol Gets Antitrust OK For BNL Bank (BOS)

The Boston Globe, September 7, 2005

MILAN, Italy --Unipol Assicurazioni SpA said Tuesday it had received the necessary antitrust regulator authorization for its $6.12 billion bid to take over Banca Nazionale del Lavoro SpA.

The bid is pending approval by insurance regulator Isvap and the Bank of Italy.

Italy's market watchdog Consob approved Unipol's prospectus last week but asked the insurer for further information regarding the nature of the agreements with Deutsche Bank.

The German bank has a call option on nearly 5 percent of BNL but is not a member of the shareholder pact led by Unipol that is launching the takeover bid for the Rome-based bank.

Unipol filed the final version of a 400-page document with conditions for its BNL bid to Consob on Friday.

Unipol's all-cash offer to acquire the 59 percent of BNL that it doesn't already own has torpedoed a rival all-share offer from Spain's Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria SA which ended unsuccessfully in July.

Endesa Rejects Gas Natural's Bid (WSJ)

By Keith Johnson and Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

Spanish power utility Endesa SA rejected the unsolicited bid of €22.55 billion ($28.27 billion) from Gas Natural SDG SA, a smaller natural-gas company, setting the stage for a hard-fought takeover battle as the European energy industry undergoes a bout of frantic consolidation.

After huddling for most of the day in Madrid, Endesa's board advised its shareholders against accepting the Gas Natural offer, calling it "hostile" and saying the price "does not reflect the real value of the company."

The Endesa board appointed three investment banks -- J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., Deutsche Bank AG and Citigroup Inc. -- to help it craft its takeover defense, according to people familiar with the matter.

"It was in the script," Gas Natural Chief Executive Rafael Villaseca said in an interview, shrugging off Endesa's negative response to the bid. "In any event, it will be up to the shareholders to decide, and business logic will end up prevailing."

Based on Monday's prices, Gas Natural's cash-and-stock offer values Endesa at €21.30 ($26.70) a share. Endesa's American depositary receipts were up $2.46, or 11%, at $25.75 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading. In Madrid, Gas Natural shares fell 2.2% to close at €24.24.

A flurry of deal making is taking place in the European energy sector. Last month, France's Suez SA moved to acquire the 49.9% of Belgian power utility Electrabel SA it doesn't own. On Monday, Germany's E.On AG said it was considering a takeover bid for ScottishPower PLC, the United Kingdom's fifth-largest power producer. And France is preparing to sell shares in its former power monopoly, Electricité de France SA, to public investors this fall, following the initial public offering of natural-gas provider Gaz de France SA this summer. (See related article.)

The intense activity is being spurred by both the European Union-mandated liberalization of the continent's energy markets and volatile commodity prices, industry executives and analysts said.

Until recently, most European energy utilities enjoyed dominant positions in their home countries and captive clients. Sheltered from market vagaries, they could pass on higher production prices to their consumers.

But the EU has begun opening its power and gas markets to competition in staggered phases, first to corporate and then to residential clients. EU members must fully open their power markets to competition by July 2007 and their natural-gas markets by the end of 2008. As these deadlines approach, European energy utilities are seeking more size, a pan-European presence and a more balanced energy-generation portfolio.

In the past year, they also have had to contend with a volatile market for oil and natural gas, which have reached record prices, driving up their costs of producing electricity.

The combination of these factors has pushed some companies to seek vertical integration by controlling their own supply of raw materials -- a main rationale behind Gas Natural's bid. Gas Natural hopes to use its plentiful supply of natural gas to power Endesa's gas-fired turbines, which produce cheaper and environmentally cleaner electricity than older coal-fired plants.

"Some utilities that have been squeezed by commodity prices on the one hand and by consumers and regulators at the other end are beginning to think they should move upstream, to capture a greater share of the energy value-chain margin," said Vittorio Perona, head of the power and natural-resources corporate-finance division at Dresdner Kleinwort Wasserstein.

Gas Natural, based in Barcelona, Spain, outlined details of its offer yesterday, arguing that it would spur competition to the benefit of consumers in Spain, while creating a strong "national champion" able to compete with other European energy titans when the continent's power markets are fully liberalized.

"The only possible solution" to growing energy demand in Europe is "more gas-fired plants," Mr. Villaseca said. "And that means utilities have to have a flexible and available supply of natural gas."

Rival Spanish utility Union Fenosa SA is following a similar strategy by teaming up with Italian oil-and-gas titan ENI SpA to build liquefication and regassification plants that will bring natural gas from Egypt to Spain by ship to power its turbines at a competitive price. In Germany, E.On relies on its E.On Ruhrgas unit to supply it with natural gas to power its turbines.

In the near term, the strategy carries financial risks. Credit concern Standard & Poor's Ratings Group placed Gas Natural and Endesa on review with a negative outlook yesterday, citing the increased debt load that the combined company would carry if the deal were successful. Gas Natural also must convince Spanish regulators that a merged company wouldn't have too dominant a position in Spain.

Gas Natural said it expects the deal to pass muster thanks to a pre-agreed selloff of some of Endesa's generation assets to a Spanish rival, Iberdrola, under a deal reached with Iberdrola.

The takeover offer sparked a rally in the shares of European utilities yesterday. The DJ Stoxx utilities index rose 1.5%.

Endesa's advisers are trying to determine whether other utilities could emerge as counterbidders. Any foreign bidder, though, risks entering a highly political dogfight.

Court Cases Don't Scare Music File Swappers Away (USAT)

By Jefferson Graham

USA Today, September 7, 2005

Despite two huge court losses for file-sharing firms, unauthorized online song and movie swapping is at an all-time peak, says Internet measurement company BigChampagne.

“File sharing has never been more popular than it is now,” says BigChampagne CEO Eric Garland. “People have heard all the legal threats and admonitions, but that's not enough. They don't believe it.”

He says about 9.6 million people were logged onto sharing networks at any one time in August, up from 6.8 million the year before.

The recording industry has filed 14,000 copyright infringement lawsuits against song swappers in the last two years, at a time when more than 1 billion songs have been offered for trading each month on services such as Kazaa and eDonkey. The industry has also looked to the courts for relief.

On Monday, an Australian federal court judge ruled that Sharman Networks, Kazaa's parent firm, must install filters to prevent its software from being used for unauthorized sharing.

The ruling followed a U.S. Supreme Court decision in June that said software firms Grokster and StreamCast Networks, which operates the Morpheus service, could be held liable for their users' actions.

The Supreme Court decision hasn't curbed online swapping, and neither will the Australian court ruling, says Phil Leigh, an analyst at research firm Inside Digital Media. “A lot of college students still don't feel vulnerable at all,” Leigh says.

The Australian decision is only enforceable there. Kazaa, meanwhile, is a global product whose popularity already had faded.

DOJ_NMG_0003512

Once the most-used sharing software, it has been in steady decline. According to Internet research firm CacheLogic, Kazaa's market share tumbled to 9% in July from 24% a year earlier. Currently, eDonkey is the most popular sharing software, with a 50% market share, CacheLogic says.

Kazaa is bloated with too much backdoor, spyware-type advertising, Garland says. “People went elsewhere. A judgment might have been more meaningful a few years ago, when Kazaa was more popular.”

Recording Industry Association of America CEO Mitch Bainwol said he is pleased with the Kazaa decision, which “reflects a growing, international chorus: Those who promote theft can be held accountable no matter how they may attempt to escape responsibility.”

Garland says the industry should spend less time fighting the online pirates and more time turning them into paying customers.

Legitimate online music stores have taken off since Apple's popular iTunes site made its debut. But Garland says Apple and competitors Napster, RealNetworks and others could sell even more if they made their songs compatible with each other's systems.

Songs purchased at iTunes can't be transferred to non-Apple digital music players without some workarounds, and vice versa with songs from Napster. “The incompatibility is a nightmare for consumers,” Garland says.

Refiners' Merger Good For Business, Not Consumers (WP)

Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

Last week, as supply shortages sent the price of a gallon of gasoline as high as $6 in some markets, federal officials charged with protecting consumers quietly approved yet another oil industry merger, this one creating the nation's largest oil refiner.

Because of the rush of Katrina news, the merger earned hardly a mention in the general press. And yet by giving its blessing to Valero's $8 billion purchase of Premcor, the Federal Trade Commission not only reinforced its reputation as a patsy for the energy industry but demonstrated a stunning lack of political sensitivity.

Although the FTC and its staff never seem to make the link between industry consolidation, rising energy prices and record profits, Wall Street investors surely can. Over the past year, shares in Valero are up 226 percent, which, as the Financial Times pointed out last week, makes Google (only 186 percent) look like a laggard.

Listen to what Valero's chief executive, Bill Greehey, had to say Thursday in announcing that the deal had closed: "We are in a new era for refining where I believe you will continue to see higher highs and higher lows for both product margins and sour crude discounts. And now, with 18 refineries, no one is better positioned to benefit from this than Valero."

Translation: This deal will do nothing for consumers, but it's a home run for investors.

Here's the situation, as far as I can make it out. Refineries in the United States produce about 18 million barrels of refined product a day for an economy that consumes about 21 million. A completely new refinery hasn't been built in this country in nearly 40 years. And although Valero and others have spent $47 billion over the past decade to expand existing capacity by 13 percent, demand has grown even faster.

The reason that supply has not kept up in this industry, as in others, is simple: The industry makes more money that way. And one way the industry is better able to enforce this gentleman's agreement against investing too heavily in new capacity is by reducing the number of players and making entry into the industry even more difficult than it is already.

The FTC uses a different analysis. Its staff finds no evidence that this merger -- or any of the dozens of others they have approved -- gives the acquiring companies the power to raise prices. After all, even with this latest refinery deal, no company controls more than 13 percent of the national market nor more than 20 percent in any region.

But that analysis misses the point. As long as the industry can coordinate its investments, keep supplies tight and free-ride on OPEC price fixing, there is no need to unilaterally raise prices. In the mismatch of supply and demand, the "free" market does it for them.

The industry likes to explain away the lack of adequate refining capacity by arguing that government regulation makes building a refinery virtually impossible. The last time we heard the "government regulation" excuse, it was from Vice President Cheney during the California energy crisis. It turned out our energy-maven vice president didn't know what he was talking about, and that the real reason for skyrocketing prices was that Enron and the others were secretly manipulating the market by strategically withholding supply.

In the case of oil refineries, there's no doubt that, given voters' natural antipathy to having a refinery in the neighborhood, finding a new site requires much time, money and patience. But when President Bush floated the idea last year of speeding site approval by locating new refineries on inactive military bases, Valero's chief operating officer declared he wasn't interested. When you look at industry rates of return, he told The Post's Justin Blum, it's just not worth it.

DOJ_NMG_0003513

This is the oil industry's other Big Lie. Every year, Fortune Magazine, in its Fortune 500 issue, calculates the rate of return on shareholder equity for each major industry. Last year, when oil prices were a lot lower than they are now, the average return for both independent refiners and integrated majors was 23.9 percent. This year, it's been even higher. And over the past decade, according to Fortune, the return on equity in the sector has averaged 16 percent, well above the investment hurdle rates in most other sectors of the economy.

Valero is a great company and a real success story. Since 1997, it has bought up lots of lousy refineries, fixed them up and run them right -- in the process adding the equivalent of two refineries' worth of new capacity. Essentially, it has put the lie to the self-serving complaint from the integrated majors that there was no money to be made from refining and from other downstream operations.

But what the country needs isn't a bigger Valero -- it's more Valeros, challenging the majors, investing heavily in new capacity and competing for market share. By approving the merger with Premcor, the FTC has reduced the chance of having that kind of full-throttle competition in an industry that desperately needs it.

Steven Pearlstein will host a web discussion at 11 a.m. today athttp://washingtonpost.com. He can be reached atpearlsteins@washpost.com.

ENVIRONMENT:

E.P.A. To Bar Data From Pesticide Studies Involving Children And Pregnant Women (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6 - Researchers will no longer be allowed to include children and pregnant women in studies examining the effects of pesticides to help set federal standards, according to the first regulations for human testing of pesticides that the Environmental Protection Agency plans to propose.

The regulations, to be proposed on Wednesday, would also establish an independent oversight panel to ensure that all studies submitted to the agency were conducted ethically and followed internationally accepted protocols for human testing.

Agency officials discussed the new regulations with reporters on Tuesday. They declined to make copies of the proposal available, leading at least one major critic of the agency, Senator Barbara Boxer, Democrat of California, to suggest that a close examination of the regulations might reveal weaknesses identified in an earlier version. Agency officials said those weaknesses were removed from a draft sent to the Office of Management and Budget last month.

In a statement, Senator Boxer said of the proposal: "One thing is clear. It must be changed dramatically from the version E.P.A. forwarded to O.M.B. just a few weeks ago. If not, it will be a direct attack on our most vulnerable citizens."

The proposed regulations, which would take effect in January after a public comment period, came several months after Congress put restrictions on human pesticide tests as part of an appropriations bill. Congressional concern grew after reports that parents in Florida would be paid to participate in a program, known as Cheers, by allowing their children to be tested to measure household exposure to pesticides.

"This proposed rule contains some of the strongest protections for human subjects ever proposed by the federal government," Jim Jones, director of pesticide programs for the agency, said Tuesday in a conference call with reporters.

Mr. Jones said the agency was so alarmed by public anger over pesticide testing involving humans that the new protocols would bar the agency from considering any tests that include pregnant women and children.

He also said the proposed regulations would apply to the 22 toxicity tests involving humans that are now before the agency. Two of them included children, though none involved pregnant women, Mr. Jones said.

Environmental groups expressed worry that the agency might blur the lines between past and future tests.

"This is a huge problem if they are going to accept studies already done," said Erik D. Olson, a senior lawyer with the Natural Resources Defense Council. "Dozens of past unethical studies are now before the E.P.A. If they accept them, the new rules are plainly inadequate."

The leading trade organization for pesticide manufacturers, CropLife America, defended its testing practices, saying its members have always worked to ensure the safety of participants.

At the same time, the group's president, Jay Vroom, welcomed the new E.P.A. regulations, saying they "have the potential to establish ethical and scientific safeguards and uniform standards to protect research subjects and improve the risk assessment process."

DOJ_NMG_0003514

Mr. Vroom also said future tests would "only involve healthy adult volunteers and exclude pregnant women."

In most cases, the tests are conducted by chemical manufacturers and the results submitted to the E.P.A. as part of a chemical's approval process. But critics in recent years have questioned the effectiveness of a system in which the companies have an enormous financial interest in winning approval.

Mr. Jones said an oversight panel to review tests involving pesticides would include medical ethicists and experts in chemical tests and would exclude anyone with connections to the agency or chemical companies.

National Parks Grapple With Surge Of Illegal Off-road Vehicles (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, September 7, 2005

The Big Cypress National Preserve in Florida is crisscrossed with so many illegal swamp-buggy ruts - more than 23,000 miles of them - that park officials in August began limiting off-road vehicles to 400 miles of trails in order to protect the Florida panther and the preserve.

In Yosemite National Park, off-road vehicles are involved in "numerous" violations, according to a staffer's memo.

And each day of a long summer weekend like Labor Day, as many as 2,200 motorized vehicles hit the beaches of Cape Hatteras National Seashore in North Carolina. "Not one of those is there legally," says Don Barger, southeastern regional director of the National Parks Conservation Association, a watchdog group.

In all, unauthorized off-road vehicles are buzzing through nearly one-third of America's national parks, according to a recently released internal National Park Service (NPS) survey. In one-fifth of the parks, they have damaged natural environments that by law must be preserved for future generations. Preservation vs. recreation

The survey highlights a conundrum for the park service. It has gone to bat for broader access for motorized off-road vehicles - including snowmobiles in Yellowstone National Park. At least 29 of its parks have allowed illegal off-road vehicles. On the other hand, in some cases, the parks are prohibited from doing so by their authorizing legislation; in other cases, they haven't conducted required environmental impact evaluations of the vehicles, according to a legal analysis by Bluewater Network, an environmental group in San Francisco.

In March, the NPS convened a workshop of rangers and other park officials to develop a "national strategy" for dealing with the problem, according to a senior park official.

NPS officials downplay the challenge.

"Some of the illegal use is very infrequent. Some of it is crossing boundaries that may not be well marked," says Jerry Case, the service's regulations program manager. "We're certainly working on it. [But] there are probably just a handful [of parks] that have significant illegal use causing significant environmental damage."

The Cape Hatteras seashore is one facility that until recently had not conducted the required legal reviews to allow off-road vehicles, though it is doing so now.

"We certainly recognize that some [facilities] need to get back in line with the executive order and regulations, but for the most part I think we're doing all right," Mr. Case says. Tracking illegal vehicles

Other branches of the Department of Interior, however, say illegal motorized vehicles are a serious national problem. The chief of the National Forest Service, for instance, has called it one of his top four management problems.

An Interior Department spokesman told Congress in July that 43 of the nation's federal "park units" allow snowmobiles, 25 allow off-road vehicles, and nine allow personal watercraft.

But he made no mention of any problem with the illegal vehicles highlighted by the internal survey.

Critics say the problem is acute and growing, even if not yet felt uniformly. "The pressure to increase these kinds of uses in national parks is constantly increasing," Mr. Barger says. "Our park lands are becoming more and more like isolated islands, with the demands for their use from everybody."

At least 113 of the nation's 388 park units report illegal off-road vehicles, the internal survey showed, and 85 of those report that the vehicles have caused environmental or other damage. Striking as those results are, they may understate the scope of the problem, says Sean Smith, public lands director for Bluewater Network. Only 273 of the 388 park units had responded to the survey. Parks like Yellowstone, Acadia, and Shenandoah National Parks had not responded. Trampling on protected lands

There are signs of movement. Sections of Cape Hatteras were closed this summer to limit damage to nesting piping plover. The tiny shorebird's chicks are often trapped in the ruts left on the beach by off-road vehicles and run over.

But in the survey, many parks reported they lacked the staff or funding needed to chase down the illegal vehicles, says Bluewater's counsel Robert Rosenbaum of the law firm Arnold & Porter in Washington.

"Operators are rarely caught due to staffing limitations," wrote a park official in the survey from Arches National Park and Canyon lands National Park in Utah, cited in a June letter by Blue water to the Park Service. "There are a number of locations where off-road travel has destroyed microbiotic soil crust, destroyed desert vegetations, crushed animal burrows ... impacts that may last for years."

Although Yellowstone National Park was not part of the survey results, a now infamous example occurred in 2003 when two men on off-road vehicles damaged Lone Star Geyser by driving around its cone and in surrounding meadows, according to park reports. Just last year, other illegal drivers cornered a herd of bison in a stand of trees at the park.

"To allow that kind of thing just because a set of recreational users want to take snowmobiles and whatever else into Yellowstone is crazy," says Bill Wade, a former superintendent of Shenandoah National Park, now a spokesman for the Coalition of National Park Service Retirees, a watchdog group based in Tucson, Ariz.

"It's like me saying that because I like skeet-shooting, I should be able to do that in the Sistine Chapel," he says. "There are some places with such high degree of reverence [vehicles] just should not be allowed."

Bonilla Bill Targets Eminent Domain (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, September 7, 2005

Any local or state government that employs the right of eminent domain to transfer property from one private owner to another would be denied funding for all federal programs under legislation written by Rep. Henry Bonilla (R-Texas).

Agriculture Committee Chairman Bob Goodlatte (R-Va.) characterized the legislation as the strongest response yet to the Supreme Court's June ruling in Kelo v. City of New London, Conn., which affirmed governments' rights to seize property from landowners for private development deemed by elected officials to be in the community interest. The Agriculture Committee, which will hold a hearing on the Bonilla bill today, has been given primary jurisdiction on the issue.

The Supreme Court's decision has generated a backlash from conservatives and liberals alike. Bonilla boasts several Democratic co-sponsors, including Rep. Stephanie Herseth (S.D.) and Agriculture Committee ranking member Collin Peterson (Minn.).

The House Judiciary Committee plans action on less sweeping legislation.

Let Nature Help (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

The catastrophe that devastated New Orleans has been centuries in the making. Since its founding in 1718, the city has lain uneasily between two watery and potentially lethal boundaries: Lake Pontchartrain to the north and the Mississippi River to the south.

Engineers have protected the city over the years by fortifying the earthen barriers between high water and low land. New Orleans' efforts to keep dry also sank it lower — a process called subsidence, caused when groundwater is pumped regularly out of silty soil. At the same time, the levees and canals around New Orleans diverted the flow of river sediment, dumping it in the Gulf of Mexico instead of allowing it to spread to the protective marshes and islands at the river's mouth.

In 1965, Hurricane Betsy brought a heavy hint of the dangers when a surge of storm water caused Lake Pontchartrain to overflow the levees, flooding large parts of the city. But that flood pales in comparison to the devastation of Hurricane Katrina's water surge, which caused a series of levee breaks that allowed the lake water to fill the bowl that is greater New Orleans.

For the next several weeks, and possibly months, the Army Corps of Engineers will pump the water out. Meanwhile the Corps, Congress and the Bush administration need to figure out how to avoid a repeat of last week's disaster. Clearly, if they plant the 1.3 million residents back in the bowl, after billions of dollars spent on cleanup and rebuilding, they'll need to devise better protection.

After Hurricane Betsy, Congress authorized a $732-million effort to raise the levees around the city to 16 feet. After a flood in 1995 claimed six lives, lawmakers authorized an equally ambitious venture to refortify the city's slowly sinking defenses. Finishing these projects took a back seat during the last few years to war and homeland security. Even if they are now fast-tracked to completion, they aren't enough to guarantee New Orleans protection against another Katrina-strength storm. Other nations — most notably the Netherlands — have engineered stronger, smarter levees and other coastal defenses, such as floodgates and raised shelters.

Devastating hurricanes are more likely in coming years. Warmer ocean surface temperatures, no matter what their cause, fuel more violent hurricanes, which derive their power from the water's heat.

One of the most effective shore defenses has been not only ignored but undermined. Barrier islands and the marshes of the Mississippi River Delta used to present hurricanes with a formidable land barrier to cross before reaching New Orleans. But the very levees and canals that protect New Orleans and provide navigation divert replenishing sediment. Louisiana loses about 24 square miles of this land barrier each year.

DOJ_NMG_0003516

A plan backed by environmentalists, industry and the Corps of Engineers would spend $2 billion to dredge sediment from the Gulf to be used in rebuilding the land, and divert some river sediment toward the marshland. Congress should not only approve that project but should start giving serious consideration to the rest of a $14-billion coastal restoration project supported by 11 state and federal agencies.

Funding environmental projects isn't just a luxury that makes tree-huggers happy. It's a natural way to protect people and a bargain compared with the economic and human toll exacted by Katrina.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Medical Marijuana No Influence On Teen Use (UPI)

By TODD ZWILLICH

United Press International, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6 (UPI) -- Teens in the handful of states allowing medical marijuana are no more likely to use the drug than those in other states, according to a study released Tuesday.

The study shows widespread reductions in marijuana use have occurred generally at the same rate among all the states, including those allowing medical use.

The study was funded and released by the Marijuana Policy Project, a group backing medical-marijuana efforts nationwide. The group said its findings belie Bush administration claims that medical-marijuana laws send youth a mixed message that helps to encourage drug use.

Ten states currently allow patients with certain medical conditions to use marijuana under the supervision of a physician.

Overall, the United States has seen a decrease in marijuana's popularity among teenagers since 2000, after a prolonged increase in use during the 1990s. For example, compared with 1996, about 43 percent fewer 8th graders and 9 percent fewer 12th graders reported they had used the drug in the past 30 days in 2003.

California became the first state to permit medical-marijuana use in 1996.

At the same time, past-month use dropped by half among the state's 9th graders and by one-quarter among 11th graders, according to the report, which analyzed federal and state statistics. Approximately one-fifth of California's high school juniors now acknowledge using marijuana within the last month.

Other states with medical-marijuana laws also saw varying reductions in youth marijuana use. Past-month use by 12th graders in Washington state was down 32 percent since a medical-marijuana law was enacted in 1998, though rates dropped only 12 percent among Maine's high school seniors since a similar law was passed there in 1999.

Alaska, Colorado, Hawaii, Nevada and Oregon also allow some medical marijuana, and all showed some reductions in youth use since the laws were passed. Montana and Vermont have enacted similar laws, but they did so too recently to detect any trends, the researchers said.

Several other states are considering measures allowing the use of marijuana by patients, backed by some evidence the drug can ease a variety of health problems, including pain, nausea and weight loss caused by cancer, as well as AIDS and glaucoma.

Bush administration drug officials have consistently fought the laws, stressing that such measures undermine efforts to persuade youth that marijuana is a dangerous drug.

"Contrary to the fears expressed by opponents of medical-marijuana laws, there is no evidence that the enactment of 10 state medical-marijuana laws has produced an increase in adolescent marijuana use in those states or nationwide," the MPP study concluded. "Opponents of medical marijuana laws should cease making such unsubstantiated claims."

Mitch Earleywine, one of the study's investigators, told United Press International the results show medical-marijuana laws have not stopped or slowed progress against illegal drug use in the eight states studied.

"Use is clearly decreasing regardless of medical marijuana laws," said Earleywine, an associate professor of psychology at the State University of New York at Albany.

Tom Riley, a spokesman for the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said in a statement that youth drug use has fallen largely because of increased perception among teens that drugs are dangerous.

"Misleading messages that harmful substances are somehow 'good for them' send teens exactly the wrong message," Riley said. His statement did not directly address the study's state-by-state findings.

Earlier this year the U.S. Supreme Court ruled federal anti-drug agencies have the right to enforce nationwide bans on marijuana, even in states that allow medical use. The ruling was seen as a victory for the Bush administration, but it did not prevent states from enacting new medical-marijuana measures.

Pot Use Down Where Medical Use OK (LAT)

By Eric Bailey, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

SACRAMENTO — Bucking dire predictions by anti-drug warriors, the 10 states that approved medical marijuana laws over the last decade have experienced sharp declines in cannabis use among teenagers, according to a new study by a marijuana advocacy group.

California has seen usage among ninth-graders drop 47% since 1996, the year the state became the nation's first to legalize medical marijuana. Over the same period, the nation as a whole experienced a 43% decline among eighth-graders.

The study, released today, is based on data from national and state surveys, which show a drop in marijuana use by teens.

Although debate over medical marijuana is often shaded by concerns about increasing drug abuse among young people, the report suggested the opposite has been true.

The study's authors were Mitch Earleywine, a State University of New York psychology professor, and Karen O'Keefe, a legislative analyst with Marijuana Policy Project, the organization that commissioned the research based on state and federal data.

That data "strongly suggests" that approval of medical marijuana has not increased recreational use of cannabis among adolescents, Earleywine and O'Keefe concluded. And the decline in many of the states with medical marijuana laws is "slightly more favorable" than trends nationwide, they said.

California, Washington and Colorado have all experienced greater drops in marijuana usage than have occurred nationwide. Only three states with medical marijuana laws — Maine, Oregon and Nevada — have lagged behind the national drop in teen marijuana use, the report said.

"If medical marijuana laws send the wrong message to children," the authors said, widespread attention to the debate "would be expected to produce a nationwide increase in marijuana use, the largest increase in those states enacting medical marijuana laws. But just the opposite has occurred."

Tom Riley, of the president's Office of National Drug Control Policy, said the drop in teen drug use across the nation is attributable to the federal anti-drug advertising campaign in recent years, including $125 million spent during the federal fiscal year that ends Oct. 1.

Medical marijuana has only clouded that pitch, he said.

"It's foolish to give kids a message that marijuana can be helpful to them," Riley said, adding that all Americans "should be glad that teen drug use is going down. If the drug legalizers are recognizing that, too, I think that says something."

But the researchers sketched a different hypothesis: that medical marijuana shifted the perception among some teens about pot.

"Perhaps medical marijuana laws send a very different message," they wrote. Teens may increasingly consider pot "a treatment for serious illness, not a toy, and requires cautious and careful handling."

The most extensive available data was in California, where a survey of about 6,000 students every two years showed that pot use among teens was climbing before passage of the 1996 medical marijuana law. For all grades, marijuana use dropped significantly between early 1996 and 2004, with the biggest downward shift among ninth-graders.

Between 1996 and 2004, the number of high school freshmen in the state who reported using pot in the last 30 days dropped 47%, while the number of freshmen who had tried cannabis at least once dropped 35%.

Jury's Still Out On Narcotic's Effects (BOSH)

By Dave Wedge

Boston Herald, September 7, 2005

Seen by many as a miracle cure for heroin addiction, the jury is still out on whether methadone can itself impair users or create a long-term dependency.

``There still appears to be some controversy about it," said Jim Ross, a counselor at Taunton's Community Partnerships, which specializes in helping heroin addicts. ``Although it is supposedly not addictive, we've seen firsthand some people do not use it as a stepping stone (toward recovery) and they end up being dependent on methadone their whole life. And that could be a good or a bad thing."

The White House Drug Policy Information Clearinghouse supports methadone programs, saying the drug ``does not impair cognitive functions" and ``is not sedating or intoxicating." The federal clearinghouse also says the drug does not ``interfere with ordinary activities such as driving a car or operating machinery."

DOJ_NMG_0003518

Originally created by German pharmaceutical companies during World War II, methadone was first marketed as ``dolophine'' and was used as a painkiller. Today, it is prescribed by doctors and usually dispensed at clinics at levels that are supposed to quash heroin cravings but not impair or intoxicate.

But studies by scientists in New Zealand have found that methadone's effects can include pain relief, feeling of well being, nausea, vomiting, dilated pupils, body temperature drops and slowing pulse and blood pressure. Some European scientists claim methadone can affect motor skills, while doctors in Amsterdam have found it can be addictive, just like heroin, and can cause dangerous respiratory problems, constipation, sedation and vertigo.

In addition to possible side effects, Ross said addicts sometimes stockpile methadone to sell.

``Methadone has been a great saving grace for many heroin addicts,'' he said. ``We need to be as supportive as we can to help addicts, but sometimes we need to ask questions to assure we're taking care of public safety as well.''

Truck Driver Pleads Guilty To Trafficking (LUFNEWS)

By ASHLEY COOK, The Lufkin Daily News

Lufkin (TX) Daily News, September 7, 2005

A tractor-trailer driver pleaded guilty Friday in federal court to trafficking close to $3 million in drug money through Nacogdoches County, according to plea papers filed in court.

Juan A. Castanon, 34, of Mission, Texas, could face up to five years in federal prison on the charge. Details of his plea agreement with the U.S. Attorney's Office remained sealed in court documents.

Texas Department of Public Safety Trooper Ryan Koonce found the stash of cocaine-tainted cash during a Feb. 8 traffic stop. The money was hidden in a secret compartment in Castanon's trailer.

A drug-sniffing dog alerted Koonce to the bundled and wrapped money, which later tested positive for traces of cocaine.

Koonce became suspicious of Castanon when his log book didn't match his story. He'd driven the trailer, rented from Guiterrez Trucking in Donna, Texas, from Atlanta toward Mission.

The cash was forfeited to the government by court order. By law, the government must run an advertisement in the local newspaper, The (Nacogdoches) Daily Sentinel, giving the public an opportunity to file any claims to the money.

Mexico's Fox To Border Drug Lords: Who's Tougher? (REU)

Reuters, September 7, 2005

ZACATECAS, Mexico, Sept 6 (Reuters) - Mexican President Vicente Fox challenged drug barons on Tuesday to take on security forces in a notorious city on the U.S. border where troops and police are locked in a war with traffickers.

Fox said in an interview that federal forces were in control of Nuevo Laredo, across from Laredo, Texas, despite more than 100 drug-related murders there this year.

"We are going to win this battle. We'll see who is tougher, we'll see who is more stubborn," he told Reuters during a visit to the central state of Zacatecas.

The explosion of violence among drug gangs vying for control of a cocaine, heroin and marijuana smuggling route into the United States has drawn an influx of Mexican troops to Nuevo Laredo and strained relations with Washington.

The murder rate has soared with killings practically every day, and residential neighborhoods have seen shootouts with heavy weaponry, at one point prompting the U.S. Embassy to close a consulate in Nuevo Laredo.

But Fox said his government has taken control of the sweltering city, which also is a hub for legitimate trade.

"Nuevo Laredo now has much less criminal activity from these kingpins than it did two months ago," he said. "I can tell you that we have the city under control and from there we will put things in order."

But as the death toll rises, with 15 police officers among those killed by gunmen this year, residents and local activists are skeptical about authorities' ability to stem the tide of violence. Critics say very few cartel henchmen have been put behind bars and there is no evidence the tighter security will curb the flow of drugs across the border.

Nuevo Laredo is the most urgent front in the fight against drug gangs, but Fox said his government also has stepped up law enforcement in the Pacific state of Guerrero and in Tijuana, Ciudad Juarez and Sinaloa state near the U.S. border, places where drug-related violence also seems to be rising.

His proposed spending plan for next year, which was sent to Congress late on Monday, calls for a 20 percent increase in federal funding to fight organized crime, he said.

U.S. officials also have sought to crackdown on drug smugglers. Texas recently allocated $5 million to improve law enforcement communication in border communities.

But the violence has caused diplomatic fallout. Washington has repeatedly warned U.S. citizens against traveling in the region and urged Mexico to restore order. Mexico has told U.S. officials to keep out of its affairs.

DOJ_NMG_0003519

Spain Tops Table Of Cocaine Use (GUARDIAN)

By Giles Tremlett

Guardian (UK), September 7, 2005

Spaniards are the most prolific users of cocaine in the world, according to a report from state prosecutors obtained by El País newspaper yesterday.

Spain has overtaken the US and left Britain and Ireland behind, with the proportion of people who use the drug rising to more than one in 40. "Spain occupies the top place in the world," the report said, citing United Nations figures on cocaine use around the globe.

Article continues

The reason for such a high rate in Spain is that much of Europe's cocaine is unloaded on to Spanish beaches.

Last year 33 tonnes of it were seized by Spanish police, much of it being handled by the smuggling clans in the north-western region of Galicia who turned to the lucrative cocaine trade more than 10 years ago. The smugglers offer their services to traffickers from around the world who want to get the drug into Europe.

Often cocaine is unloaded from merchant ships into trawlers and then, once near the Spanish coast and under the cover of darkness, into speedboats that land it on Galicia's rugged beaches. The Galician smugglers store it then hand it back to the traffickers. They take a cut of the cocaine as payment.

More than 50% of cocaine found by police in Europe is discovered by Spanish officers, who arrested about 600 suspected traffickers from Colombia last year, and 150 from Britain.

Spanish police were also reported yesterday to have been behind the discovery of 4.6 tonnes of cocaine unloaded in Rotterdam at the weekend.

TAX:

U.S. Expects To Indict At Least 12 More Over KPMG Shelters (WSJ)

By Jonathan Weil and Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

NEW YORK -- The lead prosecutor in the KPMG LLP tax-shelter investigation said the government expects to seek indictments against at least 12 more individuals in the coming weeks, on top of the nine people who were arraigned yesterday in a federal court in Manhattan.

The additional defendants will be named as part of a superseding indictment and could include additional charges against the nine people whose bond requirements were set yesterday by U.S. District Judge Lewis A. Kaplan. The government's lead prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Justin Weddle, said the additional charges in the superseding indictment likely would include obstruction of justice, as well as tax evasion, in addition to the existing conspiracy count that the government unsealed last week.

Prosecutors didn't identify who the additional defendants might be. Possibilities include additional former KPMG partners, as well as others outside the firm who were involved in the sale or use of four shelters that KPMG sold to hundreds of wealthy Americans from 1996 to 2002. The shelters went by the names Blips, Flip, Opis and Short Option Strategy.

At yesterday's arraignment hearing, Mr. Weddle said the government believed that some of the nine defendants already named in the case used allegedly fraudulent KPMG shelters to shave their own personal tax bills.

He also said tax-evasion charges would be sought against some defendants who allegedly helped KPMG clients evade taxes by creating and marketing the shelters.

Prosecutors asked for three months to seek the superseding indictment, citing Justice Department procedures for tax-fraud prosecutions. In denying the government's request, Judge Kaplan said, "You're going to have to move a lot faster. It's not clear to me why you can't." He added, "Multibillion-dollar takeovers get litigated in that time. You can do it." The judge set an Oct. 17 deadline for the government to file its superseding indictment and scheduled trial proceedings to begin May 1, 2006.

Prosecutors estimated that a trial of the nine people arraigned yesterday could take three months.

At the same time, Judge Kaplan said that the "chances of having a single trial" for more than 20 defendants "are not too great." Some of the defense lawyers at yesterday's hearing, including a lawyer for former KPMG Deputy Chairman Jeffrey Stein, said they believed the case should be broken up into different groups of defendants for multiple trials.

Of the nine defendants arraigned yesterday, eight are former KPMG tax professionals, including Mr. Stein. Other defendants include former KPMG Vice Chairmen Richard Smith and John Lanning, and Raymond J. Ruble, a former New York partner at the law firm Sidley Austin Brown & Wood LLP.

DOJ_NMG_0003520

Under the terms of a $456 million settlement last month, KPMG admitted criminal wrongdoing in connection with past shelter sales, but it will not be criminally prosecuted so long as it complies with certain requirements, including continued cooperation with prosecutors.

The nine defendants were released yesterday on their personal recognizance and have two weeks to meet additional bond requirements. Judge Kaplan set Mr. Stein's bond at $3.5 million, the highest among the nine defendants.

Prosecutors described Mr. Stein as one of the leaders of the alleged conspiracy at KPMG to sell fraudulent tax shelters to wealthy Americans, and they had asked that his bond be set at $5 million. Among other things, prosecutors cited a severance payment of more than $9 million that they said Mr. Stein received from KPMG last year, after he had been notified that he was under criminal investigation. Mr. Stein's attorney said that KPMG, under pressure from the government, reduced the severance package; he declined to offer details.

Five of the defendants' bonds were set at $1 million each, while two others' bonds were set at $300,000 and $500,000, respectively. Mr. Smith's bond was set at $1.5 million; his bond must be co-signed by his wife and secured by their home and any real estate his wife owns. All nine defendants must surrender their passports.

In setting the May 1, 2006, trial date, Judge Kaplan warned Mr. Weddle about his three-month trial estimate. "You're going to put the jury to sleep and lose them completely," he said. "The name of the game is to boil this down and move it."

US Sees More Defendants In KPMG Tax Case (REU)

By Martha Graybow

Reuters, September 7, 2005

NEW YORK (Reuters) - Eight former executives of accounting firm KPMG LLP and an outside tax lawyer pleaded not guilty in a tax shelter case on Tuesday, while a U.S. prosecutor said he expects charges to be brought against 12 or more additional defendants.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Justin Weddle also told Manhattan federal judge Lewis Kaplan at an arraignment hearing for the nine defendants currently in the case that additional counts were expected against some of them. Weddle said those charges, contained in a so-called superseding indictment, likely would relate to alleged tax evasion stemming from tax shelter transactions.

Weddle did not elaborate on the new defendants expected to be named in a revised indictment.

The nine current defendants, including former KPMG deputy chairman Jeffrey Stein, were indicted last week on charges of conspiring to defraud the government in connection with tax shelters KPMG sold to wealthy individuals. A conviction on the conspiracy charge carries a maximum prison term of five years for each defendant.

The defendants were released on personal recognizance bonds on Tuesday and agreed to travel restrictions.

The arraignments took place a week after KPMG agreed to pay $456 million to settle a three-year-long federal investigation of its sales of tax shelters, avoiding a criminal indictment that might have crippled the audit firm.

KPMG declined comment on Tuesday.

At the hearing, Weddle called Stein and former KPMG vice chairman Richard Smith "leaders of the fraud" and asked the judge to impose higher bail amounts on them as a condition of their release.

The judge ordered Stein to be released on a $3.5 million bond, while Smith was ordered to post a $1.5 million bond. The other defendants were released on bonds ranging from $300,000 to $1 million.

Prosecutors said they expect an updated indictment with new charges to be ready in about three months, but Judge Kaplan urged them to issue any new charges by October 17. He set a May 1, 2006 trial date.

The U.S. government said last week that KPMG made $115 million in fees in a conspiracy that spanned from 1996 to 2003. The accounting firm generated at least $11 billion in fraudulent tax losses for wealthy individuals and prevented the government from collecting $2.5 billion in tax receipts, the Justice Department said.

U.S. To Widen Inquiry Of KPMG Tax Shelters (NYT)

By Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

Federal prosecutors said yesterday that they planned to file new charges and name as many as a dozen new defendants in their investigation of questionable tax shelters sold by the accounting firm KPMG.

Prosecutors described the widening criminal investigation yesterday at the arraignment of nine former executives who were charged last month with conspiracy to devise and sell fraudulent tax shelters. The additional charges against the nine could include tax evasion and obstruction of justice for hindering aspects of the government's investigation of the tax shelters, prosecutors said.

The nine defendants, a former lawyer at Sidley Austin Brown & Wood and eight former partners at KPMG, pleaded not guilty.

The prosecutors' statements are a sign of the depth and breadth of the criminal investigation into the tax shelters, which were sold to about 350 people from 1996 to 2002 and cost the government at least $1.4 billion in unpaid taxes, according to Senate investigators. The investigators found that KPMG earned fees of $124 million on those sales; other financial institutions, including banks and law firms, had a role in the transactions.

KPMG reached a settlement agreement with the government late last month, acknowledging wrongdoing, agreeing to pay a $456 million penalty and accepting limits on the scope of its tax practice, among other restrictions.

"This is an ongoing investigation," Justin S. Weddle, an assistant United States attorney, told the presiding judge, Lewis A. Kaplan, in Federal District Court in Manhattan yesterday.

Lawyers for the nine defendants wrangled with prosecutors over their access to documents collected in the course of the government's investigation. Mr. Weddle told defense lawyers that prosecutors had gathered about 300 boxes from different firms, including Deutsche Bank, that were involved in the shelters. A spokeswoman for Deutsche Bank declined to comment on the investigation.

Prosecutors said they also had about 1,300 boxes of documents from the Internal Revenue Service, some gathered in the course of the agency's audit of KPMG itself and others in the course of investigating individual taxpayers who bought the questionable shelters, Mr. Weddle said.

For a moment the discussion of what evidence the government would provide to the defense lawyers appeared to verge on acrimony, leading Judge Kaplan to intervene.

"Everybody chill out," he advised the courtroom.

Lawyers also discussed the timing of the case, which Judge Kaplan scheduled for trial beginning May 1, 2006. Prosecutors initially told the judge that a new, or superseding, indictment, which would require approval from the tax division of the Justice Department in Washington, could require three months. The judge advised prosecutors to have the indictment ready instead by Oct. 17, and he told defense lawyers to file motions relating to the current indictment by Nov. 14. One lawyer said he planned to object to the entire charge; another said he planned to try to sever his client's case from the other defendants'.

The proceedings yesterday offered a hint of how unwieldy the case against the nine executives, let alone against as many as 21 possible defendants, could be. Defense lawyers had to take chairs from the spectators' gallery of the courtroom, and the defendants were directed to seats normally reserved for members of a jury. Judge Kaplan's clerk asked only once how each defendant pleaded, guilty or not guilty, and each defendant's lawyer stood to respond. The arraignment took more than an hour.

Judge Kaplan also showed a hint of testiness about the pace of the government's case, commenting that if prosecutors could spend a year and a half investigating before bringing one criminal charge, they should not need another three months to add any new charges or new defendants. He also warned prosecutors against lengthy proceedings. Prosecutors said they anticipated a three-month trial.

A complex case would confuse jurors and make it harder for them to convict, Judge Kaplan said. "The idea of a three- or four-month tax trial, well, it's a daunting prospect" for potential jurors, he added.

The judge also advised lawyers for both sides to prepare as clear a presentation for jurors as possible, using video presentations, for instance, and avoiding cumbersome binders full of copies of exhibits.

The individual defendants were released after the arraignment yesterday. The court required each to provide a bond of $300,000 to $3.5 million.

David Spears, a lawyer representing Jeffrey Stein, one of the former KPMG partners, filed a request with the court seeking bail in a "reasonable amount."

The filing also offered a preview of the arguments that Mr. Spears will probably make on Mr. Stein's behalf at the trial. The document states, "Mr. Stein relied on the hard work and advice of the tax experts who approved the strategies at issue and continues to have no reason to doubt the validity of the tax advice he ultimately provided."

The Squeezing Of Lawyer-Client Privilege (NYT)

By Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

In its agreement with the government that headed off an indictment, the accounting firm KPMG promised not to try to use "any claim of privilege" to keep information from prosecutors.

The pledge did not get much attention, perhaps because waiving the privilege that protects communications between a lawyer and client is now commonplace for corporate defendants.

DOJ_NMG_0003522

But the privilege has been weakened in other ways, too, as more individual defendants try to argue that their actions were blessed by a lawyer and that, as a result, they did not know they were doing anything wrong.

Some lawyers say they are worried that weakening the privilege will mean that clients will be less candid, making legal advice less reliable. Other lawyers counter that anyone advising a company, an executive or an individual will give better advice because of the possibility that the advice may someday become public. But all agree that the privilege today is much more negotiable than in years past.

"It's clear that there's this chill out there, that the privilege is vulnerable," said R. William Ide III, a lawyer at McKenna Long & Aldridge in Atlanta and also chairman of an American Bar Association committee on lawyer-client privilege. "We don't think it should be in play."

But powerful forces have put in play the privilege protecting communications, as well as the so-called work product privilege covering documents and other work by a lawyer in anticipation of litigation. Examples abound in recent years of lawyers providing evidence - in cases involving HealthSouth, Tyco, Credit Suisse First Boston, Enron and others. A recent bar association report notes that while it is difficult to determine how frequently companies are asked by regulators and prosecutors to waive the privilege, those interviewed by the committee said "these requests, backed by an express or implied threat of harsh treatment for refusing, have become increasingly common."

KPMG provides a case study. Former partners there who have been indicted on charges of tax shelter conspiracy want to tell jurors that they could have had no improper intent because they cleared all their actions with their lawyers. Lawyers will also be useful sources of evidence because of their involvement in the transactions - an increasingly common fact of life, as transactions become ever more complicated and lawyers become essential guides.

"This is something where lawyers were all over it," Stanley Arkin, who is defending Jeffrey Eischeid, one of the former KPMG partners facing a criminal charge, said in an interview last week. If lawyers approved the tax shelter transactions at issue in the KPMG investigation, he said, then people like his client did not know they were doing anything wrong, which would mean they did not break the law. Mr. Arkin said he expected to call the lawyers who approved the shelters to testify.

"Even if in retrospect these shelters are something that was inappropriate, did someone at the time they were doing this think they were engaging in some kind of crime?" he asked.

Michael Ramsey, who represents Kenneth L. Lay, the former chief executive of Enron, said he expected testimony from former Enron lawyers to figure prominently in his client's trial, expected to begin early next year.

"With the complexity of litigation growing more and more dense, if you will, we are seeing, and we will continue to see, executives who think they are doing the right thing because they consulted with counsel," Mr. Ramsey said.

KPMG had good reason to agree to waive its privilege to placate prosecutors weighing whether to indict the firm. In making the decision whether to indict, prosecutors consider whether a company has cooperated, and the government defines cooperation to include sharing information that may otherwise be protected by privilege. Under the terms of its agreement with the government, KPMG has also turned over documents and other information to investigators and made a strong statement acknowledging past wrongdoing.

Prosecutors say that they usually do not seek to learn what advice a lawyer provides to a client, but are trying only to learn the facts. In an interview in 2003, James B. Comey, a former United States attorney, said, "They are just seeking the facts, including factual attorney work product." Lawyers for former KPMG partners have already excoriated the firm's cooperation and, in particular, its acknowledgment of wrongdoing, contending that the firm did not undertake a thorough internal investigation to justify such a statement. (The statement is unlikely to be admitted in evidence in the criminal case against the former partners, though, lawyers said, and, in any event, it does not identify specific wrongdoers.)

Robert S. Bennett, whose firm, Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom, helped persuade prosecutors not to indict KPMG, responded that KPMG could have been destroyed if it had been indicted, and that would have hurt far more people than the eight former partners named in the indictment.

"When you are saving a company, you are saving more than just bricks and mortar," Mr. Bennett said, adding that the firm was comfortable with the acknowledgment that it made. Mr. Bennett is familiar with such brinkmanship after advising the boards at HealthSouth and Enron; both waived privilege, to satisfy prosecutors that they were cooperating. Mr. Bennett declined to comment on any of those specific instances, but he said that corporate defendants generally waive the privilege in more cases, for more reasons and more often now than in the past.

"It's very hard being a defense lawyer these days," Mr. Bennett said. "In today's climate, in order for a company to avoid an indictment, it must cooperate with the government. And today, cooperation, under the Thompson guidelines, as a practical matter often requires companies to waive the attorney-client privilege and cooperate in other ways."

The so-called Thompson memorandum, drafted in 2003 by the deputy attorney general, Larry Thompson, in the wake of a wave of corporate fraud, laid out guidelines on prosecutions of corporations. The guidelines state that "one factor the prosecutor may weigh in assessing the adequacy of a corporation's cooperation is the completeness of its disclosure including, if necessary, a waiver of the attorney-client and work product protections, both with respect to its internal investigation and with respect to communications between specific officers, directors and employees and counsel."

But Mr. Ide, the chairman of the bar association's task force, and other lawyers say they worry that when prosecutors insist on a waiver, they are essentially making corporations an offer they cannot refuse.

That may have serious consequences. For example, companies may have difficulty conducting internal inquiries if employees do not talk because they know their statements may end up being handed over to the government; executives may decide not to consult lawyers before making critical business decisions; and lawyers may temper their advice if they know it may one day be exposed.

"One concern is that this will chill corporate officials' willingness to get good legal advice," said Michael Young, a lawyer at Willkie Farr & Gallagher. "The result ironically would be less access to sound legal counsel."

Not everyone is worried about weakening the privilege for corporations, though. John R. Kroger, a law professor at Lewis & Clark Law School and a former federal prosecutor, said that knowing what lawyers told executives is crucial to learning what happened at a company

"It's really in the public's interest to get out on the table whether there's any possibility executives engaged in wrongdoing were really following legal advice or not," Mr. Kroger said.

Many Families Miss Tuition Tax Breaks (USAT)

By Mary Beth Marklein

USA Today, September 7, 2005

Nearly 10 million Americans claimed a federal higher-education tax break in 2002, more than double the number who did in 1998.

But hundreds of thousands of families who may be eligible for such breaks aren't taking advantage of them, a federal report says.

Meanwhile, with Congress under pressure to reduce the federal deficit, the legislators responsible for student loans have been given a Sept. 16 deadline to detail how they will trim about $13 billion from mandatory programs in their jurisdiction.

The tax-related report, released last week by the Government Accountability Office, found that filers of 27% of the 1.8 million returns it analyzed appeared eligible but did not claim either a tuition deduction or tax credit.

The report said those filers could have reduced their tax liability by $169 on average; 10% of them could have cut their liability by more than $500.

A major reason people did not take advantage of it may be that the tax provisions are “difficult for families to understand and use correctly,” the report said.

It called on the Department of Education to sponsor research on the effectiveness of tools to assist students and families — not only with tax breaks but also student aid programs, through which more than 8.4 Americans received grants or loans in 2002.

In 2004, about $14 billion in grants and $56 billion in loans were made available through federal programs while post-secondary tax breaks amounted to $10 billion, the report said.

Now, with Congress looking to trim budgets, higher education groups expect cuts to federal loan programs of between $7 billion and $10 billion over five years, says Terry Hartle of the American Council on Education, an umbrella group for colleges and universities.

And as Congress prepares to consider a package of bills aimed at making college more accessible, critics of a student aid provision wending its way through the legislative process argue that the measure would raise the cost of loans for some borrowers.

That provision, passed by a key House committee in July, would offer new options for students and greater flexibility for loan repayment, says Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio, chairman of the Education and the Workforce Committee.

That committee is a key architect of the Higher Education Act, which is renewed every five years.

But a coalition of public interest groups, including the United States Student Association and the State Public Interest Research Groups, say the costs far outweigh the bill's benefits.

They say new loan fees, higher interest rates and the elimination of certain borrower benefits would hike loan costs by as much as $5,800.

Meanwhile, an 85-member coalition of loan providers is urging a Senate committee to oppose “excessive cuts” as members look for ways to save money.

DOJ_NMG_0003524

Significant cuts, the coalition says, “could destabilize the loan program and create more barriers to higher education for the neediest students.”

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush: List For Second Vacancy 'Wide Open' (CO)

By Jesse J. Holland

The Charlotte Observer, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON - President Bush said the list of possibilities for his second Supreme Court nomination was "wide open" Tuesday as Senate Republicans urged him to consider a woman and Democrats pressed him to consult with them before making his next pick.

The president said the Senate should concentrate on confirming U.S. Appeals Judge John Roberts to replace the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist before worrying about any other choices.

"I want the Senate to focus not on who the next nominee is going to be, but the nominee I got up there now," Bush said.

Roberts' confirmation hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee will begin next Monday, one week after Bush named him to replace the justice he worked for as a Supreme Court law clerk. Roberts was originally slated to be Sandra Day O'Connor's replacement, but Bush formally withdrew that nomination Tuesday and made the 50-year-old judge the chief justice nominee.

O'Connor has agreed to stay on until her successor is in place, Bush noted, ensuring there will be a nine-member court if Roberts is confirmed before the new term begins on Oct. 3.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and Judiciary chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said they expected to be finished with Roberts before then.

Specter and Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas - who will be the Senate's No. 3 Republican next year - said Bush should choose a woman since O'Connor's retirement would leave only one woman on the court, Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

"Two women, I think, are a minimum," Specter said.

Several senators suggested the president should wait before making any new selection public, given that the Senate is working on relief for the hurricane-stricken Gulf Coast as well as Roberts' nomination. "We've got more than a full plate right now," said John Cornyn, R-Texas.

"I think you should do one nomination at a time, even though it would be nice to know who the president is thinking of," added Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

Democrats urged Bush to talk with them before replacing O'Connor, who sometimes has sided with more liberal justices.

"The list is wide open, which should create some good speculation here in Washington," Bush said, playfully glancing at Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who has been mentioned as a possible nominee. If named, Gonzales would become the first Hispanic justice on the Supreme Court.

Bush Pledges Wide Search For Court Seat (WP)

By Peter Baker And Jo Becker

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

President Bush vowed yesterday to "take a good, long look" at a "wide open" list of candidates before deciding whom to nominate for a second open seat on the Supreme Court, as both sides girded for twin confirmation battles and recalibrated strategies after the dizzying events of recent days.

The casket of the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist was laid in repose in the Great Hall of the Supreme Court, borne by a cast of pallbearers that included his former clerk and would-be successor, John G. Roberts Jr. Some influential Democrats signaled that Roberts's ascension increased their eagerness to press him on his record -- particularly on civil rights, which they said has taken on new salience in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

"What the American people have seen is this incredible disparity in which those people who had cars and money got out and those people who were impoverished died," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said in an interview . The question for Roberts, he said, is whether he stands for "a fairer, more just nation" or for "narrow, stingy interpretations of the law to frustrate progress."

Bush, who tapped Roberts on Monday to replace Rehnquist, suggested that he will take his time finding a new candidate for the seat of retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, which was originally supposed to go to the appellate judge. Aides said they expect no announcement this week as Washington focuses on the damage wrought by Hurricane Kristina.

DOJ_NMG_0003525

At the same time, Bush playfully hinted he could choose his friend Alberto R. Gonzales, a prospect that reignited consternation among conservative groups skeptical of the attorney general's politics.

"The list is wide open, which should create some good speculation here in Washington," Bush told reporters after a Cabinet meeting, generating laughter. With a sly look, he added: "And make sure you notice when I said that, I looked right at Al Gonzales, who can really create speculation."

Whether or not the president actually intends to nominate Gonzales, who would be the first Hispanic on the court, that lighthearted remark crystallized the renewed battle within the Bush camp over the selection of an associate justice -- a virtual replay of the fight that preceded Roberts's original nomination in July, pitting the Republican right against the White House.

At the same time, having already chosen a white man for the high court, Bush came under pressure from within his party to make diversity a priority. Republican Sens. Arlen Specter (Pa.), Kay Bailey Hutchison (Tex.) and John Cornyn (Tex.) all advised the president to consider a woman or a member of a minority. O'Connor and first lady Laura Bush have both previously stated a preference for a second woman on the bench as well, while Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice smiled broadly yesterday when Bush was asked whether he would name a female nominee.

With O'Connor's pending departure, the court would be left with one woman, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and one minority, Clarence Thomas. "Two women are, I think, a minimum," Specter said, though he added he does not favor a quota.

Complicating the picture is the political aftermath of Katrina, which analysts say has left Bush weakened amid recriminations over a slow, ineffectual initial response. Some analysts speculated that Bush might avoid a provocative conservative in favor of a less ideologically pure nominee, possibly Gonzales. But White House advisers scoffed at the notion, suggesting that fundamentally misunderstands Bush's nature.

Conservatives lobbied against shifting course because of Katrina. "The court is a long-term thing," said William Kristol, the influential editor of the Weekly Standard. "It's crazy to mess up your long-term legacy to possibly help him with a short-term PR problem. I think Gonzales would be a disaster."

Some Republican strategists reason that the hurricane may actually work in their favor in that the public has no appetite for a fiery, partisan battle over the Supreme Court. "People are in no mood for a circus," said a senior administration official who spoke anonymously because of the sensitivity of the situation. "The country is dealing with a terrible tragedy. The American people want a dignified process."

Specter, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, yesterday rescheduled hearings originally slated for today until Monday. Preparing for a showdown, some Democrats mapped plans to link Roberts's past opposition to affirmative action and other civil rights measures to the unfolding scenes of mostly poor African Americans hit hardest by the hurricane.

Democrats will make that argument in part through their witness list, which includes Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), a leader in the 1960s civil rights movement who plans to note that courts historically have led the way in guaranteeing rights for the disenfranchised. "New Orleans is just a symbol," he said in an interview. "We are still a nation divided by race and class, and I don't see [Roberts] being an advocate for those who were left out and left behind."

Democrats used the delay in the Roberts hearings to renew their request for documents related to his service as principal deputy solicitor general under President George H.W. Bush, but Specter rejected the appeal. The government has released tens of thousands of pages of memos and papers from Roberts's early service in the Reagan administration while refusing to turn over those from the solicitor general's office on the grounds of preserving confidential deliberations.

On other matters, Democrats sent mixed messages as party leaders seemed to search for a consensus strategy. Some said Roberts should be held to a higher scrutiny because of the influence of a chief justice. "Look at [Earl] Warren and Rehnquist," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), referring to two long-serving chiefs credited with moving the court to the left and right, respectively.

But other Democrats said the switch of Roberts to replace Rehnquist rather than O'Connor actually made his confirmation less significant because now it would be trading one conservative for another. Unlike Rehnquist, O'Connor was a decisive vote in many cases. "She has been the swing vote on so many of the freedoms" important to Americans, said Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.).

In a similar vein, Democrats also split on whether Bush should signal his choice for O'Connor's seat before the Senate votes on Roberts. Shortly after Bush picked Roberts for chief, Kennedy said the president should disclose his proposed replacement for O'Connor expeditiously. But Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) urged Bush not to rush. "It would seem to me the White House may want to take it a little more slowly," Reid told reporters.

Bush appeared in no rush. "I'll take a good, long look at who should replace Justice O'Connor," he said. Bush noted that he spoke with O'Connor on Monday to inform her that Roberts would be submitted for Rehnquist's seat instead of hers and to remind her that she had agreed to remain on the court until her successor is confirmed. "Her first reaction was that she better get back to doing her homework," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0003526

Having gone through a selection process just two months ago, Bush has a good sense of the universe of candidates, who besides Gonzales appear to include former deputy attorney general Larry D. Thompson and a plethora of appeals court judges, including J. Michael Luttig, Edith Hollan Jones and Priscilla R. Owen. Bush has not scheduled any more candidate interviews, nor is he holding any regular meetings with aides, instead discussing the choice on a more ad hoc basis by calling advisers when he has a thought or question, officials said.

"He's got his mind organized around a short, decent list of people," said one senior official close to the process who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the confidentiality of the process. "But he's not close-minded about this at this point."

As much as anything, timing may be the open question. Bush is unlikely to announce the next nomination in the midst of next week's hearings on Roberts, but the president's advisers are debating whether it would be better to go ahead after the hearings or to wait until after a final floor vote, now scheduled for the week of Sept. 26.

Even if O'Connor is sitting on the court when its next term opens Oct. 3, her presence may not matter much. If she is not still there when decisions are written and issued months later, her vote would not count. In instances when that would leave a 4 to 4 tie, the cases might have to be reargued for her successor's benefit.

"The president ought to act expeditiously simply to fill the slot as quickly as possible," said Todd F. Gaziano, a scholar at the Heritage Foundation and former Jones clerk.

Others argue that even with two appointments, Bush needs another to effect lasting change. "While this weekend was filled with dramatic events, they won't transform the court in the way people on both sides hope or fear," said M. Edward Whelan III, president of the Ethics and Public Policy Center and a former clerk to Justice Antonin Scalia. "Real transformation requires replacing someone on the left with a proponent of judicial restraint."

Bush Hints At Gonzales For Court Opening (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

President Bush yesterday reignited speculation that he would nominate Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to the Supreme Court, saying the list of potential candidates to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor is "wide open."

Mr. Bush made his comments at a Cabinet meeting, adding that his words "should create some good speculation here in Washington."

"And make sure you notice when I said that I looked right at Al Gonzales, who can really create speculation."

Although the remark drew chuckles from Cabinet members and journalists, Bush aides said he is seriously considering Mr. Gonzales. That prompted a fresh round of grumbling from conservatives, who fear that Mr. Gonzales would not vote to overturn Roe v. Wade, the 1973 high court ruling that legalized abortion.

"He's obviously not pro-life," said Mark Crutcher, president of Life Dynamics.

Stephen Peroutka, chairman of National Pro-Life Action Center, pointed out that Mr. Gonzales voted to allow a girl have an abortion without telling her parents in 2000 when he was on the Texas Supreme Court.

Mr. Bush emphasized that he is casting a wide net for his second Supreme Court nominee in two months. His first nominee, Judge John G. Roberts Jr., was chosen in July and will appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee next week for confirmation hearings.

"I was deliberate in my process last time; I'll be deliberative this time," Mr. Bush said.

The president said he does not expect to name a replacement until Judge Roberts is seated on the bench as a replacement for Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who died Saturday. Mr. Roberts was initially tapped to replace Justice O'Connor, but was renominated to become chief justice after Chief Justice's Rehnquist's death.

"I want the Senate to focus not on who the next nominee is going to be, but the nominee I've got up there now," Mr. Bush said.

Meanwhile, Justice O'Connor has agreed to stay on the court until her replacement is found.

"She'll be there when the court is seated with a new chief justice," the president said.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid said he expects to be consulted on the new nominee and urged the president not to nominate a staunch conservative.

"I look forward to consulting with the president on the O'Connor seat," the Nevada Democrat said on the Senate floor. "Justice O'Connor has been a voice of moderation and reason on the court and should be replaced by someone who, like her, embodies the fundamental American values of fairness, liberty and equality."

In July, Mr. Reid said Mr. Gonzales is "qualified" to sit on the Supreme Court, which made some conservatives even more suspicious of the potential nominee's credentials. But it also suggested that Mr. Gonzales, if nominated, would garner at least some Democratic votes in the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0003527

ABC News political editor Mark Halperin yesterday wondered whether "the White House will secretly welcome the opposition of a few conservative groups, making Gonzales seem more moderate."

Gonzales Is Mentioned In Supreme Court Remarks (NYT)

By Richard W. Stevenson And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6 - President Bush said Tuesday that his list of candidates to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was "wide open," and he jokingly but pointedly singled out Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales.

Mr. Bush's mention of Mr. Gonzales as a possibility, in comments to reporters at the end of a cabinet meeting, fueled concern among conservatives, who were already mobilizing against the attorney general. Conservatives say that Mr. Gonzales has not shown himself to be sufficiently opposed to abortion rights and that nominating him would miss an opportunity to move the court fundamentally to the right.

Mr. Bush said that he had yet to make up his mind and that he would "take a good, long look at who should replace Justice O'Connor." But he mentioned only one name, that of Mr. Gonzales, a longtime friend and aide who, if nominated and confirmed, would be the first Hispanic on the court.

"The list is wide open, which should create some good speculation here in Washington," Mr. Bush said to laughter in the Cabinet Room, with the attorney general sitting directly across from him. "And make sure you notice when I said that, I looked right at Al Gonzales, who can really create speculation."

The president's remark came as the Senate delayed until next week confirmation hearings for Judge John G. Roberts Jr., who had been nominated to fill Justice O'Connor's seat but who was selected by Mr. Bush on Monday as his nominee for chief justice after William H. Rehnquist died on Saturday. The hearings on Judge Roberts's nomination to Justice O'Connor's seat had been scheduled to begin Tuesday.

The White House has already signaled that Mr. Bush will not announce a selection of a new replacement for Justice O'Connor this week. The president went further on Tuesday, suggesting that he would hold off on a selection at least until Judge Roberts's nomination reached the Senate floor, if not until he was confirmed.

"I want the Senate to focus not on who the next nominee is going to be, but the nominee I've got up there now," Mr. Bush said.

It has never been clear how seriously Mr. Bush has considered Mr. Gonzales for the Supreme Court, and it was hard to tell if the president's remarks were calculated to send a signal or were simply a reflection of his sense of humor and his disdain for Washington guessing games.

Mr. Bush, as governor of Texas, named Mr. Gonzales to the State Supreme Court in 1999 after employing him as one of his top aides, and then brought him to Washington as White House counsel in 2001. He became attorney general this year.

A senior administration official, speaking on the condition of anonymity to provide his interpretation of Mr. Bush's remarks on Tuesday, said that the president was "giving a jab to a good friend" and that both men are "immune to speculation and rumors."

But by mentioning Mr. Gonzales, however lightheartedly, Mr. Bush increased the likelihood that conservative groups would reprise and perhaps intensify their largely behind-the-scenes effort earlier this summer to convince the White House that selecting Mr. Gonzales for Justice O'Connor's seat would be a betrayal of his most ardent supporters.

"Would any of his aides have the nerve to tell him that as Supreme Court jurists go, Gonzales would be mediocre - and not a solid bet to move the court in a constitutionalist direction?" William Kristol, editor of The Weekly Standard, wrote in an article posted Tuesday afternoon on that conservative magazine's Web site. "Would any of them have the nerve to explain to the president that a Gonzales nomination would utterly demoralize many of his supporters, who are sticking with him and his party, through troubles in Iraq and screw-ups with Hurricane Katrina, precisely because they want a few important things out of a Bush presidency - and one of these is a more conservative court?"

Conservatives have been hoping for years to replace Justice O'Connor, a swing vote on abortion, immigration, religion and other divisive social issues, with a conservative who could fundamentally alter the balance on the court. They have been pressing Mr. Bush to choose someone like Judge J. Michael Luttig of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, in Virginia, a strong opponent of abortion rights.

Confirmation hearings for Judge Roberts, a former Rehnquist clerk, had been scheduled to begin Tuesday when lawmakers returned from a monthlong recess. Now the hearings on his nomination as chief justice will begin Monday, giving liberal groups more time to develop their case against him.

Democrats have called on Mr. Bush to ask Justice O'Connor to stay on for a full year, saying such a move would bring stability to the court and avoid a divisive confirmation process in the devastating aftermath of the hurricane.

DOJ_NMG_0003528

"If he wants to be a hero," said Senator Barbara Boxer, Democrat of California, referring to the president, "he can pick up the phone and call Sandra Day O'Connor."

Republicans said that as a replacement they were looking for someone like Judge Roberts, a conservative whose impressive legal résumé has made him difficult for Democrats to challenge.

"I'd be pleased if you could clone John Roberts," said Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama.

Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, said, "I don't know whether John Roberts has a twin, perhaps a sister or, uh, someone with a Hispanic last name."

Mr. Bush's remark about Mr. Gonzales left many conservative allies of the White House guessing. Some took it as just an off-the-cuff comment, intended to tweak a good friend.

Others wondered if Mr. Bush was "testing the waters," in the words of Marion Edwyn Harrison, president of the Free Congress Foundation, a conservative group whose chairman, Paul Weyrich, has expressed serious reservations about putting Mr. Gonzales on the court.

Should Mr. Bush nominate Mr. Gonzales, he would also arouse the ire of some liberals, who have been critical of Mr. Gonzales's role in setting administration policy regarding torture and the treatment of prisoners seized in what the White House calls the global war on terrorism.

But he is seen by some Democrats in Congress as a relatively moderate option who could steer clear of an ideological showdown.

"I think what most Americans are looking for is someone in the image of Sandra Day O'Connor," Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said, "and while we don't know a lot of details about Attorney General Gonzales, at first blush he would seem to be in that image."

Pressure Rises With Roberts Hearings Set For Next Week (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — Senate leaders said Tuesday that the Judiciary Committee would begin hearings Monday on President Bush's nomination of John G. Roberts Jr. to be chief justice, and the president said he would take his time selecting a candidate from a "wide open" field to fill the Supreme Court's second vacancy.

At midday, Bush formally sent Roberts' name to the Senate to succeed Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who died Saturday, and withdrew the earlier nomination of Roberts to fill the seat of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who is retiring.

"I want the Senate to focus not on who the next nominee is going to be, but the nominee I got up there now," Bush said. "In the meantime, the country can be assured that I'll take a good, long look at who should replace Justice O'Connor."

Democrats urged the president to move quickly to fill the vacancy, saying it would be easier for them to support Roberts' nomination if they knew the name of the second nominee.

Senators on Tuesday spent their first full day on the job after their summer recess adjusting to a new reality: two Supreme Court vacancies that will need to be addressed against the backdrop of the national emergency caused by the devastation of Hurricane Katrina.

Even though the hearings on Roberts' nomination will start six days later than first planned as a result of Rehnquist's death, Senate leaders were optimistic that a vote on Roberts would take place before the Supreme Court term begins Oct. 3.

"Judge Roberts does have the skill, he does have the mind, he does have the intellect and the temperament to lead the Supreme Court for decades to come," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn.

Bush's decision Monday to nominate Roberts as chief justice forced both parties to recalibrate their political compasses.

Democrats, worried about the balance of conservatives and liberals on the court, started pressuring Bush to quickly announce a nominee to replace O'Connor. She has been a swing vote between the court's liberal and conservative wings.

"If we had an idea of who might fill the other vacancy, it would help put (Roberts' nomination) in perspective," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin, D-Ill., a member of the Judiciary Committee. "This court is very closely divided, and if the president's next nominee is too extreme, it will worry us that the court is going to change for generations to come."

Republicans, apparently recognizing that delaying a second nomination might give the president more options, deferred to the White House. Over the weekend, Bush aides suggested the president would choose another nominee quickly. After a Cabinet meeting Tuesday morning, the president suggested a more measured pace.

"I was deliberate in my process last time. I will be deliberative this time," Bush said.

Democrats, who had indicated they were unlikely to try to block Roberts' confirmation, said the proposal to make him chief justice raised the stakes.

DOJ_NMG_0003529

"At his age, we could see him for 25 or 30 years," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, D-Vt., the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee.Roberts is 50 years old.

Sen. Russell D. Feingold, D-Wis., said it was now more important for the White House to release 16 case files from Roberts' service in George H.W. Bush's administration that the current White House has withheld.

Democrats worry that the president could use a second nomination to name a conservative ideologue to placate the Republican Party's right wing, which privately has expressed concerns that Roberts might not be as reliable a conservative vote as they would like. Democrats express the opposite fear, that Roberts will be rigidly conservative.

"It really falls on us to ask important questions about who he really is and to require the administration to produce enough evidence about who he is and what he believes that we can make a reasonable judgment," Durbin said.

There is considerable speculation in both parties that Bush will try to name a woman or a member of an ethnic minority to promote more diversity among the justices.

"It is desirable to have balance on the court, and two women, I think, are a minimum," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the committee chairman. "But I don't think you can have a quota system either for women or a minority as an absolute determinant."

Senators said that the aftermath of Katrina had created an unusual backdrop for the Roberts hearings, but that it was important to move forward after the weeklong delay to mourn Rehnquist and the hurricane victims.

"All three branches of government are critical (even in) those Southeastern states that are suffering so terribly," said Sen Orrin G. Hatch, R-Utah, a member of the judiciary panel. "But this is one of the most important responsibilities the Senate has, and we need to exercise that responsibility."

The Right Wants A Woman (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 7, 2005

Key Republicans and conservatives are pressing President Bush to nominate a woman to replace retiring Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

This is despite welcoming the nomination seven weeks ago of Judge John Roberts, a white man and a member of Washington's elite, who was elevated Monday as the nominee to replace the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

It may suggest that, with the president faltering in opinion polls, the right believes it needs the sop of liberal identity politics to get a second conservative justice confirmed.

Priscilla Owen, Edith Jones and Edith Brown Clement, all three from the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, and Janice Rogers Brown, of the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, are considered by conservatives to lead the list of potential female nominees.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) yesterday signaled that he would like Bush to nominate a woman.

"It is desirable to have a balance on the court," he said when asked about Bush's next nominee. "Two women, I think, are a minimum."

In the same breath, however, Specter added that the Supreme Court should not have a quota system for nominees.

Many conservative activists are talking behind the scenes about the desirability of a female nominee to replace O'Connor.

Paul Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation and a longtime leader of the conservative movement, told The Hill, "I've heard from any number of people who think that way." He said, however, that he didn't think the seat should be reserved for a woman.

Owen's name has arisen more frequently this week than it did when O'Connor announced her retirement in June.

The Senate confirmed Owen, a former Texas Supreme Court justice, at the end of May by a vote of 55-43 after Democrats had blocked her nomination for nearly four years.

Another activist said that "conservatives would embrace" Owen, Jones, Clement and Brown.

Clement was on the president's shortlist to replace O'Connor two months ago, but her stock is believed to have declined among conservatives since then.

Manuel Miranda, a former strategist to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) on judicial nominations, said there is pressure on Bush to appoint a woman or a member of a racial minority now that that he has selected Roberts to lead the court.

Referring to the pressure, he said, "I think it's greater to appoint a woman but also [there's pressure to name] a Hispanic."

Two Republican Judiciary Committee members, Sens. Orrin Hatch (Utah) and Tom Coburn (Okla.), said Bush should not let sex considerations drive his choice.

"I don't think it should be a question of a woman or a Hispanic or a Caucasian," said Hatch, who nevertheless added: "There are some outstanding women in the law whom the president is considering."

DOJ_NMG_0003530

Democrats say they would like the president to announce his next nominee before they cast a final vote on Roberts's confirmation. Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), a member of the Judiciary panel, said it would be helpful.

Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), another member of the committee, said he did not perceive "the point of waiting," when asked whether the president should make the announcement before Roberts has passed through the Senate.

Feingold also raised the possibility that Roberts may not be able to be confirmed within the three-week timeline Republicans set yesterday. Even before the delay of Roberts's hearing, he said, confirmation by October was uncertain.

Sen. Dick Durbin (Ill.), the Democratic whip, said that Democrats were committed to beginning Roberts's confirmation hearings this Monday but that it was too early to predict whether they would allow a final vote on Roberts to take place if Bush has not named O'Connor's successor.

Several liberal and conservative strategists said that linking Roberts and O'Connor's replacement would help Democrats portray Bush as trying to alter the makeup of the court dramatically by appointing two very conservative nominees at the same time.

Frist, Specter, Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Judiciary Committee ranking Democrat Patrick Leahy (Vt.) announced yesterday a new schedule for Roberts's confirmation hearings.

Frist said the schedule would allow lawmakers to complete action on Roberts's nomination by Oct. 3, the start of the Supreme Court's new term. But Reid countered that Democrats had made no commitment to holding a final vote by the start of the new term.

"You never know what is going to happen," Reid said.

Schumer indicated that Democrats reserve their power to extend the confirmation process as long as possible.

During interparty negotiations, Schumer insisted that Democrats not commit to a deadline for a final vote on Roberts or to limited rounds of questioning of the nominee.

Roberts's hearing will begin at noon Monday with a round of opening statements, followed by two days of questioning and a day of outside witness testimony.

Specter and Leahy have tentatively agreed to a committee vote on Roberts on Sept. 20. Specter acknowledged that Democrats could invoke Senate rules to delay the committee vote until the following week but said he hoped "no one will exercise the right to carry it over a week." Specter added that committee Democrats had assured their Republican colleagues that they want to move without unnecessary delay.

Leahy, who met with his committee colleagues over the Labor Day weekend, said that "substantive questions will be asked" but that Democrats would not create procedural delays.

Specter said that if lawmakers could not agree unanimously to a vote during the week of Sept. 20, the following Monday, Sept. 26, would be the fallback date for the committee vote, enabling Frist to schedule a final floor on one of the last four days of the month.

NJ Judge Mentioned As Possible Supreme Court Nominee (AP)

By DONNA DE LA CRUZ, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON (AP) -- A second opening on the U.S. Supreme Court is bringing renewed interest in Samuel A. Alito Jr., a federal judge from New Jersey who used to serve as the state's federal prosecutor.

Alito, who sits on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers the Garden State, is among several people mentioned by court observers as being on a "short list" of candidates for associate justice to succeed Sandra Day O'Connor. She is retiring but remaining on the bench until her replacement is confirmed. President Bush's original choice for that position, John Roberts, has been nominated to become chief justice following the death Saturday of William H. Rehnquist.

The other possible nominees include U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, former U.S. Solicitor General Theodore Olson, and former deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson.

Alito, 55, has been dubbed "Scalito" or "Scalia-lite" by some lawyers and political pundits because of a reputation as a strong, conservative jurist that often brings comparisons to conservative Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia. But Alito, 55, also has a reputation as being scholarly and quiet, rarely asking questions during oral arguments.

Alito's New Jersey ties run deep. Alito was born in Trenton, as was Scalia, although Scalia moved with his family to Queens, N.Y., when he was 5. Both Alito and Scalia are Italian-Americans.

Alito's deceased father, Samuel Alito Sr., was the director of the New Jersey's Office of Legislative Services from 1952 to 1984. Alito's sister, Rosemary Alito, is a partner with the law firm of Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Nicholson Graham in Newark, and is regarded as one of New Jersey's top employment lawyers.

Alito earned his undergraduate degree from Princeton University in 1972 and graduated from Yale Law School in 1975. He served as a law clerk from 1976-1977 for Leonard Garth, a judge on the 3rd U.S. Circuit in Philadelphia. He returned to New Jersey in 1977 to work as an assistant U.S. attorney.

From 1981 to 1987, Alito worked in Washington, first as an assistant to the U.S. solicitor general and a deputy assistant U.S. attorney general. Alito returned to New Jersey in 1987, where he served as the U.S. Attorney for the District of New Jersey until 1990, when the first President Bush nominated him to the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Among Alito's noteworthy opinions was his sole dissent in the 1991 case that struck down a Pennsylvania law requiring women seeking abortions to tell their husbands. The Supreme Court later struck down the spousal notification.

But in 2000, Alito joined the majority in ruling that a New Jersey law banning late-term abortions was unconstitutional.

In a 1997 ruling, Alito said that Jersey City officials did not violate the Constitution with a holiday display that included a creche, a menorah and other secular symbols.

Alito and his wife, Martha, live in West Caldwell. They have two children, a college-age son Philip and a younger daughter, Laura. His interests include tennis, music and the Philadelphia Phillies.

Target Date Is Set For Committee Vote On Roberts (WSJ/DJN)

By Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Senate leaders said the Judiciary Committee will vote no later than Sept. 26 on the nomination of Appeals Court Judge John Roberts to become the next U.S. chief justice.

Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) said yesterday that the committee will begin confirmation hearings on Monday. The hearings are expected to run a week. Although Republican and Democratic leaders said they are working together to move Mr. Roberts's nomination quickly, the full Senate might not hold a final vote on Judge Roberts until just before the high court convenes for its new term on Oct. 3.

"We have tried to work through all of the issues," Mr. Specter said. "I'm optimistic we will be able to dispense the duties of the committee and the full Senate."

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) said Democrats plan to work with Republicans to move ahead on the hearings. But he said his party remains largely uncommitted on how it will vote. Mr. Reid said he has "some concerns" about Mr. Roberts's writings on civil rights and women's issues from when he worked for Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

Following the death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist on Saturday, President Bush named Judge Roberts to fill the top job. He was originally nominated to fill the seat of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who announced her retirement July 1.

Rehnquist's Casket Lies in Supreme Court

Meanwhile, Chief Justice Rehnquist's casket was carried up the steps of the Supreme Court Tuesday by former clerks including John Roberts, the man nominated to succeed him as chief justice. Official Washington began paying its last respects at the court to the nation's 16th chief justice.

Judge Roberts -- currently a member of the federal appeals court in Washington, D.C. -- and the seven other pallbearers bore the flag-draped casket up some 40 steps of the high court to the Great Hall, where busts of the former chief justices are displayed in niches and on marble pedestals along the walls.

The doors to the court chamber, where Chief Justice Rehnquist had served for 33 years, were open at the east end of the hall. His casket was placed on the Lincoln Catafalque, the structure on which President Lincoln's coffin rested in the Rotunda of the Capitol a century and a half earlier.

Lining the steps to greet the casket were six justices, including Sandra Day O'Connor, who was in tears as the casket passed by. She announced her plans to retire in July, resulting in President Bush's nomination of Judge Roberts to replace her. Mr. Bush said Monday he would nominate Judge Roberts to be chief justice instead. Senate leaders said his confirmation hearings are set to begin Monday, after being delayed.

Absent from Tuesday's ceremonies were Justices Anthony M. Kennedy and David Souter.

The Rev. George Evans Jr., the Rehnquist family pastor at the Lutheran Church of the Redeemer in Virginia, offered a prayer as the justices, former clerks, court staff and family surrounded the casket. Two sprays of flowers and a large portrait of the chief justice were on display.

After the brief ceremony, a long line of people formed outside the court and people began walking inside past the coffin of the chief justice, who died Saturday night.

Public viewing was to take place until 10 p.m. Eastern Time on Tuesday and from 10 a.m. until noon Wednesday. On Wednesday, funeral services will be at 2 p.m. at St. Matthew's Cathedral in Washington, open to friends and family.

DOJ_NMG_0003532

Burial at Arlington National Cemetery will be private. The bodies of Chief Justice Rehnquist's two immediate predecessors, Warren E. Burger and Earl Warren, also are buried at Arlington. Chief Justices Burger and Warren lay in repose in the Supreme Court Building before their services.

Given his office, Chief Justice Rehnquist is entitled to a state-sponsored official funeral, a ceremony that includes a 19-gun salute, four ruffles and flourishes from drums and bugles, and the last 32 bars of the John Philip Sousa march "Stars and Stripes Forever" among other military honors.

Hearings Set For Monday (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, September 7, 2005

The Senate Judiciary Committee will kick-start hearings on Judge John Roberts' nomination to be chief justice of the United States on Monday, a six-day delay allowing for the funeral and burial services this week for the late William Rehnquist.

The delay, however, still leaves plenty of time for the committee to hold a week's worth of hearings, as originally scheduled, and send the nominee to the full Senate for a vote by the final week of September — the timetable originally laid out by Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

"Assurances have been made that everybody wants to get it concluded," Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said, although Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) stipulated that those were general assurances of cooperation and not an iron-clad guarantee that Democrats wouldn't attempt to slow the process.

Regardless, without any new revelations that require the hearings to extend well into the month, Specter said they would conclude on Sept. 16. In order to send the nomination to the full Senate with a recommendation, the committee will then reconvene one of three days: Sept. 20 or Sept. 22, but Sept. 26 at the latest.

That gives the Senate almost three full weeks to take up other legislation, particularly any related to fallout from Katrina's devastation, and then handle the Roberts nomination beginning Sept. 26 and continuing through the rest of that week.

Specter said he expected President Bush would fairly quickly make a new appointment to fill the vacancy created by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement earlier this summer. "My instinct is the White House will be ready for an appointment reasonably soon," he said.

But that announcement is not likely to interrupt the Roberts proceedings in any way, although Specter said the early phases of the new nomination battle could get under way while the Senate is still handling Roberts.

"We can pat our head and rub our stomach at the same time," he said.

Senate Sets Date For Roberts Confirmation Hearings (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

Senate leaders agreed to begin confirmation hearings for federal Judge John G. Roberts Jr. on Monday, giving Congress this week to mourn the death of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist.

"The schedule allows us both to pause to pay appropriate respect to Chief Justice Rehnquist and to complete floor action on the nomination of Judge Roberts as chief justice by October 3, the start of the Supreme Court's new term," Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, said yesterday.

The schedule allows for a Judiciary Committee vote on Judge Roberts' nomination by Sept. 22, followed by at least a week of debate on the floor of the Senate, according to committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican.

"You can never know for sure about a completion date because we conclude when the last senator stops talking, and that's always hard to predict," said Mr. Specter, who is becoming known for keeping loquacious senators under control during his committee's proceedings.

Republicans had been under pressure to postpone the Roberts hearings, first for Hurricane Katrina and then for the death of Justice Rehnquist.

Even the mayor of New Orleans, C. Ray Nagin, took time out of his frantic efforts to salvage his city to call Mr. Specter over the weekend and ask that the Roberts hearings be delayed.

"Events overtook us with the passing of Chief Justice Rehnquist and concern for the sentiments for the Rehnquist family," Mr. Specter said. "And then events overtook us again with the naming by the president of Judge Roberts to be chief justice, if confirmed."

Despite the postponement, Mr. Specter and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and ranking minority member on the committee, agreed that the hearings should commence without too much partisan delay. At times during a joint briefing yesterday, the two men were cordial -- even jovial -- with one another

"Senator Leahy and I have talked at great, great length about how we're proceeding and it is significantly on the basis of good faith that I am optimistic," Mr. Specter said.

Mr. Leahy said he would work with Mr. Specter, "as I have all the way through this, to keep things in line to make sure there's not procedural delays." He added that "substantive questions will be asked."

Some Democrats have said that since Judge Roberts' nomination has been elevated to chief justice, more documents should be handed over, including the solicitor general reports that the White House says are protected under attorney-client privilege.

Mr. Specter dismissed the idea, saying the more than 70,000 pages of documents provided thus far have shed plenty of light on the nominee's record.

"Judge Roberts has a very, very extensive paper trail," Mr. Specter said. "He has commented, I think, on all the issues which are of concern."

Specter Asks; Roberts Answers, For The Most Part (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

There are advantages to being Senate Judiciary Committee chairman, and Arlen Specter used them yesterday to sit down with the man nominated to be chief justice of the United States and to quiz him about abortion, consensus-building and other topics.

Specter (R-Pa.) invited John G. Roberts Jr. to his Senate office shortly after Roberts helped carry William H. Rehnquist's coffin into the Supreme Court, where the late chief justice lay in repose. In an interview, Specter said he asked Roberts, an appeals court judge, a range of questions, including, "How are you going to handle guys like Scalia? He's a lot older than you."

Justice Antonin Scalia, once considered a contender for chief justice, is 69. Roberts, 50, replied somewhat indirectly, according to Specter, by saying he considers it "a dialogue among equals" when lawyers argue cases before the Supreme Court.

"I'm intrigued by his concept of a dialogue among equals," Specter said, because it suggests Roberts will bring a needed tone of humility to court interactions. "I think for Judge Roberts to approach the court that way shows a lot of confidence," Specter said.

Specter said he also raised concerns about recent court rulings that he considers confusing and inexplicable. They include two 5 to 4 decisions regarding public displays of the Ten Commandments that in some ways seemed contradictory. Justice Stephen G. Breyer was the crucial swing vote in both cases, but "there's no explanation" of his reasoning, Specter said.

"I talked to him about consensus-building," the senator said. "He said that was something that he thought was important" and will be a priority if he is confirmed.

Specter said he also told Roberts that the 1973 landmark abortion rights case Roe v. Wade has been followed by 38 Supreme Court rulings meant to refine or clarify its guidelines, and he asked, "Is Roe a super-precedent?"

And the nominee's reply? "He didn't say," Specter said. Even a committee chairmanship, it seems, has its limits.

Roberts Confirmation Hearing Set For Monday (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, September 7, 2005

U.S. Chief Justice nominee John Roberts' confirmation hearing will begin on Monday, Senate leaders said, with Democrats vowing to take as long as needed to question the 50-year-old conservative who could lead the Supreme Court for decades.

At the White House, President George W. Bush said the field was "wide open" for his other pick for the nation's highest court but that the pending nominee was unlikely to be in place by the time the court begins its new term on October 3.

Bush also dampened Democratic hopes they would know who the second nominee was before they vote on Roberts, a federal appeals court judge the past two years who appears to have broad support to become the nation's 17th chief justice.

"I want the Senate to focus not on who the next nominee is going to be but the nominee I've got up there now," Bush said.

Bush originally nominated Roberts in July to fill the lifetime post of retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate conservative who had been a swing vote on the sharply divided court.

But on Monday, Bush switched and nominated Roberts to replace Chief Justice William Rehnquist, a leading conservative who died on Saturday at the age of 80 of cancer.

Roberts' hearing was to have begun on Tuesday. But it was delayed until next week in the wake of Rehnquist's death and Bush's nomination of Roberts as the new chief justice.

DOJ_NMG_0003534

"It would have been unseemly to go forward with a hearing on his successor this week," said Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record) of Vermont, ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee that will hold the hearing.

In announcing the rescheduled hearing to begin at noon EDT September 12, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist expressed confidence Roberts would win Senate confirmation by the time the high court begins its new term.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, a Nevada Democrat, promised bipartisan cooperation, but said there was no guarantee on when a Senate vote would take place.

"There are no commitments of a date certain to vote on the nomination, so everyone should understand that," said Reid, flanked by fellow Senate leaders.

At the White House Bush noted O'Connor, who will not step down until her replacement is confirmed, would still be on the nine-member court when the session begins.

"The list is wide open, which should create some good speculation here in Washington," Bush said of her pending new replacement. "And make sure you notice when I said that I looked right at Al Gonzales."

Gonzales, the attorney general, has been among those considered potential picks for the Supreme Court even though some of Bush's fellow conservatives complain his longtime friend may not be not be conservative enough.

The Judiciary Committee will spend four or five days on the nomination of Roberts, which has drawn the support of conservative groups and opposition from liberal organizations.

"While we mourn the chief's passing, we look forward with confidence at the president's new nominee for chief justice," said Frist, a Tennessee Republican.

Several Senate Democrats have spoken glowingly of Roberts, who served in two Republican administrations and received the American Bar Association's highest rating for a seat on the Supreme Court.

But a number of Democrats and other groups have questioned his record on civil rights and women's rights, based largely on a review of tens of thousands of pages of documents from his work as a lawyer in the Reagan administration two decades ago.

Democrats have said they will withhold final judgment until after what promises to be a bruising confirmation hearing.

"I'm very happy that (in) my Democratic caucus -- no one has made a commitment how they're going to vote," Reid said. "And I think that's appropriate because these hearings, as far as I'm concerned, are very important."

(Additional reporting by Tabassum Zakaria)

Katrina Thrusts Government's Role To The Fore In Confirmation Battle (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON - By opening questions about poverty, race and government policies, Hurricane Katrina has made landfall on Washington's deliberations over vacancies on the U.S. Supreme Court and threatens to make John Roberts' confirmation hearings for chief justice a contentious test of conservative thought.

Democrats and liberal groups say Roberts' past opposition to expanded affirmative action and voting rights laws should get extra scrutiny, especially in light of the disproportionate suffering by poor black residents of New Orleans.

Democrats have long advocated a more activist government, while conservatives have pressed for a smaller federal bureaucracy that gives more power to the states. Democrats believe that Katrina has focused attention on a broader function of the federal government - not only in rescue, relief and rebuilding but also in setting policies that protect the most vulnerable.

In that vein, the questions Roberts will face will be part of a larger Democratic strategy designed to confront conservative orthodoxy head on.

"The events of the past week have only underscored that we need Supreme Court justices who value the role of the courts in protecting individuals' rights and freedoms, who understand the nature of discrimination and its continuing impact on our country, and who will uphold the role of the federal government in preserving those rights and acting to protect the common good," said Ralph Neas, president of the liberal People for the American Way.

Roberts was to face hearings Tuesday before the Senate Judiciary Committee as the nominee to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. But on Monday, President Bush nominated Roberts to replace Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who died Saturday. The Judiciary Committee planned to delay the start of Roberts' hearings to later this week or next week.

Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, a member of the Judiciary Committee, said he believed using Katrina to question Roberts on civil rights was "a stretch."

He said Roberts' legal conservatism makes him much more like Rehnquist than O'Connor, who is considered more moderate. "A Roberts for a Rehnquist ought to be less controversial than a Roberts for an O'Connor," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0003535

But Sen. Edward Kennedy, who already was prepared before Katrina hit to spend his hearing time questioning Roberts about civil rights, was expected to emphasize the racial disparities revealed by Katrina's destruction.

Kennedy, D-Mass., is expected to zero in on Roberts' internal memoranda while he was a young lawyer in the Reagan administration, when he advised the White House to fight efforts to expand the reach of anti-discrimination laws and the Voting Rights Act.

"Roberts wants to restrict the role of government," said Jenny Backus, a Democratic consultant. "His early writings ... have really raised question about what he will perceive as the appropriate role for strong centralized government. You will see more questions about that, especially with him as chief."

Despite the stepped up scrutiny, Roberts' confirmation still appears likely.

Chief justices are considered first among equals, but have significant authority in assigning court opinions when they are in the majority, a power that can determine whether a ruling will have broad legal implications or narrow applications.

When Rehnquist was elevated to chief justice in 1986, Democrats criticized his record on civil rights and accused him of working to intimidate black and Hispanic voters as a Republican poll watcher in Arizona in the early 1960s. In the end, Rehnquist got 33 "no" votes, more than any other chief justice in history.

Will Roberts Choose Candor Or Silence Before Senate? (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Law.com, September 7, 2005

By today, Supreme Court nominee John Roberts Jr. was supposed to be answering the questions of Senate Judiciary Committee members as part of his confirmation hearing to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Instead, because of the death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist on Saturday, and the swift decision by President George W. Bush to put Roberts in the chief justice's spot instead, the Roberts hearing has been put off until Monday.

But when the hearing finally gets underway, the questions will likely be the same, and the dilemma for Roberts will be the same, though possibly more urgent: how candid should he be about his views on the law? It's a crucial decision for Roberts to make. Senate Democrats will be insisting on as much candor as possible, while Republicans hope and expect Roberts will stay out of trouble by invoking a previously unheard of doctrine called the "Ginsburg precedent."

In anticipation of a reticent Roberts, conservatives offered evidence of what the Federalist Society said was the "vast number" of times Clinton nominee Ruth Bader Ginsburg declined to answer substantive questions during her 1993 confirmation hearing. Liberal groups including the American Constitution Society fired back, documenting all the moments when Ginsburg actually answered questions "candidly and at length."

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-NY, gave a speech last week debunking the conservative version of the Ginsburg precedent, warning that if Roberts invokes it, it will sound more like taking the Fifth. On the other side, former Republican Attorneys General Edwin Meese III, Dick Thornburgh and William Barr, among others, wrote to the Judiciary Committee reminding members that Ginsburg said during her hearing that she would give "no hints, no forecast, no previews" of how she might vote on future cases.

But Ginsburg is far from the only nominee who said little -- or a lot, depending on which version you believe -- to the assembled senators reviewing a Supreme Court nomination.

During the 1986 cakewalk enjoyed by Justice Antonin Scalia, the late Sen. Strom Thurmond asked him a softball question about the meaning of Marbury v. Madison, the 1803 decision that declared the Court's power to review acts of Congress. "I do not think I should answer questions regarding any specific Supreme Court opinion, even one as fundamental as Marbury v. Madison," Scalia said coyly.

More famously, nominee Clarence Thomas in his 1991 hearing denied ever having discussed Roe v. Wade as a law student. Few believed him, but it may have been a safer answer than if he had been more candid.

All recent nominees, in fact, have declined to answer questions that they or their handlers thought would get them in trouble. But they also have yielded just enough information to give the media something to chew on and give senators a feeling of accomplishment.

Nominee David Souter in 1990 probably gave Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., more than he expected when he asked Souter an unusual question: How he thought his predecessor, William Brennan, Jr. would be remembered. Souter replied that Brennan would be remembered as "one of the most fearless, principled guardians of the American Constitution that it has ever had and ever will have." In retrospect, Souter's fervor in praising the liberal lion might have been an early signal that Souter was not the conservative that Republicans hoped he would be.

If Roberts wants to be more candid next week than some past nominees, he would have ample precedent from both ends of the spectrum.

DOJ_NMG_0003536

In 2002 Scalia -- the same justice who would not discuss Marbury v. Madison -- took a more expansive view in his ruling in Republican Party of Minnesota v. White. That decision dealt with what judicial candidates can and cannot say during a judicial election, but Scalia's words resonate in the context of appointed candidates.

"A judge's lack of predisposition regarding the relevant legal issues in a case has never been thought a necessary component of equal justice, and with good reason," wrote Scalia. "For one thing, it is virtually impossible to find a judge who does not have preconceptions about the law."

Indeed, Scalia added, "even if it were possible to select judges who did not have preconceived views on legal issues, it would hardly be desirable to do so," since it would indicate that the judge had not thought much about the law.

A more recent example of judicial candor came just last month from the more liberal Justice John Paul Stevens. In a speech before the Clark County Bar Association in Las Vegas Aug. 18, Stevens reviewed Supreme Court decisions from last term that produced "results that I consider unwise." They were also, he added, decisions he either wrote or joined.

Two of the cases he mentioned were ones he actually wrote: Kelo v. City of New London and Gonzales v. Raich.

In the controversial Kelo case, Stevens upheld the power of the town of New London, Conn., to take private property by eminent domain for private development by others, a result he said was "entirely divorced from my judgment concerning the wisdom of the program."

Likewise in Raich, Stevens said he agreed with "the policy choice made by millions of voters" in California to legalize the medical use of marijuana. Yet he wrote an opinion favoring the federal anti-drug laws that supersede the California initiative.

As a result of his speech, the public now knows what Stevens personally believes about eminent domain and medical marijuana. Yet if those issues come to the Court again, would anyone suggest that Stevens could not rule impartially?

By the same token, what would happen if Roberts were just as candid and told the Senate Judiciary Committee what he really thinks about issues large and small? Then the question would be whether he, like Stevens, could set aside those views as a Supreme Court justice. And that may be the most important and difficult question of all.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

Minutemen go north

Former Yonkers, N.Y., Mayor John Spencer is joining with the Minutemen to bring the all-volunteer patrol to America's northern borders.

The Minutemen have concentrated their efforts in the Southwest to discourage illegal immigration from Mexico. What about New York, Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont?

Mr. Spencer will meet with the Minutemen on Saturday at an American Legion Hall in Babylon, N.Y. He is intent on organizing and training volunteers to patrol the northern border in those four states.

"Those immigrating are not the enemy; the drug dealers, the criminals and the potential terrorists hiding among them are the enemy," Mr. Spencer said yesterday calling the Minutemen "force multipliers."

Mr. Spencer is a candidate for the Republican nomination to challenge New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton in 2006.

One judge to another

Robert H. Bork, the Reagan-era Supreme Court nominee rejected by the Senate after his 1987 confirmation hearings devolved into public spectacle, says he wants Judge John G. Roberts Jr. to be confirmed as the next chief justice.

Speaking at the National Press Club yesterday, Mr. Bork suggested it's unlikely Supreme Court confirmation hearings ever again will resemble "any dignified process."

"Today's confirmations are political struggles, political circuses, and there may be no going back," said Mr. Bork, a former federal judge.

"Mr. Bork offered Judge Roberts, and any other upcoming nominee, advice for a Senate hearing:

"Don't write or say anything about the Constitution. Judge Roberts has already satisfied that requirement. The second: Don't commit your vote at the hearings on any issues. If you are drawn into a commitment to how you will vote, you'll only be ratifying the corruption of the confirmation process. And third, don't make it obvious that you think some of the senators' questions reveal that they haven't a clue about the Constitution or its interpretations."

Dad to the rescue

Former President George Bush is fed up with unreasonable attacks on his son, President Bush.

"The media has a fascination with the blame game," the senior Mr. Bush told CNN. "There was one particularly vicious comment that the president didn't care, was insensitive on ethnicity, insensitive about race. That one hurt, because I know this president, and I know he does care."

DOJ_NMG_0003537

Mr. Bush continued: "Huge numbers of dollars have been appropriated or signed off on for the Congress, both Senate and the House, and he had to push forward. He cannot listen to every critic from the editorial page of the New York Times."

The former president also questioned certain media reports.

"I talked to Haley Barbour, the governor of Mississippi, yesterday because some people were saying, 'Well, if you hadn't sent your National Guard to Iraq, we here in Mississippi would be better off.' He told me 'I've been out in the field every single day, hour, for four days and no one, not one single mention of the word 'Iraq.'

"Where does that come from?" Mr. Bush asked. "Where does that story come from if the governor is not picking up one word about it?"

17, 5 and 2

"The New York Times today seemed so excited to see former President Bill Clinton involved in hurricane relief that it practically ignored his partner in this pursuit, former President [George] Bush," the Media Research Center noted yesterday.

According to one analysis, one Times story cited "Mr. Clinton by name at least 17 times, his wife five times, while the former President Bush is actually only named twice. From this, one would think that he's such an afterthought that this effort should be called the Clinton-Clinton Katrina Fund," the watchdog noted.

Celeb update

The trail of Hollywood hand-wringers grows in the wake of Katrina.

Among the stars who have either sounded off about -- or arrived in -- New Orleans for better or worse: Oprah Winfrey, the gray-bearded ex-James Bond Pierce Brosnan, Halle Berry, John Travolta and Sean Penn, who sank in his own ill-fated rescue boat.

Some showbiz types take action, though. Talk-radio host Rush Limbaugh has announced he will stage a benefit performance for hurricane victims in Manhattan. "Rush On Broadway" will have a single show Oct. 18 at New York's New Amsterdam Theater.

The event also will feature a special introduction by Fox News and talk-radio host Sean Hannity.

An insoluble woe?

Former Attorney General John Ashcroft yesterday said that U.S. problems with immigration along its porous border might be insoluble, reports Shaun Waterman of United Press International.

Speaking on efforts to address what he called government's "biggest challenge" -- the country's immigration policy and border-control regime -- Mr. Ashcroft said: "We're a long way from home there, and I don't know if we'll ever get that solved."

He spoke during a conference organized by the New America Foundation on terrorism and U.S. security.

Mr. Ashcroft said that the border's intractability mostly stems from conflicting goals, and also the sheer scale of the issue.

"We've got to try and find a way to welcome people and facilitate people who are bringing productivity and industry into the country," he said, "while at the same time we're careful about welcoming people who would bring devastation into the country."

"The real big problem is we've got 550 million border crossings a year," he said. "Think about that."

Question of attitude

Scripps Howard columnist Star Parker yesterday denounced statements by the Congressional Black Caucus, the Rev. Jesse Jackson and others that imply rescue efforts in New Orleans were impeded by racism.

"It is grossly irresponsible to imply that racism is at work here," said Miss Parker, founder of the Los Angeles-based Coalition on Urban Renewal and Education.

"The relevant question to ask is: 'Why, after these many years, does our African American population remain disproportionately poor?' " she said. "Those who assert that rescue efforts were impeded because of racism also assert that black poverty persists because of racism. It is this attitude, the welfare-state mentality, that has contributed in no small part to the tragedy we have witnessed."

For Chief Justice, A Final Session With His Court (WP)

By Susan Levine And Charles Lane

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

The flag-draped wooden coffin of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist was carried with slow, halting steps yesterday, up the long marble sweep of the institution where he presided for nearly two decades, between two silent lines of colleagues, staff and former law clerks, into a columned corridor where the mighty and humble alike began paying respects.

It was a journey that lasted only minutes, yet few gathered in the morning crowd outside the Supreme Court missed the most telling moments: when John G. Roberts Jr., the man nominated to succeed Rehnquist, walked solemnly with the other pallbearers toward the hearse bearing his body, and when an emotional Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, on the eve of her own planned farewell, wiped away tears as the plain white pine coffin passed and entered the building's Great Hall.

DOJ_NMG_0003538

There, it was placed on the historic Lincoln Catafalque, which was covered in black velvet. Busts of Rehnquist's 15 predecessors as chief justice line the room where O'Connor and five other justices joined with his children and grandchildren in a short prayer service.

"Rest here now, child of God, William Hubbs Rehnquist," intoned the Rev. George W. Evans Jr., pastor of Lutheran Church of the Holy Redeemer in McLean, which Rehnquist attended for many years. "Rest here in the halls you know so well."

In those usually calm, reasoned halls -- where Rehnquist had been known simply as "the Chief" since President Ronald Reagan elevated him to the post in 1986 -- feelings flowed freely. Roberts, one of those former clerks, seemed to struggle to keep his composure. Justice Antonin Scalia brushed a tear from his eye.

And O'Connor, a tough westerner raised amid cattlemen and rattlesnakes, sobbed openly; her friendship with Rehnquist dated more than a half-century to their law school days at Stanford University.

Outside, flags flew at half staff as a steady procession of visitors waited for admittance through the court's massive bronze doors. President Bush and the first lady arrived just before 4 p.m. and were escorted in through another, secured entrance. They stood before the coffin briefly, then walked over to view the formal painting of Rehnquist in his black judicial robes, on display for the first time.

Official Washington was joined throughout the day by tourists, teachers, bankers, ministers. Even when disagreeing with Rehnquist's unwaveringly conservative legal views, they said they appreciated his consistency, his leadership, the brilliance of his reasoning.

"He served this country well for a very long time," said sociology professor Roger Nemeth of Holland, Mich., drawing nods from those around him.

Representing Rehnquist's native state was Shirley S. Abrahamson, chief justice of the Wisconsin Supreme Court, whose take on his legacy is far more honed than most. So, too, is her personal connection: Rehnquist swore her into her position nearly a decade ago.

"You have someone who is widely praised as an administrator and chief, who's been fair and equitable with all the justices and managed to win their respect and regard" -- despite often sharp differences of opinion, Abrahamson reflected. "He stood up for administrative issues and judicial independence."

At 9:40 p.m., 20 minutes before the viewing was to end, more than 200 people still waited. They formed a line that stretched for 1 1/2 blocks, even after some were told by police that they probably would not make it inside the building.

At least 70 people remained as 10 p.m. came -- and went. The door remained open, and all those in line were allowed to pay their respects.

The public viewing continues from 10 a.m. to noon today. The 80-year-old Rehnquist, who died Saturday at his home in Arlington after battling thyroid cancer, will be buried at Arlington National Cemetery after a funeral service at 2 p.m. today at St. Matthew's Cathedral in Northwest Washington.

Evans and two other ministers from Holy Redeemer will conduct the service. Bush and O'Connor are expected to offer eulogies, as are two of the chief justice's children, James Rehnquist and Nancy Spears, and granddaughter Natalie Lynch.

Court officials said all eight justices will attend. Justice Anthony M. Kennedy was unable to make it back yesterday from travels in China, and Justice David H. Souter also was out of town.

Roberts, Rehnquist Compel Comparisons (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — For a quarter-century, William Rehnquist was a mentor to John Roberts, the federal appeals court judge now nominated to succeed the late chief justice.

Roberts was a law clerk to Rehnquist in 1980-81, and like Rehnquist, he became a lawyer for a conservative White House. When he wrote policy memos for President Reagan and legal briefs for the first President Bush, Roberts occasionally cited the work of Rehnquist, who died Saturday of thyroid cancer at age 80.

The close relationship between the two Midwesterners was evident Tuesday, when Roberts, 50, was one of eight pallbearers who carried Rehnquist's casket up the marble steps to the Supreme Court's Great Hall. The moment seemed to symbolize a transition of sorts, and with Roberts facing confirmation hearings in the Senate on Monday it was a reminder of a question that will be part of the backdrop to the hearings: how Roberts' style and brand of conservatism compares with that of the man he would succeed.

“It's hard to imagine a choice more similar to Chief Justice Rehnquist than John Roberts,” says Walter Dellinger, a former U.S. solicitor general. “They both love the law and they both are among a handful of the most intellectually accomplished legal minds.”

DOJ_NMG_0003539

Although Roberts' brief record in his work for the government and his 2½ years as a federal judge makes it difficult to predict precisely how he would view the law as chief justice, Dellinger believes that Roberts' views "would be closer to Rehnquist's than any other justice on the court."

Rehnquist, who was on the high court for 33 years — 19 of them as chief — sought a limited role for federal judges in American life and had a narrow view of individual rights. He voted against the court's decision in Roe v. Wade, the 1973 ruling that made abortion legal nationwide. He opposed affirmative action and policies intended to help racial minorities rebound after years of segregation. He also endorsed a low wall of separation between church and state.

Overall, Rehnquist believed that the nation's social dilemmas should be resolved by legislators, not judges. When he was appointed to the court in 1972 by President Nixon, Rehnquist's views often made him a lone dissenter on what was then a liberal court. But as Republican presidents continued to make appointments and Rehnquist was elevated to chief justice in 1986 by President Reagan, Rehnquist gained a majority on many fronts. (Abortion is an exception; six justices on the current court — including the retiring Sandra Day O'Connor — have backed abortion rights.)

Ted Cruz, a Texas solicitor general who is another former law clerk to Rehnquist, says he believes Roberts shares Rehnquist's support of judicial restraint. "Both believe it is principally the role of the democratically elected officials to make policy," says Cruz, who is here for Rehnquist's funeral today.

Much remains unknown about Roberts' current views, however. Thousands of pages of memos from his years in the Reagan and first Bush administrations indicate that he was a loyal foot soldier for conservative agendas. But it's not clear how he might vote today on divisive issues such as abortion rights, affirmative action and the separation of church and state.

Some Democratic senators, including Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Charles Schumer of New York, say they are troubled by Roberts' writings on civil rights and women's issues.

When he was a lawyer in the Reagan White House in the 1980s, Roberts sometimes was dismissive about women's claims of job and pay discrimination. He also sought to curtail the use of affirmative action in government and to limit judicial orders for school busing. He criticized a 1985 Supreme Court ruling that struck down an Alabama law requiring a "moment of silence" in schools, and he praised Rehnquist's stance in dissent of the ruling.

And yet, since President Bush originally nominated Roberts in mid-July to succeed O'Connor, Roberts' nomination generally has been well-received by senators.

Now that Bush has switched gears and nominated Roberts for the Rehnquist opening, Roberts is poised to make history: A few former Supreme Court law clerks have gone on to be justices — including Rehnquist, who worked for Justice Robert Jackson in the 1952-53 term — but Roberts would be the first court appointee to take the seat of his former boss.

Friends and colleagues of Rehnquist and Roberts use phrases such as "down to earth" and "amiable" to describe the personalities of Rehnquist, a Wisconsin native, and Roberts, who was born in Buffalo and grew up in Indiana. "There's a lot of personal warmth there," says Chuck Cooper, who like Roberts was a law clerk to Rehnquist and then worked in the Reagan administration. Cooper also says that Roberts and Rehnquist have compatible views of the law.

Their somewhat similar styles — along with the fact that Roberts argued 39 cases before the high court as a lawyer in government and private practice — could make it easier for Roberts to suddenly become the senior member of the bench and run the justices' private conferences.

"It will be an extraordinary moment in the first confidential conference when a legendary figure like William Rehnquist is replaced at the head of the table by someone so junior," says Dellinger, who was a law clerk to the late Justice Hugo Black. "But John Roberts is one of the few people who would be up to that challenge."

There are differences between the two men. Being 30 years younger than Rehnquist, Roberts might ultimately reveal a different worldview on contemporary issues such as gay rights. Rehnquist consistently voted against gay rights. Roberts, when he was in private practice, helped a team of lawyers that successfully urged the high court to strike down a Colorado law that barred cities from protecting lesbians and gay men from discrimination.

During court sessions, Rehnquist also had a no-nonsense devotion to punctuality that Roberts would be hard-pressed to match. The late chief justice insisted that lawyers at the lectern stop talking as soon as a red light in the court illuminated, signaling their time was up. When lawyers made their arguments, Rehnquist often would cut them off in midsentence.

"When that light went on, if you didn't notice it, he certainly did," Cooper says. "I would be surprised if John is as abrupt and severe as the boss."

Former Aide Roberts Helps Bear Rehnquist's Coffin (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003540

WASHINGTON — The man who hopes to succeed William Rehnquist as chief justice helped carry the late jurist's plain pine coffin Tuesday up the marble steps of the Supreme Court, where friends, family and the public filed by all day to pay last respects.

John Roberts was one of eight ex-Rehnquist aides who served as pallbearers. President Bush later paid a solemn visit to the court, a day after nominating the federal appeals court judge to become the nation's 17th chief justice.

Rehnquist died of cancer Saturday at age 80. Bush will be one of the speakers today at a service at St. Matthew's Cathedral. Rehnquist will be buried at Arlington National Cemetery after the state funeral.

After a brief ceremony at the Supreme Court, Roberts crossed the street for a meeting with Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter. The Pennsylvania Republican will preside over Roberts' confirmation hearings beginning Monday. Specter predicted a "thorough and piercing" confirmation process for Roberts, who could influence the court for decades. Roberts, 50, would be the youngest chief justice since 1801, when John Adams appointed 45-year-old John Marshall.

Democrats say that will mean even closer scrutiny for Roberts, originally tapped to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Bush switched Roberts to the chief justice job after Rehnquist's death.

"I have some concerns with his writings a number of years ago concerning the rights of women and civil rights," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Some of the memos that have been released from Roberts' years as a lawyer for the Reagan White House show him arguing to limit the reach of federal laws designed to protect the rights of minorities and women.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., is pushing for a Senate vote on Roberts by the last week of the month, which would allow the judge to take his seat on the high court when it opens its next session Oct. 3. Reid said he's making no promises on the date for a confirmation vote. However, he and Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, top-ranking Judiciary Committee Democrat, indicated any slowdown would be due to substantive questions, not parliamentary maneuvering.

"I will work with Sen. Specter to make sure there are no procedural delays," Leahy said.

Leahy and Specter said they would like to see Bush nominate a woman to O'Connor's seat. "The two women are, I think, a minimum," said Specter, referring to O'Connor and Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg. However, he added, "I don't believe anybody ought to tie the president's hands."

O'Connor, who has agreed to stay on until the Senate confirms her successor, was standing on the steps with five of her fellow justices Monday. She wept as Rehnquist's flag-draped coffin passed.

Inside the court, the coffin was set onto a black catafalque first constructed in 1865 for President Lincoln. Since then, it has been used as a bier for a number of American leaders, most recently for former president Ronald Reagan.

A portrait of Rehnquist stood at the head of the room. Two bouquets of red roses, white snapdragons and blue bellflowers stood at either end of the coffin.

Mourners ranged from 12-year-old Sarah Strickland, visiting with her parents from Enterprise, Ala., and hoping for a glimpse of history, to Lloyd Roberts, a retired Supreme Court policeman who occasionally served as a driver for Rehnquist and called him "a real intellectual." Roberts is no relation to the Supreme Court nominee.

Bo Rutledge, a former law clerk for Justice Clarence Thomas, said Rehnquist was "very approachable" and liked to lunch with clerks. "He always took an interest in the people around him," said Rutledge, who teaches at Catholic University law school.

Chief Justice's Death Hits O'Connor Hard (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — As Chief Justice William Rehnquist's flag-draped casket was carried up the Supreme Court steps Tuesday morning, one of the most compelling images was the distraught, tear-streaked face of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Her public sadness was a reminder of all that Rehnquist and the nation's first female justice had been through together. They met in law school at Stanford University in the late 1940s. The World War II veteran was nearly six years her senior, but they developed a bond that endured through the years. They dated briefly, but then married other college sweethearts. Their families became close as Rehnquist and O'Connor walked remarkably similar paths.

In the 1960s, they lived in Phoenix and practiced law. They were active in Republican politics and became acolytes of conservative Arizona Sen. Barry Goldwater.

Rehnquist was an assistant U.S. attorney general on Oct. 21, 1971, when President Nixon nominated him to the Supreme Court. O'Connor, then a state senator in Arizona, sprung into action on Rehnquist's behalf. On the floor of the Arizona Senate the next day, she called her friend "one of the most brilliant legal minds in the country" and said that because he was only 47, he might one day be elevated to chief.

DOJ_NMG_0003541

When Rehnquist was sworn in as an associate justice on Jan. 7, 1972, O'Connor was in the courtroom. She joined him on the bench in 1981, tapped by President Reagan in a historic appointment. Five years later, Reagan made Rehnquist chief justice when Warren Burger retired.

On June 27 of this year, their last day together in the courtroom, O'Connor helped Rehnquist down from the bench. Suffering from thyroid cancer, he looked frail.

As Rehnquist was expected to retire, it came as a surprise that week when O'Connor, 75, said she was stepping down to take care of her ailing husband, John. President Bush chose federal judge John Roberts to replace O'Connor, who said she would stay on the court until she was replaced. But after Rehnquist's death Saturday, Bush made Roberts the nominee for chief. So now, with her friend gone, O'Connor remains.

Bush And First Lady Visit Rehnquist's Coffin At Court (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6 - President Bush and his wife, Laura, made an unscheduled visit on Tuesday to the Supreme Court to pay their respects to Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, whose flag-draped coffin lay in the "great hall" that leads to the courtroom.

Hours earlier, Judge John G. Roberts Jr., whom the president has nominated to succeed the chief justice, had helped to carry the coffin into the court building and place it on the historic Lincoln Catafalque, on which President Lincoln's coffin once lay.

All day, members of official Washington as well as private citizens and tourists filed by the coffin. An oil portrait of the chief justice, who died Saturday at the age of 80, was placed nearby. Painted in 1994 by Thomas Loepp, it shows the four gold stripes with which the chief justice decorated each sleeve of his judicial robe and depicts him with a slightly bemused expression.

During their brief midafternoon visit, the president and first lady walked together to the coffin, and then examined the portrait in the company of Justice Antonin Scalia and Sally Rider, the chief justice's administrative assistant.

Chief Justice Rehnquist will be buried at Arlington National Cemetery on Wednesday after a funeral at St. Matthew's Cathedral here. Reporters will be permitted to attend the Mass, although no still or television cameras will be allowed. The press will be barred from the burial. The grandson of Swedish immigrants, Chief Justice Rehnquist was Lutheran, not Roman Catholic.

His pastor, the Rev. George W. Evans Jr., of the Lutheran Church of the Redeemer in McLean, Va., told reporters that with 350 seats, that church was too small. He said the Roman Catholic Archdiocese had offered the 2,000-seat cathedral, familiar to many of the justices for its annual Red Mass, a worship service that honors the judiciary.

Judge Roberts, a clerk for then-Associate Justice Rehnquist 25 years ago, was one of eight pallbearers. The others were a former administrative assistant to the chief justice, James Duff, and six other former law clerks: David G. Leitch, Frederick W. Lambert, Ronald J. Tenpas, Kerri Martin Bartlett, Gregory G. Garre and John C. Englander.

Dozens of other clerks who served the chief justice during his 33-year tenure also joined family members and six of the current justices in paying respects, standing by the white-pine coffin at a brief prayer service that Mr. Evans led before the court was opened to the public.

Along with Justice Scalia, Justices John Paul Stevens, Sandra Day O'Connor, Clarence Thomas, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer were present for the service. Justice Anthony M. Kennedy was returning from China, and Justice David H. Souter from New Hampshire. All the justices will be at the funeral.

After the service, the chief justices' former law clerks took turns standing guard in pairs by the coffin. The building, while closed for official business all day, remained open to the public for viewing the coffin until 10 p.m. and will be open again on Wednesday morning.

Court employees, from the most senior officers to the most junior workers, also attended the brief private service. For most, Chief Justice Rehnquist had been a presence during their working lives at the court.

Among members of the public, the first in line was Martha Hamilton, a graduate student at Regent University in Virginia Beach, who arrived at 4 a.m. She had deferred her return to school after the Labor Day weekend because, she said, "I felt like this was a historic opportunity to participate in honoring the chief justice and the position of chief justice."

Others in the line, which stretched the length of the court steps and down the block, included David and T. J. Voell, 35-year-old twins from Wilmington, Del., both bankers who had taken time off to come to Washington and attend the confirmation hearing for Judge Roberts that had been scheduled to begin Tuesday. The hearing has been postponed until next Monday.

Rehnquist's 'Strong Legacy' Hailed (WT)

By Stephanie Mansfield

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003542

Solemn and respectful they stood, single file, and at times the line snaked around the block in the September sunshine: congressional staffers, college kids in baseball caps, tourists, Capitol Hill groundskeepers, many on their lunch break.

Few had met Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who was lying in a plain wooden coffin draped with an American flag inside the Supreme Court building yesterday, but all expressed the same sentiment: They were there to pay their respects.

"I met him once when I was a White House fellow," said Army Lt. Col. Barrye Price, wearing his dark green uniform and black beret. "I respect his service to our nation. You felt his sense of power and his sense of humility."

In attendance were Chief Justice Rehnquist's colleagues, including a tearful Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was once his Stanford Law School classmate.

The nation's 16th chief justice will be buried today at Arlington National Cemetery.

One veteran came from Fort Belvoir, Va., to pay his respects.

"He leaves a strong legacy for the country," said Steve Clark, 38, who lost his right arm in a road explosion in Iraq two years ago.

As they waited, the mourners discussed Chief Justice Rehnquist's long tenure on the nation's highest court.

"Courts in general have gotten too active," said contractor David Paine, 51. "I think he was a good man, and I supported his ideas. Like him, I think less should be more."

Marlin Britton, 38, who works at the Library of Congress, wasn't interested in the chief justice's politics or beliefs. "Let history tell how well he did the job. This is of historical interest. You respect someone of his stature."

Barbara Mack, 81, was visiting from Chicago. "We respected Justice Rehnquist greatly. We wanted to pay our respects," she said.

Once inside the Great Hall, up the long white marble steps, mourners walked slowly past the coffin. It was carried up the step yesterday morning, borne by Chief Justice Rehnquist's seven former law clerks, including Judge John G. Roberts Jr. Judge Roberts has been picked to replace his former boss, and his Senate confirmation hearings will begin next week.

Flanked by two tall freestanding floral arrangements of blood-red full-blown roses and white and purple delphinium, the coffin rested on the Lincoln catafalque, the bier where President Lincoln's body was placed after his assassination in 1865.

Resting on an easel was a 1994 oil portrait by Thomas Loepp, showing the chief justice in his court robes, next to a globe that was a gift from his law clerks.

The morning began with a prayer service attended by his colleagues, children and grandchildren, and former staffers. Many had tears in their eyes.

Chief Justice Rehnquist, 80, died of thyroid cancer at his Arlington home Saturday. He was a member of the Redeemer Lutheran Church in McLean, where he will be remembered more for his familial than judicial duties.

"I was more impressed by him as a father and grandfather, as well as chief justice," said fellow church member Chuck Clopton, who was standing in line yesterday to pay his respects. "I loved his sense of humor. He was a very kind man, and not impressed with himself."

Mr. Clopton said he is planning to attend Chief Justice Rehnquist's funeral today at 2 p.m. at St. Matthew's Cathedral in Northwest Washington. The World War II veteran will be interred in a private burial service at Arlington, where his predecessors as chief justice, Warren E. Burger and Earl Warren, are buried -- as is his wife, Natalie, who died in 1991.

"He was really a great leader and upheld many decisions that were controversial," said 21-year-old Katherine Litras, a student at American University who came yesterday with two friends. "I hope they find someone as great to replace him."

Rehnquist's Legacy (USAT)

USA Today, September 7, 2005

Chief Justice William Rehnquist was that rarity among public officials: one who worked to make his office less powerful. From his days as a Supreme Court clerk a half-century ago until his death Saturday after 33 years on the court, Rehnquist argued for leaving important decisions to state legislatures or, if necessary, Congress — not the courts. The result was a career that foreshadowed much of today's political debate, and one that helps to focus it.

In his early years on the court, Rehnquist, an intensely conservative member of what was then a very liberal court, was so isolated that he was sometimes called the "Lone Ranger." As the nation as a whole grew more conservative, the court moved in his direction. States gained more latitude, producing restrictions on abortion, and blurring the line between church and state. Congressional power increasingly came under challenge. Affirmative action was restricted.

In most cases, Rehnquist led that charge, reflecting a judicial philosophy formed much earlier, one that not only favored state power over federal but also over the individual.

While clerking for Justice Robert Jackson during the 1951 and '53 terms, Rehnquist objected to "ivory tower jurisprudence" — hearing appeals from criminals claiming to have been wrongly convicted in state courts or brutalized by the police. He derided justices with qualms about the death penalty as "like a bunch of old women." He rejected calls for civil rights laws as unnecessary and wrote a memo for his boss, from which he later tried to distance himself, defending the constitutionality of racial segregation.

Such attitudes were not uncommon at the time. But Rehnquist remained at odds with the direction the court would take during the 1950s and 1960s as it overturned the national stain of racial segregation, extended protections to criminal suspects and defendants and, for a time, outlawed the death penalty.

After joining the court in 1972 (he was elevated to chief justice in 1986), Rehnquist regularly objected to broad interpretations of the Constitution on social issues such as abortion and on routinely allowing federal mandates on the states.

How Rehnquist's record is viewed will depend on where the viewer resides on the political spectrum. Over the years in this space, we've both favored and opposed positions Rehnquist joined, but we've regularly expressed concern about intrusions on personal rights — from privacy, to a woman's right to choose, to religious freedom, to issues of race.

We'd argue now that for the nation's minorities and women, for defendants railroaded by a flawed system of justice and for others who have turned to the courts for redress, it's fortunate that Rehnquist's views on those subjects have not prevailed.

But that does not detract from the man's significance, or his integrity, or his devotion to the law — all of which are substantial and not fully recognized by the public. His aggressive questioning of lawyers in oral arguments, and his blunt refusal to consider allowing cameras in the courtroom, as well as the political intensity his views provoked, created a gruff image at odds with the one described by those who knew him best.

Rehnquist's conduct of the televised Senate impeachment trial of President Clinton introduced the chief justice to many Americans as a calm and fair-minded administrator, a trait that drew praise over the years even from the justices who disagreed with him most often on the law. The personal fondness he inspired was on view Tuesday as mourners passed by his casket at the Supreme Court before today's funeral service.

In the pulling and hauling of public debate, it is important that articulate voices such as Rehnquist's be heard, particularly when they are in the minority. That is even more important on the court, where judges isolated from much of society benefit from a diversity of thought and experience. The downside of a legal philosophy that limits the power of the court is that it also limits the protection of individual rights and liberties.

Ironies Abound As Rehnquist Leaves Us (USAT)

By Tony Mauro

USA Today, September 7, 2005

Death knows no timetable, so it is sad but unsurprising that Chief Justice William Rehnquist's death came at a most inopportune time, full of ironies.

Many of the ironies of his death were personal. But it also was remarkable that Rehnquist died at a moment when the nation was completely distracted by a crisis that relates significantly to his judicial legacy. The finger-pointing between state and federal officials over the handling of Hurricane Katrina's awful devastation is a debate that Rehnquist would have found familiar.

At the personal level, it is sad that this determined and devoted man did not live long enough to see his friend and former clerk John Roberts Jr. become a colleague on the court. Rehnquist had toughed out his battle with thyroid cancer and seemed fixated on working until he could work no more. Perhaps he was inspired to stay to the bitter end by Robert Jackson, the justice for whom he had clerked more than 50 years earlier. Jackson rose from his sick bed to join the court's landmark Brown v. Board of Education decision in 1954 and died a few months later. Ironically, until Rehnquist, Jackson was the last Supreme Court justice to die in office.

It would have been a first for Rehnquist to serve alongside one of his own former law clerks, and it would have made Rehnquist very proud. Roberts had been appointed in July to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor; instead, with Rehnquist's passing on Saturday, President Bush shuffled things around and appointed Roberts on Monday to replace Rehnquist. Another irony: Roberts regards Rehnquist as his mentor, and now is about to replace him.

Roberts and Rehnquist have many similarities, not only in their conservative perspectives but also in their sharp intellect and keen sense of humor. When Rehnquist, an unassuming man, told a funny story, he would start giggling before he finished his sentence. Years ago, when I asked Roberts why he lost a case before the court 9-0, his deadpan answer was, "Because there are only nine justices."

State vs. federal role

If Hurricane Katrina had not wreaked havoc on the Gulf Coast, we would have been reading more about Rehnquist and his legacy. But the hurricane's aftermath actually turns out to be a teachable moment about Rehnquist.

DOJ_NMG_0003544

Much of the nationwide anger has been over the delay in the federal response to the hurricane's awful onslaught. Federal officials, for their part, have suggested that states and localities have primary responsibility in such matters, and did not move quickly enough either.

The balance of power between state and federal government is a perennial debate, and Rehnquist spent much of his career on the Supreme Court trying to readjust that balance in favor of states. Following what he believed to be the intent of the Constitution's framers, Rehnquist tried mightily to rein in Congress and keep it and federal agencies from turning states into unimportant subsidiaries that must depend on the federal government to act. The Bush administration is filled with adherents to Rehnquist's doctrine; Michael Leavitt, the secretary of Health and Human Services who has become a familiar figure since the hurricane, first gained national attention as a Utah governor who pushed hard against federal domination of the states.

So at a policy level, it probably should have been no surprise that the Bush administration hung back too long before federalizing the relief effort. In a broad context, there are valid arguments to be made against excessive federal power. If you think about it, it should be difficult to send U.S. soldiers into the streets of the USA for essentially law enforcement duties; it is in our national genes not to want federal troops used against our own citizens.

That said, though, there has to be a way to overcome this reluctance more quickly when troops are needed domestically for humanitarian reasons. And the hurricane aftermath proves the seemingly obvious point that there are times when a swift and strong federal response must pre-empt competing or confused state and local interests. The terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, also showed the need for a strong national government; states and localities are not equipped to chase after Osama bin Laden.

A shift on the court

In fact, it seems that since 9/11, some of the steam went out of Chief Justice Rehnquist's conservative, pro-states juggernaut. And it's not just because a strong federal government comes in handy sometimes; it's also because some states are doing some pretty liberal things, legalizing everything from medical marijuana to same-sex marriages. A few months before he died, Rehnquist voted in favor of California's medical marijuana law on states' rights grounds, but he was on the losing side. Even Justice Antonin Scalia, a usual ally in protecting state power, suddenly embraced federal preeminence in the area of drug laws. Progressives, observing the Republican-dominated federal government, are turning to the states to fight their battles.

Usually, the tension between state and federal power is discussed at the eye-glazing level of theory and abstraction. Hurricane Katrina has laid the debate before us in dramatic, real-life terms: When should states take care of themselves, and when should the federal government take over?

Continuing that debate and drawing clearer lines of authority would be a more fitting way to honor the memory of Rehnquist than banner headlines about his death. He never much liked being in the spotlight anyway.

A Defender Of Independent Courts (NYT)

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

Today's funeral service for Chief Justice William Rehnquist and the imminent start of hearings in the Senate on Judge John Roberts Jr., the nominee to succeed him on the Supreme Court, provide a moment to honor one of the vital but less celebrated hallmarks of Chief Justice Rehnquist's 33-year service on the court: his proud record of defending the independence of the federal judiciary against attacks by politicians.

Those attacks, as Chief Justice Rehnquist noted last January in his 19th and final report on the state of the federal courts, have taken a troubling new turn in recent years. Without singling out individual members of Congress by name, he made clear his disapproval of some conservative Republicans, like the House majority leader, Tom DeLay, and others. He disapproved of their moving beyond the normal criticism of judicial decisions to try to bully and intimidate individual judges, strip federal courts of jurisdiction to decide certain constitutional challenges, and otherwise undermine the constitutional separation of powers and checks and balances.

One glaring example proving the validity of the chief justice's concerns followed his final report: the meddling by Florida officials and Congress in the case of Terri Schiavo, and the way some Republican lawmakers later denounced the string of federal judges who had rightly upheld earlier state court rulings and rejected ghoulish Congressional meddling in her death.

"A judge's judicial acts may not serve as a basis for impeachment," the chief justice wrote in answer to rising threats to impeach judges labeled by some Republican politicians as "activists" and worse because of their views of the Constitution.

"Any other rule would destroy judicial independence," he explained. "Instead of trying to apply the law fairly, regardless of public opinion, judges would be concerned about inflaming any group that might be able to muster the votes in Congress to impeach and convict them."

Chief Justice Rehnquist was also duly critical of hastily enacted limitations on judicial sentencing decisions, and the potential damage that compiling information on the sentencing habits of individual judges could do to fair and impartial justice.

DOJ_NMG_0003545

Chief Justice Rehnquist plainly saw his role as defender in chief of the nation's independent court system, which he famously called "one of the crown jewels of our system of government."

When confirmation hearings begin on Monday, we would like to hear Mr. Roberts use at least part of his opening statement to make it clear that he intends to continue this legacy, even at the risk of offending some fellow conservatives. On issues like these, that never stopped Chief Justice Rehnquist.

Newsview: White House Falls Out Of Step (NSDY/AP)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON -- The Bush White House is known for its ability to remain in control of its message and image, sliding out of crises with barely a scratch. Not this time.

Despite day after day of appearances by President Bush aimed at undoing the political damage from a poor response to Hurricane Katrina, the White House has not been able to regain its footing, already shaken by the war in Iraq and a death toll exceeding 1,880.

The administration on Tuesday struggled to deflect calls for an accounting of who was responsible for a hurricane response that even Bush acknowledged was inadequate. There were increasing calls for the resignation or firing of Michael Brown, director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"I think it's clear we're in damage control now," said Norman Ornstein, political analyst at the American Enterprise Institute think tank.

It's a troubling position for Bush, already suffering the lowest approval ratings of his presidency.

The mistakes have come one upon the other.

Even as Katrina was bearing down on the Gulf Coast that Sunday night and early Monday, Aug. 28-29, and the National Hurricane Center was warning of growing danger, the White House didn't alter the president's plans to fly from his Texas ranch to the West to promote a new Medicare prescription drug benefit.

By the time Bush landed in Arizona that Monday, the storm was unleashing its fury on Louisiana and Mississippi. The president inserted into his speech only a brief promise of prayers and federal help.

He continued his schedule in California, and he didn't decide until the next day that he should return to Washington. But it took him another day to get there, as he flew back to Texas to spend another night at his home before leaving for the White House.

Once the president was in Washington, the criticism only intensified.

While a drowned New Orleans descended into lawless misery, Bush delivered remarks from the Rose Garden that were seen as flat and corporate. It was a sharp contrast to the commanding, empathetic president the public rallied around in the days after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

In a television interview, Bush said -- mistakenly -- that nobody anticipated the breach of the levees in a serious storm.

Even Monday's trip to the region was a redo, hurriedly arranged by the White House over the weekend after lukewarm response to Bush's first in-person visit to the Gulf Coast last Friday.

Bush had raised eyebrows on his first trip by, among other things, picking Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss. -- instead of the thousands of mostly poor and black storm victims -- as an example of loss. "Out of the rubbles of Trent Lott's house -- he's lost his entire house -- there's going to be a fantastic house. And I'm looking forward to sitting on the porch," Bush said with a laugh from an airplane hangar in Mobile, Ala.

In the same remarks, Bush gave FEMA chief Brown -- the face for many of the inadequate federal response -- a hearty endorsement. "Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job," Bush said.

Later in Biloxi, Miss., Bush tried to comfort two stunned women wandering their neighborhood clutching Hefty bags, looking in vain for something to salvage from the rubble of their home. He kept insisting they could find help at a Salvation Army center down the street, even after another bystander had informed him it had been destroyed.

And at his last stop that day, at the airport outside of New Orleans, Bush lauded the increasingly desperate city as a great town because he used go there and "enjoy myself -- occasionally too much."

Unlike his galvanizing appearance in the rubble of the World Trade Center just days after the 2001 attacks, Bush has stayed far from the epicenter of New Orleans' suffering. His only foray into the city was to its edges to watch crews plugging one of the breached levees on Friday.

On Monday, he skipped the hardest-hit coastal areas entirely, choosing instead to visit Baton Rouge, the state capital about 80 miles northwest of New Orleans, which sustained no damage. He also went to Poplarville, Miss., to walk the streets of a middle-class neighborhood that seemed to suffer little more than snapped trees, a couple off-kilter carport roofs and a downed power line or two.

DOJ_NMG_0003546

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said the president avoided New Orleans to stay out of the way of search-and-rescue operations.

"It's going to be almost impossible to overcome the perception about the president that he didn't show compassion and didn't get control of the policy failures," American University political scientist James Thurber said. "The vivid images that are coming across the television are really destroying his image as a leader."

White House counselor Dan Bartlett said the president and his aides are unconcerned for now about the unrelenting criticism.

"Emotions are running high. People are tired," Bartlett said. "If we focused more of our attention on decisions that have already been made, rather than on those before us, there's potential for making far greater mistakes. ... We really don't have time to play the political game right now."

* __

EDITOR'S NOTE: Jennifer Loven has reported from Washington since 1993 and covers the White House for The Associated Press.

Bush Resists Immediate Probe Into Katrina Response (REU)

By Steve Holland

Reuters, September 7, 2005

President George W. Bush pledged on Tuesday to review what went wrong in the initial response to Hurricane Katrina but resisted any immediate probe and lawmakers launched an investigation of their own.

Partisan tempers flared, the projected cost of Katrina recovery efforts mushroomed and Pentagon leaders denied there was any delay in the military response to the relief effort last week.

After a Cabinet meeting on the myriad challenges posed by his biggest crisis since the attacks of September 11, 2001, Bush said he would lead an investigation into what went wrong. But he said he first wanted to save lives and solve problems before assessing blame.

"I think one of the things that people want us to do is to play a blame game," Bush said of critics of the initial administration response. "We've got to solve problems. There will be ample time for people to figure out what went right, and what went wrong."

He added: "I'm going to find out over time what went right and what went wrong."

Key senators launched an oversight review to determine how federal, state and local authorities bungled the relief effort in the first days after the hurricane struck.

"It is difficult to understand the lack of preparedness and the ineffective initial response to a disaster that had been predicted for years and for which specific dire warnings had been given for days," said Sen. Susan Collins (news, bio, voting record), the Maine Republican who chairs the Senate homeland security committee.

Tempers flared in the driveway of the White House after congressional leaders emerged from a meeting with Bush to brief reporters.

House of Representatives Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois, backing up Bush's position, agreed on the need for an investigation, but only after the recovery is well under way.

"There's going to be a lot of time to point fingers after we get through there," he said.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California quickly approached the microphone.

"Let me just say because my colleague said I was pointing fingers too soon: You're darned right, you're darned right. We're a week behind where we should be in terms of responding to Katrina."

Pelosi said Michael Brown, the head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, "should not continue in that job unless we want a continuation of the shortcomings that we have had in the response."

With $10.5 billion already set aside, Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada predicted the recovery effort could end up costing $150 billion -- a figure that could put pressure on Bush to give up some tax cuts he wants to extend.

Reid said he expected the White House budget director, Josh Bolten, to make a new emergency spending request in 24 hours that could be $40 billion to $50 billion.

The No. 2 House Republican, Tom DeLay of Texas, scolded Reid. "People that just throw numbers out, not knowing what they're talking about, I think it's pretty irresponsible," DeLay said.

With some critics pointing to the fact that insufficient troops at the outset slowed the relief effort, top Pentagon officials denied there had been any delay.

DOJ_NMG_0003547

But Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said he had ordered an internal Pentagon study of "lessons learned" from the disaster.

"You know, you can never be perfect in a tragedy like this," said Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "You'd like to be perfect and be there the moment someone needs help. But as hard as these people tried and the states tried, it's just not possible."

Much anger from Democrats and Republicans alike has been directed at Bush for a slow federal response to a catastrophe that may have killed thousands in New Orleans and along the Gulf coast.

Bush said he was dispatching Vice President Dick Cheney to the disaster zone on Thursday to try to remove any "bureaucratic obstacles that may be preventing us from achieving our goals."

With calls for an independent commission to investigate the disaster, the White House was cautious.

Asked where the buck stops in the Bush administration, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said: "The president." But he said to launch a probe now could divert people involved in the recovery effort from doing their jobs.

(Additional reporting by Patricia Wilson, Tabassum Zakaria, Will Dunham and Donna Smith)

For Bush, A Deepening Divide (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

When terrorists struck on Sept. 11, 2001, Americans came together in grief and resolve, rallying behind President Bush in an extraordinary show of national unity. But when Hurricane Katrina hit last week, the opposite occurred, with Americans dividing along sharply partisan lines in their judgment of the president's and the federal government's response.

The starkly different verdicts on Bush's stewardship of the two biggest crises of his presidency underscore the deepening polarization of the electorate that has occurred on his watch. This gaping divide has left the president with no reservoir of good will among his political opponents at a critical moment of national need and has touched off a fresh debate about whether he could have done anything to prevent it.

To his critics, Bush is now reaping what he has sown. Their case against him goes as follows: Facing a divided nation, the president has eschewed unity in both his governing strategy and his political blueprint. These opponents argue that he has favored confrontation over conciliation with the Democrats while favoring a set of policies aimed at deepening support among his conservative base at the expense of ideas that might produce bipartisan consensus and broader approval among the voters. His allies and advisers, while acknowledging that polarization has worsened during the past five years, say the opposition party bears the brunt of responsibility. Democrats, by this reckoning, have rebuffed Bush's efforts at bipartisanship, put up a wall to ideas that once enjoyed some support on their side, and, even in the current crisis along the Gulf Coast, are seeking to score political points rather than joining hands with the president to speed the recovery and relief to the victims.

Wherever reality lies between these mutual recriminations, the path from post-9/11 unity to the rancor and finger-pointing in the aftermath of Katrina's fury charts a clear deterioration in political consensus in the United States and a growing willingness to interpret events through a partisan prism. It is a problem that now appears destined to follow Bush through the final years of his presidency -- a clear failure of his 2000 campaign promise to be a "uniter, not a divider."

A Washington Post-ABC News poll taken last Friday illustrates the point vividly. Just 17 percent of Democrats said they approved of the way Bush was handling the Katrina crisis while 74 percent of Republicans said they approved. About two in three Republicans rated the federal government's response as good or excellent, while two in three Democrats rated it not so good or poor.

"Bush is the most partisan president in modern American history," said William Galston, a professor at the University of Maryland and previously a top domestic adviser to former President Bill Clinton. "As a result, voters in both parties are focusing on him, rather than on the specifics of the policies."

In Galston's view, Bush bears principal responsibility for that condition, saying that on three occasions he passed up opportunities to govern from the center and work more constructively with the Democrats and instead chose a path designed to mobilize conservatives. The first came after the disputed election of 2000, in the early days of Bush's new administration. The second came after the Sept. 11 attacks, when Bush's approval rating rose to 90 percent. The third came after the hard-fought and polarizing election last year.

"While White House aides can provide familiar talking points on gestures of cooperation across party lines, the fact of the matter is on all three occasions, the principal thrust of Bush's policies was toward polarization rather than conciliation," Galston said. "We are now living in the shadow of nearly five years in which that has been the dominant political message coming out of the White House."

DOJ_NMG_0003548

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman offered a vigorous rebuttal to that criticism yesterday. "They've got a one-way street of unity," he said. "It's 'Do what we want, or you're not a unifier.' "

Mehlman said Bush has produced an unprecedented record of bipartisan accomplishment, citing the passage of the No Child Left Behind education act, prescription drug benefits for Medicare recipients, the USA Patriot Act and the creation of the Department of Homeland Security, which he said was advanced initially by Democratic Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.) and eventually embraced by Bush. (Democrats say Bush embraced the department only when public opinion showed it to be extremely popular.) Mehlman also said Democrats are now attempting to take advantage of the politics of Katrina and pointed specifically at Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who yesterday introduced legislation calling for the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) to be reconstituted as an independent, Cabinet-level agency, rather than a unit in the new Homeland Security Department. "You tell me who's taking what should be a moment of national unity and trying to score politically," he said. William Mayer, a political scientist at Northeastern University, said the public divide over Bush's handling of the natural disaster bears considerable resemblance to divisions over Clinton's handling of the standoff with the Branch Davidian followers of David Koresh in Waco early in his presidency, which ended in a fire that killed more than 80 people. Democrats supported Clinton did the best he could "dealing with a crazy man," Mayer said, while Republicans "said this was a massively bungled affair."

Mayer and Nolan McCarty, a professor of politics and public affairs at Princeton said that while polarization has worsened under Bush, the president bears only some of the responsibility. McCarty said Bush could try to rise above the current criticism but noted that partisans now have jumped in. "It will polarize things worse," he said.

Mark McKinnon, Bush's campaign media adviser, said Bush is still dealing with divisions that came out of the election 2000 but said the current crisis presents an opportunity for the administration "to show leadership and coordination and response and compassion of a nature that could affect the political dynamics of the country."

Galston agreed that is possible, but he said he doubted even a well-judged performance will fundamentally change Bush's ability to work across party lines on controversial issues. The hurricane may have washed away much of the Gulf Coast, but political polarization has proved resistant to its forces.

Bush Pledges To Stay On Top Of Relief Effort, Says It's Improving (USAT)

By Richard Benedetto

USA Today, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush spent Tuesday in a series of meetings aimed at making sure the resources of the federal government are focused on the Hurricane Katrina recovery effort.

He met with his Cabinet, education officials, congressional leaders and the heads of charities involved in the recovery. Afterward, he said the relief effort is improving, more supplies are en route, schooling is being arranged for thousands of displaced children and that he will make sure the recovery continues.

“Bureaucracy is not going to stand in the way of getting the job done for the people,” Bush said.

Bush and his administration continue to be criticized for what many see as a slow and inadequate federal response to the storm that ravaged three states and flooded the city of New Orleans.

“We're a week behind where we should be in responding to Katrina,” House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said after meeting with Bush at the White House.

Tuesday's meetings came the day after Bush's Labor Day visit to the disaster region, his second visit in four days. Bush said he will send Vice President Cheney and first lady Laura Bush to the region Thursday.

Bush acknowledged last week that the initial federal response was “unacceptable.”

Bush will ask Congress as soon as today for more money for Katrina relief, on top of the $10.5 billon in emergency funds appropriated by Congress last week.

Additional money will be requested as the needs are further assessed, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Bush's new request will be as much as $50 billion, and he said the overall cost could top $150 billion.

Bush said he will personally lead an investigation into what went wrong with the early federal response to Katrina.

After their meeting with the president, congressional leaders said they would conduct a bipartisan investigation.

Reid also called for a probe by an independent commission “comparable to the 9/11 Commission,” which looked into why the federal government wasn't able to stop the 2001 terrorist attacks on New York City and Washington.

Bush said that while critics want “to play a blame game,” he and his administration have “got to solve problems. … There will be ample time for people to figure out what went right and what went wrong. What I'm interested in is helping save lives.”

DOJ_NMG_0003549

The president praised the work of community and faith-based organizations aiding hurricane victims and urged Americans to send them cash donations to support their efforts.

He also pledged to speed Social Security, unemployment and other federal benefit checks to those in affected areas.

Bush Counters Criticism Of Federal Relief Effort (LAT)

By Scott Gold And Lianne Hart

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — As the recovery effort persisted and the floodwaters continued to recede in this shattered city, President Bush sought to short-circuit congressional criticism by declaring that he will investigate the federal relief effort.

Bush has made two trips through the Gulf Coast and has visited relief agencies in Washington as part of his effort to persuade people that his administration cares about the disaster and will use all means to help the region recover, and in particular the hard-hit city of New Orleans.

Local officials have been fiercely critical of the federal government, saying that basic necessities were delayed, costing lives. With Congress returning today to Washington, the anger has been growing as some legislators launched their own investigation and promised hearings to determine who is at fault.

In an effort to get ahead of the issue, Bush said he will lead his own probe.

"What I intend to do is to lead an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong," he said.

"It's very important for us to understand the relationship between the federal government, the state government and the local government when it comes to a major catastrophe. And the reason it's important is, is that we still live in an unsettled world. We want to make sure that we can respond properly if there's a WMD attack or another major storm. And so I'm going to find out over time what went right and what went wrong," the president said.

Katrina dealt New Orleans a glancing blow, but it was severe enough to break two levees that turned the city in a disease-ridden cesspool whose inhabitants had to be evacuated. Tens of thousands of people went days without food and water before transportation arrived to carry them to safety.

With 250,000 people evacuated to Texas and hundreds of thousands more from Southern Louisiana voluntarily fleeing, the city has turned into a watery ghost town.

Even though the reconstruction will take weeks and months, there was a sense of optimism as waters continued to ebb and the bulk of the evacuations has been completed.

"We now have the resources to get the job done," Mayor C. Ray Nagin told reporters today. "I want to thank the governor and the president and I want to thank that John Wayne dude."

The mayor was referring to Lt. Gen. Russel Honore, who is leading the forces that entered the city last week, restored order and ended the looting so that large-scale relief efforts could take place.

More than 32,000 people have been rescued in Louisiana since Katrina hit last week, according to David Passey, a spokesman for the Federal Emergency Management Agency. To date, FEMA has allocated $2.8 billion to provide emergency assistance to Louisiana, he said.

In addition, 315,568 households have registered for federal and state assistance, officials said.

Nagin said the mandatory evacuation remains in effect and that the city will begin moving emergency people out of the area to Las Vegas and Atlanta so they can recharge.

"Las Vegas is a party town," he said, fending off criticism. "New Orleans is a party town. Get over it."

Nagin said that the city is now 60% underwater — still in a debilitated state, but much improved from the weekend, when the saturation reached 80%. Several pumps are now sending water gushing over the levee system into Lake Pontchartrain, and the city is trying to get Pump Station 6 — a critical facility that Nagin called "the big daddy" — operating as soon as possible.

"Even in places where the water was up to the rooftops, we are now starting to see part of the buildings," Nagin said after his daily helicopter ride over the city.

Nagin said a power plant on Carrollton Street could be operating soon. Officials had attempted to construct a dam around the plant to rid that portion of the city of water but the dam did not hold. So the city is bringing in portable pumps to suck the water out continuously.

Water service could begin flowing into the city within 24 hours, Nagin said, but he cautioned that officials were wary of how clean the water would be. The water supply is off — and the water flowing through pipes once they are fixed is so full of pollution and bacteria it cannot be drunk even after it is boiled, Nagin said.

"We have to flush the system," he said.

Officials continue to find people who are alive and awaiting rescue from houses, attics and rooftops, he said. Many are elderly, delirious or severely dehydrated.

DOJ_NMG_0003550

Nagin also said reports that authorities had withheld food and water from some neighborhoods in an effort to flush out stragglers who don't want to leave are "absolutely false."

He said he told his officers and other authorities: "Do not harm anyone. Do not allow anyone to starve. Do not allow anyone to go without water."

On Monday, the Army Corps of Engineers plugged one of the broken levees and officials continued their efforts today to pump water out of the city. Water pumps are slowly being restarted as the water recedes and workers can dry and repair them. It will take 24 days to drain eastern Orleans Parish, and as much as 80 days to remove the water from Chalmette, said Dan Hitchings, a spokesman for the Corps.

As the waters recede, more bodies are expected to be found.

Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco said that disease is going to be "big, big problem" in New Orleans.

"We certainly don't want disease outbreaks. That is our next big worry, and can be the next big tragedy," she said. "We have a massive clean-up operation, and that's why we're asking citizens to be patient and not try to get in there because we don't know what we're going to find. We have to let the medical experts get in and test."

In the face of ongoing criticism about the speed and effectiveness of the hurricane relief effort, the nation's top health officials today defended federal efforts to provide health services in Katrina's aftermath.

"We are one week out, and so far so good," said Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt during a news conference by telephone.

Leavitt said that security risks and chaotic conditions delayed health services for evacuees crowded into the New Orleans Convention Center and the Superdome.

Leavitt and Dr. Julie Gerberding, director of the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, emphasized that disaster preparations had been based on the smaller-scale disasters seen after previous hurricanes.

Leavitt, who toured the disaster area over the Labor Day weekend, said federal health officers are present in all major shelters for evacuees, and are working with local medical professionals to provide services despite the primitive conditions.

"The response was massive, led in large measure by local communities. I would judge it to have been strong and high quality, but predictably imperfect. It drained resources from local service providers. They have responded in a remarkable way," Leavitt said. "We walked through medical shelters that were staffed by the heads of departments to major hospitals working alongside medical students. The quality of service they were [delivering] was amazingly high."

The Louisiana governor was also more upbeat than in recent days.

"The resources are strengthening as we speak. Those of us in the decision-making chairs are feeling better about the coordinated effort. The supply chain has improved the morale, and I think it will continue to get better," she said.

With police getting a break, the Pentagon began sending paratroopers from the Army's 82nd Airborne Division to New Orleans to use small boats, including inflatable Zodiac craft, to launch a new search-and-rescue effort.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, division commander, said about 5,000 paratroopers would be in place by today.

Fires, some started by candles used to replace broken electric lights, have also been a problem. Several blazes were burning, pouring thick smoke into the air.

Officials announced in Baton Rouge that they have begun testing the quality of the air. Scientists are also sampling the brackish floodwater in New Orleans as well as the water in Lake Pontchartrain, said Mike McDaniel, secretary of the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality.

"It is simply infeasible" to pump the floodwater anywhere but the lake, he said. "We have to get the water out of the city or the nightmare gets worse. We will deal with the issues of the water, but right now the priority is to save lives," he said.

"There's lots of discussion about toxic soup, a witch's brew, but I've seen no data that backs up that kind of statement," McDaniel said.

He said there will obviously be bacteria in the water.

"After all, we have humans with no waste treatment facilities, we have backed up facilities. They're showing a large number of fecal indicators," he said.

McDaniel said he also believes gas, fuel, and traces of toxic materials like pesticides and heavy metals will be found. Test results will be known in about two days, he said.

With 2,200 facilities with underground storage tanks; 140,000 to 160,000 flooded homes that will have to be condemned; 25 major sewage treatment facilities offline, as well as 505 medium to small sewage treatment plants out, McDaniel said there's good reason for concern.

"It is almost unimaginable the things we are going to have to plan for and deal with," he said.

The impact of the storm on the Louisiana coast is enormous, he said. "The aerials we see are complete devastation. It will take a while to reestablish."

DOJ_NMG_0003551

About 68,000 barrels of oil spilled into the Mississippi River, near Venice, La., and is now being blown into the gulf. Another 10,000 barrels of oil has spilled into a flooded neighborhood in Chalmette.

"Everywhere we look there are spills. It all adds up to an almost solid sheen over the area now," McDaniel said.

Earlier, Bush called congressional leaders to the White House for their first meeting since Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29 and rampaged through more than four Southern states. The death toll is estimated at perhaps 10,000 and the cost of the damage is put at more than $25 billion in insurance claims alone, with tens of billions more to rebuild.

"Government at all levels failed," Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) said at a Capitol news conference, where she announced that the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee would hold hearings.

"It is difficult to understand the lack of preparedness and the ineffective initial response to a disaster that had been predicted for years, and for which specific, dire warnings had been given for days," she said.

During his Cabinet session, Bush rejected playing "a blame game. We've got to solve problems. We're problem-solvers. There will be ample time for people to figure out what went right and what went wrong.

"This administration is not going to rest until every life can be saved, until families are reconnected, until this recovery is complete," he said.

Even though security has improved, a New Orleans man was arrested and faces federal charges for allegedly firing shots at a military helicopter, according to U.S. Atty. Jim Letten. Wendell Bailey, 20, was charged with attempting to damage and destroy an aircraft, which carries a sentence of up to 20 years, and with illegal possession of firearms, which can be punished with 10 years in prison.

Bush Promises To Seek Answers To Failures Of Hurricane Relief (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut And Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6 - Under relentless political fire over the federal response to Hurricane Katrina, President Bush on Tuesday tried to steer the public debate toward progress in the region, promising to investigate earlier stumbles, as anxious lawmakers returned to the Capitol pledging inquiries of their own and aid money for the storm victims.

Mr. Bush, in a flurry of meetings at the White House, said he would dispatch Vice President Dick Cheney to the Gulf Coast this week to cut through any bureaucratic obstacles slowing recovery efforts. Members of Congress demanded answers and awaited a new emergency spending measure from the White House, calculating the growing cost of the recovery at $50 billion, if not more than twice that.

Fresh from their summer recess, lawmakers questioned the effectiveness of the Federal Emergency Management Agency and pledged to hold hearings and possibly enact legislation to address the failures in the response system.

"It is difficult to understand the lack of preparedness and the ineffective initial response to a disaster that had been predicted for years and for which specific dire warnings had been given for days," said Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine and chairwoman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which will conduct one of the main inquiries.

There will be at least two sets of Congressional hearings, leaders said, beginning as early as next week, to examine issues like failures in the command and control structure, shortcomings in the evacuation plan for New Orleans, and any organizational problems that may have contributed to the slow response.

The hearings will also address whether the government missed critical opportunities to shore up the levees in New Orleans and whether planning for future disasters is sufficient.

Lawmakers, at least in the Senate, said it would be too early to consider whether Mr. Bush would be called to testify.

For the first time since the hurricane hit, Mr. Bush met with leaders from both parties, capping a day of constant political attention to a crisis that has exposed fault lines within the Republican Party and threatens to overtake the entire Congressional agenda. Mr. Bush promised to lead an investigation into what went wrong, although a White House spokesman quickly qualified the statement, saying the inquiry would come later to avoid diverting resources from the recovery efforts.

Mr. Bush also resisted renewed calls to fire Michael D. Brown, the director of FEMA, who became a lightning rod for attacks last week when he said he was unaware of a crisis at the New Orleans convention center, news of which had been televised for days. Instead, Mr. Bush accused critics of playing the "blame game" and said he would remain focused on the immediate crisis as evacuees fanned out across the country.

"We've got to solve problems; we're problem-solvers," he said. "There will be ample time for people to figure out what went right and what went wrong. What I'm interested in is helping save lives."

At issue in the immediate future is the amount of money the government will allocate for the recovery and reconstruction efforts. Mr. Bush signed a $10.5 billion spending measure last Friday, and Congressional leaders said they expected to receive a $40 billion to $50 billion supplemental spending request this week. Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said the total bill could reach $150 billion, further squeezing a budget constrained by the nearly $5 billion spent each month on the Iraq war and the $333 billion federal deficit.

DOJ_NMG_0003552

The $150 billion projection was quickly disputed by Representative Tom DeLay of Texas, the Republican leader, who suggested that Mr. Reid was "playing politics" by giving that figure when no official projections were available. But White House officials have not disputed estimates in the tens of billions of dollars.

Senior administration officials rejected accusations that the federal government had been slow to respond, detailing progress on the military, education and social services fronts. Mr. Bush, after meeting with Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, said the administration was reviewing ways to help states like Texas absorb the costs of accommodating thousands of children of evacuees in their public school systems.

At the Pentagon, senior officials pointed to the arrival of forces in the Gulf Coast in recent days, with more than 41,000 National Guardsmen and about 17,000 active-duty personnel committed to the mission. Gen. Richard B. Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, praised what he described as a more than adequate military response.

"Not only was there no delay, I think we anticipated, in most cases - not in all cases - but in most cases, the support that was required," General Myers said at a news briefing. "And we were pushing support before we were formally asked for it."

Even so, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said he had ordered the military to conduct a "lessons learned" study on the armed forces' response to the hurricane to determine whether it could have been more timely.

And Mr. Bush, in the first of several hurricane-related events throughout the day, made an unexpected pledge to personally lead an inquiry into earlier failures.

"What I intend to do is lead a - to lead an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong," Mr. Bush, after meeting with his cabinet, said in response to a question about who would be held accountable.

"And I'll tell you why," he continued. "It's very important for us to understand the relationship between the federal government, the state government and the local government when it comes to a major catastrophe. And the reason it's important is, is that we still live in an unsettled world."

Pressed for details about the investigation, Scott McClellan, the White House spokesman, said it would not begin until the immediate crisis had passed.

Describing it as an "analysis," not an investigation, Mr. McClellan would not say whether the emergency failures would be examined by an independent commission, as the Sept. 11 attacks were, or even when the president wanted the process to start.

"There will be a time to do a thorough analysis," Mr. McClellan said. "Now is not the time to do that."

Instead, Congress appeared poised to take the lead.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, said she was introducing legislation to create an independent commission.

Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia and chairman of the Government Reform Committee, said his panel would begin hearings on the government response, a move that came after Senate leaders had announced their own plans for hearings and that appeared to catch House leaders off guard.

"We are going to look at Mr. Davis's hearing," said Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois. "What we don't want to have happen is that the people who are on the ground in the Gulf States have to come up here and talk to 13 or 14 different groups."

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, a Connecticut Democrat who will help lead the Senate investigation with Ms. Collins, said the federal response to Hurricane Katrina had shaken the public's confidence in the ability of the government to protect them.

"Hurricane Katrina was in one sense the most significant test of the new national emergency preparedness and response system that was created after 9/11, and it obviously did not pass that test," Mr. Lieberman said.

Some Republican lawmakers said they had tried to impress upon their party's leaders what they believe are the political risks involved in the disaster response, fearing that Republicans have exposed themselves to significant political risk in next year's elections by having appeared not to take the hurricane and its aftermath seriously at first.

Already, the hurricane has upended the fall legislative agenda. Leaders of both the House and the Senate have said their chief mission in the coming weeks would be to provide relief to storm victims and begin rebuilding devastated communities.

Under pressure from Democrats, the Senate postponed a vote on a proposal to eliminate the estate tax, while House officials said they expected to delay a budget bill that would require cuts in health care and education.

Bush To Probe Storm Response (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003553

Stung by criticism of the federal response to Hurricane Katrina, President Bush yesterday promised to investigate his own administration's emergency management, then readied a request for tens of billions of dollars for relief and cleanup.

From the Pentagon to Capitol Hill, official Washington spent yesterday grappling with a hurricane recovery effort that, according to some estimates, will cost more than $100 billion and influence a broad range of federal policy, from emergency response to coastal development, from expanded domestic oil exploration to the future of the estate tax.

Bush vowed to "find out what went right and what went wrong." Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said that the military already has begun a "lessons-learned" assessment of its coordination with state and local governments. Nine Cabinet members briefed Senate and House leaders last night on the federal response, and key senators pushed for changes that would allow Third World relief efforts to be emulated in the United States.

"Nothing will be the same again," said Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), whose Pascagoula home was destroyed.

Just days after Congress approved a $10.5 billion emergency relief package, Bush informed congressional leaders of a request of as much as $40 billion, making Katrina the federal government's most expensive domestic emergency ever. The package could be passed as early as today, aides said.

But with the Federal Emergency Management Agency spending more than $500 million a day, lawmakers from both parties said the cost will climb much higher. Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) suggested the total could exceed $150 billion, with $100 billion for FEMA alone. Lott said the cost will be "well in excess of $100 billion," and few were disagreeing.

Beyond money, congressional leaders ordered committee chairmen to draft any legislation that could remedy the problems revealed by the hurricane and its aftermath. And after nearly a week of recriminations, Washington slipped into an extraordinary bout of self-reflection.

"It is fair to say the overall response to this emergency could have and should have been better," House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) said.

Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.) called for FEMA Director Michael D. Brown to leave and be replaced by "an experienced, professional emergency manager."

Speaking to reporters after a Cabinet meeting , Bush said: "It's very important for us to understand the relationship between the federal government, the state government and the local government when it comes to a major catastrophe. . . . We want to make sure that we can respond properly if there's a WMD [weapons of mass destruction] attack or another major storm."

Bush, who has called the response to the hurricane unacceptable only to amend that to say the results were not acceptable, offered no specifics on his planned investigation. Still, the call for an investigation was unusual coming from a president who rarely admits mistakes.

House Republican leaders suggested that Congress launch one comprehensive examination of the disaster response, possibly a joint House-Senate investigation. But Senate committees were already moving forward. The Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee has scheduled hearings next week to examine the federal disaster response.

Sen. James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.), chairman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, promised his own examination of Gulf Coast infrastructure, water projects and coastal erosion. Next week, the panel will look into Katrina's impact on energy supplies, a subject examined yesterday by the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee and set to be examined today by the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

At the Senate Energy Committee hearing, Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) said Congress must accept politically difficult measures that lawmakers have repeated rejected, such as raising car and truck fuel efficiency standards.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) castigated the Cabinet's performance as two hours of "self-congratulatory" talk. "This administration does not live in reality," Pelosi said. "To hear them talk, everything went right. . . . They have very low standards, and no performance, and no accountability."

DeLay said the GOP leadership was working to bring legislation to the floor, possibly this week, that would loosen rules that govern federal assistance programs. He chastised Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) for seeking to open hearings next week on the response.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) proposed retooling a resettlement program for foreign refugees to help Americans displaced by Katrina.

But there was little immediate agreement on how to proceed and many notes of discord.

House and Senate lawmakers said they will proceed with a package of $70 billion in tax cuts and $35 billion in entitlement spending cuts, including as much as $10 billion out of a Medicaid program they simultaneously were suggesting expanding.

Before Katrina struck, the House and Senate were at loggerheads over an energy and water spending plan for the fiscal year that begins in October, with the Senate hoping to spend $700 million more than the House on water projects, including $27 million more on flood control in southeastern Louisiana and $20 million more on Louisiana coastal protection. House

DOJ_NMG_0003554

Appropriations Committee spokesman John Scofield said the committee has received no instructions to budge: "We are committed to living within our budget."

With federal resources stretched, Grassley questioned a rush to temporarily lift the tax on airline fuel, and he lambasted proposals to offer more tax incentives to oil companies for domestic oil exploration. "With $60 [a barrel] oil, you don't need more incentives," he said. "What we need is for the oil companies to take some of their profits and lower the cost of gasoline."

DeLay had a similar response to suggestions that the federal gasoline tax be suspended: "Now more than ever you're going to need . . . those highway trust funds, to rebuild the bridges that were destroyed, rebuild the railroads that were destroyed."

At the Pentagon, Rumsfeld said the involvement of troops in hurricane relief efforts will not diminish the military's ability to sustain operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

He noted that more than 300,000 Army National Guard and Air National Guard troops remain available to help. He sharply rejected the suggestion that the commitment of large numbers of troops to Iraq -- including National Guard soldiers from Louisiana and Mississippi -- had delayed the military's response. About 41,000 Guard troops are in assisting the region.

"Not only was there no delay," said Gen. Richard B. Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "I think we anticipated in most cases -- not in all cases, but in most cases -- the support that was required."

GOP Begins Damage Control (WT)

By Joseph Curl And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

Republicans tried to limit the political damage from the botched federal response to Hurricane Katrina -- with President Bush, members of Congress and military leaders yesterday all promising to look into the failures.

"What I intend to do is lead an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong," the president said after meeting with Cabinet members at the White House.

Republicans said they have received the message that there is frustration over the federal response.

"Have I got an earful? You betcha," said Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota Republican, who said he heard about it from voters at Minnesota's state fair this weekend.

But even as Republicans promised investigations, they made it clear that the first failure was at the state and local levels, where governments are charged with preparation and the first response to disasters.

"I'm a former mayor," Mr. Coleman said. "The leadership starts at the local level. I didn't see the local mayor. I didn't hear from the mayor."

His focus on state and local officials was echoed by Mr. Bush, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and top congressional Republicans, who said the federal response fell short because, in Mr. Coleman's words, "the federal officials didn't do a good enough job of filling that void fast enough."

The senator from Minnesota said that the federal government must now turn its immediate failure into an opportunity to show it is in control.

Now, both Congress and the president are rushing to fill that void with money.

Mr. Bush was expected to send Congress a reported $40 billion emergency spending package last night, five days after a $10.5 billion emergency bill passed.

The top Democrat in the Senate said the final cost could be $150 billion -- the first long-term cost estimate placed on the storm by a high official.

"Through my conversations with officials on the ground and in consultation with Senator Mary Landrieu [of Louisiana], I believe that the recovery and relief operations will cost up to and could exceed $150 billion," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat.

At the Pentagon yesterday, the nation's two top military leaders rejected criticism that they were too slow in deploying troops to storm-ravaged Gulf states, saying they are in the middle of the largest domestic disaster relief effort in U.S. history.

Mr. Rumsfeld and Gen. Richard B. Myers, Joint Chiefs chairman, said Pentagon planners made contingencies once Katrina strengthened in the Gulf of Mexico and ordered thousands of troops and relief supplies once the request was made.

Mr. Rumsfeld ordered a mandatory "lessons learned" on what the armed forces had done right and wrong in the week-old disaster that likely killed thousands in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

He added that the military's involvement will not affect the U.S. effort in Iraq.

"We have the forces, the capabilities and the intention to fully prosecute the global war on terror while responding to this unprecedented humanitarian crisis here at home," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

At the White House, Mr. Bush said a thorough review is necessary to prepare for the next catastrophe.

"We still live in an unsettled world. We want to make sure that we can respond properly if there's a WMD attack or another major storm," he said.

Even as the president was trying to put out fires, he might have created more ill will at an afternoon meeting with congressional leaders.

During the meeting, Mr. Reid and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, tried to learn the size of the new spending request, but Office of Management and Budget Director Joshua B. Bolten said he did not have a figure, Mr. Reid's spokesman said.

As the leaders left the meeting, they found out from press reports that someone had told the Associated Press the total would be $40 billion.

Meanwhile, there was disagreement among Republicans over how quickly to proceed on the investigations.

The Republicans who run the House and Senate oversight committees both said they will begin next week, even though House leaders and Sen. Trent Lott, a Mississippi Republican whose home was destroyed by the storm, asked them not to distract from the relief effort.

Hearings called by House Government Reform Committee Chairman Thomas M. Davis III seemed to catch House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert off guard yesterday when a reporter asked about it at a press conference.

"What we don't want to have happen is the people who are on the ground in the Gulf states have to come up here to talk to 13 or 14 different groups," said Mr. Hastert, Illinois Republican.

Rep. Mark Foley said particular blame lies at the feet of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) and, by extension, Congress, which put FEMA under the Department of Homeland Security.

The Florida Republican said the agency had flaws in responding to the hurricanes in Florida last year.

"There'll be a lot of blame to go around, and we can all reasonably take a share of it," he said, though he also said political blame will recede with time. "It gets worse for a while and finally people see the light at the end of the tunnel."

Storm Upheaves Bush's Second-term Agenda (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — Eight months into President Bush's first term, the nation was rocked and his agenda overtaken by terrorist attacks on New York and Washington.

Now, at nearly the same point in his second term, a natural disaster that has struck New Orleans and the Gulf Coast has revived questions about the government's preparedness to protect its citizens and reshuffled the priorities the president faces in coming months.

His plan to overhaul Social Security? Forget it. Repeal the estate tax? Postponed. Make the 2001 tax cuts permanent? Tougher to finance. Stay the course in Iraq? Questions about the deployment of U.S. resources and National Guard troops for the war have been sharpened.

“This is a shot to the solar plexus of George Bush's agenda,” says William Galston, a professor of public policy at the University of Maryland and a White House adviser to President Clinton in his first term. “The ripples go out in so many different directions, to so many different areas of policy, domestic and foreign. It's second only to 9/11 in its impact on the course of the presidency.”

“The aftermath of Katrina poses a threat to his entire second term,” the lead editorial in the Bush-friendly Wall Street Journal declared Tuesday.

The perils may be even greater for Bush than they were in 2001.

His resolute leadership in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks rallied the nation to his side, but the lack of urgency he conveyed in the first days after the hurricane and his administration's fumbling response to desperate human needs have brought scathing bipartisan criticism. He has sought to recover in recent days, traveling to the region twice to comfort victims and clearing his schedule to focus on the crisis.

But after five years in charge, Bush is being called to account for shortcomings in the administration in a way he wasn't when he was new to office. There is little sense, as there was after 9/11, that criticizing the president is unpatriotic. “A lot of the strong part of his image is now at least temporarily tarnished — the notion of the can-do guy,” says Fred Greenstein, a presidential scholar at Princeton University.

The investigations into what went wrong — including the decision to downgrade the Federal Emergency Management Agency's status and the performance of the new Department of Homeland Security — are starting long before all the water has been pumped from New Orleans' streets. The Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs convenes its first briefing on the issue today.

DOJ_NMG_0003556

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist joined his Democratic counterpart, Harry Reid, in criticizing the pace of relief efforts. “We are going to take a hard, hard look at our disaster response,” Frist said.

Reid blasted those who have blamed state officials. “This is a huge federal issue,” he said. “The buck stops at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue.”

In the short run, the confirmation of two Supreme Court justices and the need to deal with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina will dominate the White House and Congress. To the dismay of some anti-tax conservatives, the Senate indefinitely postponed its scheduled vote this week on repealing the estate tax. “Ridiculous,” fumes Mallory Factor, chairman of the Free Enterprise Fund. He called the delay unwise and an attempt to be “politically correct.”

In the long run, Bush's agenda has been upended.

·Adding individual investment accounts to Social Security was, Bush has said, the top domestic priority of his second term. With Democrats united against it and some Republicans wary of embracing it, the odds of passing fundamental changes to the nation's most popular social safety net already were distant. Now, they seem impossible.

“Our members, like Congress and the American people, are rightly preoccupied with doing their part to assist in hurricane relief, recover and rebuilding, (and) I think the timing of much of the congressional agenda may have to be put on hold for a time,” says Derrick Max, director of the Alliance for Worker Retirement Security, a leading business-backed group supporting Bush's plan. “But as soon as Congress returns to its other legislative priorities, we would expect work to continue on Social Security reform.”

·Revising the tax code has been another Bush priority. A blue-ribbon panel he appointed is supposed to report back by the end of the month with a plan to simplify the tax code, ameliorate the impact of the alternative minimum tax on middle-income families and make permanent the tax cuts passed in 2001.

Now those proposals will have to compete with demands to increase federal spending on relief and infrastructure repair. The $10.5 billion aid package passed last week was only a down payment.

Former senator Connie Mack, co-chairman of the panel, says the hurricane's aftermath may delay but won't derail consideration of the proposal, which is supposed to be revenue-neutral. “I always saw this as a 2006 issue,” he says.

·Maintaining U.S. troop levels in Iraq until a constitution has been approved and a democratic government installed is an even higher priority for Bush, but now there are demands for active-duty troops and National Guard units, already strained by tours of duty in Iraq, to maintain order and provide hurricane relief at home.

About 8,500 active-duty troops are being dispatched to the Gulf Coast, probably for months, the Pentagon says. About 2,800 soldiers from the Louisiana National Guard are being allowed to return from Iraq immediately, a month or two earlier than scheduled. Most will join relief efforts.

·Reaching out to African-American voters, the Democrats' most loyal supporters, has been a concerted effort this year by Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, Bush's campaign manager in 2004. But the TV footage of hurricane victims showed mostly minorities and poor people. “I don't think the outreach was working all that well, but this destroys it,” says political scientist Ronald Walters, author of Freedom is Not Enough: Black Voters, Black Candidates, and American Presidential Politics. “The perception is that he didn't move quickly enough because a lot of the people involved were black. Whether that's true or not, that is the perception in our community.”

Presidential terms are often shaped by the unexpected — wars, crises and scandals that never surfaced during the campaign. George H.W. Bush's presidency was shaped by Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. Jimmy Carter faced oil shocks and a hostage crisis in Iran. Franklin Roosevelt, elected to deal with the Depression, led the nation into World War II. He told Americans: “Dr. New Deal has become Dr. Win-the-War.”

“That's why pragmatism is such a central ingredient of an effective presidency,” says historian Robert Dallek, the author of books on FDR, John Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson. “If you're not pragmatic, not responsive to changing realities, then you don't succeed.”

But Stanley Renshon, a political scientist at City University of New York, argues that Bush's resilience is underestimated. “As control is re-established and help is coming in, Bush will be seen as somebody who rallied in the same way he did with 9/11 and mastered the circumstance,” he predicts.

Americans are divided in rating Bush's response. In a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken Monday and Tuesday, 42% said Bush had done a bad or terrible job in responding to the hurricane and the subsequent flooding; 35% said he had done a good or great job. The survey of 609 adults has a margin of error of +/-4 percentage points.

Whatever happens to his standing, the issues on Bush's plate have changed. “There are other priorities that we remain committed to,” White House spokesman Scott McClellan said Tuesday. “Right now our highest priority is on the response and recovery to Hurricane Katrina.”

DOJ_NMG_0003557

When Congress returned to work Tuesday, the agenda drafted when they left a month ago — immigration changes, Social Security and tax cuts — had been sidelined. Congressional leaders who met with Bush at the White House discussed how to rebuild the Gulf Coast, reopen the crucial Port of New Orleans, provide federal benefits for victims and protect other American cities that rely on aging earthen levees. And high gas prices are “the No. 1 issue on people's minds,” Frist says.

The most fundamental issue ahead may be this: Four years after the Sept. 11 attacks, despite the president's unrelenting focus and the expenditure of billions of dollars for homeland security, the government seemed unable to respond to a crisis that had been forecast days before it happened.

Hurricane's Toll Is Likely To Reshape Bush's Economic Agenda (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6 - Hurricane Katrina is about to blow a hole in the federal budget, and it is already jeopardizing President Bush's agenda for cutting taxes and reducing the deficit.

Administration officials told Republican lawmakers on Tuesday that relief efforts were running close to $700 million a day, and that the total federal cost could reach as high as $100 billion.

That would be many times the cost of any other natural disaster or even the $21 billion that was allocated for New York City after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

The expenses would come just as Mr. Bush and Republican leaders are trying to push through spending cuts for programs like Medicaid and student loans, extend about $70 billion in expiring tax cuts, and reduce the federal budget deficit.

"There is no question but that the costs of this are going to exceed the costs of New York City after 9/11 by a significant multiple," said Senator Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire and chairman of the Senate Budget Committee.

White House officials are planning to ask Congress as early as Wednesday for a second round of emergency financing, perhaps as much as $40 billion, but they said even that would be a "stopgap" measure while they assessed the full costs.

Though it is still too early for accurate estimates, the costs are all but certain to wreak havoc with Mr. Bush's plans to reduce the federal deficit and possibly his plans to extend tax cuts.

On Monday, the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, postponed plans to push for a vote on repealing the estate tax, a move that would benefit the wealthiest 1 percent of households, costing more than $70 billion a year once fully put in effect.

House and Senate leaders are also grappling with their pre-hurricane plan to propose $35 billion in spending cuts over the next five years for entitlement programs like Medicaid, student loans, food stamps and welfare payments.

Those cuts could suddenly prove politically unpalatable to Mr. Bush and Republican lawmakers, who are trying to rebuff criticism that the federal government shortchanged the hurricane's poorest victims.

Congressional Democrats are already using the hurricane as a reason to block Republican tax and spending plans.

"Democrats think this is the worst possible time to be cutting taxes for those at the very top and cutting the social safety net of those at the very bottom, and adding $35 billion," said Thomas S. Kahn, staff director for Democrats on the House Budget Committee.

Budget analysts said the magnitude and unique characteristics of the hurricane made it unlike any previous natural disaster, resulting in a variety of extraordinary costs:

¶Shelter for as many as a million people for months.

¶A potentially high share of uninsured property losses that stem from flooding, which is not covered by private insurers.

¶Education and health care for hundreds of thousands forced to live outside their home states.

"Katrina could easily become a milestone in the history of the federal budget," said Stanley Collender, a longtime budget analyst here. "Policies that never would have been considered before could now become standard."

Indeed, there were signs on Tuesday that Republicans and Democrats had already begun to compete with each other over who might be willing to spend more.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Senate Democratic leader, predicted on Tuesday that costs could total $150 billion. Top Republican lawmakers, meanwhile, have begun to call for "stimulus" measures to buck up the overall economy.

White House officials contend that costs attributable to the hurricane are separate from Mr. Bush's underlying budget goals, which include cutting the deficit in half over the next four years and permanently extending most of the tax cuts passed in 2001 and 2003.

Budget analysts also note that natural disasters are essentially one-time costs that do not affect the government's long-run fiscal health.

"We can afford $100 billion - one time," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, director of the Congressional Budget Office. "What we cannot afford is $100 billion in additional spending year after year."

DOJ_NMG_0003558

The problem is that, even without the hurricane, the federal government's underlying fiscal health is in poor shape. In July, the White House predicted that surging tax revenues would reduce the deficit this year to $333 billion from $412 billion in 2004.

But many analysts believe that the tax surge was largely a one-time event and that overall government spending is still poised to climb rapidly as a result of the war in Iraq, the Medicare prescription drug benefit and the growing number of baby boomers who will soon reach retirement age.

Before the hurricane, House and Senate Republicans were preparing to work out $35 billion in spending cuts over the next five years that would trim Medicaid payments by $10 billion and make smaller cuts in student loan programs, farm programs, food stamps, housing and cash assistance to poor families.

Under the budget resolution that Congress passed this spring, Congressional committees are supposed to spell out the proposed cuts by Sept. 16. House and Senate leaders had been planning to pass the cuts within a week or so after that.

Bush Praises Americans' Aid To Hurricane Victims (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

President Bush yesterday urged Americans to continue to donate to private charitable organizations and faith-based groups in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

"We've got people who represent thousands of volunteers who are in the midst of helping save lives," the president said as he praised charity leaders at the White House. "If you want to help, support the Red Cross or the Salvation Army or your church or the United Way."

Mr. Bush met in the White House with faith-based and community groups, including representatives from the African Methodist Episcopal Church, the Southern Baptist Convention, the Salvation Army, the American Red Cross, the United Way of America, the YMCA, Catholic Charities USA and several others.

Private donations to U.S. charities giving meals, water and shelter to victims of Hurricane Katrina had topped $300 million by Monday. The American Red Cross, which accounts for the bulk of private donations, said it had received $196.9 million so far, including roughly $85 million from corporate donors.

Still, more money is needed. American Red Cross spokeswoman Sarah Marchetti said her group did not have a specific target figure for donations, but that she knew the relief efforts would cost far more than the $130 million spent after the four hurricanes that hit the United States last year.

Mr. Bush has appointed his father, former President George Bush, and former President Bill Clinton to lead fundraising efforts in the United States, as they did for the Dec. 26, 2004, tsunami in Asia.

Radio and television stations across the country have set a goal of raising at least $100 million, and the National Association of Broadcasters has designated Friday as a day for stations to hold telethons and other fundraising events.

During brief comments after his White House meeting, Mr. Bush took issue with the use of the word "refugees" to describe those displaced from New Orleans.

"There's a debate here about refugees. Let me tell you my attitude and the attitude of people around this table: The people we're talking about are not refugees. They are Americans, and they need the help and love and compassion of our fellow citizens. And the people at this table are providing that help and compassion and love," the president said.

Mr. Bush also assured Americans that displaced people will continue to receive their Social Security checks, their veteran's benefits checks and unemployment checks.

The Rev. Larry Snyder, president of Catholic Charities USA, which consists of more than 1,300 local agencies and institutions nationwide, was among those at the White House.

"Catholic Charities USA is firmly committed to helping people rebuild their lives," Mr. Snyder said.

Mr. Bush assured the religious leaders that their efforts are having an effect.

"Out of the darkness will come some light," he said.

Bush Taps Cheney To Assess Recovery Effort (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang And Mary Curtius

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush said today he was dispatching Vice President Dick Cheney to the region to assess the recovery efforts after Hurricane Katrina struck the Gulf Coast, amid growing unhappiness in Congress with the government's response.

The Senate Government Affairs Committee announced it would begin an investigation of the government's performance, and Bush said he, too, would look into his administration's response to the storm and the disaster that followed.

DOJ_NMG_0003559

The president made the announcement at the end of a Cabinet meeting at which department heads reported on their agencies' work in the week since the storm.

Pledging to press ahead with the effort to meet the demands posed by the catastrophe, the president said: "This administration is not going to rest until every life can be saved, until families are reconnected, until this recovery is complete."

The meeting was the first of several the president has scheduled for today, after running into sharp criticism throughout last week that his administration had been slow to recognize the scope of the disaster and to begin federal assistance to the stricken Gulf Coast.

Later in the morning he met with representatives of national voluntary organizations for what his spokesman, Scott McClellan, presented as a report on what charitable organizations were doing in the region.

Bush also called congressional leaders to the White House for their first meeting since Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29 and rampaged through more than four Southern states.

The death toll is estimated at perhaps 10,000 and the cost of the damage is put at more than $25 billion in insurance claims alone, with tens of billions more to rebuild.

"Government at all levels failed," Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) said at a Capitol news conference, where she announced that the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee would hold hearings.

"It is difficult to understand the lack of preparedness and the ineffective initial response to a disaster that had been predicted for years, and for which specific, dire warnings had been given for days," she said.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, the senior Democrat on the committee, said "governmental failures in preparing for, and responding to, Hurricane Katrina allowed much more human suffering and property destruction to occur than should have."

He said the storm was "the most significant test of our national emergency preparedness and response system" since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. The system, he said, "obviously did not pass the test."

On Monday, during his second trip to the region in a week, Bush heard one of the storm's victims complain about the use of the term "refugees." At the end of the meeting in the White House Roosevelt Room, Bush addressed that issue.

"Let me tell you my attitude and the attitude of people around this table: The people we're talking about are not refugees. They are Americans, and they need the help and love and compassion of our fellow citizens.

He also promised, as he did during the Cabinet meeting, that Social Security checks and other government benefit payments would be dispatched.

At the Cabinet meeting, Bush said that the vice president's mission would be to determine whether the government was meeting its most pressing goals, including searching for victims, restoring essential services, draining the flooded region, removing debris, and protecting health and safety.

He also said Cheney would focus on whether bureaucratic obstacles were interfering with the delivery of aid.

"Bureaucracy is not going to stand in the way of getting the job done for the people," the president said.

Over the weekend, would-be rescuers working for state and local agencies, and others, lambasted the Federal Emergency Management Agency for imposing bureaucratic roadblocks to their work.

Bush and McClellan refused to respond directly to questions about whether any senior officials would be fired as a result of their performance.

The president said he intended "to lead an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong."

"We want to make sure that we can respond properly if there's a WMD attack or another major storm," Bush said.

The focus of any investigation becomes a contentious issue.

Urging the Senate committee to keep the focus on what needed to be done in the immediate aftermath of the storm, Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said he asked Collins to "please don't have a hearing tying up people who need to make decisions."

The top priority, he said, should not be affixing blame, but on figuring out "how to fix things fast."

Some Democrats called for the formation of a commission similar to the independent panel that studied the Sept. 11 attacks to determine whether there had been an intelligence failure and to look at the government's response.

Some Republicans, including Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who pushed for creation of the 9/11 commission, said a similar inquiry may yet be required. But McCain and others said they first wanted to see Congress exercise its oversight role.

However, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) said no such commission was necessary. DeLay said he hoped that Congress would mount its own bipartisan, bicameral investigation into what went wrong. But he said the immediate focus should be on what needs to be done to aid victims.

DeLay said the House was likely to pass a second aid bill before week's end that would try to cut through bureaucratic red tape and get unemployment benefits to evacuees. The Congress passed, and Bush signed, a $10.5 billion aid bill last week.

DOJ_NMG_0003560

DeLay refused to say how much additional funding might be included for hurricane relief. He accused Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) of "playing politics" by putting out a statement estimating that "an initial investment of $150 billion will be needed" for immediate relief efforts. DeLay said no one knows how much money would be needed.

'Rays Of Light' In New Orleans (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, September 7, 2005

The draining of New Orleans quickened Tuesday as huge pumps made headway in lowering floodwaters in a city that braced for how many victims of Hurricane Katrina the dropping waterline may reveal.

Meanwhile, President Bush was readying a request for as much as $50 billion for the Gulf Coast region, which equals $625 for every household in America. And he announced plans to look into the government response.

"What I intend to do is lead an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong," he said.

Already, a $10.5 billion check approved last week is "being used at an increasingly rapid pace," said Scott Milburn, an Office of Management and Budget spokesman. "We're readying a second installment now."

Senate Democratic Minority Leader Harry Reid said after Bush met with congressional leaders that the president planned to ask for $50 billion more.

Relief and recovery needs will be the "No. 1 priority for the foreseeable future," said House Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas.

A USA TODAY poll of 609 people Tuesday asked who was to blame the most for problems after the hurricane. Twenty-five percent said state and local officials; 18% said the federal government, 13% blamed Bush. But the majority, 38%, said no one is to blame.

In New Orleans, major flood wall breaks were at last plugged with rocks and sandbags. The Army Corps of Engineers reported its pumping efforts had reduced the scope of flooding to 60% of the low-lying city, down from 80% at the high-water mark. Mayor Ray Nagin said it offered the first "rays of light" for a city that overnight turned from tourist attraction to disaster site. But he was worried about the human toll.

"It's going to be awful, and it's going to wake the nation up again," said Nagin, renewing warnings that the bodies of thousands of victims of the flooding left by Katrina could soon surface.

The Pentagon beefed up its presence, dispatching 4,000 paratroopers from the 82nd Airborne Division to finish evacuating the city. Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said "in most cases" the military had contributed the troops needed to help with the recovery effort.

The military was returning from Iraq about 2,800 members of a Louisiana combat brigade a month ahead of schedule, and some Mississippi National Guard members were also being sent home early.

The death count grew slowly. The number of confirmed dead was 294, including 83 in Louisiana and 196 in Mississippi. Effort intensified to reunite thousands of survivors with their loved ones. That is being led by groups such as the American Red Cross, television networks and Internet bulletin boards.

Sniper fire and looting have declined dramatically since the arrival days ago of National Guard troops, police Lt. Troy Savage said. But big fires hampered search-and-rescue efforts, including fires at antebellum homes in the fashionable Garden District.

Bush Will Rebound From Katrina Missteps (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The Hill, September 7, 2005

Normally, disasters such as floods, hurricanes, tornadoes and such are chances for the president to gain popularity and for his administration to shine. It was the unique and inexplicable inability of the Bush people to understand the magnitude of what they confronted and to respond to it quickly that managed to transform this chance for a big political gain into a monstrous liability.

Americans will want to know why the trucks didn't start rolling when the winds started blowing. And when they quieted, where were the airlifts and evacuations that could have fed and watered thousands and prevented many deaths and much psychic and physical harm?

But make no mistake about it: Every day for the next year, voters will see nonstop scenes of federal relief, rebuilding, renovation and reconstruction along with the empathy, sympathy and compassion these efforts imply in the heart of George W. Bush. He may have had a terrible first week, but he will rebound big time in the months to come.

DOJ_NMG_0003561

The aid an administration gives in the aftermath of a momentous disaster will be covered continuously by the media. Every relief convoy will get a wide slice of publicity. As the pumps run and the city and the gulf region drain, the nation will feel a surge of heady optimism at our ability to bounce back from disaster. Happy visuals will replace tragic ones, and interviews with homeowners joyously moving back in will run instead of the tearful stories of refugees.

After Sept. 11, Bush was heavily criticized too. Remember the slowly ticking minutes in Michael Moore's film "Fahrenheit 9/11" during which Bush continued to read to a class of children even after hearing about the Trade Center attack? (Bush was absolutely right not to bolt from the room and traumatize the kids and the nation even more.) It was not until his bullhorn speech several days later that the president got ahead of the story. Soon his response to Sept. 11 was the mainstay of his popularity and of his claim for a second term on the job.

The recovery from Katrina may well follow a similar trajectory. While the air in Washington will be filled with recriminations about why the levee wasn't reinforced and why the aid was so slow in coming after the storm hit, the airwaves around the nation will be filled with evidence of the administration's response, just as they were in the months after Sept. 11.

All this is not to take away from our justifiable anger at the human pain, loss of life and needless suffering that FEMA's inability to get off the dime fast caused. To watch those pictures of Americans crowded into what was increasingly called the Sewerdome is to simmer in rage at the dunderheads in Washington who stood on ceremony, budgetary considerations, bureaucratic constraints and chain of command rather than rushing to help those in need before a weather disaster became a human one.

It is also not to take away from the need for a thorough examination, preferably through a Sept. 11-style commission, of why the levee was not strengthened after the warnings of Hurricane Ivan a year before and of why relief was so slow in coming.

But let the Democrats hold their rejoicing. In a year, Katrina and the relief and rebuilding efforts that are about to follow will be seen as having imparted a new and crucial momentum to an administration that was obviously increasingly running out of ideas, out of steam, and — like its nation — out of gas.

Katrina has the capacity to shape the second Bush term in the same way Sept. 11 shaped his first term — not only in rebuilding New Orleans but in taking preventative steps around the nation to bolster our defenses against natural and manmade disasters and terror strikes. Responding to disasters is a source of presidential strength and popularity, and Bush is about to show how it is done.

Morris is the author of Rewriting History, a rebuttal of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's (D-N.Y.) memoir, Living History.

A Swamped Nation-builder (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

NOW WE KNOW HE'S SERIOUS: President Bush has taken the most important issue facing his administration, the Katrina relief mission, and kicked it upstairs to the vice president's office. Bush announced Tuesday that he is deploying Dick Cheney to the Gulf Coast region on Thursday, and Cheney will join the thousands of troops who have poured in to impose order on the relief effort. After its initial halting response, the federal government is bringing the full force of its power to bear on the crisis. The Coast Guard, FEMA, the National Guard, active military units and even the Border Patrol have been coordinating the rescue of tens of thousands of Gulf Coast residents. The evacuation of survivors has become far more orderly. On Tuesday, the Army Corps of Engineers plugged one of New Orleans' broken levees, and pumping water out of the city quickened.

Still, the overriding fact on the ground — both in Washington and along the Gulf — is this: Too many people died needlessly because their governments were too concerned about the threat of terrorism to pay attention to the threat posed by Mother Nature.

There will be plenty of time for politicians to play the blame game and to embrace facile, inside-the-Beltway solutions to the botched rescue. (A Cabinet seat for FEMA! Repeal the Posse Comitatus Act!) And some of the investigations now being called for — the president himself has graciously offered to lead one of them — may yield some useful information.

But the human tragedy will haunt the remainder of the Bush presidency. Bush was dismissive of nation-building in 2000; now his presidency will be judged largely by his performance as a nation-builder — both in Iraq and at home.

Setting aside the government's overall performance, the president himself, already reeling from extraordinarily low approval ratings, has not been sure-footed in responding to Katrina. He embarrassed himself on TV last Thursday when he said that he didn't think "anybody anticipated the breach of the levees." On Tuesday, sounding more like someone who'd just wandered into the Oval Office than like the commander in chief who saw us through 9/11, Bush said: "It's very important for us to understand the relationship between the federal government, the state government and the local government when it comes to a major catastrophe."

Get it together, Mr. President.

DOJ_NMG_0003562

A CEO's Weaknesses (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

There were two levee breaks last week: The natural disaster of Katrina ravaged New Orleans and left behind thousands of victims, but there was also a political catastrophe that breached the Bush administration's containment walls and exposed fundamental weaknesses in how this White House makes decisions.

The political damage may be harder to repair than the flooded infrastructure. The management flaws that have been so obvious over the past week go to the heart of how President Bush runs the government.

Early in his first term, it was popular to speak of how this Harvard Business School graduate was operating an "MBA Presidency." He insisted that everyone be on time to meetings; he wanted his aides to be properly dressed; he favored delegation of power, crisp meetings, early bedtimes. But these chief executive officer habits disguised a deeper reality: that Bush's management style was often haphazard and reactive. Like Isaiah Berlin's famous hedgehog, he came to focus on one big thing -- the war against terrorism -- and let many lesser things slide. Loyalty counted for more for this CEO than performance -- an attitude that is deadly in managing any enterprise.

The most pointed criticism of Bush's management I've read over the past week comes from the conservative columnist William Kristol. "Almost every Republican I have spoken with is disappointed" by the administration's response to Katrina, Kristol told The Post's Jim VandeHei. "He is a strong president . . . but he has never really focused on the importance of good execution. I think that is true in many parts of his presidency."

The part of this administration I know best is foreign policy. While I respect some of Bush's decisions, I see an underlying weakness in decision making that is very similar to the post-Katrina fiasco. This White House doesn't move effectively to fix broken bureaucracies, such as the Central Intelligence Agency or the Department of Homeland Security; it doesn't use interagency meetings to force clear decisions and then implement them, as has been clear in continuing policy confusion on Iraq, North Korea and Iran; and it doesn't mobilize the government well to deal with crisis warnings, as the Sept. 11 commission reported.

What accounts for this management failure? Experts cite a number of factors. First, this White House lacks a strong, substantive chief of staff who could act as a kind of deputy president, riding herd on the Cabinet agencies. Bush's chief, Andrew Card, is good at organizing the president's schedule, but he hasn't played the broader, make-the-trains-run role of many of his predecessors. Another problem is Bush's own style: As a key adviser once told me, this president isn't interested in hitting singles and doubles; he wants home runs. This approach almost guarantees that the administration won't do well at crisis prevention -- which succeeds best when nothing dramatic happens at all, thanks to good planning.

Even on the issues Bush has identified as his priorities, there has been a surprising reactive quality. Take the war on terrorism: The two bureaucracies that are crucial for protecting Americans -- the Department of Homeland Security and the intelligence community -- have been in obvious disarray over the past two years. Yet Bush has not seized the initiative in either case and has let others set the agenda for reorganization. The disorientation today at those two mission-critical bureaucracies is genuinely dangerous for the country.

Iraq, too, has been a policy disconnect. The president insists (admirably, in my view) that America must stay the course, but as the situation there has deteriorated, he has failed to explain clearly what that course is. That's not a new problem: From the beginning, the administration has had difficulty framing a single Iraq strategy and mobilizing all the resources necessary for it to succeed. There hasn't been one Iraq policy but several competing versions.

Managing the government isn't as glamorous as politics, and on the political side it must be said that Bush has been very skillful. His top political adviser, Karl Rove, is one of the most gifted, if also ruthless, people ever to play that role. And this White House is good at reaction and damage control -- at mobilizing the apparatus of government after initial mistakes, as we're finally seeing on the Gulf Coast.

What this White House needs most is the tonic of honest accountability, as illustrated by an anecdote from presidential scholar Fred Greenstein. He recalls a moment in the 1950s when an aide walked out of the Oval Office, congratulating himself for telling President Dwight D. Eisenhower "what he wanted to hear." Ike's national security adviser, Gen. Andrew Goodpaster, overheard the aide and angrily sent him back to tell the president the truth, no matter how unpleasant.

The 'Stuff Happens' Presidency (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

We're not number one. We're not even close.

DOJ_NMG_0003563

By which measures, precisely, do we lead the world? Caring for our countrymen? You jest. A first-class physical infrastructure? Tell that to New Orleans. Throwing so much money at the rich that we've got nothing left over to promote the general welfare? Now you're talking.

The problem goes beyond the fact that we can't count on our government to be there for us in catastrophes. It's that a can't-do spirit, a shouldn't-do spirit, guides the men who run the nation. Consider the congressional testimony of Joe Allbaugh, George W. Bush's 2000 campaign manager, who assumed the top position at FEMA in 2001. He characterized the organization as "an oversized entitlement program," and counseled states and cities to rely instead on "faith-based organizations . . . like the Salvation Army and the Mennonite Disaster Service."

Is it any surprise, then, that the administration's response to the devastation in New Orleans is of a piece with its response to the sacking of Baghdad once our troops arrived? "Stuff happens" was the way Don Rumsfeld described the destruction of Baghdad's hospitals, universities and museums while American soldiers stood around. Now stuff has happened in New Orleans, too, even as FEMA was turning away offers of assistance. This is the stuff-happens administration. And it's willing, apparently, to sacrifice any claim America may have to national greatness rather than inconvenience the rich by taxing them to build a more secure nation.

As a matter of social policy, the catastrophic lack of response in New Orleans is exceptional only in its scale and immediacy. When it comes to caring for our fellow countrymen, we all know that America has never ranked very high. We are, of course, the only democracy in the developed world that doesn't offer health care to its citizens as a matter of right. We rank 34th among nations in infant mortality rates, behind such rival superpowers as Cyprus, Andorra and Brunei.

But these are chronic conditions, and even many of us who argue for universal health coverage have grown inured to that distinctly American indifference to the common good, to our radical lack of solidarity with our fellow citizens. Besides, the poor generally have the decency to die discreetly, and discretely -- not conspicuously, not in droves. Come rain or come shine, we leave millions of beleaguered Americans to fend for themselves on a daily basis. It's just a lot more noticeable in a horrific rain, and when the ordinary lack of access to medical care is augmented by an extraordinary lack of access to emergency services.

Even if we'll never win the national-greatness sweepstakes for solidarity, though, we've long been the model of the world in matters infrastructural, in roads, bridges and dams and the like. But the America in which Eisenhower the Good decreed the construction of the interstate highway system now seems a far-off land in which even conservatives believed in public expenditures for the public good. The radical-capitalist conservatives of the past quarter-century not only haven't supported the public expenditures, they don't even believe there is such a thing as the public good. Let the Dutch build their dikes through some socialistic scheme of taxing and spending; that isn't the American way. Here, the business of government is to let the private sector create wealth -- even if that wealth doesn't circulate where it's most needed. So George W. Bush threw trillions of dollars in tax cuts to the wealthiest Americans, and what did they do with it? Did the Walton family up in Bentonville raise the levees in New Orleans? Did the Bass family over in Texas write a tax-deductible check to the Mennonites for the billions of dollars they would need to rescue the elderly from inundated nursing homes?

Even now, with bedraggled rescuers pulling decomposed bodies from the muck of New Orleans, Bill Frist, the moral cretin who runs the U.S. Senate, wanted its first order of business this week to be the permanent repeal of the estate tax, until the public outcry persuaded him to change course. The Republicans profess belief in trickle-down, but what they've given us is the Flood.

The world looks on in stunned amazement, unable to understand how a once great nation has grown so indifferent not just to its poor and its blacks but even to the most rudimentary self-preservation. Some of it is institutional racism, but the primary culprit is the economic libertarianism that the president still espouses whenever he sells his Social Security snake oil. It's that libertarianism, more than anything else, that has transformed a great city into an immense morgue.

But, hey -- stuff happens.

Osama And Katrina (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

On the day after 9/11, I was in Jerusalem and was interviewed by Israeli TV. The reporter asked me, "Do you think the Bush administration is up to responding to this attack?" As best I can recall, I answered: "Absolutely. One thing I can assure you about these guys is that they know how to pull the trigger."

It was just a gut reaction that George Bush and Dick Cheney were the right guys to deal with Osama. I was not alone in that feeling, and as a result, Mr. Bush got a mandate, almost a blank check, to rule from 9/11 that he never really earned at the polls. Unfortunately, he used that mandate not simply to confront the terrorists but to take a radically uncompassionate conservative agenda - on taxes, stem cells, the environment and foreign treaties - that was going nowhere before 9/11, and drive it into a post-9/11 world. In that sense, 9/11 distorted our politics and society.

DOJ_NMG_0003564

Well, if 9/11 is one bookend of the Bush administration, Katrina may be the other. If 9/11 put the wind at President Bush's back, Katrina's put the wind in his face. If the Bush-Cheney team seemed to be the right guys to deal with Osama, they seem exactly the wrong guys to deal with Katrina - and all the rot and misplaced priorities it's exposed here at home.

These are people so much better at inflicting pain than feeling it, so much better at taking things apart than putting them together, so much better at defending "intelligent design" as a theology than practicing it as a policy.

For instance, it's unavoidably obvious that we need a real policy of energy conservation. But President Bush can barely choke out the word "conservation." And can you imagine Mr. Cheney, who has already denounced conservation as a "personal virtue" irrelevant to national policy, now leading such a campaign or confronting oil companies for price gouging?

And then there are the president's standard lines: "It's not the government's money; it's your money," and, "One of the last things that we need to do to this economy is to take money out of your pocket and fuel government." Maybe Mr. Bush will now also tell us: "It's not the government's hurricane - it's your hurricane."

An administration whose tax policy has been dominated by the toweringly selfish Grover Norquist - who has been quoted as saying: "I don't want to abolish government. I simply want to reduce it to the size where I can drag it into the bathroom and drown it in the bathtub" - doesn't have the instincts for this moment. Mr. Norquist is the only person about whom I would say this: I hope he owns property around the New Orleans levee that was never properly finished because of a lack of tax dollars. I hope his basement got flooded. And I hope that he was busy drowning government in his bathtub when the levee broke and that he had to wait for a U.S. Army helicopter to get out of town.

The Bush team has engaged in a tax giveaway since 9/11 that has had one underlying assumption: There will never be another rainy day. Just spend money. You knew that sooner or later there would be a rainy day, but Karl Rove has assumed it wouldn't happen on Mr. Bush's watch - that someone else would have to clean it up. Well, it did happen on his watch.

Besides ripping away the roofs of New Orleans, Katrina ripped away the argument that we can cut taxes, properly educate our kids, compete with India and China, succeed in Iraq, keep improving the U.S. infrastructure, and take care of a catastrophic emergency - without putting ourselves totally into the debt of Beijing.

So many of the things the Bush team has ignored or distorted under the guise of fighting Osama were exposed by Katrina: its refusal to impose a gasoline tax after 9/11, which would have begun to shift our economy much sooner to more fuel-efficient cars, helped raise money for a rainy day and eased our dependence on the world's worst regimes for energy; its refusal to develop some form of national health care to cover the 40 million uninsured; and its insistence on cutting more taxes, even when that has contributed to incomplete levees and too small an Army to deal with Katrina, Osama and Saddam at the same time.

As my Democratic entrepreneur friend Joel Hyatt once remarked, the Bush team's philosophy since 9/11 has been: "We're at war. Let's party."

Well, the party is over. If Mr. Bush learns the lessons of Katrina, he has a chance to replace his 9/11 mandate with something new and relevant. If that happens, Katrina will have destroyed New Orleans, but helped to restore America. If Mr. Bush goes back to his politics as usual, he'll be thwarted at every turn. Katrina will have destroyed a city and a presidency.

Haunted By Hesitation (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON

It took a while, but the president finally figured out a response to the destruction of New Orleans.

Later this week (no point rushing things) W. is dispatching Dick Cheney to the rancid lake that was a romantic city. The vice president has at long last lumbered back from a Wyoming vacation, and, reportedly, from shopping for a $2.9 million waterfront estate in St. Michael's, a retreat in the Chesapeake Bay where Rummy has a weekend home, where "Wedding Crashers" was filmed and where rich lobbyists hunt.

Maybe Mr. Cheney is going down to New Orleans to hunt looters. Or to make sure that Halliburton's lucrative contract to rebuild the city is watertight. Or maybe, since former Senator John Breaux of Louisiana described the shattered parish as "Baghdad under water," the vice president plans to take his pal Ahmad Chalabi along for a consultation on destroying minority rights.

The water that breached the New Orleans levees and left a million people homeless and jobless has also breached the White House defenses. Reality has come flooding in. Since 9/11, the Bush administration has been remarkably successful at blowing off "the reality-based community," as it derisively calls the press.

DOJ_NMG_0003565

But now, when W., Mr. Cheney, Laura, Rummy, Gen. Richard Myers, Michael Chertoff and the rest of the gang tell us everything's under control, our cities are safe, stay the course - who believes them?

This time we can actually see the bodies.

As the water recedes, more and more decaying bodies will testify to the callous and stumblebum administration response to Katrina's rout of 90,000 square miles of the South.

The Bush administration bungled the Iraq occupation, arrogantly throwing away State Department occupation plans and C.I.A. insurgency warnings. But the human toll of those mistakes has not been as viscerally evident because the White House pulled a curtain over the bodies: the president has avoided the funerals of soldiers, and the Pentagon has censored the coffins of the dead coming home and never acknowledges the number of Iraqi civilians killed.

But this time, the bodies of those who might have been saved between Monday and Friday, when the president failed to rush the necessary resources to a disaster that his own general describes as "biblical," or even send in the 82nd Airborne, are floating up in front of our eyes.

New Orleans's literary lore and tourist lure was its fascination with the dead and undead, its lavish annual Halloween party, its famous above-ground cemeteries, its love of vampires and voodoo and zombies. But now that the city is decimated, reeking with unnecessary death and destruction, the restless spirits of New Orleans will haunt the White House.

The administration's foreign policy is entirely constructed around American self-love - the idea that the U.S. is superior, that we are the model everyone looks up to, that everyone in the world wants what we have.

But when people around the world look at Iraq, they don't see freedom. They see chaos and sectarian hatred. And when they look at New Orleans, they see glaring incompetence and racial injustice, where the rich white people were saved and the poor black people were left to die hideous deaths. They see some conservatives blaming the poor for not saving themselves. So much for W.'s "culture of life."

The president won re-election because he said that the war in Iraq and the Homeland Security Department would make us safer. Hogwash.

W.'s 2004 convention was staged like "The Magnificent Seven" with the Republicans' swaggering tough guys - from Rudy Giuliani to Arnold Schwarzenegger to John McCain - riding in to save an embattled town.

These were the steely-eyed gunslingers we needed to protect us, they said, not those sissified girlie-men Democrats. But now it turns out that W. can't save the town, not even from hurricane damage that everyone has been predicting for years, much less from unpredictable terrorists.

His campaigns presented the arc of his life story as that of a man who stumbled around until he was 40, then found himself and developed a laserlike focus.

But now that the people of New Orleans need an ark, we have to question the president's arc. He's stumbling in Iraq and he's stumbling on Katrina.

Let's play the blame game: the man who benefited more than anyone in history from safety nets set up by family did not bother to provide one for those who lost their families.

Katrina's Global Lessons (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

MOSCOW -- Hurricane Katrina has raked a vivid scar across America's image abroad -- and left its marks on President Bush's ambitious foreign policy agenda as well. Overcoming these setbacks will require a demonstration that the United States under Bush is not an irrevocably weakened and divided nation about to turn inward on its own problems.

The stories and images of lawlessness, refugees dying of deprivation or mayhem, and the desperation of befouled human sanctuaries in New Orleans have at times resembled dispatches from Darfur or Afghanistan. The initial shock abroad comes not from the sights of such human misery but from the fact that it occurred in the United States, which has always been quick both to help and to lecture those swept up in natural and man-made disasters in foreign lands.

The feet of clay of a nation that has regularly vaunted its standing as the world's only remaining superpower have been in plain view in recent days.

Here in the Russian capital and elsewhere abroad, the focus is shifting quickly to take in political consequences as well as relief efforts. European embassies in Washington are already reporting back to their capitals on how the disaster may further impair Bush's effectiveness as he slips toward lame-duck status. Diplomatic cables raise the key question of which America will emerge from this harrowing test of national resolve and compassion.

DOJ_NMG_0003566

Will post-Katrina America be humbler, more cooperative and more understanding of other nations' problems and failures? Or will the United States let its active engagement in the world's human and political crises become another casualty of Katrina's winds and floodwaters -- and of the political turmoil they have triggered?

"I look at this and cannot believe my eyes," Russian President Vladimir Putin said when I asked him Monday evening about Katrina's damage. "It tells us however strong and powerful we think we are, we are nothing in the eyes of nature and of God Almighty. . . . We are all vulnerable and must cooperate to help each other."

Putin reeled off details of the emergency aid that Russia has offered to airlift to Louisiana. But remarks by Putin and others at the annual Valdai conference, which brings together Europeans, Russians, Asians and Americans for discussions on Russia, seemed to reflect an expectation of a fairly quick return to the world stage by Bush, to whom Putin referred at one point simply as "George." The two leaders are due to meet in New York and then in Washington next week.

But the Russian will find that Bush has his hands full at home as he tries to cope with the angry complaints of residents of Louisiana and Mississippi who feel they have received little or no immediate help, while the victims of Asia's tsunami were lavishly aided and taxpayer money was flowing to Iraq.

The anger over their deplorable conditions and the incompetent reactions by federal and local authorities that contributed to those conditions is more than justified. And no one can doubt that there will be some lessening of U.S. capacity to alleviate suffering abroad when there is so much of it at home.

But the kind of deprivation and peril that Americans have witnessed in New Orleans in recent days is roughly what people in much of the Third World experience every day of their lives -- with no hope of a National Guard ever arriving, or an escape route being opened, unless there is significant outside help, especially from the United States.

Our own needs should not drive Americans farther away from other peoples in distress or cause us to abandon them to their own fate. To the contrary. This crisis -- like those in Darfur and elsewhere -- underlines the common humanity and the common destiny that all nations share.

Bush will go to New York next week to address the U.N. General Assembly, the symbol of "the international community" that his administration has regularly derided. This is the moment for the president to show the humility he once promised to bring to America's world leadership, but which he largely abandoned once in office.

For all its horror, Katrina could yet hold a political silver lining if the disaster reminds both Bush and his harshest critics that America's role in the world is not defined just by the personalities and policies of the current occupants of the White House. America is big enough in heart, resources and intelligence to recover at home and be active abroad -- if it shows national unity in the face of national disaster.

First Estimates On Katrina Costs For Washington Hit $200 Billion (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon, David Rogers and Dionne Searcey

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

The federal government could spend as much as $150 billion to $200 billion caring for the victims of Hurricane Katrina and rebuilding from its devastation, according to early congressional estimates -- a total bill that would far surpass the initial costs of recovering from the 9/11 terror attacks and could put Katrina on track to become the most expensive natural disaster in American history.

The early estimates are rough, but they are so high that some in Congress already are talking of creating a new government entity simply to manage the costs, similar to the effort by then-Commerce Secretary Herbert Hoover after floods in the same regions in the 1920s. All told, the process of paying for relief and repair is likely to be a "three-to-four-year exercise," said Sen. Judd Gregg, the New Hampshire Republican who heads the Budget Committee.

Even as levee breaches were being repaired in New Orleans and oil spills and fires were posing new problems, a torrent of federal relief spending was under way. The Federal Emergency Management Agency is committing funds at a rate close to $1 billion to $2 billion a day, officials estimated.

President Bush meets with cabinet members and says, "This administration is not going to rest until every life can be saved." Plus, U.S. Labor Secretary Elaine Chao discusses the federal programs in place for Hurricane Katrina victims.

Lawmakers said the $10.5 billion already allocated to relief efforts in an emergency measure late last week was likely to be gone in a matter of days. As a result, they expect the White House to ask shortly for an additional $40 billion. That alone will drive the cost of Katrina to more than three times the federal cost of the four big hurricanes that struck Florida last year. Approval is virtually certain: Louisiana is a politically important swing state coveted by both Republicans and Democrats, and neither party will want to be seen as shortchanging the effort.

But that will be only a down payment on a federal tab that all now agree is going to reach more eye-popping levels. The width of the storm's impact adds to costs. Among other things, the federal aid will include not only immediate relief but also major payments under the national flood-insurance program, and new appropriations to subsidize small-business disaster loans. What makes this disaster's costs extraordinary, however, is the fact that so many people face such a lengthy displacement and will now need housing and individual income and health assistance under a government safety net that didn't exist when the famous floods of the 1920s hit the same region.

DOJ_NMG_0003567

In many cases, such as Medicaid or welfare-related payments, states typically share in the costs. But the federal government will be asked to carry more of the burden, both because the affected states such as Louisiana have been so devastated financially, and because relief workers want to create the maximum flexibility to allow families to resettle around the country.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada was the first to go public, predicting a government commitment of $150 billion. Top Republicans bridled initially, saying any such estimates at this time translated into playing "political games."

But Mr. Gregg subsequently used an even higher $200 billion estimate, and defended Mr. Reid's figure. "I don't find that crazy at all," Mr. Gregg said. "That's a reasonable estimate from what we know so far."

Mr. Gregg said the requests for additional money will be coming regularly. "I think we'll be doing them every week or bi-weekly for a while," he said. "They are pulling down huge numbers right now."

The spending will surpass the federal costs of recovering from the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on New York and Washington. After those attacks, the federal government allocated $20 billion to rebuild Lower Manhattan. Overall, the forecasting firm Economy.com estimates that Sept. 11-related aid by all levels of government totaled about $67.3 billion in current dollars.

Some of the ideas being discussed on Capitol Hill involved relief far beyond the disaster area. For example, Sen. Charles Grassley, the Iowa Republican, said he wants loan relief for farmers whose crops might not reach market on schedule due to disruption at the New Orleans port. Sen. Ted Stevens, the Alaska Republican, said he favors tax relief for airlines hit by higher fuel costs. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, the Texas Republican, said she envisions broad-based aid to local governments for the added costs of schooling, housing and providing health care to evacuees, even temporarily. "There are many costs for the states like Texas that are taking these people in need in," she said.

Cecil Picard, Louisiana's superintendent of education, said he was hoping for federal help for some of the myriad issues schools will be facing as 187,000 students from storm-affected areas have been displaced. He wants federal money to make up the pay difference for teachers forced into substitute teaching jobs in outlying areas.

The large outlays overall will have many ripple effects. For one, Mr. Gregg said there is little question that the spending will drive up the 2006 deficit above the $333 billion forecast for the current fiscal year ending Sept. 30.

In addition, the sums now being discussed could add to anger over the fact that New Orleans, at least, wasn't better protected, and accelerate demands for investigations. In response to a question, President Bush said he himself would direct one probe.

"What I intend to do is lead...an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong," Mr. Bush said yesterday at a cabinet meeting. He offered no further details. But signaling that federal officials probably would point to state and local officials as a source of the problems, the president added, "It's very important for us to understand the relationship between the federal government, the state government and the local government when it comes to a major catastrophe.... We still live in an unsettled world. We want to make sure that we can respond. "

As Washington grappled with the costs, developments in the hurricane-struck region illustrated the kinds of after-effects that will make recovery and rebuilding so expensive. Officials toting up the damage in New Orleans said the storm generated as much as 90 million tons of solid waste and rendered 140,000 to 160,000 homes unusable. Environmental workers are worrying about everything from radioactive waste to wood infested with the ravenous Formosan termites that infest many Southern states.

Clean-up was getting under way at two major oil spills that unleashed 78,000 barrels of oil; the larger spill was moving out to the Gulf of Mexico. Nearly all of Louisiana's 530 sewage treatment facilities in the storm-ravaged region were damaged, with some barely visible under the floodwater.

Fires were burning yesterday in several places -- one in a staging area for Mardi Gras floats and some where gas lines were broken. Contributing to the mess: flooded homes where pesticides or old batteries were stored; overturned cars and boats where gas is leaking; submerged rail cars possibly carrying hazardous materials; termite-infested wood; and numerous animal carcasses.

"Everywhere we look there's spills," said Mike McDaniel, secretary of the Louisiana State Department of Environmental Quality. "It all adds up to almost a solid sheen over the area right now, but we expect over time that will take care of itself."

There's nowhere for the contaminated floodwater in the city to go but into Lake Pontchartrain, he said, though that will create environmental problems down the road. "We have to get the water out of the city or the nightmare gets only worse," he said. "We'll have to deal with the issues in the lake. The priority is on saving lives."

DOJ_NMG_0003568

As a result, it could be years before drinking water is restored to everyone, he said: "It is almost unimaginable the things we're going to have to plan for and deal with."

The Army Corps of Engineers said yesterday that progress continued, albeit fitfully, on efforts to repair damaged levees and position pumps to drain floodwaters from New Orleans. Officials said about 60% of the city remains under water, and they stood by earlier estimates that it could take one to three months to complete the pumping.

In a conference call yesterday afternoon with reporters, the officials estimated that about 10 of roughly 40 pumping stations in the New Orleans vicinity are operating. One major pump located along Interstate 10 near the 17th Street Canal is running and is sending water into the canal, where it drains into Lake Pontchartrain. But a second pump, known as Pump Station Six, at the head of the canal near the lake, had to be shut down shortly after it was started Monday. It overheated because of trash in the water clogging it.

"Various pump stations are starting up," said engineer Walter Baumy. "It's a very small number but at least it's progress."

The New Orleans flooding was caused by what officials now describe as three "major" breaches, and several smaller ones, in the system of protective barriers protecting New Orleans and surrounding areas. As officials begin to gain access to heavily flooded areas south and southeast of the city, they are finding additional levee damage.

Administration officials said yesterday that the levees that failed were all completed projects. Despite complaints of cuts to the Army Corps of Engineers budget and charges that the cuts may have blocked projects to bolster the levees, no improvements to those facilities were in the pipeline, they said.

Aides to Mr. Reid, the Senate Democratic leader, said their overall estimate of $150 billion in federal relief costs included not just relief efforts, but about $50 billion of public works to rebuild the area's infrastructure. As the picture of the damage and costs came into clearer focus, some Republicans were talking of managing the outlays now needed by using an entity modeled after the Lower Manhattan Development Corp., created to help rebuild following the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

For his part, Mr. Gregg, the Budget Committee chairman, says his model of what should be the efforts by the future President Herbert Hoover, after floods in the same region in the 1920s. "You've got to have some central management entity that's on the ground, in the region, headed up by somebody of substance whom people respect," he said.

Mr. Gregg said Congress can still meet its commitment to wring some savings from federal benefit programs over five years as promised in a budget resolution passed last spring. Medicaid, the federal-state health-care program for the poor, is one of the areas targeted for multiyear savings. But he also said that in the short term, Washington may have to increase its commitment to maintain health coverage for families whose homes were destroyed by the storm and have been forced to relocate out of state.

Despite the looming bills, Mr. Gregg said he saw no reason to retreat on the level of tax cuts assumed in the budget. And Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, an Iowa Republican, said the greater impetus after Katrina is to do more to bring "additional tax policy into place to help investment."

Mr. Grassley was cautious about promising any added tax relief for airlines, which are being hurt badly by rising fuel costs in Katrina's wake, saying that a pending pension bill had already been shaped to help the industry by stretching out its payment obligations. But Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens, an Alaska Republican, said the finance panel should consider a suspension of federal fuel taxes for airlines.

Leaders Push To Make Sure Blacks Given Fair Share Of Rebuilding Jobs (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand And Melanie Eversley

USA Today, September 7, 2005

BATON ROUGE — After accusations that many New Orleans hurricane victims were not evacuated or rescued because they were black and poor, civil rights advocates Tuesday shifted their focus to making sure poor blacks aren't left out of the city's rebuilding.

Jesse Jackson, at the Louisiana state emergency center in Baton Rouge, said Hurricane Katrina is an opportunity for the federal government to lift a community out of poverty.

New Orleans' impoverished black residents “should be first in line to get the jobs to clean up their own neighborhoods,” he said.

Rep. Mel Watt, D-N.C., head of the Congressional Black Caucus, said the caucus would support any effort to make sure New Orleans residents were part of rebuilding.

Blacks make up 67% of New Orleans' population of about 450,000. A quarter of the city's blacks are considered poor. By federal standards, a family of four earning less than $19,307 a year is poor.

DOJ_NMG_0003569

Poverty rates in neighboring Gulf states Mississippi and Alabama, which also were hit by the hurricane, are higher than the national average of 13.1%. Mississippi is the USA's poorest state with 21.6% below the poverty line; Alabama is among the top 10 with 16.1% below poverty.

Many blacks in New Orleans were marooned for days after levees broke and the city flooded. Thousands were stranded in their homes or waiting in the Superdome and at the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, where conditions deteriorated rapidly. There was a shortage of food, water and medicine.

Black leaders have been angry at the response.

"We cannot allow it to be said by history that the difference between those who lived and those who died in the great storm and flood of 2005 was nothing more than poverty, age or skin color," said Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, D-Md., past chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, at a news conference last week.

At a concert fundraiser for victims, rapper Kanye West lashed out at the president: "George Bush doesn't care about black people."

Now that most stranded residents have been moved to shelters across the country, Jackson is calling for a Marshall Plan for the region, referring to the massive U.S. aid plan that helped rebuild Western Europe after World War II.

Jackson said evacuees should be kept close to home so that families are not separated. He's also advocating a moratorium on foreclosures for affected homeowners and business owners.

Jackson is urging that blacks from New Orleans be given temporary housing on Louisiana military bases rather than being dispersed to other states.

In-state resettlement increases chances they will get first crack at rebuilding jobs — and lessens the risk they'll wear out their welcome in cities outside Louisiana that have offered to take them in, Jackson said.

"Race and class is an issue when the land is dry," he said.

New Orleans resident Karl Spain, 26, a black day laborer who made it to Baton Rouge after a three-day odyssey, said he'd be first in line for a rebuilding job in his home city but would take work wherever he could find it.

Spain said he escaped the floodwaters in New Orleans by carrying his 11-month-old daughter through waist-high water. He and his family made it to a roadside and got a ride to Baton Rouge, where a church shelter took him in.

"Right now, we don't have nothing at all," Spain said. "We're just trying to survive."

New Orleans Mayor Orders Forced Evacuation (AJC/AP)

By Cain Burdeau, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 7, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — As flood waters receded inch by inch Tuesday, New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin authorized law enforcement officers and the U.S. military to force the evacuation of all residents who refuse to heed orders to leave the dark, dangerous city.

Nagin's emergency declaration released late Tuesday targets those still in the city unless they have been designated by government officials as helping with the relief effort.

The move comes after some citizens bluntly told authorities who had come to deliver them from the flooded metropolis that they would not leave their homes and property. An estimated 10,000 residents are believed to still be in New Orleans, and some have been holed up in their homes for more than a week.

While acknowledging the emergency declaration, police Capt. Marlon Defillo said late Tuesday that forced removal of citizens had not yet begun. He said that officers who were visiting homes were still reminding people that police may not be able to rescue them if they stay.

"That would be a P.R. nightmare for us," Defillo said of any forced evacuations. "That's an absolute last resort."

Repeated telephone calls to Nagin's spokeswoman, Tami Frazier, seeking comment were not returned.

Meanwhile, engineers struggled to drain the saucer of a city of billions of gallons of water, a Herculean task that could take weeks — if they are lucky.

The Army Corps of Engineers said the timetable ranges from three weeks to nearly three months, depending on a string of variables, including rainfall, the still-unknown condition of the pumps abandoned to Hurricane Katrina, and whether the system can withstand the flotsam of broken buildings, trees, trash and corpses.

Work has also been impeded by sporadic gunfire coming from "criminals with guns," said Col. Richard Wagenaar, the Corps' chief district engineer.

The contractors are "getting used to it and that's pretty scary," Wagenaar said.

DOJ_NMG_0003570

Despite complications, "we have to get the water out of the city or the nightmare will continue," said Louisiana Environmental Secretary Mike McDaniel. He said the water will be pumped into Lake Pontchartrain even though it is fouled with sewage, heavy metals, gasoline and other dangerous substances.

The pumping began after the Corps used hundreds of sandbags and rocks over the Labor Day weekend to close a 200-foot gap in the 17th Street Canal levee that burst in the aftermath of the storm and swamped 80 percent of this below sea-level city.

Following an aerial tour Tuesday, Nagin said the water was dropping ever so slightly, and he estimated that it covered only 60 percent of the city.

"Even in areas where the water was as high as the rooftops, I started to see parts of the buildings," he said, adding, "I'm starting to see rays of light."

But he also warned of the horrors that could be revealed when the waters recede. "It's going to be awful and it's going to wake the nation up again," said Nagin, who a day earlier upped his estimate of the death toll in his city to as much as 10,000.

The job to rid the city of water got off to a woefully slow start.

Once all of the city's pumping stations are running, they can move water at a rate of 29 billion gallons a day and lower the water level a half-inch per hour, or about a foot per day. But by late Tuesday afternoon, Corps officials said only three of New Orleans' normal contingent of 148 drainage pumps were operating.

With the water dropping, military and police turned their attention to evacuating the streets. Among those refusing to leave was 69-year-old John Ebanks, who waved off would-be rescuers from a porch stocked with food, mosquito spray and other supplies.

"You've got to protect your property, that's the main thing," Ebanks said. "This is all I've got. I'm pretty damn old to start over."

In St. Bernard Parish, 38-year-old Dennis Rizzuto took a break from a Monopoly game with his family to emerge from the second-floor window of his home.

He said he had plenty of water, food to last a month and a generator powering his home. "They're going to have to drag me" out, Rizzuto said.

In a plea to holdouts who might be listening to portable radios in the powerless city, Nagin warned that the fetid water could carry disease and that natural gas was leaking all over town.

"This is not a safe environment," Nagin said. "I understand the spirit that's basically, `I don't want to abandon my city.' It's OK. Leave for a little while. Let us get you to a better place. Let us clean the city up."

To that end, the Pentagon began sending 5,000 paratroopers from the Army's storied 82nd Airborne Division to use small boats, including inflatable Zodiac craft, to launch a new search-and-rescue effort in flooded sections of the city.

Some National Guardsmen and helicopters were diverted from their search missions Tuesday to fight fires, an emerging threat in a city that is still at least a day and a half away from restoring the first running water since the storm.

A candle was blamed for starting one major blaze in the lower Garden District — a historic neighborhood of mostly wooden homes. The flames started in an abandoned brick building and spread to a neighboring apartment house. The blazes burned for hours before Chinook helicopters with water pouches were brought in to fight the blaze.

New Orleans Police Superintendent Eddie Compass said lawlessness in the city "has subsided tremendously," and officers warned that those caught looting in an area where the governor has declared an emergency can get up to 15 years in prison. About 124 prisoners filled a downtown jail set up at the city's train and bus terminal.

"We continue to get better day by day," Compass said.

The signs of hope came against increasingly angry rhetoric over the federal response as too little too late. In Washington, congressional leaders planned hearings into the aftermath of the storm.

"We need to rebuild the confidence of the American people ... in our government's ability to protect them from attack, whether it comes from nature or from terrorists," said Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn. "The government simply did not act quickly and effectively enough."

Jefferson Parish president Aaron Broussard was even more blunt.

"Bureaucracy has murdered people in the greater New Orleans area," he said on CBS' "Early Show." "Take whatever idiot they have at the top of whatever agency and give me a better idiot. Give me a caring idiot. Give me a sensitive idiot. Just don't give me the same idiot."

Five of the 13 sub-basins in New Orleans were still seriously flooded, and barges and crews were getting into place to fix levee breaches at two other spots — the London Avenue canal and the Industrial canal. The London Avenue canal is in the northwestern section of the city, the Industrial canal in the east.

DOJ_NMG_0003571

The Corps is concentrating on the London Avenue canal, where workers will spend at least two weeks filling a 45-foot hole with rocks and sandbags, Wagenaar said. Once that drainage canal is fixed, then more pumps can start running.

Before work can even begin on the Industrial canal two barges pushed onto a bridge by Katrina and a sunken barge need to be removed. The Coast Guard has said 110 barges, ships and boats sank or ran aground during the storm — 67 of them in the Mississippi River, and another 43 along the coast.

The levees were deliberately breached in some spots to let the water flow back out into Lake Pontchartrain, where the water level had dropped below that inside the city.

How long it takes to drain the city could depend on the condition of the pumps — especially whether they were submerged and damaged, the Corps said. Also, the water is full of debris, and while there are screens on the pumps, it may be necessary to stop and clean them from time to time.

"We're working every avenue to do whatever we can to get things back in order," said Walter Baumy, Corps manager for the project. "We're going to accomplish the mission of getting the water out of the city."

New Orleans Levees Patched, Army Starts Pumping Water (Update6) (BLOOM)

By Heather Burke

Bloomberg, September 7, 2005

Sept. 6 (Bloomberg) -- Engineers repaired a ruptured levee in New Orleans and began pumping water from the flooded city as workers intensified the search for survivors and those killed in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

Rescuers are combing through in the areas hit hardest by Katrina ``to see if we missed anybody and to gather bodies missed previously," said Brigadier General Gary Jones of the Louisiana National Guard. Officials estimated that some 10,000 people still need rescuing in the city.

``We are starting to see some significant progress," New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said today in a televised news conference. ``The individuals we are pulling out are in pretty bad shape," Nagin said. ``Most of them are delirious, they're dehydrated."

Rescuers are confronted with a community awash in filth, as fires broke out around the city, including the historic Garden District. The water in New Orleans is fouled by pesticides, gasoline, metals and fecal waste, said Mike McDaniel, secretary of the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality.

As many as 160,000 homes are submerged, McDaniel said. Oil leaking from underground fuel tanks, submerged vehicles and other equipment have made the area a vast toxic waste site, McDaniel said. ``It adds up to a solid sheen over the area," he said.

Thousands Presumed Dead

Thousands are presumed dead in what officials called the worst natural disaster in U.S. history. Katrina ripped into the north coast of the Gulf of Mexico on Aug. 29, breaching levees that protected New Orleans. About 80 percent of the city, which lies below sea level, was under water as deep as 20 feet. The storm left a $100 billion trail of destruction, according to Risk Management Solutions Inc., an insurance-industry consultant.

The hurricane may be the deadliest U.S. storm since one that swept through Galveston, Texas, in 1900, killing an estimated 8,000 to 12,000. The 1906 San Francisco earthquake and fire killed 5,000 to 6,000.

Louisiana has recorded 71 dead so far, said Bob Johannessen, a spokesman for the state Health and Hospitals Department. Mississippi officials estimate that 161 were killed in the state.

Temporary Morgue

Louisiana set up a temporary morgue in St. Gabriel Parish, about 50 miles north of New Orleans, which can hold about 1,000 bodies and can be expanded, Johannessen said.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency has allocated more than $2.87 billion in aid, including purchases of relief supplies, construction of camps and military evacuations, said spokesman David Passey.

As of 1 p.m. Washington time today, 32,000 people had been rescued and 182,000 people were housed in 559 shelters, the Department of Homeland Security said.

The department said 15,000 active-duty military, 43,000 National Guard members, 4,000 Coast Guard personnel and 7,000 FEMA responders were on the ground in the hurricane-stricken areas.

Two thousand people have been evacuated to hospitals, U.S. Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt said today.

While many people are being lifted by helicopter from damaged homes and off rooftops, some residents have refused to leave, doubting they'll be allowed back.

Coaxing People to Leave

Louisiana Governor Kathleen Blanco said state officials are bringing in chaplains and other people to persuade people to leave their homes.

``Some of them are in shock, they're scared," Blanco told reporters today.

About 356 U.S. Public Health Service workers and 340 disease trackers from the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention will be working in shelters, U.S. officials said in a press conference in Baton Rouge, Louisiana.

Health officials are investigating outbreaks of diarrhea at Texas shelters for people displaced by the storm, CDC Director Julie Gerberding said. They are also concerned about possible outbreaks of typhoid and respiratory diseases, she said.

Engineers are pumping water from the flooded areas of New Orleans back into Lake Pontchartrain after patching the levee at the city's 17th Street Canal yesterday, said Jason Binet, a civil engineer with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. Today, the repaired breach will be fortified with layers of stone and asphalt, Binet said.

About 60 percent of the city is still under water, Corps of Engineers officials said today at a press conference. They estimate it will take 24 to 80 days to drain the city.

Closing Ruptures

Two ruptures remain at the London Avenue Canal. Engineers are building a dike out of rocks at the head of canal to stop the water flowing, then will use steel sheets to fix the breaches, officials said.

Troops are using portable pumps to remove the water, Binet said. The permanent pumps need to be fixed because portable ones can't reach the city's center, he said. Some pump stations are under water, and their electrical machinery has to dry out, he said.

The city of almost 500,000 depends on pumps and levees to keep dry. The walls shield New Orleans from the Mississippi River to the south and the Lake Pontchartrain to the north.

Open the Port

The Port of New Orleans, the biggest U.S. port by tonnage handled, opened to Hurricane Katrina relief ships today and commercial shipments may resume in two weeks.

BellSouth Corp. is working to restore telephone lines as it also contends with 6,500 employees who live in the areas along the Gulf coast. The company has set up tent cities in Baton Rogue and Kenner, Louisiana, and Gulfport, Mississippi, to provide workers with food, beds, and a staging area for those working to restore lines.

About 810,000 lines in Mississippi, Louisiana and Alabama were knocked out, and 19 central offices were shut by the storm, Atlanta-based BellSouth said in a statement today. The company said it may have to pay as much as $600 million to fix its network.

About 946,000 people remained without power in the Gulf region today, according to figures released by Entergy Corp., Southern Co., Cleco Corp. and the Energy Department.

New Orleans began rotating police officers, firefighters and emergency-medical workers on five-day rest periods. About 315 firefighters from New York are in New Orleans, said Captain John Hellmers of the New Orleans Fire Department. The New Yorkers are manning 12 New Orleans fire trucks. Firefighters have handled eight fires in the city today, Hellmers said.

Failing to Report

The police department said as many as 500 of its 1,600 officers have failed to report for work. Many may be searching for family members after losing their homes, New Orleans Police Deputy Chief Warren Riley said during a televised press conference.

In Washington, lawmakers from both parties criticized the government, saying officials failed to send emergency aid fast enough. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid joined Senator Hillary Clinton to ask President George W. Bush to create a special commission to investigate.

Bush said he will call for a probe into how the federal government responded to the disaster.

``We want to make sure we can respond properly," Bush said after a meeting with his Cabinet today at the White House. ``If things went wrong, we'll correct" them.

Help From Cheney

Bush said he will send Vice President Dick Cheney to the area later this week to ``help me determine" whether the government is meeting its goals in the search for survivors and in restoring public services.

The Senate will begin public hearings as early as next week into the ``failures of all levels of government" in the response to Hurricane Katrina, said Susan Collins, a Maine Republican and chairwoman of the Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee.

The U.S. Federal Reserve should hold off on increasing interest rates later this month to allay any consumer doubts about the nation's economic health, said Senator Charles Grassley, an Iowa Republican and chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0003573

``It would probably bring some confidence to people that are concerned about the overall economy and not hurt our fight against inflation," Grassley said.

Scenes of the city's devastation, played out on cable news channels, Web sites and in newspapers, led Americans to donate at least $500 million toward Katrina relief, according to the Chronicle of Philanthropy.

Days of Chaos

The first days following the storm were marred by chaos and lawlessness, as police focused on saving people. Military officials say crime is now under control. Curfews are in effect in several parishes, said Lieutenant Kevin Cowan of the Louisiana emergency preparedness office. Federal agents arrested a 20-year- old man for firing a handgun at a military rescue helicopter in New Orleans, said U.S. Attorney Jim Letten. The man was arraigned in Baton Rouge today, charged with the first federal crime related to Katrina, Letten said.

The storm ravaged energy production in the Gulf of Mexico, source of about a third of the oil consumed in the U.S. and about one-fifth of the natural gas.

Katrina shut 870,374 barrels of daily oil output, or 58 percent of normal Gulf production, according to a report from the U.S. Minerals Management Service in Washington. Daily oil output rose 173,307 barrels from yesterday.

The average U.S. pump price for regular gasoline fell to $3.041 a gallon today from a record $3.057 a gallon yesterday, according to the American Automobile Association. Prices range from $3.35 a gallon in Washington, D.C., to $2.74 in Louisiana, according to the AAA.

Storms Brewing

In the Atlantic Ocean, other storms are brewing. Hurricane Maria, with maximum sustained winds of about 100 mph (160 kph) was 545 miles (875 kilometers) east-northeast of Bermuda as of 11 a.m. New York time, the National Hurricane Center said. Maria, which was weakening, is forecast to remain at sea.

Tropical storm Nate was about 275 miles (440 km) south- southwest of Bermuda and showing little movement, the hurricane center said. It has top winds of about 60 mph.

Tropical-storm warnings were issued along Florida's eastern coast for yet another storm, as yet unnamed, that and may strengthen tomorrow, the hurricane center said. It was about 180 miles (290 km) southeast of Cape Canaveral, Florida, and likely to move slowly north-northwest, the center said.

Huge Pumps Start Draining Toxic Floodwater From City Runoff Flowing Into Pontchartrain May Threaten Lake's Health (USAT)

By Peter Eisler, Tom Kenworthy And Traci Watson

USA Today, September 7, 2005

Engineers fired up a few of New Orleans' giant pump stations Tuesday to drain flood water into Lake Pontchartrain, a task that will pour millions of gallons of toxic runoff into the lake in the coming weeks.

Officials from the Army Corps of Engineers said it should take from 24 to 80 days to drain the bowl-shaped city completely. They said about 60% of New Orleans remains under water, down from 80% that was submerged after flood walls around the city gave way last week in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

“We're getting access to areas we could not get to, and that's going to help us greatly,” said Walter Baumy, chief engineer for the corps' New Orleans district. Crews have sealed off the biggest breaches in the city's flood walls. They started up four major pump stations and a few smaller ones — about a quarter of the 40 or so pumps. “It's not a large (pumping) capacity at this point … but at least it's progress.”

The corps still could not say how long it would be until the city is dry enough to allow people to return to their homes and begin reconstruction. There's simply too much water on the ground to do a credible damage assessment.

“We can't even get in there to have a chance to look at that and see the condition of the infrastructure,” said Al Naomi, another corps engineer.

New Orleans sits largely below sea level. The city is ringed by Lake Pontchartrain, the Mississippi River and the marshes of the Gulf of Mexico, so floodwater can't flow out on its own. A 350-mile system of levees and flood walls protects the city, but Katrina caused three major breaches and several smaller ones. The massive pumps that normally push rain and floodwaters out to the lake were overwhelmed.

Engineers from the corps and the state and local agencies that help maintain the levee and drainage systems now face an unprecedented challenge. Because the floodwaters are filled with debris, it's hard to predict how efficiently the pumps will be able to empty the city. Also, the water is filled with sewage overflows, petrochemicals from ruptured fuel tanks and other toxic wastes.

DOJ_NMG_0003574

So no one knows how much damage Lake Pontchartrain will suffer when millions of gallons of that fetid water are pumped into the lake.

State and federal environmental teams are assessing contamination levels. They will monitor water quality in the lake as the city is drained, said Donna Myers, chief of national water quality assessment at the U.S. Geological Survey (USGS). Until the results are in, she added, it's tough to gauge the impact. “It's a large volume of water, and there are many contaminant sources,” Myers said, and “we're not sure how this all moves together. We don't know if there are very high (contamination) levels.”

Myers and Jeff Williams, another USGS scientist, noted that the lake already is polluted. Still, it is a critical estuary that supports important fisheries and wildlife habitat. “Clearly, there is cause for concern” about the impact of the floodwaters, Williams said. “How much of a negative impact … we are not in a position to say.”

Harold Zeliger, a chemical toxicology consultant in Saratoga, N.Y., predicted “a huge environmental impact” and offered a “best-guess estimate” that it would take the lake three to five years to recover.

The more immediate concern was draining the city. To that end, the federal Environmental Protection Agency and its state counterpart have issued the corps temporary permits to immediately pump floodwater into Pontchartrain. Environmental groups, such as the local Sierra Club branch, said they did not object.

Engineers punched holes in several levees in parts of the city where flood levels were higher than the water in drainage canals leading to Pontchartrain. That allowed water to flow out of those neighborhoods; some saw floodwaters drop by 5 feet, Baumy said. Now, engineers are closing those holes and sealing off other canals where damaged flood walls allowed the lake's waters to flow into the city.

Engineers also are evaluating pumping stations. One major station, where a breached flood wall on the 17th Street Canal allowed flooding, was shut down due to debris, Baumy said. That pump and others are expected to be on line later this week.

The intentional breaches bring “a more dramatic and appreciable lowering of the water,” said Don Basham, the corps' construction chief. Now that water levels inside and outside the levees have equalized, the rest of the flooding will have to be pumped out, he added, so the drawdown from now on will be “less dramatic.”

Flooding Recedes In New Orleans; U.S. Inquiry Is Set (NYT)

By Jere Longman And Sewell Chan

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 6 - The floodwaters began to drain fitfully from this crippled city on Tuesday as a handful of pumps came back into operation. But with growing concerns about gas leaks, fires, toxic water and diseases spread by mosquitoes, Mayor C. Ray Nagin said he wanted to ratchet up pressure on the estimated 5,000 to 10,000 remaining citizens to leave.

Mr. Nagin said he was reissuing a mandatory evacuation order and urged stragglers to leave immediately, saying he did not want possible explosions and disease to increase a death toll that, Lt. David Benelli, president of the Police Association of New Orleans, said could reach 2,000 to 20,000.

In Washington, President Bush promised an investigation into what went wrong in the response to Hurricane Katrina and planned to dispatch Vice President Dick Cheney to the Gulf Coast to cut through any bureaucratic obstacles slowing the recovery. [Page A17.]

The Senate and the House also announced their own investigation into the government's response, with Senator Susan Collins of Maine, a leading Republican, calling the response "woefully inadequate."

"If our system did such a poor job when there was no enemy," said Ms. Collins, chairwoman of the Homeland Security Committee, "how would the federal, state and local governments have coped with a terrorist attack that provided no advance warning and that was intent on causing as much death and destruction as possible?"

The committee is preparing for public hearings next week on response to the storm.

Officials said about 60 percent of New Orleans was still under water, but that was down from a peak of about 80 percent. Most of the gain came because the Army Corps of Engineers began opening gaps in the city's levees after the water level in surrounding bodies of water fell. The holes ensured that the levees - designed to keep water out of the below-sea-level city - would not hold it in.

Four of the approximately 40 pumping stations in the New Orleans area were running on Tuesday at least at partial capacity, officials said, but haltingly; a fifth giant one, at the 17th Street Canal, site of a major levee breach, started but had to be shut off again because the pumps sucked in debris.

Officials said it would take 24 days to pump the water from an eastern section of New Orleans and 80 days to clear the flooding from Chalmette, the nearby seat of St. Bernard Parish.

The receding waters were expected to reveal ever more bodies, to be identified by a team of forensic pathologists, medical examiners, coroners and morticians from local funeral homes.

DOJ_NMG_0003575

"We are going to take one deceased victim at a time and count one at a time," said Robert Johannessen, a spokesman for Louisiana's Department of Health and Hospitals. Of the process of identifying the bodies, Mr. Johannessen said, "It could take days, it could take years, it could take lifetimes."

The official death toll in Louisiana stood at 83, but state officials said the counting had only begun. In Mississippi, Gov. Haley Barbour announced Tuesday evening that the state's "unofficial but credible estimate" of the death toll was at 196, but that it was still rising. Mr. Barbour said that more than a quarter of the deaths had been reported in inland counties, not along the coast.

Evacuees continued to come back into Jefferson Parish to check on their homes, overwhelming roads and bridges. Interstate 10, which connects Baton Rouge and New Orleans, was backed up for about five miles.

Louisiana officials offered a first glimpse at the environmental wreckage. The state secretary of environmental quality, Michael D. McDaniel, said that wildlife habitats along hundreds of miles of coastline had been destroyed and that the hurricane exacerbated the slow coastal erosion that had already made the coast more vulnerable to hurricanes.

Mr. McDaniel said that there was no alternative to pumping billions of gallons of brackish water back into Lake Pontchartrain, but that it was too early to determine the harmfulness of the toxins and pollutants that were being slowly sifted out of New Orleans.

"I know there's been a lot of discussion about 'toxic soup' and 'witch's brew,' " he said. "I've seen no data to date that backs up that kind of statement. We do know and would expect that there are a lot of bacteriological contaminants in the water."

In New Orleans, four major fires had broken out by Tuesday morning and gas leaks were numerous, Mayor Nagin said.

"I don't want make any statement that suggests I'm giving up on New Orleans," he said at a news conference. "But it's a very volatile situation in the city right now. There's lots of oil on the water and there's gas leaks where it's bubbling up, and there's fire on top of that. If those two unite, God bless us. I don't know what's going to happen."

Mr. Nagin said in an interview that a new evacuation order would eliminate exemptions that had allowed people to stay in hotels and hospitals. Essentially, the city will be closed to everyone but law enforcement, military, and public safety and health officials while it is drained of water and utilities are restored. The 82nd Airborne Division closed a Hyatt hotel to civilians on Tuesday afternoon.

The new evacuation order has been drafted and will be issued shortly, Mr. Nagin said, even though Louisiana state officials question his authority to issue such a command. "I don't care, I'm doing it," he said. "We have to get people out."

That meant people were once again bound to the city's convention center, where 25,000 people or more had huddled in desperate conditions for days. At St. Charles and Louisiana Avenues, about two dozen people were patted down by federal customs officials and placed on a bus for the convention center, where they were to be airlifted out of town.

Told that some people were waiting as long as three hours at the convention center before being flown out, Mr. Nagin said that was a considerable improvement over the five days that it took some people to be evacuated last week.

Lucas Russ, 65, a retired school district employee, said, "It's getting nasty and really smelly," as he prepared to board a bus with a bag of his belongings.

Mr. Russ said that National Guard troops had told him he had to leave and that he would receive no more food and water. Guard officials denied that, and Mr. Nagin said that many evacuees were delirious, severely dehydrated, missing their medication and in need of immediate medical attention.

The mayor said that the National Guard had asked him whether handing out sustenance provisions would encourage people to stay, but that his response was, "Do not harm anyone, do not allow anyone to starve, do not allow anyone to go without water and always treat everyone with respect."

That left officials with the question of how to strongly encourage holdouts to leave. No one is being forced to leave yet, but officials said that could change.

"We may have to force people out to save their lives, if we get to that point," said P. Edwin Compass III, superintendent of police. "I'm using this as a tactic to scare people into leaving."

Brig. Gen. Michael P. Fleming, an Army National Guard commander said of a forced evacuation: "It's a tough decision. Between the mayor and governor, if they decide that's what's to be done, the New Orleans Police Department, the state police and National Guard would be part of it. We would help them implement it if we're called on to do so."

With assistance from 4,000 National Guard troops and another 4,000 troops from the 82nd Airborne, New Orleans was now secure and "locked down," with looting reduced to minimal levels, said Warren J. Riley, the deputy superintendent of the New Orleans police.

Mr. Nagin said, "I think we're turning the corner."

DOJ_NMG_0003576

Still, parts of the city, like the Ninth Ward and New Orleans East, along with Chalmette in neighboring St. Bernard Parish, remain inundated, and it could take two months to get electricity fully restored to the hardest-hit areas, officials said. Police officers and firefighters have been inoculated against hepatitis, cholera, typhoid, tetanus and diphtheria.

The spine of St. Charles Avenue, with its broken canopy of oak trees and its streetcar tracks laced with downed power lines, provided a look at the successes and failures of New Orleans's recovery effort on Tuesday. Near St. Charles and Josephine Street, a fire consumed two city blocks, officials from the Oklahoma National Guard said.

At Lee Circle, Victor Mejia, 58, a janitor, stood in the shade and said he had no intention of leaving. "I live here," he said. "Where am I going to go?"

With attention turning to what had gone wrong, Mr. Nagin said he wanted an independent assessment of the missteps, saying he believed the matter was beyond the ability of politicians to solve. He blamed a lack of coordination, a rescue plan that was slow to be carried out and what he called a "two-step" danced by federal and state officials to determine who was in charge.

The mayor said he welcomed any effort to criticize his own handling of the crisis.

"My big question to anybody who's trying to shift the blame is, 'Where were you?' " Mr. Nagin said. "I was here. I know what happened. I walked among the people in the Superdome and in the convention center. I saw babies dying. I saw old people so tired, they said, 'Just let me lay down and die.' They can talk that, but bring it on. I'm ready for it."

No Photographing the Dead

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 6 (Reuters) - The Federal Emergency Management Agency said on Tuesday that it did not want news photographers to take pictures of the dead as they were recovered in New Orleans.

FEMA rejected requests from journalists to accompany rescue boats.

An agency spokeswoman said that "the recovery of the victims is being treated with dignity and the utmost respect."

FEMA Director Faces His Own Storm Of Controversy (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — In his online résumé, Michael Brown touts his experience dealing with hurricanes and wildfires. He talks of being a state legislative committee director and an assistant city manager. He doesn't mention the decade he spent as chief rules enforcer for the Arabian Horse Association.

The horse job, which he left in 2000, is now fodder for critics who say Brown, head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), has botched the Katrina relief operation. Those critics include Republicans, Democrats and newspapers.

President Bush appointed a FEMA director who had “absolutely no credentials” for the job, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said Tuesday.

“The more one learns about him,” Republican commentator William Kristol said on Fox News Sunday, “one is surprised that he's in that job in the first place.”

Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, however, said FEMA had a disaster plan in place, but Louisiana leaders did not implement it. “Brown is getting a bad rap,” he said.

More not-so-bad news for Brown: Only 29% in a new USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll said that any top federal officials handling relief efforts should be fired.

Brown, 50, an Oklahoma native, was active in Republican politics and ran unsuccessfully for Congress in 1988. He practiced law in Oklahoma and Colorado before taking the job with the horse association.

He came to the Bush administration through Joe Allbaugh, a college friend of Brown's who was Bush's chief of staff when he was Texas governor and his campaign manager in 2000.

Allbaugh became FEMA director in 2001, when Bush took office, and hired Brown as general counsel. Brown was promoted to deputy director and by 2003 had the top job, after Allbaugh left for the private sector.

Brown says he has led the federal government's response to more than 160 disasters and emergencies. He assured the public last week that “the full force of the U.S. government” was being brought to bear in “an unprecedented response” to the disaster.

On national TV Thursday, Bush called him “Brownie” and said he was doing “a heck of a job.” Brown himself was all over TV, four networks on Friday morning alone.

But his appearances were contentious. He said people were “getting the help they need” and called New Orleans security “pretty darn good,” contradicting reports and video from the scene. He was forced to explain why, despite extensive TV coverage, he didn't know that thousands of people were stranded without food or water at the New Orleans Convention Center.

“Every official at the Federal Emergency Management Agency should be fired, Director Michael Brown especially,” the New Orleans Times-Picayune newspaper said Sunday in an “open letter” to Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0003577

By then, Brown had vanished from sight, and his boss, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, had become the face of the federal response. Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said Brown briefs the media but otherwise is focused on his mission: “aiding those in need and getting about the reconstruction and rebuilding process.”

Bush and other leaders were non-committal Tuesday about Brown's future. Asked if he was going to fire anyone, Bush replied, “I'm going to find out over time what went right and what went wrong.”

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., told NBC “it's too early to judge” whether Brown should go. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., said “there needs to be some accountability” for the federal failures, but “where it starts and who it should be, I will expect the administration to handle.”

Havidn Rodrguez, director of the Disaster Research Center at the University of Delaware, said FEMA lost autonomy, money, focus and direct access to the president when it was folded into the mammoth new Department of Homeland Security in 2003. “These are issues that go well beyond one person,” he said.

Clinton introduced a bill Tuesday that would separate FEMA from Homeland Security. It would also require FEMA directors to have emergency- management experience.

Michael DeWayne Brown: Facing Blame In A Disaster (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6 - Speaking at a Florida university last year, Michael D. Brown, director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, recalled his small-town Oklahoma upbringing and offered advice he said few graduation speakers would offer.

"Everything in life is not perfect," Mr. Brown said. "Expect to make those mistakes. Expect to fall down every now and then. And expect to occasionally fail at something."

Mr. Brown may be calling on those maxims himself today, in his second week as on-the-ground manager of the largest disaster response in American history. He has faced two simultaneous challenges - coordinating 14 federal agencies with state and local counterparts under grueling conditions, and fending off criticism from those who say that FEMA has failed and put the blame squarely on him.

By all accounts, it was not experience in managing disasters that brought Mr. Brown, 50, a lawyer from Oklahoma, to FEMA in 2001 as general counsel. It was his 30-year friendship with Joe M. Allbaugh, who managed President Bush's 2000 presidential campaign and became his first director of the emergency agency..

But when pressed yet again to give his qualifications at a news conference on Monday, Mr. Brown gave a practiced answer, running through his learning curve as general counsel, then deputy director and finally, since 2003, director of FEMA.

He has overseen the response to 164 presidentially declared disasters, he said, including California wildfires, a rash of tornadoes in the Midwest several years ago and the four Florida hurricanes last year. "So, yes," he said, "I've been through a few disasters in my life."

Mr. Brown's spokeswoman, Natalie Rule, added on Tuesday that he oversaw an agency with a lot of experience in disaster management. "What you need is what he is - a leader who can manage budget, personnel and policy."

Nonetheless, Mr. Brown has been a hands-on manager, trudging through each new scene of devastation dispensing aid and encouragement. Since Hurricane Katrina, he has been a constant presence on television, rattling off statistics on people rescued and meals delivered.

But he stunned several national television interviewers last week with the admission that he did not know about the 20,000 evacuees at the convention center in New Orleans until Thursday, 24 hours after it was featured in news reports.

Senator Mary L. Landrieu offered a devastating critique on Friday in Baton Rouge. "I have been telling him from the moment he arrived about the urgency of the situation," she said. "I just have to tell you that he had a difficult time understanding the enormity of the task before us."

Since then, the news for Mr. Brown has not gotten better. The Times-Picayune, Louisiana's largest newspaper, asked Mr. Bush in an open letter to clean house at FEMA, calling "especially" for the ouster of Mr. Brown. On Monday, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff placed the Coast Guard's chief of staff, Vice Admiral Thad W. Allen, in charge of the New Orleans relief effort, clearly a move to beef up management where the problems have been most severe. And on Tuesday, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, in calling for FEMA to be made a separate cabinet-level agency, said its director should have emergency management experience.

Mr. Brown's friends say they have cringed watching the criticism of a man they describe as compassionate and dedicated to difficult work.

DOJ_NMG_0003578

Mary Ann Karns, who worked as city attorney in Edmond, Okla., in the 1970's when Mr. Brown was her assistant, said, "He was interested in politics not for glory and not for power, but because he wanted to make things better for people."

Michael DeWayne Brown was born on Nov. 11, 1954 in Guymon, Okla. He and his wife, Tamara, have two grown children, Jared and Amy. His friends say he is an admirer of Theodore Roosevelt, an avid hiker and fly fisherman, and a collector of antique maps of the West.

In addition to his brief experience as a city official, Mr. Brown has practiced law, worked for the Oklahoma State Senate and served as counsel to an insurance company. He lost a race for Congress in 1988. But the job he did for a decade before joining FEMA is curiously omitted from his online agency résumé.

From 1991 to 2001, as commissioner of the International Arabian Horse Association, Mr. Brown enforced the rules administered by judges at the association's 300 annual horse shows. His decisions provoked a number of lawsuits, including one from David Boggs, a trainer whom Mr. Brown accused of having cosmetic surgery performed on horses.

Mr. Brown's critics in the horse world say he was forced to resign in January 2001 because association officers were upset that he had accepted donations to a personal legal defense fund. But Andy Lester, a friend of Mr. Brown's and his lawyer, said that his departure was "negotiated" and that there was no wrongdoing.

An ethics review panel upheld the charges against Mr. Boggs and suspended him for five years.

Mr. Lester said that Mr. Brown showed backbone in pursuing the charges despite the controversy that erupted in the horse industry.

"He did not fold under pressure," Mr. Lester said. By 2001, Mr. Brown was tired of the uproar and was ready to move on, said Tom Connelly, the president of the horse association at the time. He had often spoken of the possibility of a Washington job should Mr. Bush become president, Mr. Connelly recalled.

"What has surprised me is that he rose to the position he has now so quickly," Mr. Connelly said. "But when he started with the association, he didn't know horses. And he caught up in a hurry."

Right City, Wrong State (CNN)

CNN.com, September 7, 2005

(CNN) -- Add geography to the growing list of FEMA fumbles.

A South Carolina health official said his colleagues scrambled Tuesday when FEMA gave only a half-hour notice to prepare for the arrival of a plane carrying as many as 180 evacuees to Charleston.

But the plane, instead, landed in Charleston, West Virginia, 400 miles away.

It was not known whether arrangements have been made to care for the evacuees or transport them to the correct destination.

A call seeking comment from FEMA was not immediately returned.

"We called in all the available resources," said Dr. John Simkovich, director of public health for the South Carolina Department of Health and Environmental Control.

"They responded within 30 minutes, which is phenomenal, to meet the needs of the citizens coming in from Louisiana," he said.

Simkovich said that the agency had described some of the evacuees as needing "some minor treatment ... possibly some major treatment."

"Unfortunately, the plane did not come in," Simkovich said. "There was a mistake in the system, coming out through FEMA, that we did not receive the aircraft this afternoon. It went to Charleston, West Virginia."

A line of buses and ambulances idled behind him at Charleston International Airport as he described what happened.

"This is a 'no event' for today," Simkovich said.

Coast Guard's Chief Of Staff To Assist FEMA Head Brown (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

With Michael D. Brown, the embattled public face of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, taking harsh criticism for the slow federal response to Hurricane Katrina, the secretary of homeland security this week assigned a top Coast Guard official to help bail him out.

Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen, the Coast Guard's chief of staff, was assigned on Monday to be Brown's deputy and to take over operational control of the search-and-rescue and recovery efforts along the Gulf Coast. The unprecedented task of coordinating the massive effort was handed off to a leader and expert who was described by colleagues as unflappable, engaging and intensely organized.

DOJ_NMG_0003579

Allen is also familiar with the inner workings of the Department of Homeland Security, where the Coast Guard has landed alongside FEMA as one of the designated main protectors of the United States. Allen has been one of the primary shepherds of change at the Coast Guard since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and has been praised for his ability to reach out to other agencies to develop "big-picture" approaches to homeland defense.

Retired Adm. James M. Loy, former commandant of the Coast Guard and former deputy secretary of Homeland Security, said yesterday that Allen has the experience to help steer the federal response to the Katrina catastrophe in the right direction after early shortfalls. When Loy was the Coast Guard chief of staff from 1996 to 1998, Allen was his resource director, and Loy said he "always brings a new idea per minute to the table as far as how to grapple with difficult situations."

DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff handpicked Allen to essentially lead the federal recovery efforts in New Orleans. As Brown's deputy, Allen will work with Army Lt. Gen. Russel L. Honore -- head of the military's Joint Task Force Katrina -- to oversee, manage and lead all military and civilian recovery efforts.

Loy also praised Allen's experience, which ranges from being a sailor in the early part of his career to leading the Coast Guard's transition into the Department of Homeland Security. Allen also led the Coast Guard's maritime response to the Sept. 11 attacks, mobilizing his Atlantic forces to shut down major seaports and to control U.S. waters.

Since then, Allen has been working on transforming the Coast Guard's dominant missions of drug interdiction and migrant issues to protecting the borders from terrorism.

"If I was confronted with a multi-stakeholder nightmare, Thad Allen is the guy I would want to have put in charge of coming up with the solution that would keep the stakeholders engaged, participating and focused on the chore at hand," said Loy, who is now a senior counselor at the Cohen Group in Washington.

The task in Louisiana and Mississippi is in some ways uniquely suited for the Coast Guard, which is routinely involved in search-and-rescue, recovery, waterway reconstitution and pollution cleanup efforts. The Coast Guard has rescued thousands of people stranded last week as a result of the hurricane and subsequent flooding.

Allen, 56, is a native of Tucson, and he graduated from the U.S. Coast Guard Academy in 1971. He later went on to earn a master's degree in Public Administration from George Washington University and a master of science degree from the Sloan School of Management at MIT.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, Allen provided the Coast Guard with an oral history of the day's events, discussing the decision to block the Potomac River and secure ports in New York and Boston. He spoke of the need to "keep cool" and "not get excited about everything," according to a transcript of the interview.

"I guess what I'm saying was I wasn't overcome by the magnitude of the event where it paralyzed or impacted my thinking," Allen said in the March 2002 interview. "I was treating it like I would a major catastrophe because we get involved in those over our career a lot. This was an order of magnitude that nobody could imagine. But nonetheless you get on task and you start working."

Adm. Thomas H. Collins, the Coast Guard's commandant, said yesterday that Allen will make a great deputy principal federal official, the official title of Brown's deputy.

"The Coast Guard is blessed with many talented personnel," Collins said in a statement. "Vice Admiral Allen is a tested leader and knows how to manage a crisis. We're glad we could send one of our best to help [Brown] manage the extraordinary challenges of this rescue and recovery effort."

Cmdr. Brendan McPherson, who was Allen's public affairs officer on 9/11 and is now at Coast Guard headquarters in Washington, said Allen is an extremely effective leader, especially in crisis situations.

"He has an amazing ability to quickly recognize a situation that needs leadership, that needs action, and then to develop a plan that can be quickly implemented," McPherson said, adding he was impressed with Allen during and after the terrorist attacks. "He quickly identified that, pulled in the resources that he needed, developed a plan, and then implemented a plan to secure the maritime borders."

Allen lives with his wife, Pamela, in Potomac, and they have three grown children and two grandchildren. The couple was away for the past week and returned to learn that Allen was going to be assigned to Louisiana. Their 30th wedding anniversary is in October, and Pamela Allen is not sure he will be home to celebrate.

"We've been sitting back wanting to help, and he was given the privilege of being able to help," said Pamela Allen, who is assistant dean for academic and career services at the George Mason University School of Management.

"He's been in the Coast Guard his entire life, and one of the things he does and does well is what the Coast Guard motto is, be always prepared. He takes every new event and gets down and starts working and sees it to its end."

FEMA Chief Sent Help Only When Storm Ended (AP)

By TED BRIDIS

DOJ_NMG_0003580

The AP, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON - The top U.S. disaster official waited hours after Hurricane Katrina struck the Gulf Coast before he proposed to his boss sending at least 1,000 Homeland Security workers into the region to support rescuers, internal documents show.

Part of the mission, according to the documents obtained by The Associated Press, was to "convey a positive image" about the government's response for victims.

Acknowledging that such a move would take two days, Michael Brown, director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, sought the approval from Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff roughly five hours after Katrina made landfall on Aug. 29.

Before then, FEMA had positioned smaller rescue and communications teams across the Gulf Coast. But officials acknowledged the first department-wide appeal for help came only as the storm raged.

Brown's memo to Chertoff described Katrina as "this near catastrophic event" but otherwise lacked any urgent language. The memo politely ended, "Thank you for your consideration in helping us to meet our responsibilities."

The initial responses of the government and Brown came under escalating criticism as the breadth of destruction and death grew. President Bush and Congress on Tuesday pledged separate investigations into the federal response to Katrina. "Governments at all levels failed," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine.

Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said Brown had positioned front-line rescue teams and Coast Guard helicopters before the storm. Brown's memo on Aug. 29 aimed to assemble the necessary federal work force to support the rescues, establish communications, and coordinate with victims and community groups, Knocke said.

Instead of rescuing people or recovering bodies, these employees would focus on helping victims find the help they needed, he said.

"There will be plenty of time to assess what worked and what didn't work," Knocke said. "Clearly there will be time for blame to be assigned and to learn from some of the successful efforts."

Brown's memo told employees that among their duties, they would be expected to "convey a positive image of disaster operations to government officials, community organizations and the general public."

"FEMA response and recovery operations are a top priority of the department and as we know, one of yours," Brown wrote Chertoff. He proposed sending 1,000 Homeland Security Department employees within 48 hours and 2,000 within seven days.

Knocke said the 48-hour period indicated for the Homeland employees was to ensure they had adequate training. "They were training to help the lifesavers," Knocke said.

Employees required a supervisor's approval and at least 24 hours of disaster training in Maryland, Florida or Georgia. "You must be physically able to work in a disaster area without refrigeration for medications and have the ability to work in the outdoors all day," Brown wrote.

The same day Brown wrote Chertoff, Brown also urged local fire and rescue departments outside Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi not to send trucks or emergency workers into disaster areas without an explicit request for help from state or local governments. Brown said it was vital to coordinate fire and rescue efforts.

Sen. Barbara Mikulski, D-Md., said Tuesday that Brown should resign.

After a senators-only briefing by Chertoff and other Cabinet members, Sen. Charles Schumer said lawmakers weren't getting their questions answered.

"What people up there want to know, Democrats and Republicans, is what is the challenge ahead, how are you handling that and what did you do wrong in the past," said Schumer, D-N.Y.

Meanwhile, the airline industry said the government's request for help evacuating storm victims didn't come until late Thursday afternoon. The president of the Air Transport Association, James May, said the Homeland Security Department called then to ask whether the group could participate in an airlift for refugees.

Witt Makes Presence Known In La. (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, September 7, 2005

It didn't take long for James Lee Witt, the former head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), to throw his weight around in hurricane-ravaged Louisiana.

Witt, who headed FEMA during the Clinton administration, has been hired by Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco (D) to help coordinate state and federal responses to the natural disaster.

Blanco introduced Witt to President Bush on Monday, according to a source who has spoken with Witt. Bush promised Witt whatever support he needed and said that Mike Brown, FEMA's embattled director, is his man in charge.

DOJ_NMG_0003581

Andrew Card, Bush's chief of staff, called Witt to give him his home phone number and reiterate Bush's support.

According to the source, Witt told Brown, "Mike, you're going to do your job, and I'm going to make you do your job. And I'm going to show you how to do your job."

Many lawmakers on both sides of the aisle are pleased that Witt, who contributed thousands of dollars to congressional Democrats last year, is involved in the disaster-relief effort.

Over the past several years, GOP lawmakers have sought Witt's counsel, including Reps. Bill Shuster (Pa.), Christopher Shays (Conn.) and Jerry Lewis (Calif.).

"James Lee Witt was an outstanding director of FEMA and is a good choice by the governor, regardless of the activities of FEMA," said former Rep. Bob Livingston (R-La.), who is now a top lobbyist.

Witt met with Shuster and Shays earlier this summer to discuss the fallout of removing FEMA's emergency-preparedness function from its mission.

As fires raged in his congressional district in 2003, Lewis — who had chaired the appropriations subcommittee that funds FEMA when Witt was FEMA's chief — became frustrated with the agency because it did not respond to the disaster as quickly as it should have, said Lewis spokesman Jim Specht.

"[Lewis's] biggest concern was that FEMA hadn't been able to come up with a plan" to prepare for a disaster, Specht added.

Lewis relied on Witt to help cajole FEMA's bureaucracy to plan for what could have become a federal disaster area. Lewis and Brown eventually toured the vicinity in a helicopter.

After a week of mixed signals and non-communication, state and federal officials began holding joint press conferences, set up a joint command structure, worked to restore cell-phone coverage to the area and prepared to restore electrical power in New Orleans by stationing an additional 1,000 firefighters in case there were fires when the power came on.

For the first 45 to 60 days, Witt is working on a pro-bono basis for the state of Louisiana. After that, a contract will be negotiated, said a spokeswoman for Witt.

The spokeswoman added, "Witt is going to be the Bush administration's knight in shining armor."

"FEMA has never been without criticism, but it was once much more nimble, as it needs to be, and now is apparently becoming a responsive afterthought," said former Rep. Ken Bentsen (D-Texas), who often dealt with FEMA when tropical storms and hurricanes flooded Houston and who credited Joe Allbaugh, Bush's first FEMA director, for responding effectively to Tropical Storm Allison in 2001.

"Congress should look into this quickly and employ some management expertise to boot," Bentsen said.

Witt left the government in 2001 to start his own consulting and lobbying shop.

We Can't Afford Not To Plan For Catastrophes (USAT)

By James Lee Witt

USA Today, September 7, 2005

Hundreds of thousands of residents jammed the highways to get out of Hurricane Katrina's path, which included 145-mph wind gusts and storm surges of more than 20 feet. That was just the beginning.

Local, state and federal resources were mobilized as one of the most powerful hurricanes in history made landfall along the Gulf Coast regions of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

During my years as director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), I witnessed the incredible abilities and dedication of our nation's emergency response personnel, of which we have the best trained and best equipped possible. Despite their skills, ability and technology, we must do more to be better prepared and protected in the case of such a catastrophe.

Our financial recovery mechanisms, which rely primarily on the private insurance market, federal assistance in the form of low-interest loans and a handful of state catastrophe funds, need to be retooled so that they are capable of meeting the immeasurable costs of a catastrophe.

Conservative estimates indicate that the costs of recovery from Hurricane Katrina will rival any natural catastrophe we've experienced in the USA. Initial predictions indicate that recovery costs could surpass the $30 billion cost of recovering from the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

A replay of any of our previous natural catastrophes would result in similarly astounding costs:

· A 1938 hurricane, the "Long Island Express," missed Manhattan by only a few miles and caused $308 million in damage. A replay of that storm today is projected to have a recovery cost of $24 billion in Suffolk County, alone.

· If the 1906 San Francisco earthquake happened in the same spot as it did a century ago, damages are estimated to exceed $400 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0003582

From a financial standpoint, state and federal catastrophe funds provide a necessary backstop for families, businesses and communities in the case of extraordinary events. Florida has funds in place to deal with hurricanes; California has such funds for earthquakes. New York is considering a similar fund as well.

Policymakers in other disaster-prone states should follow their example. States can move faster than the federal government. And they should move now.

On the other hand, catastrophes are not a state-by-state problem. Hurricanes that hit North Carolina can wreak havoc on New England. Earthquakes in California can cause damage well into the Pacific Northwest.

A national solution is every bit as important as the steps being taken in the states. Steps to be taken include a national catastrophe fund that would shore up private insurers in instances when truly catastrophic events occur. Such a fund would be a financially responsible way to ensure the viability of the private market and its ability to provide coverage to families, businesses and communities.

James Lee Witt is the CEO and chairman of James Lee Witt Associates, a public safety and crisis management consulting firm. Witt served as the director of FEMA from 1993 to 2001. Witt has been hired by Louisiana to help advise the governor on hurricane recovery efforts.

FEMA Fails Its Core Mission (WT)

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) head Michael Brown confirmed the dysfunctional performance of his organization throughout the first three or four days following Hurricane Katrina's assault on New Orleans. In an interview on CNN's "Paula Zahn Now," three-and-a-half days after Katrina made landfall, Mr. Brown insisted that the federal government in general and FEMA in particular had no idea until that very day that tens of thousands of New Orleans residents and tourists had assembled at the city's convention center.

"Sir, you aren't just telling me you just learned that the folks at the convention center didn't have food and water until today [Thursday], are you?" Mrs. Zahn asked incredulously. "You had no idea they were completely cut off?"

"Paula, the federal government did not even know about the convention center people until today," Mr. Brown said, ever so matter-of-factly. With that reply, he confirmed the enormous size of the disaster that was the federal response.

How the federal government should respond to emergencies and disasters is detailed in the National Response Plan, a 426-page report issued by the Department of Homeland Security. "The National Response Plan embodies our nation's commitment to the concept of one team, one goal," Tom Ridge, the secretary of Homeland Security at the time, declared on Jan. 6, 2005, when the response plan was revealed. "This achievement is a bold step forward in bringing unity in our response to disasters and terrorist threats and attacks." The plan was overwhelmed by events in its first major test with reality.

Guiding the nation's response to emergencies and disasters, the National Response Plan "establishes a comprehensive all-hazards approach to enhance the ability of the United States to manage domestic incidents," the Department of Homeland Security asserted. "The plan incorporates best practices and procedures from incident management disciplines," including emergency management, law enforcement and public health, "and integrates them into a unified structure. It forms the basis of how the federal government coordinates with state, local and tribal governments and the private sector during incidents." Contemplating a national catastrophe comparable to Katrina, a department fact sheet states that the response plan "ensures the seamless integration of the federal government when an incident exceeds local and state capabilities." Moreover, the plan "provided the means to swiftly deliver federal support in response to catastrophic incidents."

In the wake of the disastrous initial responses to the Katrina disaster, the self-congratulatory conclusion asserted in the preface of the response plan is particularly disturbing. "The end result is vastly improved coordination among federal, state, local and tribal organizations to help save lives and protect America's communities by increasing the speed, effectiveness and efficiency of incident management." By FEMA's own description of its mission, they failed.

It's Not A 'Blame Game' (NYT)

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

With the size and difficulty of the task of rescuing and rebuilding New Orleans and other Gulf Coast areas still unfolding, it seemed early to talk about investigating how this predicted cataclysm had been allowed to occur and why the government's response was so slow and inept. Until yesterday, that is, when President Bush blithely announced at a photo-op cabinet meeting that he, personally, was going to "find out what went right and what went wrong." We can't imagine a worse idea.

No administration could credibly investigate such an immense failure on its own watch. And we have learned through bitter experience - the Abu Ghraib nightmare is just one example - that when this administration begins an internal investigation, it means a whitewash in which no one important is held accountable and no real change occurs.

DOJ_NMG_0003583

Mr. Bush signaled yesterday that we are in for more of the same when he sneered and said, "One of the things that people want us to do here is to play a blame game." This is not a game. It is critical to know what "things went wrong," as Mr. Bush put it. But we also need to know which officials failed - not to humiliate them, but to replace them with competent people.

It's obvious, for instance, that Michael Brown has met the expectations of those who warned that he would be a terrible director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. This is no time to be engaging in a wholesale change of leadership, but in Mr. Brown's case there seems to be precious little leadership to lose. He should be replaced with someone who can do the huge job that remains to be done.

But the questions go way beyond Mr. Brown - starting with why federal officials ignored predictions of a disastrous flood in New Orleans - and the answers can come only from an independent commission. We agree with the Senate minority leader, Harry Reid, Senator Hillary Clinton and others who say that such a panel should follow the successful formula of the 9/11 commission: bipartisan leadership and members chosen by the White House and both parties in Congress on the basis of real expertise. It should have subpoena power and a staff expert enough to find answers and offer remedies.

Mrs. Clinton has also proposed pulling FEMA out of the Homeland Security Department and restoring its cabinet-level status. That is premature. The current setup makes sense, at least in theory. The nation should not have to support two different bureaucracies for dealing with sudden disasters.

Before throwing the system into chaos again, an investigation should determine whether the problem lies in the structure or in execution. Yesterday, The Wall Street Journal showed how the Bush administration had systematically stripped power and money from FEMA, which had been painfully rebuilt under President Bill Clinton but had long been a target of Republican "small government" ideologues. The Journal said state officials had been warning Washington - as recently as July 27 - that the homeland secretary, Michael Chertoff, was planning further disastrous cuts.

This page supported the creation of Mr. Chertoff's department. But it was poorly run by the first secretary, Tom Ridge, with his maddening color-wheel alerts.

It is clearly in need of a hard look and perhaps serious reorganization. Senators Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, and Joseph Lieberman, Democrat of Connecticut, have plans for hearings, which is fine. But they created the department in the first place and may have more of a stake in the outcome than a panel of impartial experts.

The panel should also look at the shortcomings of local officials and governments. It was chilling, to put it mildly, to read Mayor Ray Nagin's comment in The Journal that New Orleans's hurricane plan was "get people to higher ground and have the feds and the state airlift supplies to them."

But disasters like this are not a city or a state issue. They concern the entire nation and demand a national response - certainly a better one than the White House comments that "tremendous progress" had been made in Louisiana. We're used to that dismissive formula when questions are raised about Iraq. Americans deserve better about a disaster of this magnitude in their own country.

Convoy To Chaos (WP)

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

District officials deserve praise for their prompt response to the needs of displaced Gulf Coast residents. The rescue operation launched Friday demonstrated how communities can quickly mobilize to help each other at a time of crisis, even when the federal government falls down on the job. But the District's mission to the storm survivors encountered widespread confusion, made worse by governmental red tape and indecision. Surveying the federal response to Hurricane Katrina and observing that the Washington region itself could be subject to a disaster or terrorist attack, Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) said yesterday on WTOP Radio's "Ask the Executive" program that area officials "need to know what we can count on and not count on from FEMA." That observation is aptly borne out by the District's experience in New Orleans and other flood-ravaged communities.

The District's convoy of 10 buses filled with food, diapers, water and 30 D.C. officials set out Friday, hoping to return this week with as many as 400 evacuees. Instead, the buses are expected to return today with the mission only partially accomplished. Tons of relief supplies were, in fact, delivered, but to the Alabama Red Cross. The caravan also picked up four people in New Orleans and dropped them off at a Red Cross staging area, according to WTOP Radio. But there were no crowds of evacuees waiting in New Orleans as had been promised. Nor did the caravan find evacuees waiting for transport in Baton Rouge, La., where it was dispatched by officials from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Fuel was given to the Louisiana National Guard, but the buses are returning with only one or two hurricane evacuees. Meanwhile, nearly 300 evacuees were airlifted to Washington yesterday and are being housed in the D.C. Armory.

City leaders and emergency preparedness workers expected to find chaotic conditions near the damaged communities, with thousands of displaced storm victims on the move and shelter space dwindling on the battered Gulf Coast. But they also expected the federal relief effort to be better organized and at least up to managing the influx of assistance pouring in from around the country. That was not the case.

DOJ_NMG_0003584

There is a lesson here for the Washington region. The federal-local law enforcement partnership that worked smoothly during the sniper attacks may not reemerge in a future natural disaster. As Mr. Duncan noted, FEMA is a changed agency, buried within a huge, slow-moving federal bureaucracy. If ever there were a time for local leaders to come together to review and coordinate their emergency and relief efforts, it's now. Otherwise, we may witness another descent into chaos -- only next time it will be closer to home.

Congress Should Share A Big Part Of The Blame For Katrina Response (RC)

By Norman Ornstein

Roll Call, September 7, 2005

In four days, we will mark the fourth anniversary of the tragedy of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. It's been four years — but in terms of our preparation for the aftermath of a devastating terrorist attack, it might just as well be one day after 9/11. [IMGCAP(1)]

This is not a time to mince words. The performance of the federal government in the Hurricane Katrina disaster — the policy wing of the federal government, not the dedicated employees — has been abysmal. Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) was right: The grade should be an F. But the failures of the past several days are a symptom of the bigger fiasco, one that should leave all of us furious — and nervous. And in that fiasco, Congress stands front and center in the line of miscreants.

On 9/11, the inability of firefighters and police in New York to work their radios contributed to the loss of many lives. At the Pentagon, the inability of emergency workers from Montgomery and Prince George's counties in Maryland and Fairfax and Arlington counties in Virginia to communicate with each other made the response there much more difficult.

Now, four years have passed. A few metropolitan areas, on their own and without adequate federal assistance, have acted to make their own radio systems interoperable. The broader problems? They're the same, in essence, as they were before and during 9/11.

On 9/11, it became obvious that the resources and training available to the nation's first responders — fire, police, emergency medical technicians, public health clinics and so on — were woefully inadequate to deal with the new threats, not to mention larger natural disasters. No capability for dealing with chemical or biological threats, not enough gas masks (or appropriate ones), no training to deal with the collapse of large buildings. Four years later, regrettably, we can say the same thing. Instead of allocating the resources necessary to deal with these problems, we have in fact cut them in many areas.

On 9/11, a new set of broad threats emerged: the international network of terrorists out to kill as many of us as it could. The threat had existed beforehand, but suddenly it took on a new magnitude. The Hart-Rudman Commission, understanding this threat, had recommended prior to 9/11 the creation of a new Department of Homeland Security to bring together agencies and bureaus with other missions to incorporate the new missions of combating the terrorist threats and responding to a disaster that terrorists could bring — disasters of a different form and magnitude than a natural catastrophe, but with many similar characteristics.

Four years after 9/11, we have a DHS, and it's much larger than the Hart-Rudman Commission had envisioned. Its bureaucracy is still reeling from the task of integrating more than 20 separate entities into one — the largest reorganization in federal government history. When Katrina struck, DHS was not the centerpiece of federal response that its outside framers had foreseen, but rather a bloated bureaucracy that was unable for days to figure out what to do, and which produced a leaderless response that only compounded the tragedy.

The idea of creating such a department was a solid one; the magnitude and form of such a department was more debatable. But it was never debated. After vehemently resisting the idea of a department for almost nine months, the president turned around virtually overnight and embraced it, unveiling a plan much more sweeping than the original, and which had been hatched in secrecy by several key administration aides working in the situation room to ensure confidentiality. The normal debate and deliberative process that would have questioned the sweep of the reorganization plan and its breakneck pace was absent. Absent, too, was the notion of starting with a new Department of Border Security and moving in increments to something grander.

When the Department of Homeland Security bill came to Congress, it ended up facing one and only one serious area of controversy and deliberation: the question of sweeping civil service changes to eliminate many of the regular protections for the 70,000 DHS employees. That issue became a political tool — a major campaign point in the 2002 elections — even as the larger and important questions of what kind of department, and how to fulfill all the real and serious government functions, was ignored.

The result was, as we now see in embarrassing fashion, a downgrading of FEMA and confusion about its mission. After the creation of the department, at least these issues could have been raised through Congressional oversight. But the Senate never established a committee with full legislative responsibilities over these areas; the House, after much footdragging, created a select committee with no legislative jurisdiction.

So these issues received virtually no serious oversight. Even after the 9/11 Commission pushed Congress to reorganize itself, there was a wholly inadequate response — a bit of lip service paid to the House committee, which still sits under the thumb of such rival powers as Judiciary and Transportation, and a Senate committee with a new title and surface jurisdiction, but not the real cachet and authority that it needs. Much of the failure to implement the changes needed over the past four years can be laid at the feet of Congress and its leaders.

It is not as if we did not know what to do; other commissions and smart individuals with serious credentials have been out shouting about the problems and what to do about them. Read Steve Flynn's book, "America the Vulnerable," and ask yourself: What has been done to deal with threats to chemical and nuclear plants, railway stations with hazardous materials coming in every day and ports?

This is a sham and a travesty. Congress has underfunded first responders; DHS has downplayed the response to an attack while focusing the lion's share of its resources on prevention; the administration has shown no urgency about these issues of homeland security.

Are local and state officials culpable for the aftermath of Katrina? Of course. But keep this in mind: On 9/11, the tragedies that struck New York and Virginia spilled over into Connecticut, New Jersey, Maryland and the District of Columbia. It was clear that leaving the response largely to state and local officials could not work in the same way that local responses might have decades earlier. FEMA worked under the Clinton administration's James Lee Witt. It worked, if less well, under Joe Allbaugh. It does not work now, and it may be neutered further under the new DHS reorganization plan unless great care is paid to its role in every kind of disaster.

Actions have consequences. Inactions have consequences, too — in this case unspeakably tragic ones. Those responsible, including the leaders of Congress, should be made accountable, and if they are decent, they will admit their failures and make new efforts to correct them. But if the past four years is any guide, I am not sanguine.

Norman Ornstein is a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute.

Mayor Slams Blanco For Stalling (WT)

By James G. Lakely

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco has been critical of the Bush administration's response to the disastrous aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, but, according to the mayor of New Orleans, her indecision when President Bush offered help delayed rescue efforts and cost lives.

New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin told CNN's "American Morning" Monday that he met with Mr. Bush and Mrs. Blanco on Air Force One on Friday and implored the two to "get in sync."

"If you don't get in sync, more people are going to die," Mr. Nagin said.

Mr. Bush met privately first with Mrs. Blanco, then called Mr. Nagin in for a meeting.

"He called me in that office," Mr. Nagin said. "And he said, 'Mr. Mayor, I offered two options to the governor.' I was ready to move. The governor said she needed 24 hours to make a decision."

That decision was a request by Mr. Bush to allow the federal government to take over the evacuation of New Orleans, which had been marked by chaos for days. The Democratic governor, who has clashed behind the scenes with the Bush administration since the storm hit, refused.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan confirmed the Air Force One meeting with Mrs. Blanco and the governor's decision not to cede her authority over the Louisiana National Guard, but added that he didn't think "it helps any situation to get into all those internal discussions."

"This isn't a time when people are trying to look at who's to blame or try to shift responsibility," Mr. McClellan said. "This is a time when we're all trying to work together to get things done."

Mr. Bush, at the request of Mrs. Blanco, declared the entire state of Louisiana a disaster area 48 hours before the hurricane made landfall. He also asked Mrs. Blanco to order a mandatory evacuation of New Orleans on Aug. 27 -- two days before the hurricane hit -- but she did not make the order until Aug. 28.

Mr. Bush and federal officials have come under harsh criticism for what some see as a slow reaction to a humanitarian crisis that unfolded last week.

"Instead of unconscionably blaming others, President Bush must take charge and take responsibility, and must get it right, and that is my concern and the message that I will bring to the president," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat. "Mr. President, you should have taken charge and you should have taken responsibility."

DOJ_NMG_0003586

When the levees broke Aug. 30 and flooded New Orleans, the city descended into violence, looting and confusion. Hundreds of New Orleans police officers walked off the job, and some survivors housed in the Superdome and the city's convention center described rapes, robberies and killings in and around the facilities.

Mrs. Blanco yesterday complained on ABC's "Good Morning America" that the federal government didn't act fast enough as the crisis grew.

"We didn't have enough resources," Mrs. Blanco said. "We were begging for resources, too. We needed helicopters because of all the water, we needed helicopters that could actually do this rescue mission, and we needed boats.

"We brought in everything we had, and we were begging for more, and nothing came as quickly as we needed it," she said.

Supporters of the president, however, say Mrs. Blanco and Mr. Nagin, who left New Orleans for the safety of Baton Rouge before the storm hit, also should share some blame.

"Kathleen Blanco and Ray Nagin weren't exactly Pataki and Guiliani," said a political adviser with close ties to the White House, referring to the New York governor and mayor praised for their response to the September 11 attacks. "They'll have their own problems when this crisis abates."

Sen. David Vitter, Louisiana Republican, said, "Hindsight is 20/20," but added that Mrs. Blanco was too slow in calling out the National Guard to keep order in New Orleans and save lives.

"We needed to make this a full-scale military operation starting with the National Guard immediately," Mr. Vitter said on ABC's "Good Morning America."

Paul Simpson, a political blogger who lives in the New Orleans suburb of Metairie, La., said he and other locals are puzzled by the governor's refusal to let the federal government temporarily command the state's National Guard.

"I thought it was as standard as sunshine in California that the governor would tell the president, 'You have the Guard.' I thought that was a given," Mr. Simpson said. "She absolutely has no clue."

Critics have long derided Mrs. Blanco for her tendency to call for studies and special commissions to find solutions for the state's biggest problems.

In 2003, the Shreveport Times, in endorsing her Republican opponent for governor, Bobby Jindal, called Mrs. Blanco "indecisive" and "unprepared" for the rigors of the job.

But defenders say that this merely reflects Mrs. Blanco's deliberative temperament. Shortly after Mrs. Blanco took office, Dan Juneau, president of the Louisiana Association of Business and Industry, defended her as a woman who "likes to accumulate as much information as possible before finalizing a major decision."

"She would rather be criticized for taking her time in finding the right approach than for shooting from the hip and moving in the wrong direction," Mr. Juneau wrote.

Congress Investigates 'woeful' Response To Katrina (FT)

By Edward Alden, Christopher Swann, Guy Dinmore And Joshua Chaffin

Financial Times, September 7, 2005

President George W. Bush and members of Congress on Tuesday promised full investigations into the slow government response to Hurricane Katrina, with Mr Bush suggesting that "bureaucratic obstacles" from state and local officials were partly to blame.

Following a meeting with his cabinet on Tuesday morning, Mr Bush said: "I intend to lead an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong.

"It's very important for us to understand the relationship between the federal government, the state government and the local government when it comes to a major catastrophe." Mr Bush's statement came as leading members of Congress also said they would begin hearings on what they called the "woeful" effort to aid those trapped by the storm and the flooding in New Orleans.

Republican senator Susan Collins and Democrat Joe Lieberman, who head the Senate homeland security committee, said they would start immediately with closed-door sessions with officials from the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which led the response.

"The first obligation of government is to protect its citizens. In its initial response to the catastrophe of Hurricane Katrina, particularly in Louisiana, governments at all levels failed in this obligation," said Ms Collins.

Dick Cheney, the powerful US vice-president, will travel to the region on Wednesday to assess the recovery effort. Mr Bush said Mr Cheney would "make sure that we remove any bureaucratic obstacles that may be preventing us from achieving our goals. In other words, bureaucracy's not going to stand in the way of getting the job done for people."

Much of the focus is likely to be on whether the state government sought federal help quickly enough, or put up obstacles preventing that help from being delivered.

DOJ_NMG_0003587

Kathleen Blanco, the Democratic governor of Louisiana, insisted on CNN on Tuesday that "I asked for everything that we had available from the federal government...and the federal effort was just a little slow in coming. I can't understand why."

But at the same time she said that co-operation had improved dramatically in recent days. "We are parties in this effort. We are a team," she told a news conference in Baton Rouge, the state capital.

She called for a "Marshall-like plan" for reconstruction after the storm, saying the priorities for Louisiana's economic rebuilding should be tourism, energy, transportation, manufacturing and technology.

Harry Reid, the Senate Democratic leader, said that Mr Bush would seek an additional $40bn-$50bn for the relief effort, following the $10.5bn approved by Congress on Friday. Mr Reid suggested the costs for reconstruction could exceed $150bn.

In New Orleans' Jefferson parish, which has over 400,000 residents, a massive operation to restore utilities was launched. A few areas already have power.

Several of the levees breached in the storm were also repaired, and engineers began pumping water out of the flooded city. But General Myles Deering, of the joint task force assigned to Baton Rouge, was cautious about the progress. "This is going to be a long process," he said. "It's hard to celebrate the triumphs when they have such disaster."

Lawmakers Prepare Katrina Probe, Financial Aid (REU)

By Donna Smith

Reuters, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The Republican senator leading a Senate investigation into the government's response to Hurricane Katrina said on Tuesday it was "woefully inadequate" and it had raised doubts about the U.S. ability to cope with a terrorist attack.

Sen. Susan Collins, a Maine Republican, spoke as lawmakers prepared to provide a second round of emergency money to cope with the devastation on the Gulf coast expected to total around $40 billion.

Collins said her Senate Homeland Security Committee would begin its investigation this week into the relief efforts.

"If our system did such a poor job when there was no enemy, how would the federal, state and local governments have coped with a terrorist attack that provided no advance warning and that was intent on causing as much death and destruction as possible?" she told reporters.

Collins and the panel's top Democrat, Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, promised a bipartisan, wide-ranging review, which was requested by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency, part of the Homeland Security Department, has been a focus of much of the criticism, which has also targeted President George W. Bush.

"Katrina was a disaster that scientists, emergency management officials and political leaders had anticipated for years, yet the initial response was woefully inadequate," Collins said.

Lawmakers moved on several fronts to respond to Katrina's devastation. House Government Reform Committee Chairman Tom Davis, a Virginia Republican, said his committee would hold a hearing next week on the disaster response.

MORE EMERGENCY AID

In the House of Representatives, Republican leaders said they expected a fresh Bush administration request for emergency funds for FEMA. They declined to say how much the White House wanted on top of the $10.5 billion approved last week, but Senate aides said they expected it to be about $40 billion.

House and Senate leaders met with Bush on Tuesday to discuss relief efforts and House Speaker Dennis Hastert, an Illinois Republican, said the new aid package could be approved by the end of the week.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said the cost of recovery and relief could exceed $150 billion. The estimate was "not unreasonable," but the numbers were not yet clear, said Jenny Manley, a spokeswoman for the Senate Appropriations Committee.

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, a Texas Republican, said other legislation would be needed to help victims of Hurricane Katrina. He noted the storm hit at the end of the month just before Social Security and other government checks were mailed to beneficiaries who no longer have a place to live.

"We have to remove the red tape so they can get these checks and start to rebuild their lives," DeLay said.

Lawmakers were also taking a hard look at FEMA and whether it should stay in the Homeland Security Department created after the September 11, 2001, attacks.

Democratic Sens. Hillary Clinton of New York and Barbara Mikulski of Maryland said they were introducing legislation making FEMA a separate cabinet-level agency, which it was when it was created in 1979.

DOJ_NMG_0003588

"We've given billions of dollars to the Department of Homeland Security," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, a Vermont Democrat. "I voted for those billions of dollars as a member of the Appropriations Committee. We have given as many tools as they've asked for. What in heaven's name was happening?"

(Additional reporting by Richard Cowan, Joanne Kenen and Vicki Allen)

Members Of Congress Return From Recess, Call For Probes (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — Congress returned from a five-week recess Tuesday to an agenda swept clean by Hurricane Katrina, a disaster that has sent lawmakers scrambling to aid its victims and figure out why help came to them so late.

"It is difficult to understand the lack of preparedness and the ineffective initial response to a disaster that had been predicted for years, and for which specific, dire warnings had been given for days," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, head of the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee.

Collins called for congressional hearings as early as next week.

Others called for a 9/11-style commission to investigate failures in responding to the disaster. "It's hard to untangle all of the causes," said Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., who will introduce a bill that would create such a commission. She said cutbacks in funding and personnel at the Federal Emergency Management Agency, as well as unclear lines of command that appear to have bogged down the response, "have to be thoroughly investigated."

Clinton also introduced a bill to separate FEMA, which she and others say bungled the initial response to Katrina, from the Department of Homeland Security. FEMA was an independent agency before Congress put it under the new Cabinet department.

Some Republicans agreed. Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., who lost his home in Pascagoula, said it was "a mistake" to take away FEMA's independence. But he warned against finger-pointing while hundreds of thousands of people are homeless.

"Our response has not been perfect," he said, but he urged colleagues, "Please, let's not try to affix blame now. There'll be time" later.

Senators and representatives began working to address the crisis. Members of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee met with relief organizations in a "listening session" to determine the most critical needs of evacuees. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., released a wish list of legislation that included waiving income and residency requirements for Medicaid, mental health outreach and providing $2,500 per child to school districts that take in displaced students.

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas, said he hopes to introduce legislation this week that would include reducing red tape on dispersing aid for those left jobless. Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, wants to retool a federal resettlement program for displaced people from other countries to help Americans displaced by Katrina.

"We can try to help people get back to their lives and get started again much sooner," Grassley said.

Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, and others called for cutting taxes to encourage investment in the affected areas.

That enraged some Democrats.

"This is the height of fiscal irresponsibility," said Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill. "I can just see these poor, homeless people sitting in the Houston Astrodome saying, 'Thank God, I don't have to pay some death tax.' "

Fuming Congress Plans A Battery Of Hearings (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman And Robert Dodge

The Dallas Morning News, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON – Congress returned from a five-week recess Tuesday hopping mad and ready to start swearing in witnesses. One committee after another announced hearings on Hurricane Katrina, and lawmakers couldn't find enough ways to express their disgust for the planning and response to the disaster.

It's a frenzy President Bush hasn't faced from a Congress controlled for most of his tenure by allies. Through terrorism, war and the occasional scandal, they have protected his administration from the sort of pointed grilling lawmakers are planning over the coming days and weeks.

"There's clearly a mood for aggressive oversight on this issue because people are demanding it. It's a national catastrophe," said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz. "I don't know if it affects the general mood of Congress on every issue, but certainly there's a strong desire ... to find out what went wrong and what went right."

House and Senate Republican leaders have rarely allowed embarrassing oversight hearings in recent years, routinely brushing aside Democratic demands on Iraq and weapons of mass destruction, and on allegations of prisoner abuse at Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo Bay. It took an outcry from victims' families to jump-start the Sept. 11 commission.

DOJ_NMG_0003589

This time, GOP lawmakers have rushed to the microphones.

'On the defensive'

"If you were a president, you couldn't have asked for more than he's [historically] gotten from these [Republican leadership] guys," said Joel Aberbach, director of the Center for American Politics and Public Policy at the University of California Los Angeles and author of Keeping a Watchful Eye: The Politics of Congressional Oversight.

But the shortcomings involving Katrina have been too overt and terrible to ignore, he said, even for congressional stalwarts who have kept their troops disciplined for years.

"The Republican Party and the president in particular are tremendously on the defensive now because of how miserably the government has performed," Dr. Aberbach said.

Mr. Bush spent the day focused on disaster response. He met with volunteers, his Cabinet and congressional leaders of both parties. Congressional aides said he'll seek $40 billion more from Congress for the next phase of response and recovery. He announced that he will personally oversee an investigation into what went wrong and why, and will dispatch Vice President Cheney as his point man in Louisiana.

"Bureaucracy is not going to stand in the way of getting the job done for the people," Mr. Bush said.

But Mr. Bush is the head of the federal bureaucracy, and Democrats weren't about to let that go unnoticed. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California accused him of "unconscionably blaming others" rather than taking responsibility for his administration's failures.

Anger on the coast

Demands for congressional inquiries came most poignantly from those in the disaster zone.

"Bureaucracy has murdered people in the greater New Orleans area. And bureaucracy needs to stand trial before Congress today," Jefferson Parish president Aaron Broussard said on CBS' The Early Show. "So I'm asking Congress, please investigate this now. Take whatever idiot they have at the top of whatever agency and give me a better idiot. Give me a caring idiot. Give me a sensitive idiot. Just don't give me the same idiot."

At the Capitol, Republicans went out of their way to criticize state and local governments.

"Governments at all levels failed," said Senate homeland security committee chairwoman Susan Collins, R-Maine, announcing hearings into the disaster response. "It is difficult to understand the lack of preparedness and the ineffective initial response to a disaster that had been predicted for years and for which specific dire warnings had been given for days."

Even Mr. Bush's staunchest defenders called hearings inevitable, though some such as Florida Sen. Mel Martinez, Mr. Bush's former housing secretary, said he'd prefer to hold off a while.

"I'm not going to be quick to be finger-pointing and looking for ways of making easy answers out of complicated problems," Mr. Martinez said. "And there's plenty of responsibility of local state and federal government that ought to be reviewed. But I don't think anybody wants to whitewash what might have gone wrong."

Democrats were harsher, demanding that President Bush fire the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, Michael Brown. And they shrugged off warnings against trying to score political points, issuing detailed suggestions for coping with the disaster.

Ms. Pelosi also asked Speaker Dennis Hastert to create a hurricane relief task force to investigate the failures of the initial response.

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Sugar Land, didn't immediately dismiss the idea. He called for a "comprehensive congressional review," a bipartisan inquiry with a more ambitious scope than committee-by-committee hearings.

"This work will require us to ask serious and difficult questions," he said. "It is Congress' responsibility to look into what happened before the disaster and after the disaster."

Meanwhile, the hearings are already under way. A Senate panel heard testimony Tuesday on the spike in gasoline prices. The House energy committee, chaired by Rep. Joe Barton, R-Ennis, plans a similar hearing today. Other panels will focus on disaster planning and response.

House committee chairmen met Tuesday night to brainstorm legislation their panels might offer in the next weeks and months to keep the economy humming, address energy prices, ensure the flow of Midwest farm products that depended on the Mississippi, rebuilding oil platforms and, of course, helping Katrina's victims and rebuilding New Orleans and other devastated areas.

Pressure also is mounting from states for congressional relief – those reeling directly from the storm and those facing the prospect of absorbing the hundreds of thousands of evacuees.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, said it's important for the federal government to reimburse Texas cities for their costs quickly.

DOJ_NMG_0003590

"We are taking 250,000 people in now for a much longer term than anyone has ever had before," she said. "We're having to add to our school systems. We're going to have to add security. There are many costs for the states like Texas that are taking these people in need."

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., said federal and state governments had made mistakes, but with the crisis ongoing, he was reluctant to be critical, even as his state seeks its share of hurricane aid.

"My mama don't raise no idiot. I ain't going to bite the hand that's trying to save me," he said.

Deconstructing Katrina (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

"Never did we dream that they would use our own airplanes as weapons."

-- President Bush, April 20, 2004.

"I don't think anyone anticipated the breach of the levees."

-- Bush, Sept. 1, 2005.

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) wore a burgundy suit, dangling earrings and a demure smile when she appeared in the Senate television studio yesterday. But the questions she asked were sharp and unnerving.

"If our system did such a poor job when there was no enemy, how would the federal, state and local governments have coped with a terrorist attack that provided no advance warning and that was intent on causing as much death and destruction as possible?" the chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee wondered, announcing a probe into the response to Hurricane Katrina. "How is it possible that almost four years to the day after the attacks on our country, with billions of dollars spent to improve our preparedness, that a major area of our nation was so ill prepared to respond to a catastrophe?"

As horrendous as the death and dislocation have been in and around New Orleans, the government's "woefully inadequate" response there, as Collins put it, has left Americans far from the disaster area to assume that, if a terrorist's nuclear bomb goes off on K Street or smallpox is released in Times Square, it will be every man for himself. Bush linked the two yesterday, telling reporters, "We want to make sure that we can respond properly if there's a WMD attack or another major storm."

But there was a disconnect yesterday at opposite ends of Pennsylvania Avenue. On the Hill, outraged lawmakers launched a bipartisan investigation and demanded to know what good had come from all that homeland security spending. At the White House, the president was still operating in the conditional. "If things went wrong, we'll correct them," he said. "And when things went right, we'll duplicate them."

Collins and Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.), the ranking Democrat on the committee, had scheduled their announcement of an investigation for 11:15 yesterday morning. Bush preempted them, inviting reporters into the Cabinet Room at 11:08. "What I intend to do is to lead an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong," the president said.

Bush was in no hurry to probe. "There will be ample time to assess," he said. Rearranging a presidential coaster on the Cabinet table, he said that to ask questions while the relief operation is underway would be "to play a blame game."

The mood was more urgent on the Hill, where a bipartisan group of lawmakers in the House was preparing legislation to separate FEMA from the Department of Homeland Security. In the Senate, the issue eclipsed the excitement over the sudden emergence of a second Supreme Court vacancy, with the death of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist.

At an otherwise subdued briefing announcing the postponement of confirmation hearings for John G. Roberts Jr., Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) erupted when asked about the hurricane response. "We've given billions of dollars to the Department of Homeland Security," he said, almost shouting. "What in heaven's name was happening?"

Collins, performing before a standing-room-only crowd, had an answer to Bush's objections. She said her committee's goal is not "to fix blame," and she promised "not to divert resources from the rescue and recovery."

But she said the questions could not wait; hearings are planned for next week. "We would be remiss," she said, "if we did not ask the hard questions needed to understand what went so wrong and what our country must do to improve our ability to respond to future crises, whether they are natural disasters or terrorist attacks."

Lieberman, too, spoke of a problem bigger than New Orleans. "Hurricane Katrina was in one sense the most significant test of the new national emergency preparedness and response system that was created after 9/11, and it obviously did not pass that test," he said. "We need to know why -- not just to fix what went wrong, but in my opinion, to rebuild the confidence of the American people."

The normally adept White House has had trouble settling on a message over the past week. Officials have condemned the "blame game" even as they point fingers at state and local authorities. They have made public assertions -- that nobody anticipated a levee breach and that Louisiana did not declare a state of emergency -- that turned out to be flat wrong. Now, Bush is in the position of promising to lead an investigation but saying it's still a question of "if things went wrong."

DOJ_NMG_0003591

After a midday meeting with the president at the White House, even top GOP congressional leaders dropped the "if." House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.) called for investigations "to make sure that this doesn't happen again." And Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.), promising to "investigate aggressively," floated the idea of an independent commission or bicameral committee. "If we don't have a strong disaster response," he said, things such as a bioterrorism attack "could result in not hundreds of deaths, but thousands of deaths and indeed millions of deaths."

Storm Rages In The Wake Of Katrina (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan , Patrick O'Connor And Roxana Tiron

The Hill, September 7, 2005

The House and Senate government-oversight committees will hold hearings into the widespread criticism of the federal response to Hurricane Katrina.

The hearings are just part of Republicans' response to the public-relations fallout over the administration's admitted mishandling of the devastation in the immediate aftermath of the hurricane.

President Bush also plans to hold a separate investigation.

The decision to hold House hearings comes after Rep. Henry Waxman (Calif.), the top-ranking Democrat on the government-reform panel, and several other Democrats wrote a letter to Government Reform Committee Chairman Tom Davis (R-Va.) and Transportation and Infrastructure Committee Chairman Don Young (R-Alaska) calling for "thorough oversight to examine the preparation for and response to Hurricane Katrina."

The 17-page letter, dated Sept. 6, was signed by Waxman, as well as Democratic Reps. James Oberstar (Minn.) and Bennie Thompson (Miss.), a prominent member of the Congressional Black Caucus.

Even though several GOP leaders pleaded for increased civility, Congress plunged immediately into bitter partisanship as lawmakers returned to work yesterday, with the two parties arguing over blame for the death and destruction left in Hurricane Katrina's wake.

Echoing the White House, Republican lawmakers faulted Louisiana local and state officials for bungled relief efforts in New Orleans while House Democrats distributed talking points saying Bush's administration underfunded disaster relief programs and GOP lawmakers "voted against ensuring New Orleans safety through FEMA and Army Corps of Engineer funding."

Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.) said, "Local and state officials were totally unprepared. Governor Blanco was all but AWOL. Only at President Bush's urging did she declare a state of emergency," he said.

In fact, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco (D) requested a declaration Aug. 26, two days before the hurricane struck her state.

The sniping did not stop after House Republican and Democratic leaders met with President Bush at the White House. At the stakeout, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) could be heard muttering as House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) spoke to reporters and Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) told Bush directly that FEMA director Michael Brown should be fired.

DeLay counseled caution during the early stages of the oversight process and called for a bipartisan, bicameral review of how the government prepared for the storm and of the emergency response to the flooding.

DeLay said he was reluctant to have an independent commission review the federal government's response; Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) called earlier this week for just such a commission in the mold of the Sept. 11 commission.

"I have concerns about holding hearings," the majority leader told reporters, adding that he did not want to take local, state and federal officials away from the rebuilding effort. "My own impression is that whole system broke down."

DeLay said he opposed legislation aimed at separating the FEMA from the Department of Homeland Security (DHS), saying, "I think it's way too premature."

Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and DeLay have been discussing congressional oversight but were not ready to offer specifics. DeLay said Congress would try to reduce red tape so that federal agencies could extend Social Security, student-loan and unemployment benefits to people displaced by the hurricane.

He said the House would take action this week by:

· Providing relief for Pell Grant recipients who had to withdraw from school.

· Allowing FEMA to transfer money directly to private charities and faith-based groups.

· Suspending red tape requirements for distributing unemployment benefits.

· Letting states use surplus unemployment funds to provide relief.

Asked about Reid's proposal for a $150 billion bailout package, DeLay said it was too early to put a cost on the disaster.

DOJ_NMG_0003592

The flurry of legislation will probably postpone budget reconciliation by a week or more, but the House is still committed to moving bills that would reform retirement security and border security as well as to finishing the annual appropriations process.

"We can do more than one thing in this Congress," DeLay said.

In the Senate, Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) directed the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee to investigate the widely criticized federal response to Hurricane Katrina and whether FEMA should be separated from DHS.

"I tend to think that FEMA should stay at DHS," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), the committee chairwoman.

She and Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), the committee's ranking Democrat, who wrote the legislation creating the DHS, will get a closed-door briefing from FEMA today before considering whether to restore FEMA's status as an independent agency.

"We have to consider every question, including our own work" and the decision to put FEMA into DHS, Lieberman said at the press conference.

Collins did not call for Brown or DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff to resign but said her panel will take a careful look at all the roles played by federal officials.

Lieberman seemed to take a more aggressive stance, saying, "What Michael Brown and Michael Chertoff did is at the center of the investigation."

The Senate appropriated almost $2.9 billion for emergency preparedness and response in the 2006 DHS budget. Congress approved an emergency $10.5 billion aid package last week and now Democrats are calling for as much as another $50 billion.

Responding to the rising gas prices, House Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton (R-Texas) will hold a press conference today on price gouging and energy issues related to Katrina.

Despite the apparent widespread agreement that the response to the storm and flooding was inadequate, most lawmakers, except Pelosi, stopped short of calling for Brown's resignation.

"It's too chaotic to suggest that," said Foley, who slammed FEMA for its response to the four hurricanes that swamped Florida last year and wants the agency to be pulled out of DHS. "I am for looking at the agency function before calling for heads to roll."

Parties Divided Over Katrina Response (RC)

By By Emily Pierce, Ben Pershing And Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, September 7, 2005

Proposals to help the victims of Hurricane Katrina ran the gamut in Congress on Tuesday, with Democrats pressing for action as early as this week on a long list of social welfare bills while Republican leaders cautioned that Congress may need more than a few days to devise legislative solutions.

In the meantime, Members braced for the second spending request for the Federal Emergency Management Agency in just five days. This time, Congressional aides estimated that the Bush administration would ask for as much as $40 billion because FEMA is using up the initial $10.5 billion Congress appropriated on Friday at a faster rate than it had expected. As of press time, it was unclear whether the White House would make the request last night or today.

Beyond emergency appropriations, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and other Democrats pressed to pass legislation by the end of this week that would extend federal social programs such as Medicaid, subsidized housing and unemployment insurance to newly homeless and jobless residents of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. Reid also estimated that the "initial investment" for Katrina relief would be upwards of $150 billion.

But the Democrats' proposals and demands for "immediate" Congressional action were received somewhat skeptically by Republicans.

Senate Republican Policy Committee Chairman Jon Kyl (Ariz.) urged Members to "take a deep breath and think carefully." Kyl suggested creating a bipartisan task force that would develop a legislative package within 30 days.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said that he will be talking with his chairmen over the next two days "to pull together their ideas for the immediate response, the midterm response, and the long-term response" to the hurricane. But he was short on specifics, saying only, "There are a lot of human practical needs that have to be addressed right now, and the federal government has a major role as we look at health and social services and housing, when you look at food and look at shelter."

Frist spokeswoman Amy Call said that the Majority Leader and other Senate GOP leaders would "have a better sense of what the [legislative] package will look like" after Frist meets with Republican committee chairmen this morning.

Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Chairman Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.) said his panel would hold a hearing Thursday on legislative solutions to the crisis caused by Katrina.

"One of the worst things you can do in politics is start announcing the decisions before you listen to the people," said Enzi, who, along with ranking member Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), met with representatives from relief agencies Tuesday to find out what they can do legislatively. Enzi also asked for suggestions for what Congress can do to be submitted to the HELP Committee Web site.

DOJ_NMG_0003593

However, Kennedy, like many Democrats, offered a list of actions he believes Congress should take in the near future, including extending disaster unemployment insurance to more people, helping fund school districts that are accepting children from the storm-ravaged region, freezing student loan payments and interest for those affected by the disaster and providing mental in addition to physical health care for victims.

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), who represents a state severely affected by Katrina, appeared to take the middle ground, urging a combination of caution and haste.

"We need thoughtful things. We need innovative things, but we do need speed," said Lott, who noted that many of the things Democrats are pressing for have already been done by the agencies in charge of health care and unemployment insurance.

For example, Lott said waivers are already in place to help disaster victims secure access to Medicaid as well as for worker compensation if their jobs have been lost.

House Republicans are also taking a somewhat cautious approach to the Congressional response, hesitating to place a dollar figure on the damages. House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), for one, reacted negatively to Reid's suggestion that the reconstruction effort might cost $150 billion.

"I don't think anybody knows, and anybody trying to know is just playing political games," he said.

Still, DeLay called the Katrina effort "the House's No. 1 priority for the foreseeable future" and said he expected an initial Katrina package to be "ready for the floor later this week."

DeLay suggested Tuesday that the package would likely contain a number of small provisions designed to cut red tape and allow money to be shifted around to cover various shortfalls.

In the meantime, the Louisiana Congressional delegation has continued to craft a legislative package that could provide immediate relief to the displaced hurricane victims. Brian Richardson, spokesman for Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.), said the package would likely include Democratic proposals to make sure that Medicaid, housing and unemployment benefits are available to victims in the long term.

The package may also include provisions that enable displaced children to enroll in school without having to produce former school records as well as possible changes to a bankruptcy law passed earlier this year that would make it easier for disaster victims to erase their debts, Richardson said.

"It will be a huge bill, because this is a huge national tragedy," said Richardson.

Lott said he would work with Landrieu and her Republican colleague, Sen. David Vitter (La.), but he cautioned that the Louisiana delegation bill should not "duplicate or complicate efforts" currently under way.

In the meantime, Senate Finance Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) said he was considering proposals to make Medicaid available to storm victims and is working on extending the duties of Office of Refugee Resettlements within the Health and Human Services Department to help not just displaced persons from other countries but also victims of Katrina.

With even Lott saying that relief efforts could cost as much as $100 billion, lawmakers from both parties appeared largely resigned to the fact that billions of dollars would be added to the federal deficit.

Even Senate Budget Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) acknowledged, "We're going to have to spend money to do whatever it takes to solve the problem. ... Yes, it will obviously increase the deficit significantly."

But Enzi noted that lawmakers need to carefully weigh the proposed solutions being offered, particularly the most costly ones.

"We want to do it as effectively as we can, but there are cost constraints," Enzi said of Congress' legislative contributions to the relief efforts. "We have to look at it realistically to see what kinds of things can be done."

House Democrats joined their Senate colleagues in calling for a multi-tiered response to the disaster. Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), along with other Democratic leaders, urged the government to provide immediate compensation and financial assistance to victims, to eliminate bureaucratic hurdles to those needing help and to make a long-term commitment of support to rebuild the Gulf Coast.

Pelosi did not estimate how much the recovery would cost, saying only that the $10.5 billion appropriated so far is "not enough." She also cautioned against "nickel-and-diming" the region, calling for additional funding for housing, food stamps, unemployment benefits and schools.

Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), ranking member on the Homeland Security Committee, said: "We take the position that the government has a responsibility to fix it, and to fix it, we've got to pay for it."

Federal assistance aside, the Democratic leadership also insisted that Republican leaders hold House hearings on the federal response, and the request was granted Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0003594

Rep. Henry Waxman (Calif.), ranking member on the Government Reform Committee, joined other ranking members by writing a letter to his committee's chairman, Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.) and Transportation Chairman Don Young (R-Alaska), outlining his reasons for the inquiry.

"We need to learn for the future what went wrong," Waxman said. "We need to know why it has happened the way it has."

Davis announced Tuesday that he would hold hearings next week.

Republican leaders have emphasized that they expect several different committees to probe the government's response to the disaster and to explore ways to improve future contingency plans.

"It's fair to say the overall response to this emergency could have and should have been better," DeLay said.

The Majority Leader dismissed the need for an investigative commission, similar to that which followed the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, saying that the legislative branch is fully capable of examining the situation itself. Some Members have suggested an independent body look into the response.

"It's Congress' responsibility to look into what happened," he said, though he emphasized that committees should be "deliberate" in scheduling oversight hearings so as not to force too many key administration officials to leave their duties to testify on the Hill all at once.

DeLay said the damage wrought by Katrina could provide the impetus for passage of another energy bill that could include "items that Democrats forced us to take out of the [last] energy bill that, frankly, we ought to have kept."

House Democrats are also pushing for legislation to remove the Federal Emergency Management Agency from the Homeland Security Department. Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.) advanced a bill Tuesday to make the agency fully independent.

As leaders from both parties contemplate their next move, the Congressional Black Caucus planned to meet last night to discuss the crisis and come up with its own plan for the coming days.

The CBC, which is concerned about the large number of blacks affected by Katrina, is trying to organize a group to visit the region, possibly as early as Friday. The members are also meeting this morning with Marty Evans, president of the Red Cross, for a briefing on the conditions and are working on ways to help the displaced.

"We're not going to sit back and wait," said one CBC staffer. "Somebody's got to step up."

Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.), a vocal critic of the government's handling of the catastrophe, is calling on the White House to declare a national day of prayer for the victims. He is also working with his Congressional colleagues and the CBC to set up a relief fund for those affected by Katrina.

"We have got to do what we can do to help," he said.

Cummings said Congress and the Bush administration first have an obligation to go "door to door" to rescue victims, and then to help the displaced reconstruct their lives. He said every Member should be furious at the recent course of events, and must come together to help the recovery efforts.

New Exit Plan: Thanksgiving (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, September 7, 2005

The aftermath of Hurricane Katrina has scrambled Congress' post-recess agenda and calendar, as leaders are frantically reordering their legislative priorities and pushing the anticipated adjournment date back weeks, and possibly more than a month.

Both the House and Senate were already resigned to missing their original departure target of Oct. 1. And with an enormous new set of challenges to tackle in the coming days, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) said Tuesday: "It's obvious that we're going to be here until Thanksgiving."

The sentiment is similar on the Senate side, where the schedule is even more crowded following the death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

"Considering that we have another Supreme Court nominee to do, I think Thanksgiving is realistic [for adjournment], if not after," said a Senate GOP leadership aide.

In the House, Republican leaders spent much of Tuesday in meetings trying to determine how best to approach Katrina's aftermath. While sources said issues such as Social Security and immigration were not prominently discussed at those sessions, Members and aides are aware that the heavier workload and the new political environment created by Katrina could change how the House approaches the rest of its agenda.

"We are seriously involved in Katrina, and there has not been a lot of time to figure out where the rest of the agenda falls into place," said a House Republican leadership staffer.

Another leadership aide said that — as happens often — much of what the House decides to do will depend on what the Senate does, since that chamber's schedule is even more crowded than the House's.

DOJ_NMG_0003595

"The House is very much capable of multitasking," said the second aide. "The bigger question is what the Senate is going to be able to swallow."

The first significant item that could be bumped by Katrina is the budget reconciliation process. Under this year's budget agreement, authorizing committees have until Sept. 16 to submit proposed spending cuts under their area of jurisdiction, and the House Ways and Means and Senate Finance Committees have until Sept. 23 to finish the overall reconciliation package.

DeLay said Tuesday that he expected those deadlines would be pushed back a week. The issue was set to be officially decided at a meeting between the Majority Leader and House committee chairmen Tuesday night.

On Social Security, meanwhile, the same uncertainties that plagued the issue in the House before the recess persist after Katrina.

While the Ways and Means Committee continues work on a broad retirement security package, GOP leaders have been unable to reach agreement on their tactical approach to the issue. Specifically, senior Republicans have not formed a consensus on whether they should push forward and pass a bill this year even if the Senate would be unlikely to follow suit.

Though Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and DeLay are in favor of moving a bill regardless of the Senate's plans, GOP sources said some lawmakers are wary of subjecting everyone to a tough vote on a measure that might never reach the president's desk.

In addition to Social Security and reconciliation, the House will also likely tackle a potentially divisive immigration bill or bills and the remaining appropriations conference reports.

Despite the heavy workload, GOP leaders remain confident they can still accomplish their pre-Katrina goals.

"We can do more than one thing [at a time] in the House," DeLay said.

Experts Warn Of Katrina Identity Theft (WP/AP)

By Jennifer C. Kerr, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Social Security cards, driver's licenses, credit cards and other personal documents are literally floating around New Orleans, raising the prospect some hurricane survivors could be victimized again _ this time by identity thieves.

Betsy Broder, the attorney who oversees the Federal Trade Commission's identity theft program, said the agency has not received any complaints yet. However, it's still early after the disaster and people have been focusing on more pressing needs, such as shelter, food and medicine.

"This is probably not the most immediate concern that people have, but at a certain point they need to stop and take stock of their financial health," Broder said Tuesday.

As survivors begin to rebuild their lives, she said, they can take steps to avoid becoming the victims of identity scammers.

Broder said survivors giving personal data to insurance adjustors or Federal Emergency Management Agency representatives should be certain they're dealing with legitimate individuals and "not crooks who are trying to trick them out of their information so they can commit identity theft."

Once victims are able to get access to phones, Internet and mail, they should check their credit card and bank statements to see if there's been any unusual activity.

They can also obtain their credit report, for free, to make certain no one has accessed their accounts. Under federal law, consumers can request a free credit report each year from any of the three major credit bureaus _ Equifax Inc., Experian Information Solutions and TransUnion.

The FBI also warned people wanting to donate money for Katrina survivors to beware of scammers who solicit online donations to lure victims into giving up credit card numbers and other sensitive information.

"There are people out there who are willing to stoop so low as to scam people who are willing to open their hearts and wallets to people in need," said FBI spokesman Paul Bresson.

He said the bureau has identified about 2,000 Web sites related to the Katrina relief effort. Most are legitimate, Bresson said, but the FBI is investigating about a dozen for possible fraud.

The Better Business Bureau advised Americans who want to give to seek out familiar charities such as the American Red Cross and The Salvation Army.

"In a disaster like this, you must give to well-known organizations that have a track record for providing this type of relief," said Art Taylor, president of the BBB's Wise Giving Alliance. Besides concerns about phony groups, he said, "it's impossible for a newly established organization to get to these victims at this time."

People who think their personal information has been misused should contact the local police, the FTC's Broder said. They can also contact the FTC on the Web at http://www.consumer.gov/idtheft or by phone at 877-IDTHEFT.

___

DOJ_NMG_0003596

On the Net:
Federal Trade Commission: http://www.ftc.gov
Better Business Bureau: http://www.bbb.org

U.S. Officials Warn Against Hurricane Aid Scams (REU)

By Jon Hurdle
Reuters, September 7, 2005

PHILADELPHIA (Reuters) - U.S. government officials warned on Tuesday that scam artists will try to profit from the outpouring of donations to aid victims of Hurricane Katrina.

After last year's Asian tsunami that killed nearly 300,000 people, the FBI investigated more than 170 Web sites that were preying on donors by mimicking the sites of well-known charities, according to Patrick Meehan, U.S. district attorney for Eastern Pennsylvania.

While no evidence has emerged of criminals attempting to divert money destined for hurricane victims, Meehan said authorities were on high alert.

"If the lessons of September 11th and the Asian tsunami are learned, some cold-hearted evil scam artists will use this occasion to perpetrate fraud, lining their own pockets at the expense of hurricane victims," Meehan told a news conference.

Private donors should avoid giving personal data such as social security numbers, dates of birth and bank account information to any organization that says it is seeking disaster aid, and should make sure they are giving money to a legitimate organization, officials said.

Some scam artists seek funds by adopting names that are similar to those of well-known organizations, such as "Red Shield" instead of Red Cross. Others attempt to win the confidence of the donor by thanking them for past donations.

"Be skeptical if someone thanks you for a pledge you don't remember making," said Oriey Glenn of the U.S. Postal Inspection Service, which is on the lookout for such scams.

Officials said the public should give directly to well-known organizations such as the Red Cross, rather than to an intermediary that might claim a "processing fee" to forward the donation. They also warned against organizations seeking a fee to help locate a family member caught up in the disaster.

The Red Cross said it had so far received $409.2 million in pledges from individuals, corporations and foundations.

Meehan urged people to avoid giving to Web sites whose addresses end in ".com" since most nonprofit organizations use ."org," and beware of emails soliciting donations, since legitimate charitable groups typically avoid that approach.

Donors seeking to confirm the legitimacy of a charity were urged to check the Web sites of the American Institute of Philanthropy and Charity Navigator, an organization that evaluates charities.

Four Held In Scam Soliciting Money (WT)

By Gary Emerling
The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

Fairfax County police arrested four persons on Sunday for operating a roadside scam claiming to collect money for victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Police said Joseph J. Murphy Jr., 23, of Warrenton, Va., and Isaac M. Beavers, 22, Marie S. Golden, 22, and Nicholas P. Flint, 19, all of Manassas, Va., told motorists in the 12100 block of Sunset Hills Road in Reston they represented charities helping hurricane victims and asked for cash donations.

"They were at the intersection, going up to the cars and people walking by," said Fairfax police spokesman Officer Edward Orellana. "They were able to collect some money."

Officer Orellana said the suspects did not represent any specific charities. Police would not disclose the amount of money they collected.

The suspects were charged with misdemeanor solicitation violations and released on a summons to appear in court.

Police in Arlington, Montgomery and Prince George's counties said they have not received reports yet of any relief-related scams. But area officials are still urging people to be cautious in their rush to help.

"Bottom-feeding con artists always try to find ways to exploit tragic headlines to cash in on unsuspecting investors," Maryland Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr. said.

In February, scam artists dressed as Red Cross volunteers bilked money from motorists in Prince George's County under the guise of raising funds to help survivors of the deadly tsunami in Southeast Asia.

Similar schemes were spread via the Internet following the tsunami, as fake fundraising messages claiming to be from relief organizations or tsunami survivors themselves were e-mailed around the world.

DOJ_NMG_0003597

Financial scammers already are hitting investors with post-Katrina stock scams tied to speculation about spiking energy prices. One spam e-mail making the rounds on the Internet refers to "a spate of refinery glitches and an unusually active hurricane season" and says investors could more than double their money in just days on certain penny stocks, the Securities and Exchange Commission said.

Mr. Curran said people also could be targeted for oil and gas investment scams because of current oil prices.

After the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, the SEC accused Texon Energy Corp. of soliciting elderly people to invest in an oil and gas Ponzi scheme by telling them Texon would profit from rising energy prices.

A 2002 court judgment ordered Texon to repay $1.2 million after a settlement agreement with the SEC.

Mr. Curran said investors should simply hang up on aggressive cold callers and ignore unsolicited e-mail.

"Whenever something is too good to be true, it really is," he said. "Sadly, there are people who fall for it."

Government Works To Arrange Places For The Displaced (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, September 7, 2005

The federal government is pushing ahead with plans to offer makeshift housing — in cruise ships, abandoned military houses and recreational vehicles — to tens of thousands of Gulf Coast evacuees.

Housing and Urban Development (HUD) Secretary Alphonso Jackson said Tuesday that the government is cobbling together enough housing to take care of the hundreds of thousands of people who were displaced by Hurricane Katrina and have nowhere to go as they rebuild their lives.

The effort is the latest by the government, criticized for its lack of speedy response to the Katrina crisis, to address the basic needs of hurricane-battered residents.

HUD and the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) initially looked for temporary housing within a 500-mile range of the devastation along the Gulf Coast.

The search was expanded nationwide.

FEMA spokesman James McIntyre said the agency has ordered 70,000 small recreational vehicles, each of which can sleep five. In areas without flooding, the trailers can be parked on people's property.

In Alabama, where 2,600 trailers have arrived, people can begin moving into them today.

For those who can't go home, FEMA will use city-owned parks or commercial land to build small temporary cities.

In some cases, FEMA may set up temporary stores for the residents. Starting Friday, McIntyre said, FEMA expects 500 trailers a day to begin arriving outside New Orleans.

The agencies also are offering space on cruise ships — 8,000 beds are available on three ships in Galveston, Texas, and Mobile, Ala. — and in apartment complexes, on military bases and elsewhere.

“We will work until we get every displaced citizen into some type of housing,” McIntyre said.

But there have been glitches along the way. The cruise ship space was offered Monday to evacuees 65 and over. By Tuesday morning, emergency workers were finding that many evacuees in shelters didn't want to move again.

Even with the prospect of a private room and bath, people were too traumatized to move once again and be isolated on a ship, McIntyre said.

Jackson said government relief workers were bringing in ministers and local leaders to talk with evacuees and convince them that they won't be able to return to their homes or neighborhoods any time soon and that they shouldn't stay in warehouse-style shelters such as the Houston Astrodome for long.

“It is very difficult to convince many people in the shelter that they're not going to be returning home very quickly,” he said. “We have to be sensitive.”

Among other government efforts underway:

·The Department of Veterans Affairs will make some of the 5,000 properties it owns nationwide available, spokesman Scott Hogenson said. About 2,000 of the homes — property seized from veterans who defaulted on loans — are in nine states in or around the disaster area, he said.

·The Agriculture Department said states could offer $50 food benefit cards to evacuees before processing their applications for food stamps.

·The Social Security Administration sent workers to the Astrodome and other shelters to help cut checks and let people know how they can get their checked cashed.

Spokesman Mark Hinkle said the agency is working with the U.S. Postal Service to mail checks to shelters and other temporary homes.

“We can issue emergency funds anywhere,” Hinkle said. “We can send your check wherever you want us to.”

·HUD granted a 90-day moratorium on foreclosures of Federal Housing Administration-insured homes.

At the White House, President Bush said he intends to “make sure those poor folks … get the help they need.”

Miscommunication has continued to plague the relief operation in and around New Orleans.

One example: a 10-bus caravan full of supplies from Washington arrived outside New Orleans over the weekend with plans to take 400 evacuees back to a shelter in the capital. By the time the buses arrived, the evacuees scheduled to be moved to Washington had been flown out, and there was no need for more supplies in New Orleans. The convoy headed for Alabama but got only one taker there. Tuesday, the 10 buses were headed back to Washington with one evacuee on board.

Residents Will Be Forced To Leave (WT/AP)

By Cain Burdeau, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- Engineers struggled yesterday with the weeks-long task of draining this flooded saucer of a city, while the mayor last night issued an order authorizing the forced removal of people refusing to leave a city that was rapidly becoming a health risk.

Mayor C. Ray Nagin told all public safety officers "to compel the evacuation of all persons ... regardless of whether such persons are on private property or do not desire to leave."

Meanwhile, authorities braced for the horrors that would be revealed by the slow drainage of waters from Hurricane Katrina, a herculean task that was being measured by inches yesterday.

The pumping began after the Army Corps of Engineers used hundreds of sandbags and rocks over the Labor Day weekend to close a 200-foot gap in the 17th Street Canal levee that burst in the aftermath of the storm and swamped 80 percent of this below-sea-level city.

After an aerial tour yesterday, Mr. Nagin said the water was dropping ever so slightly, and he estimated that it covered only 60 percent of the city.

"Even in areas where the water was as high as the rooftops, I started to see parts of the buildings," he said, adding, "I'm starting to see rays of light."

In Washington, congressional officials said President Bush intends to seek as much as $40 billion to cover the next phase of relief and recovery as leading lawmakers and the White House pledged to investigate an initial federal response that was widely condemned as woefully inadequate.

As Congress convened after a five-week vacation, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, Texas Republican, said Katrina aid will be the "number one priority for the foreseeable future," a priority that Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said might cost the federal government more than $150 billion.

In New Orleans, the pumping got off to a woefully slow start.

Once all of the city's pumping stations are running, they can move water at a rate of 29 billion gallons a day and lower the water level a half-inch per hour -- or about a foot per day. But by late yesterday afternoon, Corps officials said only three of New Orleans' normal contingent of 148 drainage pumps were operating.

The Army Corps of Engineers said the timetable ranges from three weeks to nearly three months, depending on a string of variables, including rainfall, the still-unknown condition of the abandoned pumps and whether the system can withstand the flotsam of broken buildings, trees, and trash -- and corpses.

"We have to get the water out of the city or the nightmare will continue," said Louisiana Environmental Secretary Mike McDaniel.

Mr. Nagin also warned of what could be revealed when the waters recede.

"It's going to be awful, and it's going to wake the nation up again," said the mayor, who a day earlier increased his estimate of the death toll in his city to as much as 10,000.

With the water dropping, military and police turned their attention to evacuating the streets of the estimated 10,000 people still thought to be in the city. Some have been holed up in their homes for more than a week and refuse to leave.

"You've got to protect your property, that's the main thing," said 69-year-old John Ebanks, who waved off would-be rescuers from a porch stocked with food, mosquito spray and other supplies. "This is all I've got. I'm [too] old to start over."

New Orleans Police Superintendent Eddie Compass told CNN: "These citizens will have to be removed for their own good."

The mayor's forced removal order did not apply to people in Algiers on the west side of Orleans Parish, CNN reported.

In a plea to holdouts who might be listening to portable radios in the powerless city, Mr. Nagin warned that the fetid water could carry disease and that natural gas was leaking all over town.

DOJ_NMG_0003599

"This is not a safe environment," Mr. Nagin said. "I understand the spirit that's basically: 'I don't want to abandon my city.' It's OK. Leave for a little while. Let us get you to a better place. Let us clean the city up."

To that end, the Pentagon began sending 5,000 paratroopers from the Army's storied 82nd Airborne Division to use small boats, including inflatable Zodiac craft, to launch a new search-and-rescue effort in flooded sections of the city.

But the water from Katrina has been standing for more than a week and is contaminated with E. coli bacteria, a highly placed official in the New Orleans mayor's office told CNN yesterday.

"It's absolutely unhealthy to be anywhere near the water," said the official, who declined to be identified.

Public-health officials in Washington yesterday announced the first deaths suspected to be related to tainted floodwaters, although they were not apparently related to E. coli, a bacteria that can cause fatal diarrhea in children and the elderly.

Tom Skinner, spokesman for the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, said four persons -- one a hurricane refugee evacuated to Texas, the other three in Mississippi -- might have died of a waterborne bacterial infection circulating in Hurricane Katrina's floodwaters.

The deaths appear to have been caused by Vibrio vulnificus, a germ common in warm Gulf Coast waters that's usually spread by eating contaminated food but can also penetrate open wounds, the suspected mode of transmission in these cases.

And in Houston's Astrodome, health officials took steps yesterday against a diarrhea-causing virus made infamous by recent cruise-ship outbreaks.

Officials handed out alcohol-based hand sanitizers to stem the spread of norovirus, an easily spread cause of diarrhea and vomiting. Officials isolated some refugees with the illness, although they couldn't provide an exact count. No treatment exists except to keep sufferers hydrated.

No large outbreaks are attributed to the hurricane, but infection control within shelters housing thousands of evacuees is a top priority, said Dr. Julie Gerberding, CDC's director.

A plan to move thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees from the Astrodome to cruise ships was put on hold yesterday after many objected, some because they were terrified by the thought of living on the water.

"I can't live over water. I can't swim," said Donna Smith, 24. "I wouldn't want to see no more water. I saw enough already."

Some National Guardsmen and helicopters were diverted from their search missions yesterday to fight fires, an emerging threat in a city that is still at least a day and a half away from restoring the first running water since the storm.

A candle was blamed for starting one major blaze in the lower Garden District -- a historic neighborhood of mostly wooden homes. The flames started in an abandoned brick building and spread to a neighboring apartment house. The blazes burned for hours before Chinook helicopters with water pouches were brought in to fight the blaze.

Superintendent Compass said lawlessness in the city "has subsided tremendously," and officers warned that those caught looting in an area where the governor has declared an emergency can get up to 15 years in prison.

The signs of hope came against increasingly angry rhetoric over the federal response as too little too late. In Washington, congressional leaders planned hearings into the aftermath of the storm.

"We need to rebuild the confidence of the American people ... in our government's ability to protect them from attack, whether it comes from nature or from terrorists," said Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat.

Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard was even more blunt.

"Bureaucracy has murdered people in the greater New Orleans area," he said on CBS' "Early Show." "Take whatever idiot they have at the top of whatever agency and give me a better idiot. Give me a caring idiot. Give me a sensitive idiot. Just don't give me the same idiot."

Together In Houston: 'We're Going To Survive As A Family' (WP)

By Krissah Williams

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

HOUSTON -- At first, it was almost like a family vacation. The boys brought their Microsoft Xbox and all the games with them to the hotel in Houston. The night the hurricane hit New Orleans, Blaire Garnett and her cousins went to a nightclub and partied hard.

Then the floodwaters began to rise, and by Tuesday, Garnett's family members were riveted to the televisions in their hotel rooms, watching their home town drown. At the nearby Astrodome, they found a cousin who had escaped the Louisiana Superdome. He joined them at the hotel, 35 members of the same clan crammed into four cramped rooms.

Later, a relative got through on a cell phone to tell them that Garnett's aunt, who was mentally disabled, had died on the Interstate 10 bridge in New Orleans, awaiting help. The mood turned to disbelief.

DOJ_NMG_0003600

So much is gone, but one thing is intact: the family's will to stand together. They have gone hunting for jobs as a group and have rented six apartments in the same complex to house them all. If their life in New Orleans is gone, they will remake it in Houston.

"We came here as a family, and we're going to survive as a family," said Blaire's cousin Gregory Garnett, 20, an electrical engineering student at the University of New Orleans.

The Garnett family wasn't rich before the storm, but they were comfortable. Blaire Garnett, 21, lived with her mom, stepdad and sister in a three-bedroom house in a quiet neighborhood of rental homes in Metairie, a suburb of New Orleans on the south shore of Lake Pontchartrain. Blaire, a third-year business administration student at the University of New Orleans, says she wants to be a lawyer.

To help pay the bills, Blaire worked in a factory that made conveyor belts. She liked the job because it paid well -- $12 an hour plus health benefits -- and because her mom, Lucille Garnett Wiggins; her sister, Crystal; and two of her cousins worked there.

"We all liked our jobs. It was a good company," she said. "They send conveyor belts around the world."

Blaire's stepdad, Chad Wiggins, worked in a plant mixing chemicals for $8 an hour. It was Wiggins who alerted the family that they might want to leave town to ride out the hurricane. When he went to cash his paycheck Friday night, he saw a long line of people who warned that the hurricane might be severe. The next morning, they headed to Houston because it looked to be outside the storm path.

The family had fled hurricanes before and thought they knew the drill. Blaire said her mom told them: "Throw some jeans and T-shirts in a bag. We'll be home by Tuesday."

That sense of optimism vanished after the family spent those first few days watching the suffering of the displaced people on television.

"These are not refugees; this is our country," Blaire said emotionally as she and her cousins discussed the evacuation in disbelief last week. They said they felt the federal government's response would have come more quickly for white people. "This is happening right here in our country, " Crystal said.

It became clear the family could not quickly return to New Orleans. They heard reports that the neighborhoods where their home, companies and schools were had all been flooded. Many people helped them. One company gave all the evacuees in the hotel T-shirts, brought the children Barbie dolls and puzzles and twice prepared barbecue dinners for them. One night, a customer at Church's Chicken paid for the family's chicken when he realized they were from New Orleans. And the Texas Health and Human Services Commission provided the family with food stamps.

But the family realized that was not enough. Blaire tried to call the conveyor belt factory last week to see if workers would be paid but got busy signals. The family concluded they could no longer afford $200 a night for four hotel rooms and needed to move to apartments. But many places refused to rent to tenants without jobs.

On Thursday, Blaire and five of her cousins went to the Texas Workforce Commission, where a woman helped them type resumes and sent them to Randstad, a temporary-staffing company. Randstad found six $7-an-hour positions at Drake Pack, a packing and assembly company that needed workers for a few days to pack canvas tool belts in boxes.

For the past five days, Blaire and her cousins have worked in the hot Drake Pack warehouse, slicing open boxes, removing tool belts, putting barcodes and tags on them, repacking the belts and sealing them shut. Yesterday was their last day at the packing company, but a Randstad official said he plans to make sure the family members continue to get work.

Other family members went apartment hunting. At each complex, they repeated their story: They were a family of 35 who had fled the storm and wanted to stay together.

They asked if owners had any deals for people from New Orleans. One did -- $99 down payment per apartment, with the first month's rent free. After the first month, rent would be $540. The owner waived the standard credit checks and job requirement.

The apartment he was offering was brick with green grass and blue awnings. It looked safe. They signed leases for six apartments. The family plans to leave the Sheraton today and move into the first two apartments. The other four apartments will be ready later in the week. The children will enroll in the public schools nearby.

Blaire is relieved that the family will have an address. But she thinks wistfully of what she left behind, little things, such as her collection of Will Smith paraphernalia, including a candle with Smith's photo printed on it and T-shirts that had her photo and his, along with the words "Mr. and Mrs. Will Smith."

She also misses her old nail salon. She figures it will be a long time before she finds one in Houston that can buff her fingernails the same way. Glancing down at her hand, she sighs, "I would spend my last to get my nails done."

Some sense of normalcy is returning. On Monday, Crystal bought a hair weave at a beauty supply store, and her 17-year-old cousin Tiffany sat with a fine-toothed black comb and parted Crystal's hair, braiding in the weave.

DOJ_NMG_0003601

Later that night, Crystal got on the Internet and was finally able to contact the conveyor belt company. The company said Crystal, Blaire and Lucille would be paid through September. The checks will be mailed to their new apartment, though the company could not give a precise date when the checks would arrive.

"I understand they are going to pay us, but we are out of funds," Lucille said. She also says she's worried that the paycheck will be smaller than normal, because she generally works 20 hours of overtime. She isn't expecting more than $400 this check.

Meanwhile, other family members are looking for jobs. Blaire's uncle Matthew, who worked for UPS in New Orleans, says he hopes the company can find him a similar job in Houston. He said he's done with New Orleans, tired of running scared every time a hurricane warning sounds.

Blaire's mom, Lucille, agrees, saying she is afraid to return to New Orleans.

Not Blaire. She misses her life back there. But where she settles next may depend largely on where she can continue her education.

Her federal financial-aid loan has already been processed by the University of New Orleans. Since she hasn't been able to reach anyone at the school, she doesn't know whether she can transfer the loan to another college.

She figures she won't be able to start at a new school until next semester. "I've already missed like four weeks of school," she said. "If I go to school right now, I might be behind."

She knows she fared better than many, and she says she'll just keep on pushing. "We are used to living at a certain level, and it is hard," Blaire said. "We have to keep working. I don't want to be complaining and whining. We are blessed."

Stunned By Scope Of Destruction, Couple Wonder Whether To Begin Rebuilding Home (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, September 7, 2005

D'IBERVILLE, Miss. — Katherine and Marshall Hill had a thriving, happy family life here near Biloxi before Hurricane Katrina struck. He installs and repairs slot machines at local casinos. She is chief financial officer for a chain of medical clinics that serve low-income patients.

The Hills had a four-bedroom, 2,000-square-foot ranch house and a new air-conditioning system. They had a boat, a motorcycle, a widescreen TV and a Bose surround-sound audio system. They had a pool table in the family room that attracted neighborhood kids, and saltwater aquariums full of expensive lion fish that Marshall Hill watched to relax. Hurricane Katrina destroyed all that — except the boat.

The Hills are putting their lives together, almost from scratch, and it's hard for them to know where to begin. “I gave up last week,” says Marshall Hill, 41. “I looked around, saw everything destroyed and said, ‘I'm never coming back.' ” But after a couple days, seeing many people worse off than his family, Hill regained his fighting spirit and the desire to stay in the area where he's lived since he was a child.

For now, the family is staying at his parents' house in Woolmarket, 10 miles inland from the coast. The adults sleep in a spare bedroom. Matt, 19, sleeps in the den until he returns to junior college and pursues his dream of becoming a Major League pitcher. Ashley, 11, who likes dirt bikes and cheerleading, sleeps on the living room sofa. Another daughter, Shawnessy, 16, is staying with her boyfriend's family for now but will return soon.

This arrangement may last months.

The Hills have to decide first what to do about school for the kids. The school year started in early August but may not resume for three to six months. Students may have to go to Mobile, Ala., 60 miles away, or Jackson, Miss., 180 miles away, to attend classes. The Hills could send Ashley to live with cousins in Kingsport, Tenn., and have her go to school there.

Ashley wants to stay home, and the parents are torn.

“I don't know if it's right to send my daughter away to a school where she doesn't have friends and will stay only a few months,” says Katherine Hill, 38.

Maybe they'll home-school her for a while, they think. Maybe they'll hold her back a year. “Sometimes life teaches you more than school,” Marshall Hill says.

The Hills met with their insurance company after the storm. They learned that half their house is covered by insurance and half is not. Damage to the back of their house is covered by homeowner's insurance because it was caused by wind that ripped a hole in the roof. The front of the house is not covered because it was damaged by rising water.

The Hills did not have flood insurance, because at 34 feet above sea level they were not in a flood plain. Still, the house took on 18 inches of water during the storm, forcing the nine people and four dogs in the house — friends and family — onto pool tables and beds to stay above water. Five cars owned by family and friends were destroyed at their house in the flood. Insurance will cover that.

DOJ_NMG_0003602

Right now, the Hills are using a truck borrowed from parents. Katherine Hill's 2000 Buick LeSabre will have to be replaced. After the storm, you could pull out the dipstick and measure the water in the engine.

Since insurance will cover only part of their loss, the Hills must decide how to spend the money they do get.

"We lived like many Americans — too many car loans, too much credit-card debt. We had a great life, paycheck to paycheck," Marshall Hill says. Insurance might help pay off the debts, but it won't leave much to rebuild.

Family members have offered to come immediately with tools to rebuild the house, which still stands although everything is ruined. The Hills have asked them to stay put until they know what they will do next. Marshall Hill expects to do much of the work himself. "I want the house to be fixed up totally before we buy new anything," he says. "I don't want to just put in a carpet and make do."

The best news: The Hills don't expect to lose their jobs. The slot machine company he works for says it will find jobs for people hurt by the hurricane. But he wonders if that means he may have to work temporarily in Las Vegas or elsewhere as a repairman.

Katherine Hill prepared for Hurricane Katrina by going into work the Saturday before the storm and running the payroll early for her company's 200 workers. The money was scheduled to be credited to employee accounts this past Friday. It didn't happen.

After solving the payroll problem, she'll have to reconstruct the company's records. Her computers were destroyed, and her backup records were in a safe that flooded. She hopes the company's information systems manager has a copy, but she hasn't been able to reach him because he lives in a hard-hit area closer to New Orleans.

"I have to come up with a new record-keeping system from scratch," she says. "I'm worried less about the billing records than about getting patient records."

For all the hard work ahead of them, the Hills consider themselves lucky. They have family in the area, unlike many casino workers. Their house is uninhabitable but still standing. And everyone is alive.

Over the weekend, power came back on at his mother's house where they are staying. They took a warm shower. For breakfast, they had eggs. The small pleasures of life made them laugh with delight.

Barbara Bush Calls Evacuees Better Off (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6 - As President Bush battled criticism over the response to Hurricane Katrina, his mother declared it a success for evacuees who "were underprivileged anyway," saying on Monday that many of the poor people she had seen while touring a Houston relocation site were faring better than before the storm hit.

"What I'm hearing, which is sort of scary, is they all want to stay in Texas," Barbara Bush said in an interview on Monday with the radio program "Marketplace." "Everyone is so overwhelmed by the hospitality."

"And so many of the people in the arena here, you know, were underprivileged anyway," she said, "so this is working very well for them."

Mrs. Bush toured the Astrodome complex with her husband, former President George Bush, as part of an administration campaign throughout the Gulf Coast region to counter criticism of the response to the storm. Former President Bush and former President Bill Clinton are helping raise money for the rebuilding effort.

White House officials did not respond on Tuesday to calls for comment on Mrs. Bush's remarks.

Amid One City's Welcome, A Tinge Of Backlash (NYT)

By Peter Applebome

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 6 - Last week came the rumors - of riots at Wal-Marts, of break-ins at homes, of drug gangs from New Orleans roaming the streets of its more sedate neighbor 75 miles up Interstate 10.

Today came the reality - of a dozen or more relatives crowded under one roof, of hours stuck in traffic trying to get to school or work, of frustration and fear about what kind of city Baton Rouge will be with at least 100,000 evacuees and rescue workers added to the 227,000 residents it had before the storm hit.

Make no mistake. The overwhelming response of people in Baton Rouge to Hurricane Katrina has been one of compassion and sacrifice with every church in town, it seems, housing or feeding evacuees.

But there have also been runs on gun stores, mounting frustration over gridlocked roads and an undercurrent of fear about crime and the effect of the evacuees.

DOJ_NMG_0003603

After the chaos of the storm, which did some damage here, and a long weekend, Tuesday was the first day most residents returned to work and school. Before the evacuation, blacks made up about half the population of Baton Rouge and almost 70 percent of New Orleans, and in conversations in which race is often explicit or just below the surface, voices on the street, in shops, and especially in the anonymous hothouse of talk radio were raising a new question: just how compassionate can this community, almost certainly home to more evacuees than any other, afford to be?

"You can't take the city out of the yat, and you can't take the yat out of the city," said Frank Searle, a longtime Baton Rouge resident, using a slang term for New Orleanians derived from the local greeting, "Where y'at?"

"These people will not assimilate here," Mr. Searle said. "They put up with the crime in New Orleans, and now it's staring them in the face, but up here that's not going to be tolerated. People are going to handle it individually if they have to. This is the South. We will take care of it."

For a week Baton Rouge, the state capital, home of Louisiana State University and a place that sees itself as a less raucous cousin to what had been the kingdom of sin and merriment to its south, has been trying to come to terms with its sudden status as the state's most populous city.

"It's a new Baton Rouge we're living in, isn't it?" said Jeanine Smallwood of suburban Prairieville, in the middle of a 90-minute drive to work that should have taken 20.

Like many people in and near Baton Rouge, Mrs. Smallwood, her 1,700-square-foot house now sheltering 14 people, is trying to balance the need for compassion with the vertigo of a changed city. And so while she wishes all the evacuees well, she said she feared an influx of people from the housing projects of New Orleans, places, she has heard, where people walk around in T-shirts that read, "Kill the cops."

"Or so the story has it," she said. "Those aren't neighborhoods I go to."

She was so rattled, she said, she told her daughter she might have to move. On reflection, she said, there is little chance of that. Instead, she is hoping for the best.

"People are, what's the word? Not frustrated, not scared, it's more like their lives are on hold, everything's changed and we're trying to figure out what the new normal is going to be," Mrs. Smallwood said.

Many relief workers and volunteers say the worries over crime reflect more wholesale stereotyping of people fleeing a catastrophe than anything based in fact, but safety is a major issue. At the height of the post-storm panic last week, people waited in line for three and a half hours at Jim's Firearms, a giant gun and sporting goods store. Many were people from New Orleans with their own safety issues. But many were local residents jumpy about the newcomers from New Orleans and stocking up on Glock and Smith & Wesson handguns.

Jim Siegmund, a salesman at Jim's recently returned from military service in Iraq, said he did not think there was anything to worry about. Still, holding a cellphone in his hand and comparing it to a 9-millimeter handgun he said: "When push comes to shove, this won't protect you, but a Glock 9 will."

Joel Phillips, a 38-year-old contractor, said he had never owned a gun in his life, but after watching an angry argument at a gas station, he stood in line for three hours at Jim's to buy a 9-millimeter Ruger handgun and then went with a friend to a firing range over the weekend to learn how to use it.

"I have two daughters, I sometimes have to work in bad neighborhoods," Mr. Phillips said. "I probably don't need it, but I'll feel better knowing that I have some protection."

Many evacuees are staying with family or friends, their campers, S.U.V.'s and pickups parked on front lawns or circular driveways.

Most people at the broad array of shelters were dazed but appreciative of the help from local volunteers like the Louisiana State University students, upbeat and attentive, tending to sick and exhausted evacuees at the triage center on campus.

But others, particularly those at the main Red Cross shelter at the River Center convention center downtown, were seething with frustration, not just over the disaster they were fleeing, but from the sense that they were being treated not so much like guests as people being warehoused until they could be shipped elsewhere.

Patricia Perry, a postal employee from New Orleans, said anyone with a wristband from the River Center shelter was being stereotyped outside it as one of "those people" - looters, criminals, outcasts.

"It's like a stigma," she said. "All they really want to do is get us out of town. Well, I'm from Louisiana. I work hard. I pay my taxes. Surely, this state can find a place for us to live."

Still, many residents, with the sense of intimacy that remains so much a part of Southern life, took their role as hosts seriously, as if it would be bad manners, the ultimate sin in the South, to do otherwise.

So when Pam Robertson, manager of a convenience store, asked a customer how he was doing, it was not dutiful chatter but a real question that begged for a real answer.

DOJ_NMG_0003604

When it came, she took the man's hand in hers over the counter and talked about her friend Hunter, evacuated from Loyola University, about her upbringing in the town of Henderson in the heart of Cajun country, about the grid of local streets here.

She greeted one and all with the same missionary zeal, as if the right words could somehow undo the disaster of the past week.

And when asked how she was doing, or even when they didn't, she replied: "I'm tired, but I'm hanging in. It's good. It's all good. God is good. We'll get through it."

Hundreds Of Storm Survivors Arrive In Capital (WP)

By Theola S. Labbe And Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

He was the first person to step inside the D.C. Armory yesterday, the tall elderly man who carried all his belongings in a plastic grocery bag and walked with a slight limp. Behind him was a woman in a plaid dress who pushed a walker, a girl with a pink barrette in her hair and a small boy in a lime-green T-shirt who was scooped up into a hug by a D.C. official.

One by one, the New Orleans survivors of Hurricane Katrina arrived in Washington yesterday, welcomed with smiles and applause from emergency workers and District leaders. Some came on stretchers or makeshift wheelchairs. Others could move on their own but looked tired and dazed.

Along with the clothes on their backs and the scraps of their lives stuffed into trash bags, the evacuees brought tales of fear and survival -- and were grateful to finally be able to call someplace home.

"I feel very warm," said Jameila Anderson, 19, until last week a sophomore at Dillard University in New Orleans, who arrived at the shelter with her boyfriend and his mother. "I feel relieved. I feel like everything is going to be all right."

A total of 295 evacuees were flown from New Orleans to Dulles International Airport on two commercial aircraft, and more may arrive here over the next several days. They were taken to the armory on Metrobuses and fed a hearty lunch of meatballs, egg noodles and mixed vegetables with a garden salad.

Workers with the American Red Cross, which is managing the shelter, planned to issue identification cards and assess whether evacuees needed such services as medical treatment, mental health counseling, job referrals or help with school enrollment. They will be able to stay at the armory 30 days, perhaps longer.

"This is Step 1. They're here," said Linda Cropp, chairman of the D.C. Council, who stood with Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) and other city officials shortly before the evacuees arrived. "We now must get them involved in our community."

Although District officials initially had planned to receive a group of hurricane survivors being housed in Arkansas, the Federal Emergency Management Agency on Monday night instead arranged the airlift from the New Orleans airport.

City Administrator Robert C. Bobb, who met the first plane at Dulles, said that although many people were relieved to reach a well-equipped shelter, others were astonished and dismayed to find themselves in the nation's capital, "thousands of miles from home."

"People were real irritated. 'Why am I in Washington when I wanted to go to Texas?' I heard that on two or three occasions," Bobb said. "No one told them where they were going until they got on the plane."

Three people arrived at the armory only to demand a ride back to the airport so they could travel at their own expense to Texas, Bobb said. Another man asked to go to Alabama.

Other jurisdictions in the region also were making plans to put up evacuees in shelters if needed.

"We will treat them like we treat our sisters and brothers," said Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson (D), with Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) by his side, at a news conference where government and religious leaders pledged help.

Virginia Gov. Mark R. Warner (D) said the state has identified temporary living facilities for at least 3,000 evacuees. He said that as many as 1,000 will be housed at Fort Pickett, an Army National Guard facility in central Virginia, and others in 4-H centers run by the state or in private homes identified by churches and synagogues.

During health screenings of the evacuees who arrived in the District, some were suffering from diarrhea and dehydration, but most were in good physical condition, said D.C. Department of Health Director Gregg A. Pane. Sixteen people were taken to a hospital for immediate treatment, he said.

Outside the Stadium-Armory Metro station, a group of people stood in front of the iron fence and waited as evacuees periodically came to talk with them.

"We slept on the roof for three days. We were lucky we had a two-story house," said Cleo Breland, 48, who used to help shampoo hair in New Orleans. "Man, I don't have no ID on me, no nothing."

DOJ_NMG_0003605

A rescue boat left him on a highway, he slept on a funeral home floor and then was told to go to the New Orleans convention center.

Now, he said, everybody wanted to help, wanted to treat the evacuees "like movie stars."

"It was weird," he said.

John Vaughn, 42, a New Orleans restaurant worker who was rescued two days ago, flew to Washington with his sister and her three teenage sons. He said he has no money and needs to find work quickly.

Gary Graham, 49, a hospital pharmacist, said he stayed in New Orleans during the hurricane because he was classified as an essential worker. When his house became uninhabitable, he moved into his truck and ate canned food until he was rescued Thursday.

He ended up in the vast sea of humanity at the New Orleans airport and said he was unaware he was coming to Washington until he asked a flight attendant.

Many of the area residents outside the armory hoped to help.

Geraldine Pritchett, president of Labor of Love Homeless Institute in Fairfax County, was offering donations from Costco and Giant in Northern Virginia. "We've got diapers, baby food, children's books and toys," she said, "and we hope to help get people into homes."

Donna Coates, a D.C. resident, wanted to contribute clothing. Elsa Malloy, of Maryland, wanted to help organize apartments. And Meshelle Carter, of Northeast Washington, wanted all 295 evacuees to come to a welcome picnic" at her house Saturday.

Carter, a security officer, said she knew what it meant not to have. "My heart just went out" to the evacuees, she said.

Offers Of Aid Immediate, But U.S. Approval Delayed For Days (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

Offers of foreign aid worth tens of millions of dollars -- including a Swedish water purification system, a German cellular telephone network and two Canadian rescue ships -- have been delayed for days awaiting review by backlogged federal agencies, according to European diplomats and information collected by the State Department.

Since Hurricane Katrina, more than 90 countries and international organizations offered to assist in recovery efforts for the flood-stricken region, but nearly all endeavors remained mired yesterday in bureaucratic entanglements, in most cases, at the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

In Germany, a massive telecommunication system and two technicians await the green light to fly to Louisiana, after its donors spent four days searching for someone willing to accept the gift.

"FEMA? That was a lost case," said Mirit Hemy, an executive with the Netherlands-based New Skies Satellite, who made the phone calls. "We got zero help, and we lost one week trying to get hold of them."

In Sweden, a transport plane loaded with a water purification system and a cellular network has been ready to take off for four days, while Swedish officials wait for flight clearance. Nearly a week after they were offered, four Canadian rescue vessels and two helicopters have been accepted but probably won't arrive from Halifax, Nova Scotia, until Saturday. The Canadians' offer of search and rescue divers has so far gone begging.

Matching offers of aid -- from Panamanian bananas to British engineers -- with needs in the devastated Gulf region is a laborious process, in a disaster whose scope is unheard of in recent U.S. history, especially for a country that is more accustomed to giving than receiving aid.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said yesterday that to his knowledge, all offers of foreign aid have been accepted but must be vetted by emergency relief specialists. "I think the experts will take a look at exactly what is needed now," he said.

FEMA spokeswoman Natalie Rule said the foreign complaints echo those from governors and officials "across the nation."

"There has been that common thought that because [offers of aid] are not tapped immediately, they're not prudently used," Rule said. "We are pulling everything into a centralized database. We are trying not to suck everything in all at once, whether we need it or not."

European diplomats said publicly that they understand the difficulty of coordinating such a massive recovery effort. In an open letter released yesterday, though, Ambassador John Bruton, head of the Delegation of the European Commission to the United States, wrote:

"Perhaps one of those lessons will be that rugged individualism is not always enough in such a crisis, particularly if an individual does not have the material and psychological means to escape the fury of a hurricane in time."

DOJ_NMG_0003606

Soon after the flooding, the government of Sweden offered a C-130 Hercules transport plane, loaded with water purification equipment, and a cellular network donated by Ericsson.

"As far as I know, it's still on the ground," said Claes Thorson, press counselor at the Swedish Embassy in Washington. He said that along with 20 other European Union nations that have pledged money and goods, "We are ready to send our things. We know they are needed, but what seems to be a problem is getting all these offers into the country."

So far, Thorson said, the State Department has denied Sweden's request for flight clearance. "We don't know exactly why, but we have a suspicion that the system is clogged on the receiving end," he said. "But we keep a request alive all the time, so we are not forgotten."

German telecommunications company KB Impuls contacted another company, Unisat, based in Rhode Island, with the idea of contributing an integrated satellite and cellular telephone system.

In a region with its communications systems in tatters, the $3 million system could handle 5,000 calls at once, routing them, if necessary, through Germany.

KB Impuls would contribute the equipment and two engineers, supplied with their own food, water and generator fuel, to set it up. Unisat contacted another firm, New Skies Satellite, based in the Netherlands with offices in Washington, which agreed to contribute satellite capacity.

New Skies even arranged transport, securing a C-130 cargo plane from the Israeli Air Force, to pick up the equipment and technicians from Germany and bring them to Louisiana. "With one call, I got an airplane," Hemy said. And then, over four days, she and the owner of Unisat, Uri Bar-Zemer, called contacts at FEMA, the American Red Cross, the State Department, even members of Congress, trying to find someone to accept the gift.

Finally the State Department told them that to receive flight clearance, the gift must have a specific recipient. "I was ringing, ringing, ringing -- and nothing," Hemy said. Finally, yesterday, she got a call from the U.S. Air Force's Joint Task Force Katrina Communication Operations division, thanking the companies for the gift and inquiring about the system's technical specifications.

As of late yesterday, the companies were waiting for a written order from the Northern Command to begin the mission. "I don't have a problem confirming that," Bar-Zemer said of the story. But he expressed concerns that disclosing the difficulties in donating could jeopardize the company's chances of actually delivering the aid.

U.S. Declines Some Foreign Offers Of Hurricane Aid (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

The United States has accepted help from about 40 countries for the victims of Hurricane Katrina -- fewer than half of those that offered -- including high-speed water pumps, food, cruise ships and more than $400 million in cash, U.S. officials said yesterday.

Although no offer has been rejected officially, proposals from Cuba and other countries to send doctors or nurses have not been accepted because there is enough U.S. medical personnel to deal with the crisis for now, the State Department said.

"There's been a robust response from the American medical community in terms of medical supplies, in terms of medical professionals, doctors, nurses, as well as public health officials," spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters.

A senior State Department official added: "We have the people we need right now, and we have more in the pipeline."

A Belgian offer to send medical teams to assist the American Red Cross was accepted, but they include only logistical personnel, U.S. officials said.

The State Department sent a cable to U.S. embassies around the world over the weekend with what one diplomat in Europe described as a "generic list" of needs that the Federal Emergency Management Agency had identified as top priorities.

The list did not include medical professionals, diplomats in Washington and overseas said.

"The cable said that interested governments should let us know what from the list they can provide," the U.S. diplomat in Europe said.

Once those governments respond, Washington will decide what to take from each of them, he said.

He also noted that some foreign officials are asking why it took Washington so long to compile the list, but the Bush administration said the enormity of the crisis required time and care for a comprehensive list to be produced.

"Over 90 countries and organizations around the world have made offers of assistance to the United States and the American people in our time of need," Mr. McCormack said.

"As needs are identified, certainly if they can be filled from the international offers of assistance, that is something that we have and will go back to foreign countries to try to meet," he said.

He noted that Germany and the Netherlands are sending high-speed pumps, and that Greek cruise ships are on their way to the Gulf of Mexico region.

DOJ_NMG_0003607

"There is a process of matching needs with the expertise and the donations that have been made. This is going to be an ongoing process over a period of time," Mr. McCormack said.

The largest cash contributions so far, $100 million each, have come from three Persian Gulf countries -- Qatar, the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait. The latter is also shipping $400 million worth of oil.

The United States has accepted help even from poor countries like Afghanistan that are recipients of substantial amounts of U.S. aid.

"What we do is, we accept these offers in the spirit in which they are given," Mr. McCormack said.

A Foreign Aid Twist: U.S. Gets, Others Give (USAT)

USA Today, September 7, 2005

World reaction to Hurricane Katrina has been like viewing the USA through a Hall of Mirrors. To believe some commentary in countries from Europe to Asia to the Middle East, the world's wealthy superpower has, in Katrina's wake, been exposed as a vulnerable supermonster.

In this view from abroad, the USA is a place that is callous toward its poor and black. A Pakistani newspaper wrote, for example, of how the U.S. government "for three days sat smugly apathetic to the people's plight."

It's a place where the early looting reflects a culture of violence and selfishness: "The darker side of the American dream" was how a columnist for London's Daily Mail put it.

And it's a place where a focus on the Iraq war has starved it of resources to deal with natural disasters — a favorite topic in the Arab media.

The comments, which contain both distortions and grains of truth, are a jolting reminder that the U.S. image in the world has been in a tailspin since the start of the Iraq war — fueled by anger and frustration over the go-it-alone U.S. approach that has too often disregarded others' opinions or interests.

And yet Hurricane Katrina also presents a fleeting moment of opportunity to start repairing that image. Generous international offers of aid have accompanied the criticism. The United Nations is offering its emergency response system, including disaster relief teams, equipment and expertise. As many as 90 nations have deluged the State Department with offers.

A few come tinged with political agendas or are cynical public relations ploys: Iran, for example, wants to send oil — just so long as sanctions are first lifted to allow it. Cuba wants to send doctors.

But most of the offers spring from a reflexive generosity, including much reciprocity for past U.S. help. One of the largest donation pledges, of half a billion dollars, is from Kuwait — liberated from Iraqi occupation by U.S.-led troops 14 years ago. Even small Sri Lanka, badly hit by last year's tsunami and a recipient of U.S. aid, has promised a $25,000 donation to the American Red Cross.

The manner in which the United States accepts or rejects the offers of help has the potential to influence the soured global mood. International relations are, when all's said and done, much like everyday human relationships. Psychology plays a large role. Right now, it's as if the whole neighborhood is reaching out in a time of trouble, despite having felt slighted by what many see as the rich bully on the block.

For months, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has made changing the international mood a priority. That has been hard, particularly as other nations have been reluctant to help in Iraq. Graciously accepting most offers can telegraph a newfound humility and appreciation of the value of international cooperation.

Not that doing so is easy.

Receiving help can be embarrassing and goes against the American character of self sufficiency. Americans see themselves as aid donors, not recipients, and appropriately so given the nation's wealth. No one should take from others in greater need. So far, U.S. officials seem to be playing it just about right.

Rice has profusely thanked other countries for their compassion. And not only is the United States accepting much of the international generosity, it is making specific requests. Germany, for example, can supply forklifts, veterinary supplies and ready-to-eat meals. That is in part just good common sense. For all its resources, the United States can't match the U.N. or others in some aspects of disaster relief. The U.N. has long experience dealing with traumatized children and is sending pre-made playgrounds, much as it did to tsunami victims.

Accepting Hurricane Katrina aid with grace can't magically make the United States popular, particularly when it comes to sworn U.S. enemies. Some in the Muslim world, for example, are portraying Katrina as God's wrath, as are some thoughtless Christian leaders here.

But it can be a start on rebuilding alliances.

DOJ_NMG_0003608

Four years ago this weekend, after the Sept. 11 attacks on New York and Washington, the world had a very different reaction to the U.S. distress. Besides offers of help, the world was united with Americans. As a headline in France's Le Monde newspaper trumpeted: "We Are All Americans."

Recalling that more pure generosity — of spirit and practical help — is heartening. It's a reminder that, not so long ago, the world saw the United States much as it likes to think of itself: as a generous-spirited, socially-responsible beacon of democracy. Regaining that cleareyed international admiration is an ideal. The international response to Hurricane Katrina provides an opening.

Bush: Aministration Looking To Help Schools Absorb Kids Displaced By Katrina (AP)

AP, September 7, 2005

President Bush says the administration is looking at ways to help schools absorb students displaced by Hurricane Katrina.During a meeting with Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, the president said local school districts are extending "extaordinary efforts" right now to help kids learn.Bush said he's sending his wife Laura to DeSoto County, Mississippi, tomorrow to talk to school officials about their problems.At the same time, Bush promised that Washington is ready to show flexibility when it comes to college loans. He says Katrina has forced many college students to change plans, and the Education Department will show what he calls "loan forebearance."

Across Nation, Storm Victims Crowd Schools (NYT)

By Sam Dillon

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

School districts from Maine to Washington State were enrolling thousands of students from New Orleans and other devastated Gulf Coast districts yesterday in what experts said could become the largest student resettlement in the nation's history.

Schools welcoming the displaced students must not only provide classrooms, teachers and textbooks, but under the terms of President Bush's education law must also almost immediately begin to raise their scholastic achievement unless some provisions of that law are waived.

Historians said that those twin challenges surpassed anything that public education had experienced since its creation after the Civil War, including disasters that devastated whole school districts, like the San Francisco earthquake and the Chicago fire.

"In terms of school systems absorbing kids whose lives and homes have been shattered, what we're going to watch over the next weeks is unprecedented in American education," said Jeffrey Mirel, a professor of history and education at the University of Michigan.

The vast resettlement was already under way last week, with schools in Baton Rouge, La., Houston and other cities near the Gulf Coast enrolling some students. Yesterday, officials in cities including San Antonio; Phoenix; Olympia, Wash.; Freeport, Me.; Memphis; Washington; Las Vegas; Salt Lake City; Chicago; Detroit; and Philadelphia reported enrolling students or preparing for their arrival.

The total number of displaced students is not yet known, but it appears to be well above 200,000. In Louisiana, 135,000 public school students and 52,000 private school students have been displaced from Orleans, Jefferson, St. Bernard and Plaquemines Parishes.

President Bush, speaking with reporters at the White House yesterday, thanked the nation's educators "for reaching out and doing their duty," and he said that Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings was working on a plan to help states absorb the educational costs but gave no hint of what kind of assistance might be provided. The Department of Education set up a Web site to coordinate private donations to schools enrolling displaced students.

"They said we could brace for about 500 kids," said Sue Steele, coordinator of homeless student programs for the public schools in Wichita, where buses carrying 1,800 storm victims were expected to arrive yesterday, part of some 7,000 headed for Kansas.

Many students were concentrated in districts along an arc from the Florida Panhandle west through Georgia, Tennessee, Arkansas and Texas.

The Santa Rosa County School District in the Florida Panhandle has enrolled 137 students, said Carol Calfee, a district official.

"And we still have folks coming in," she said. "They're walking through the door and some of them just have nothing, so it's really hard." The local United Way has said it will try to buy school supplies for every displaced student, she said.

The crisis poses new challenges for Ms. Spellings, including financial. The Department of Education's budget this year for homeless student programs is about $61 million, which she said was insufficient.

DOJ_NMG_0003609

Ms. Spellings, who has spent her first months in office fighting a backlash by local educators and state lawmakers against the federal law known as No Child Left Behind, is also hearing calls from advocacy groups that she take emergency measures that could be controversial.

The National Education Association, the nation's largest teachers union, asked her on Friday to waive the accountability provisions of the law for schools in the hurricane's path as well as in Texas and other states receiving large numbers of students, a move Ms. Spellings said she was reluctant to take.

Private companies that operate online courses or charter schools are urging her to use emergency powers to authorize them to enroll displaced students at the Houston Astrodome and other shelters across the nation.

Ms. Spellings has invited 40 education groups, including the P.T.A. and teachers unions, to meet at the Department of Education today to discuss disaster recovery efforts. Reg Weaver, president of the N.E.A., which has challenged No Child Left Behind in federal court, said he immediately accepted the invitation.

But in a separate letter, he also asked Ms. Spellings to use her powers to waive provisions of the law, which requires school districts to raise student scores on standardized tests each year by a percentage set by each state, a goal known as making adequate yearly progress.

"Until these children, their teachers, districts and families gain their footing under these extremely difficult circumstances, I encourage you to implement the provisions in N.C.L.B. that deal with the impact of natural disasters on testing and adequate yearly progress," Mr. Weaver's letter said.

Ms. Spellings is consulting with state school superintendents as she considers whether to waive the law's accountability provisions in some cases, said her spokeswoman, Susan Aspey. One consideration is how many displaced students that individual schools or districts enroll; those with higher concentrations may be more likely to receive waivers, Ms. Aspey said.

"There is no one-size-fits-all approach," she said.

Even before the storm, hundreds of schools that had failed to meet the federal law's proficiency requirements for several years, most of which educate the urban poor or non-English speaking immigrants, were facing sanctions that include school closings and the firing of staff. Thousands of others were expected to be placed on academic probation or labeled as low-performing.

Theodore R. Sizer, a visiting professor of history at Harvard, said that unless the law's accountability provisions were waived during the emergency, they would add tensions to the resettlement crisis.

"Imagine you're the principal of a big high school in city X, and your scores are above the state minimums, so you're doing fine with the law, and suddenly you have 300 displaced kids," Mr. Sizer said. "That not only brings crowding but also means that on the next exams your scores could plummet and the federal law will say you run a terrible school."

The Bush administration must also make decisions about another hotly debated issue in public education: charter schools. The National Council of Education Providers, which represents the nation's largest commercial school management companies, has asked the Department of Education to authorize it to enroll students housed at emergency shelters in Internet-based courses offered by its companies.

The National Council's Web site yesterday highlighted its request to the department to establish a "national virtual charter school" that would "serve evacuees wherever they are."

"Once students have access to computers and connectivity - borrowed, donated or shared - companies are standing by to waive state restrictions and log these students on," the Web site said. The restrictions in question include enrollment caps in state laws that apply to charter schools. The National Council wants the federal government to waive those laws during the emergency.

Jeanne Allen, a paid consultant to the National Council who is also president of the Center for Education Reform, a nonprofit organization, said she delivered a draft "Emergency Public Charter School Act" to members of Congress yesterday.

Hard Lessons For Kids Starting Class Far From Home (AP)

By TODD LEWAN

AP, September 7, 2005

HOUSTON — On their first day in class after the Labor Day weekend, second-graders of Briarmeadow Charter School were excitedly playing "Subtraction Wars" with toy blocks in their math class.

Not Jameall Gatlin. The 8-year-old boy had a donated new blue polo shirt, new khaki shorts, new Nike sneakers. But he was quiet and shy, understandably so: He's a long way from his home in devastated New Orleans.

"It's very different," he mumbled, shoving his hands in his pockets, when asked what he thought of his new school.

Here, as in towns and cities around the country that have taken in Hurricane Katrina's dispossessed, refugee students are getting a tough crash course in adjustment.

DOJ_NMG_0003610

Katrina forced an unprecedented displacement of students from the Gulf Coast, just as schools across America are starting the academic year. From Maine to California, districts have begun hastily enrolling these students, even embracing them — with a smile, a hug or a welcome sign drawn in art class.

The influx is putting a logistical and financial strain on schools at a time when many are grappling with budget and program cuts, soaring gas prices, and the pressure of satisfying the No Child Left Behind Act, which requires yearly progress in math and reading among all students.

Classroom space, textbooks, transportation and teachers for new students — how much it will cost? No one can say. Still, says Paul Houston, executive director of the American Association of School Administrators, "I think districts will keep taking the students and figure it all out later."

Even before Katrina, Texas, which has absorbed nearly a quarter-million refugees, was already having problems funding its growing, public school system. In 2003, about 300 school districts sued the state, claiming that not enough money was going to schools.

This year, in response to the lawsuit, Gov. Rich Perry convened three emergency sessions of the Texas Legislature to resolve the money problem. Still, lawmakers failed to come up with a new plan.

Regardless of such challenges, schools are welcoming displaced kids.

By yesterday afternoon, the Houston Independent School District had taken in 889 students, a number expected to grow by 5,000 or more in the coming days, said spokesman Terry Abbott. The district is hiring retired teachers and certified instructors from Louisiana, and getting breaks on textbooks from publishers, he said.

Teachers and administrators are also trying to make "Katrina kids" and their parents feel at home.

"The first thing we do is give them a hug and say, 'How can we help you,'" says Lynn Barnes, the principal at Briarmeadow, which had enrolled at least 22 refugee students. When Briarmeadow runs out of room, "we will contact other schools."

River Oaks Elementary has been preparing since last week for the flood of Katrina evacuees. One art class got a special assignment: to make a poster that read, "Welcome, Louisiana children."

Some New Orleans students were resettling in Louisiana itself. Schools sent employees to shelters and churches in Baton Rouge to give beleaguered parents tips on where to find school supplies, clothes, food and donated, day-to-day spending money.

The Bernard Terrace Elementary School signed up two dozen refugee students for classes on Tuesday, and Principal Deborah Daniels said the school, now with 480 students, would "take however many they want me to."

The uprooted students miss their homes, their friends — their stuff. "They say they want to go back and get this and that," said Trellis Royal, as she waited to register her 10- and 14-year-old daughters at a Baton Rouge school.

Katrina Forces Children To Start School Again In Georgia (AP)

By Greg Bluestein

AP, September 7, 2005

ATLANTA - Fifth-grader Layanda Grinstead looked like she was having fun playing badminton with her sister Leslea in the halls of a Red Cross shelter, but secretly, she said, she's eager to hit the books.

"I'm not nervous at all. I'm ready to get back," she said.

Her mom, Latanya, is too. "I'm so ready for them to go to school," she said. "They have the attitude that it's a new start even though it's hard losing everything."

Hundreds of students who fled from Hurricane Katrina will take their seats at schools across the state this week as state officials struggle to direct a smooth transition.

Some 350 evacuees have already enrolled in Georgia public schools - a number that's expected to increase significantly this week. And dozens more are expected to enroll in the state's lottery-funded pre-kindergarten program, which announced today it would open its doors to storm victims.

Although education officials are uncertain how the influx will strain schools throughout the state, the priority now is to "put them in a classroom and we'll work out the details later," said spokesman Dana Tofig.

The state board of education will also likely relax rules that limit class sizes. "The systems don't want to worry that they're being penalized to open their doors," Tofig said.

At the state's largest shelter, Georgia Tech's Alexander Memorial Coliseum, an Atlanta Public Schools liaison was helping direct students to a van early Tuesday that dropped them off at nearby schools.

Some children, like second-grader Bobby Whittey, aren't quite ready to get back to the daily grind. While at the shelter, Whittey said he's gotten used to "playing and sleeping" since his family escaped New Orleans.

His grandmother, Velma Whittey, had other ideas.

DOJ_NMG_0003611

"He's got to go back to school," she said. "He's got so much energy sometimes I got to pray to the Lord so I can get some peace to deal with this little boy."

Student Displaced By Hurricane Instant 'Rock Star' At Local School (MINNST)

By Dan Wascoe

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 7, 2005

Two weeks ago, before Katrina turned New Orleans into a deadly, fetid lake, Johnathan Smith, 18, began his senior year in nearby Metairie, La.

On Tuesday, uprooted by the hurricane from his mother, brother, sister, school and city, he began classes again, this time at Minneapolis' Southwest High. He said he is grateful for the chance to make a fast transition by moving in with his father, Crosby Smith. But he's also itching for the chance to enlist in the National Guard.

As he made new friends, grabbed a quick lunch at a nearby Dairy Queen and stood still for media attention, he was quick to note differences between his old school and his new one.

Archbishop Rummel in Metairie is a private, Catholic, all-boys, nearly all-white school of about 1,330 students in grades 8 to 12. All of them wear blue, short-sleeved, button-down shirts and khaki-colored pants.

Southwest has a coed, racially diverse enrollment of more than 1,600 in grades 9 to 12 and tolerates a greater range of apparel. Smith sported a small earring Tuesday that he said would not have been allowed at Rummel. He would have worn a cross instead.

In these ways, he acknowledged, his new start is almost a liberation -- although he admitted that attending an all-boys school reduced the distraction of what he called "social drama."

The drama quotient was definitely higher Tuesday at Southwest. As word spread of the New Orleans emigre's arrival, Johnathan was treated "like a rock star," said Josh Collins, a Minneapolis schools spokesman.

He accepted greetings and condolences from staff and students who learned of his predicament. One parent asked whether he played football. No, but he did play rugby and served on Rummel's Student Council.

A loquacious student who often calls adults "Sir" and "Ma'am," Smith started his day with Southwest Counselor Jean Sherwood. She spent about 50 minutes helping him enroll in physics, pre-calculus, psychology, Advanced Placement English and economics/government classes. He has one period free, which could help him search for a job. He'll have no 1½-hour religion course as he did at Rummel, but his lunch break at Southwest is a half-hour rather than the hour and a half he was used to.

By day's end, he said Southwest "is interesting once you learn your way around."

After his brushes with media earlier in the day, he sat quietly in his government class during a discussion of current events in New Orleans. He finished an English homework assignment in class but otherwise said the first day's coursework centered on orientation.

Studying Minnesota

Crosby Smith said his son adapts well to changing situations and was a natural candidate to make do in Minneapolis after Crosby's ex-wife and their other children left their home two days before Katrina struck.

"We're very lucky," he said. "We had options that other families didn't have."

Within days of arriving in Minneapolis after a long drive with his father from Memphis, Johnathan used the Internet to meet other Southwest students. He also visited the Minnesota State Fair, where he sampled cheese curds and described the lambs and pigs as "neat." But he couldn't understand how a Minnesota audience at the fair could resist dancing to a band playing Cajun music.

Except for one or two people, he said, "They just sat there."

Even so, he said he was impressed by the willingness of Minnesotans to help people displaced by the hurricane.

Back in Louisiana, he said, his mother, Peggy, and 13-year-old brother, Philip, were staying with relatives in New Roads, north of Baton Rouge. Their house near a Jefferson Parish levee may soon be used by doctors and staff at a nearby hospital. The storm tore siding from the house and broke tree limbs but did not flood the property. His sister Christine, 19, hopes to resume her sophomore year soon at Louisiana State University.

Crosby Smith said that during his son's drive from Louisiana to rendezvous with him in Memphis, Johnathan nearly ran out of gas. But a computer search by a friend in Minneapolis located a well-supplied service station 25 miles out of the way.

Although not sure how long he'll stay in Minneapolis with his father -- a semester seems likely -- he intends to enlist soon in the National Guard, either in Minnesota or Louisiana.

"I was kind of ticked last year," he said, because his folks wouldn't let him sign up at age 17. If that had happened, he said, "I could have been with the Guard now helping out down there."

DOJ_NMG_0003612

Texas Expecting Up To 60,000 New Students (DMN)

By Herb Booth

The Dallas Morning News, September 7, 2005

More than 6,100 students fleeing Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath have enrolled in Texas public schools so far – including about 2,000 in North Texas – and state education officials promise to release money immediately to help affected districts cope.

Officials expect 50,000 to 60,000 new students to enroll in Texas schools.

And the federal government is doing its part, sending $250,000 apiece to six Texas regional education service centers, including Dallas' Region 10.

Dallas Independent School District spokesman Donald Claxton said it's still too early to tell how many students displaced by the killer hurricane would enroll.

"We had 255 kids report for classes today," Mr. Claxton said Tuesday. "But we expect that number to rise. There were a number of parents who held on to their kids today to see what FEMA assistance they might get to rebuild."

Normally, it takes a year for districts to begin receiving money for students on its rolls. But Mr. Claxton said DISD has begun to receive funds for its new pupils.

"We started collecting average daily attendance money on these students right away," Mr. Claxton said. "For us, it's not an immediate impact. It's still too early to see how it will affect the classroom."

Suzanne Marchman, spokeswoman for the Texas Education Agency, said the entity urged districts to maintain records for Title 1 and FEMA reimbursement detailing how much money is spent on evacuee students.

But the state is contributing funding as well.

"If more than 50 students enroll in a district or a smaller district is impacted, the district should contact our financial office to begin receiving additional funding as soon as possible," Ms. Marchman said. "We anticipate hearing from Dallas, Houston, San Antonio and others soon. We want to create some normalcy for these kids as soon as possible."

Some educators wondered about where these new students might be in their education.

John Rose, principal at Irving's Crockett Middle School, said there are no records to tell administrators how the students did on tests or in certain subjects.

Waiting to enroll

Some parents had mixed feelings on when to send their children to school, and many opted to wait.

"We're really trying to find housing before we get them into school," said Rosalind Armour, a New Orleans resident who took shelter at Reunion Arena and has two school-age children. "The goal is to get settled first."

But Willie Williams wasn't having any delay in his child's education. On Friday, he anticipated starting her in school as soon as possible.

"I didn't want her to miss any school," Mr. Williams said of his daughter Brittany, 9.

About 140 displaced students had joined the Frisco school system by yesterday afternoon, according to Shana McKay-Wortham, the district's communications director.

With the majority of them staying at the homes of family and friends, it's difficult for officials to tell how long many of them will remain in the district.

"When they're enrolling, we're figuring they are going to be with us for a while," Ms. McKay-Wortham said.

DeSoto has enrolled about 170 Hurricane Katrina evacuees. "The community has been amazing with the outreach," Superintendent Alton Frailey said. "We're providing vouchers for uniforms. There are funds for school supplies. So many people have made donations. The feeling I get is that for a number of these people, the move might be permanent. They appreciate the reception they've gotten in DeSoto."

Relocating for good?

So much so, that some of them will make the Dallas area their permanent home.

Sharon Price, DeSoto school district's assistant superintendent for administration and operations, said many of the parents are picking up job applications as they enroll their children.

"They've applied for all types of jobs, from clerical to professional to construction to secretarial," Ms. Price said.

But it isn't just parents and students who are coming to North Texas for the long haul. Some Louisiana teachers are coming here, too.

One, Clifford Hawkins, has relocated for good from the New Orleans area and has landed a job at Arlington's South Davis Elementary School as a fifth-grade teacher.

DOJ_NMG_0003613

"We got out in time. So did all our family," said Mr. Hawkins, who has taught for more than 26 years. "I'm not going back. I might go just to visit, but this is my home now. A visit might do more harm than good"

Like thousands of others who fled New Orleans, Mr. Hawkins said his home and Parkview Academy, a New Orleans elementary school, sat in areas of town that were inundated with water and severe storm damage.

Mr. Hawkins, 50, said that his son lives in Arlington and that the school district impressed him whenever he visited.

Veronica Sopher, Arlington school district spokeswoman, said Mr. Hawkins showed up with a suitcase, a laptop and a memory stick. She said district officials were able to verify Mr. Hawkins' teaching certification and are glad to get him.

"He had the foresight to know life wasn't going to be what it was for a while," Ms. Sopher said.

Local Schools Open Doors For Displaced (WT)

By Gary Emerlingand Arlo Wagner

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

The first day of school in Northern Virginia yesterday symbolized the start of a new life for some children whose homes were destroyed by Hurricane Katrina, as area officials opened their doors to many displaced students from the Gulf Coast.

On the day after Labor Day, most public schools opened in Alexandria, and in Arlington, Fairfax and Prince William counties.

So far, 11 children from devastated parts of the Gulf Coast have registered to attend school in Arlington County.

"There's concern for the families in the Gulf Coast and we want to provide some stability in the lives of those students," said Robert Smith, Arlington County schools superintendent. "I suspect in most of these cases we're dealing with family members taking in these children."

Public schools in Maryland and Virginia are enrolling Katrina victims under the federal McKinney-Vento Act, which provides for the enrollment of homeless students without immediately obtaining birth records or requiring the children to receive necessary immunizations.

About 25 displaced students have enrolled to attend school in Prince George's County. Officials have been told to waive tuition and provide school supplies to students in need during the expedited enrollment process.

Montgomery County has enrolled eight displaced students, and Alexandria has enrolled three. School officials in Anne Arundel and Fairfax counties said they did not have a count of how many displaced students had been enrolled in their respective school systems.

D.C. officials also did not know how many hurricane victims were enrolled, but said staff members were registering students arriving from the Gulf Coast at Shaw Junior High School in Northwest and at the D.C. Armory.

Patricia Williams, a D.C. school official, said students in need will receive free immunizations, school meals and school supplies.

"The most important thing is the superintendent wants these families and these children to know they are absolutely welcome in the District of Columbia public schools," she said. "We are going to do everything we can to make sure their transition is as smooth as possible because they've already been through enough."

Catholic schools within the Archdiocese of Washington have enrolled 31 students from the Gulf Coast.

Within minutes after the newly built South County Secondary School in Lorton opened its doors, its 2,500 students were asked to donate toiletries, clothing, baby items, bedding and canned food for Katrina victims.

School counselor Marci Norem said two tractor-trailers loaded with 4,620 gallons of water and 20,000 meals ready to eat from a local business was expected to arrive at the school today to pick up donated items and take them to Biloxi, Miss.

By yesterday afternoon, the school lobby was filled with so many goods that Miss Norem was searching for more boxes.

Principal Dale Rumberger called the service project "a teachable moment."

"You're never too busy to give," he said.

Fairfax County Schools Superintendent Jack D. Dale, who toured the new 410,000 square-foot school yesterday, said the school system has expedited registration for those displaced by Katrina and will hire more teachers if necessary.

"I know we have kids throughout the county from different parts of the Katrina disaster. We're just saying all kids are welcome," said Mr. Dale, who heads up Virginia's largest public school system of about 165,000 students.

South County was built on 73 acres across a field from the former Lorton Prison. Its enrollment will mostly alleviate Hayfield Secondary School near Fort Belvoir, Mr. Dale said.

Top Pentagon Brass Defend Response Time (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003614

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon's top officials said Tuesday that the military responded quickly to Hurricane Katrina, although it took nearly four days for troops to begin delivering large amounts of food and water to storm victims.

"Not only was there no delay, I think we anticipated in most cases — not in all cases, but in most cases — the support that was required," Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said at a Pentagon news conference.

Storm victims in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama complained bitterly that the military didn't start large-scale delivery of provisions until Friday. Some military helicopters began search-and-rescue operations Aug. 30.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said he had appointed Navy Adm. Edmund Giambastiani to study the military's response to Hurricane Katrina to determine whether any mistakes were made. Giambastiani, a close Rumsfeld ally, is vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The commander of the first large Navy ship to participate in relief efforts said last week that she was notified the night of Aug. 28 — the day before the storm hit — that her vessel might be needed to provide relief. But she wasn't told to do so until late Aug. 30, the day flooding started in New Orleans, she said.

"I've got sailors I could send to the beach, but I can't force myself on people," Capt. Nora Tyson said Friday in an interview on the bridge of her ship, the USS Bataan.

Myers said military officials worked from the afternoon of Aug. 30 through the morning of Aug. 31 to assess the situation in New Orleans and decide what to do.

Myers and Rumsfeld said the military had planned its hurricane response but was caught off guard by the flooding. Experts, including those from the Army Corps of Engineers, have predicted for years that a hurricane as large as Katrina could cause widespread flooding in New Orleans.

Katrina, Iraq Aid Efforts Hit Same Hurdles (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Military officials surveying the slow federal response to Hurricane Katrina say the problems that hindered early relief efforts along the Gulf Coast are eerily similar to those that have dogged relief and reconstruction efforts in Iraq.

The crises spotlight the inability of disparate departments within the government to plan together before a catastrophe and work quickly together once one hits.

"Clearly we didn't get a coordinated governmental response in the case of Katrina," said Michele Flournoy, a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, or CSIS, a nonpartisan think tank in Washington, which studied the U.S. response in Iraq. "The same thing happened in Iraq. The mechanisms to integrate efforts across the government were just lacking."

Some senior Pentagon officials, however, dispute that analysis. Rather than lack of coordination, they blame the magnitude of the disaster, which wiped out state and local emergency-response efforts. "The federal response is designed so assistance flows through the state and local government," said Peter Verga, the principal deputy assistant secretary of defense for Homeland Defense. "In this case not only did we have to backfill [state and local forces], we had to fill their front ranks as well because the breadth of the disaster overwhelmed the first responders, making them victims as well."

The failure of federal agencies to work together in a coordinated fashion has been a major issue since the Iraq war. In Iraq, the Pentagon and the State Department developed separate plans for reconstructing the war-torn country, without significant input from each other. The State Department plans for postwar Iraq eventually were shelved. The Pentagon even told top officials not to attend meetings tied to the State Department's postwar Iraq effort.

As a result there was poor coordination between the military campaign to topple Saddam Hussein and the postwar efforts to deal with the ensuing chaos. As looters tore through the country -- something expected by State Department planners, based on experiences in Haiti and the Balkans -- senior military officials on the ground largely were caught off guard.

Similarly, many months before Hurricane Katrina, senior military officers within the Pentagon's Northern Command -- formed shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to oversee the military contribution to homeland defense and disaster relief -- complained that they often were hindered from planning and working alongside other key government agencies such as the Department of Homeland Security. The commander of the Pentagon's Northern Command reports directly to Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld.

Retired Gen. Ralph Eberhart, who was the senior officer in Northern Command until late last year, frequently complained that he had to get approval from the Office of the Secretary of Defense before he or his senior staff could work together with the Department of Homeland Security, said military officials who worked with the general. In some cases, Northern Command was able to work around the bureaucratic barriers, senior military officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0003615

"Ultimately, everything that Northern Command wanted to do with Homeland Security had to go through the Pentagon and be approved by the Office of the Secretary of Defense. It was a huge issue," said retired Marine Col. T.X. Hammes, a professor at the Pentagon's National Defense University who also commanded the Marine Corps' Chemical Biological Incident Response Force. "Every time you add a layer of staff you slow down the response."

A senior Pentagon official confirmed that there were limits on interaction between the Northern Command and Department of Homeland Security. But he says those applied only to policy-level discussions regarding how the Pentagon would support civil authorities, like state and local police, the defense official said. And he said the limits applied only to the most senior officials. He said the Pentagon encouraged the Northern Command and Department of Homeland Security staffs to conduct joint exercises and planning.

Northern Command didn't respond to calls seeking comment for this article. Secretary Rumsfeld Tuesday defended the Pentagon's response, saying that some troops and helicopters began to prepare for rescue and relief missions before the storm hit. "As the storm was approaching the Department of Defense met and discussed the importance of anticipating things that the department could be asked and ... actually prepositioning things before [the hurricane] ever hit," Mr. Rumsfeld told reporters.

On Aug. 30, shortly after the magnitude of the crisis in New Orleans became clear, Gen. Richard B. Myers, the military's top officer, said he told the four-star generals in charge of the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marine Corps to work directly with Northern Command to speed troops, ships and helicopters to the Gulf Coast. The order cut through at least two layers of bureaucracy, such as requirements that the Department of Homeland Security formally request forces and that Mr. Rumsfeld's office and the Joint Chiefs of Staff approve them.

"I think we anticipated the support required and were pushing support before it was requested," Gen. Myers told reporters at the Pentagon.

Still the predisaster barriers limited how much planning Northern Command could do with Homeland Security, some military officials said. One senior Army official said "the same problem" that hindered reconstruction efforts in postwar Iraq arose with the response to Katrina. "It is the interagency problem," he said. "How do you rapidly integrate all the powers of the U.S. government."

About a year ago Gen. Eberhart pitched a solution to senior Pentagon officials, some of his former staffers said. He pushed to create a permanent task force that would include people from Northern Command, the Pentagon, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the Justice Department, the Coast Guard and the Federal Aviation Administration. The members of the task force would plan and train together and during a crisis would form the core of a headquarters to oversee the relief effort. The task force would be headed by a civilian who would oversee all relief efforts if and when there were a terrorist attack or a natural disaster.

Many in the Pentagon thought it a good idea, said one senior military official involved in developing the concept. But other crises -- such as the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan -- took precedence and the idea was put on the back burner, this military official said.

At about the same time, a team from CSIS had begun briefing senior U.S. officials on their solution to some of the planning problems that plagued Iraq. Although the team focused on overseas efforts and not domestic ones, it came up with a similar solution. The team called for the U.S. to build rapidly deployable teams of representatives from the Defense, State, Commerce and Justice departments. All told, the task forces would total about 100 people who "know how to mobilize the assets of their department quickly," said Ms. Flournoy, who was one of the authors of the CSIS study.

The CSIS study got a warm response from the Pentagon and, in particular, from Gen. Peter Pace, who is set to become the next chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The Pentagon is exploring how to build such task forces for wars overseas.

Navy Pilots Who Rescued Victims Are Reprimanded (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

PENSACOLA, Fla., Sept. 6 - Two Navy helicopter pilots and their crews returned from New Orleans on Aug. 30 expecting to be greeted as lifesavers after ferrying more than 100 hurricane victims to safety.

Instead, their superiors chided the pilots, Lt. David Shand and Lt. Matt Udkow, at a meeting the next morning for rescuing civilians when their assignment that day had been to deliver food and water to military installations along the Gulf Coast.

"I felt it was a great day because we resupplied the people we needed to and we rescued people, too," Lieutenant Udkow said. But the air operations commander at Pensacola Naval Air Station "reminded us that the logistical mission needed to be our area of focus."

The episode illustrates how the rescue effort in the days immediately after Hurricane Katrina had to compete with the military's other, more mundane logistical needs.

DOJ_NMG_0003616

Only in recent days, after the federal response to the disaster has come to be seen as inadequate, have large numbers of troops and dozens of helicopters, trucks and other equipment been poured into to the effort. Early on, the military rescue operations were smaller, often depending on the initiative of individuals like Lieutenants Shand and Udkow.

The two lieutenants were each piloting a Navy H-3 helicopter - a type often used in rescue operations as well as transport and other missions - on that Tuesday afternoon, delivering emergency food, water and other supplies to Stennis Space Center, a federal facility near the Mississippi coast. The storm had cut off electricity and water to the center, and the two helicopters were supposed to drop their loads and return to Pensacola, their home base, said Cmdr. Michael Holdener, Pensacola's air operations chief.

"Their orders were to go and deliver water and parts and to come back," Commander Holdener said.

But as the two helicopters were heading back home, the crews picked up a radio transmission from the Coast Guard saying helicopters were needed near the University of New Orleans to help with rescue efforts, the two pilots said.

Out of range for direct radio communication with Pensacola, more than 100 miles to the east, the pilots said, they decided to respond and turned their helicopters around, diverting from their mission without getting permission from their home base. Within minutes, they were over New Orleans.

"We're not technically a search-and-rescue unit, but we're trained to do search and rescue," said Lieutenant Shand, a 17-year Navy veteran.

Flying over Biloxi and Gulfport and other areas of Mississippi, they could see rescue personnel on the ground, Lieutenant Udkow said, but he noticed that there were few rescue units around the flooded city of New Orleans, on the ground or in the air. "It was shocking," he said.

Seeing people on the roofs of houses waving to him, Lieutenant Udkow headed in their direction. Hovering over power lines, his crew dropped a basket to pick up two residents at a time. He took them to Lakefront Airport, where local emergency medical teams had established a makeshift medical center.

Meanwhile, Lieutenant Shand landed his helicopter on the roof of an apartment building, where more than a dozen people were marooned. Women and children were loaded first aboard the helicopter and ferried to the airport, he said.

Returning to pick up the rest, the crew learned that two blind residents had not been able to climb up through the attic to the roof and were still in the building. Two crew members entered the darkened building to find the men, and led them to the roof and into the helicopter, Lieutenant Shand said.

Recalling the rescues in an interview, he became so emotional that he had to stop and compose himself. At one point, he said, he executed a tricky landing at a highway overpass, where more than 35 people were marooned.

Lieutenant Udkow said that he saw few other rescue helicopters in New Orleans that day. The toughest part, he said, was seeing so many people imploring him to pick them up and having to leave some.

"I would be looking at a family of two on one roof and maybe a family of six on another roof, and I would have to make a decision who to rescue," he said. "It wasn't easy."

While refueling at a Coast Guard landing pad in early evening, Lieutenant Udkow said, he called Pensacola and received permission to continue rescues that evening. According to the pilots and other military officials, they rescued 110 people.

The next morning, though, the two crews were called to a meeting with Commander Holdener, who said he told them that while helping civilians was laudable, the lengthy rescue effort was an unacceptable diversion from their main mission of delivering supplies. With only two helicopters available at Pensacola to deliver supplies, the base did not have enough to allow pilots to go on prolonged search and rescue operations.

"We all want to be the guys who rescue people," Commander Holdener said. "But they were told we have other missions we have to do right now and that is not the priority."

The order to halt civilian relief efforts angered some helicopter crews. Lieutenant Udkow, who associates say was especially vocal about voicing his disagreement to superiors, was taken out of the squadron's flying rotation temporarily and assigned to oversee a temporary kennel established at Pensacola to hold pets of service members evacuated from the hurricane-damaged areas, two members of the unit said. Lieutenant Udkow denied that he had complained and said he did not view the kennel assignment as punishment.

Dozens of military aircraft are now conducting search and rescue missions over the affected areas. But privately some members of the Pensacola unit say the base's two available transport helicopters should have been allowed to do more to help civilian victims in the days after the storm hit, when large numbers of military helicopters had not reached the affected areas.

In protest, some members of the unit have stopped wearing a search and rescue patch on their sleeves that reads, "So Others May Live."

IRS Offers Relief To Katrina Victims (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

As evidence mounts of Hurricane Katrina's devastation, the federal government has greatly expanded the number of areas eligible for special tax relief and is taking other steps designed to ease pressures on taxpayers in the storm-ravaged region.

Areas eligible for relief include 64 Louisiana parishes, 52 Mississippi counties and six Alabama counties, the Internal Revenue Service said. Also on the list are three Florida counties: Broward, Miami-Dade and Monroe. Early last week, the IRS initially singled out only 31 Louisiana parishes, 15 Mississippi counties and three Alabama counties.

That means many more people now are eligible for a special tax break that applies when the president declares a place a federal disaster area. They can choose to deduct their disaster losses for 2005 on their tax returns for 2005, to be filed next year -- or on their returns for 2004. (If you've already filed for 2004, as most people have, just file an amended return on Form 1040X.) Ordinarily, taxpayers can deduct casualty losses only for the year in which they actually occur.

IRS officials also have suspended many compliance activities, such as liens, levies and seizures, for those affected by Katrina. This general suspension will last for at least 60 days, the IRS said.

Officials are extending filing deadlines and abating interest payments and penalties. For example, they have extended the Sept. 15 due date for paying estimated taxes until Oct. 31. For the hardest-hit areas, the IRS "anticipates extending these deadlines even further in the near future."

The IRS also set up a special toll-free disaster hotline (866-562-5227). Those affected by the disaster who need copies of tax returns to apply for aid or some other purpose can have the usual user fee waived, the IRS said. Write "Hurricane Katrina" in red across the top margin of Form 4506, which you use to ask for a copy of a tax return.

Separately, the IRS, citing shortages of clear diesel fuel caused by Katrina, said it won't impose a tax penalty when so-called dyed diesel fuel is sold for use or used on the highway. The IRS said this special relief applied beginning Aug. 25 in Florida, Aug. 30 in Alabama, Louisiana and Mississippi, and Aug. 31 in the rest of the nation. It will remain in effect through Sept. 15. (According to the IRS, dyed diesel fuel usually isn't taxed because it's typically sold for uses exempt from excise tax, such as to farmers and to local governments for buses.)

Yesterday, the IRS promised "an expedited review and approval process" for new groups seeking tax-exempt status in order to provide relief for storm victims. New organizations should apply by filing Form 1023. Write at the top "Disaster Relief, Hurricane Katrina."

For more details on this and other recent IRS moves related to Katrina, go to the IRS Web site (www.irs.gov) and click on the box that says "Helping Hurricane Katrina Victims."

The choice of whether to deduct casualty losses on your return for 2004 or 2005 can be tricky. Many people will be better off by claiming their losses on their returns for 2004 because it will mean an earlier infusion of cash. But others will want to wait to claim their losses on their returns for 2005.

For example, you can't deduct any losses unless you itemize your deductions. If you itemize, you must first reduce your casualty losses by $100 for each event. Then you have to reduce your total casualty losses for the year by 10% of adjusted gross income.

H&R Block Inc. says it's offering Katrina victims free preparation and filing of amended 2004 returns that claim weather- and theft-related losses resulting from the storm. Liberty Tax Service also is offering free services to victims.

Taxpayers facing extraordinary hardships who can't get satisfaction through normal IRS channels should consider contacting representatives of the IRS Taxpayer Advocate Service (877-777-4778). This IRS unit, headed by National Taxpayer Advocate Nina Olson, is designed to help taxpayers untangle problems with the IRS. Ms. Olson also recommends legislative changes to Congress designed to fix problems in tax administration.

* * *

BEWARE of con artists asking for donations for Katrina victims.

When disaster strikes, scamsters often lurk close behind. For example, watch out for phony charities, warns JJ MacNab, a financial planner in Bethesda, Md.

"Stick with big-name charities -- and, if you have any questions, verify that it's a real charity" by checking sources such as GuideStar (www.guidestar.org), Ms. MacNab says. GuideStar offers access to a vast database on nonprofit organizations.

Other sources include BBB Wise Giving Alliance (www.give.org), FEMA (www.fema.gov), the IRS (www.irs.gov) and the Federal Trade Commission (www.ftc.gov), which offers a guide to "giving wisely." For example, donors should be wary of charities with names that sound like other nationally known groups. Ask for identification when a solicitor approaches you in person. Don't provide personal or financial information, such as your Social Security number. Don't give or send cash. And try to verify whatever you're being told.

DOJ_NMG_0003618

If you aren't sure if a charity is qualified to receive tax-deductible gifts, start by checking out the IRS site. Clicking on "Helping Hurricane Katrina Victims" should lead you to a page with information about charitable giving, including a search feature for the IRS's huge list of qualified charities. (The IRS says it doesn't endorse charities.) But some organizations, such as churches and governments, "may be qualified even though they're not listed," the IRS says. Thus, donors may need to do additional research on the Web, such as search for news articles.

Also see IRS Publication 3833, which can help people who want to make gifts or form a new charity.

* * *

A PRESIDENTIAL PANEL on overhauling the tax system meets tomorrow.

President Bush's advisory panel on federal tax reform, headed by former U.S. Sen. Connie Mack, is scheduled to meet in Washington tomorrow morning at the Marriott Wardman Park Hotel. The panel (taxreformpanel.gov) has set another meeting for Sept. 15.

The panel's report is due by Sept. 30.

* * *

BRIEFS: Indiana plans a tax amnesty starting Sept. 15 and running through Nov. 15. The state calls it a "limited-time opportunity" for individuals and businesses to pay and file taxes free of penalty, interest and collection fees, and without fear or prosecution.... Many other states have offered various forms of amnesty in recent decades.

Storm Giving Outpaces That Of 9/11, Tsunami (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, September 7, 2005

Private fundraising for Hurricane Katrina victims — from bake sales, to carwashes, to football games — has topped a half billion dollars and is outpacing U.S. donations for tsunami relief.

The American Red Cross has raised more than $409 million, abetted by corporations, Texas businessman T. Boone Pickens as well as schoolchildren emptying their penny jars. Half of the total has arrived online.

“It's going gangbusters,” says Devorah Goldburg, the group's spokeswoman. She says the amount is more than double what was raised in a similar time period after southern Asia's disaster in December.

The intensity is expected to continue as schools hold fundraisers, former presidents Bill Clinton and George H.W. Bush plead for donations and entertainers host a TV benefit concert, “Shelter From the Storm,” Friday.

Next month, talk radio host Rush Limbaugh will appear on a show on Broadway to raise money for hurricane relief.

Today more than 40 different education groups meet with Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to brainstorm ways schools can both help displaced students and teach the value of good citizenship.

The Salvation Army, which raised $20 million after the tsunami, has already pulled in at least $51 million for Katrina victims.

“People are responding at a record pace,” says Major George Hood, national community relations secretary. He notes the tsunami, however, occurred right after the Christmas season, and many people had already contributed to the charity.

Hood says fundraising for Katrina is occurring faster than after 9/11, when the Salvation Army raised $90 million for victims over an extended period. Many online donations have come from abroad, including the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia and Europe.

Catholic Charities received 20,000 online donations in the past two days, spokeswoman Shelley Borysiewicz says. She says it usually gets 6,000 such donations in a year. The group has raised more than $5 million, most of it online. She says the total doesn't include special collections taken in churches.

Nationwide, the young and the old have mobilized disaster relief. In Omaha, kids distributed fundraising leaflets at soccer tournaments and high school girls held a carwash. In DeSoto, Kan., Mill Valley High School students plan to collect bottled water at a football game Friday. Ohio State University is sponsoring a “September to Remember” effort in which the athletic department will donate $2 from programs sold at home games.

In Parma, Ind., Mayor Dean DePiero asked residents to donate goods — bottled water, over-the-counter medicines, clothes, diapers, toilet paper — to help 7,000 evacuees being bused to Marksville, La. He says volunteers quickly filled two semi trucks.

“It's been overwhelming,” he says. At one point, he had to ask residents to hold off so that the donations could be boxed. A third truck is on the way. Among the donations: dolls given by little girls.

In Katrina's Wake, Generosity (USAT)

By Marco R. Della Cava

USA Today, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003619

SAN ANTONIO — If this nation has a hallmark, forged in communal hardship, it is this: In the face of inexplicable sorrow, we give.

Money. Time. Materials. Love. Whatever it takes.

And so it is with Hurricane Katrina. But while bake sales and food collections have sprung up in countless towns, some cities are giving more. Much more. Partly because they're asked to, by both city officials and fate. But mostly because they want to. Such is the case with Texas' historic Alamo City, where nearly 12,000 of Katrina's dazed evacuees have turned up in recent days.

In response, citizens have pulled all-nighters volunteering in shelter kitchens, offered rooms to elderly survivors and left their own young ones to tend to the babies of strangers.

It might be 98 degrees in the shade here, but folks are out and about, organizing toy drives downtown, lemonade sales in tony suburbs and barbecues in poor districts. Put simply, the exceptional has become the norm, a baseline for tireless displays of charity.

The catastrophe in New Orleans has many assigning blame. Some say American leaders failed. But the American people have not.

“I watched on TV, and I just thought of myself and my little children, that it could have been us running,” says Jill Fitch, explaining how she came to be bouncing another woman's infant on her knee at a child-care center inside KellyUSA, a former military facility that is housing the bulk of the evacuees.

“I feel I'm my brother's and my sister's keeper. It's really as simple as that.” The baby squawks. Fitch brushes away a tear. “I feel almost bad for what I have.”

An emotion-fueled sentiment. But being in the presence of the truly destitute will do that. Just look straight down in this cavernous cot-filled space: Most feet are shod only in socks and flip-flops. Everywhere you go in this makeshift mini-city, flip flop, flip flop.

New shoes are said to be on the way. In the meantime, the halls of KellyUSA bustle like a New York city block. Kids play with a new puzzle, two mothers load up on diapers, and a trio of men tune into a baseball game on a donated TV. Over here someone's getting a haircut, down there a grandfather is pushed about in an office chair, the only wheelchairs around. And this being a First World calamity, the air trills with sounds of cellphones.

Sometimes you even see smiles. Flooding, mayhem and rage have been replaced by air conditioning, regular meals and naked gratitude.

“If it wasn't for the care of the persons here in San Antonio, I don't know what would have become of me. It's been an emotionally overwhelming experience,” says Bernadine Holbert, whose escape from her ruined home has become routine in its hellishness.

Waiting in water. Bodies floating past. A boat ride to a field followed by a night under a highway overpass. Finally, evacuation.

“There are people whose bodies will never be identified, there are babies …” Her voice trails off as she turns away for a moment. “Although this has begun, it also will end. You just have to let go of what you think you've lost. I am very grateful to be alive.”

The what-next question, however, can't be avoided. In fact, volunteers with mental health expertise say that as the evacuees get over the shock of their ordeal, a natural anger begins to set in.

“Most of these people have no clue what happens now, and we frankly can't give them many answers,” says Ramona Leonards, a child counselor who took off work to help the Red Cross here. “Sure, most people are grateful for the food and shelter. But others feel that's too little.”

Leonards says the best approach is to solve problems one at a time. In Holbert's case, Leonards is helping her get a transfer to Dallas, where she hopes to lean on her employer, the Army Corps of Engineers, to find work.

Indeed, few evacuees talk about returning to New Orleans. Bruce Gaten, a jazz trumpeter who lost all three of his horns to the waters, says he'll go to Houston.

“It's music, right? I'll just play it there,” he says, lying on a green Army-issue cot as he stares at the ceiling. “I tell you, lots of people say they won't go back, and I think it's because they finally got out of town for the first time.”

Fernell Augustine had never been to San Antonio, but he likes what he sees. And his chances for staying just improved. An impromptu Labor Day visit by Texas Gov. Rick Perry turned into a chance chat between the two. After the governor and his entourage left, Augustine explained that he had asked for help getting his wife and seven children transferred here from another Texas shelter.

DOJ_NMG_0003620

“I am tired of the murder in New Orleans, and I want something better for my family,” he says, adding that he battled both looters and snakes while escaping the Big Easy. “This town has shown us love. I am a cook and a handyman. I will do anything. I just want a chance.”

If the altruism on display here means anything, it is that Augustine could get that chance.

Consider that when calls went out on radio stations asking for donations, lines nearly 100 cars long stretched back from the massive Salvation Army warehouse on the west side of town.

“This is so insanely wonderful,” says Denise Curran, who along with her husband, Scott, spent nearly 33 hours helping sort donations, which ranged from the eclectic (Hawaiian shirts on hangers) to the indispensable (cartons of baby formula). “Everyone's coming out, blacks, whites, Hispanics. I am very proud of this town.”

Consider that when Sibyl and Don White, both 79, finally made it out of New Orleans to stay with their son and daughter-in-law here, they immediately went to shop for new clothes and had an unforgettable experience.

When a young man in the store heard they had survived the calamity, he handed them $5 and said he wished he could do more. The Whites, who are financially secure and white, were overwhelmed by their African-American benefactor, who they say was of modest means. “We gave the bill back to him with a hug,” says Sibyl. “I will never forget that.”

Consider that when the owner of local Pizza Hut stores was asked if he'd sell a huge order at a discounted price to help feed those pouring off planes and buses, he simply gave 320 pies away.

“I mean, you see the plight these people are in, leaving their homes with nothing but the clothes on their backs. Something had to be done,” says Jack Richmond, who owns 31 stores throughout the city and county. “I figured a nice slice of pizza might help start their stay here right.”

Consider that when neighbors from an elegant northern suburb noticed their children trying to process the scenes on their television, they didn't have to wait long before the kids themselves asked to set up a lemonade stand to benefit evacuees.

“It was wonderful to see these kids get a huge lesson in humility and compassion all on their own,” says Tom Heffron, whose kids (Cody, 11, Kyle, 10, and Connor, 7) joined the Jones kids (Scottie, 11, Emily, 10, Johnnie, 6) on a blazing hot street near their gated community. The older ones had spent the morning hauling boxes of donations at the Salvation Army depot. “You want them to understand that the way they live isn't the way others live, says the elder Heffron. “I sense they get that right now.”

Consider that when one of the city's leading Jewish citizens heard about an 86-year-old woman who had arrived at KellyUSA disoriented, he immediately opened his home to her.

“This woman spent four days in her New Orleans home alone, with little food or water,” says M.H. Levine, director of the Jewish Family and Children's Service, which also has collected mountains of food, clothing and toys for evacuees. “We found she had a son in Houston, who is about to come pick her up. But she did tell me the other night that she likes it here so much, maybe she'll stay. How about that?”

But how would that work? So far, the indicators are promising.

This city of 1.1 million — nearly split between whites and Hispanics, with 6% African-Americans — has a falling unemployment rate of just under 5%, and will soon boast a new Toyota factory.

As for housing, the latest Census reports that 7% of the city's half-million housing units are vacant, and real estate agents and apartment managers are quickly updating local officials on their inventory.

“Folks we see (at KellyUSA) who were in public housing in New Orleans can get vouchers for public housing here quickly,” says Melanie Villalobos of the San Antonio Housing Authority. “So far, we're finding that people are taking whatever is available and worrying about the rest later. They want to get back on their feet.”

For some, regaining dignity and self-sufficiency is as simple as being given a few dollars and taken to a local store to spend it themselves. “It's just a way of taking back some control, which they've lost so much of in these past days,” says volunteer social worker Leonards, who has organized such trips.

For others, it means finding their way to relatives here who can promise them unlimited shelter until it is time to see what remains of their old lives. Pharmacist Famous Washington, who along with his wife, Lisa, grew up in New Orleans, is sheltering 16 of his distraught relatives who have made their way to his expansive suburban home.

“Most of my relatives were insured, so we hope eventually they'll get something back. But for now, we just wait,” says Washington, whose guests, ages 9 months to 77 years, are Lisa's extended family. The younger ones already have been accepted at local public schools, which have gone out of their way to make room for Katrina kids.

Although the Washington house was filled with the smell of blackened chicken and baked beans over the holiday weekend, festive smiles were wanting. Lisa's sister-in-law lost both her aunt and uncle when, after days of medical neglect, they died on a crowded highway overpass. “It was a general evacuation, right?” Lisa says with a quiet rage. “I don't understand why buses weren't sent for everyone.”

Says Famous: “This tragedy has brought out the bad and the good.”

DOJ_NMG_0003621

Around here, it's the good that is shining through, a welcome respite from the death, lawlessness and neglect that have punctuated these past 10 days.

The kind of good that radiates from Tiffany Collins, a parks and recreation secretary who, in volunteering at KellyUSA, befriended single mom Shantrice Wyatt and her children, Latrice, 6, and Gregory, 3.

On a recent afternoon, Collins thought it was time for Wyatt to catch a break from parent duty and for the kids to get away from the shelter's fluorescent lights. So she whisked the kids over to her modest house on the working-class side of town.

There she filled up a little plastic pool and smiled as two innocents who had escaped New Orleans played with her two children, Ayanna, 2, and Nate, 5. “They've been through an ordeal,” she says. “I figured maybe this would cheer them up.”

Back at KellyUSA, Wyatt is the one who is smiling.

“I have lost everything, like a lot of folks, but ever since I got here, people have been good to me,” she says. “I was a janitor back home. Maybe I can find that work here. All I know is, it's time for a fresh start. A new beginning. This could be a nice place to do that.”

A Mission Of Mercy To Houston (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

HOUSTON, Sept. 6 -- "Need a home?" the flier asked.

The Rev. William Finch, pastor of St. Raphael's Catholic Church in Rockville, arrived here Tuesday ready to sell Montgomery County as a haven for 50 hurricane evacuees living in the Astrodome.

He's printed 100 fliers outlining the package that he and his parishioners have assembled for those who get on his bus for Maryland: $500 in cash, unlimited use of cell phones, access to schools, help finding jobs. And they will live in some of the nicest homes in Rockville and Potomac for as long as it takes to reestablish themselves.

An ambitious and generous plan. But getting his congregation's 3,300 families, many of them well-to-do, to donate more than $100,000 was the easy part. As he prepared to board a flight for Houston on Tuesday, he realized that his busload of good intentions could go for naught.

"I'm scared to death," the 51-year-old District native said.

Since deciding to go after watching television coverage of Katrina's catastrophic aftermath last week, Finch has contacted the Red Cross and Texas officials for help identifying evacuees. He said he has not been able to reach anyone who can help.

Others who want to assist have been rebuffed. When the D.C. government sent 10 buses to New Orleans to pick up storm victims Friday, people reportedly refused to leave.

With no contacts, Finch's game plan is pretty simple. He plans to go to the Astrodome on Wednesday, walk around and ask people if they want to live in Maryland.

What if nobody wants to come? What if he can't even get into the Astrodome?

If that happens, Finch said, he will donate the money to Catholic Charities, which has taken an active role in helping the hurricane victims.

"At least we tried," he said. "Our people wanted to do something other than write checks."

Despite the uncertainty, Finch persuaded others to travel here with him. On Monday, he called Jeffrey Dunckel, a Bethesda parishioner who works for the Montgomery County Department of Public Works and Transportation. Dunckel called his supervisor and requested the week off, then got a seat on Finch's plane.

"He gave a very inspired call to action," Dunckel said.

Luisa Duarte, the Hispanic coordinator at St. Raphael's, didn't need much convincing. She left Cuba 43 years ago without her parents. "I know what it's like not knowing what's going to happen next," she said.

Since announcing his plan to parishioners during Mass over Labor Day weekend, help has emerged from all directions.

Robert Ivany, president of the University of St. Thomas in Houston, agreed to house Finch and his crew for a couple of nights. The Marriott Corp., which had offices in Bethesda and employs several of his parishioners, donated 30 free hotel rooms at a Fairfield Inn in Knoxville, Tenn., where they plan to spend Thursday night during their 22-hour drive back.

Once they get back to Maryland, Finch's staff will match evacuees to the 34 parishioners who have offered their homes. Pediatricians, dentists and counselors will offer their services.

Once the evacuees have settled into their new homes, Finch said, he will help them find jobs. Dunckel said Montgomery County will train any evacuees over age 21 as Ride On bus drivers. There are currently 25 vacancies, he said.

Regular potluck dinners will keep the evacuees together, Finch said. Parishioners are willing to house them, possibly for a year or longer.

"This is a long-term project," he said. "We will carefully watch over them and guard them."

DOJ_NMG_0003622

New Orleans Bus Convoy Returning Mostly Empty (WP)

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

A convoy of buses that set out Friday to rescue New Orleans evacuees is scheduled to return this morning largely empty-handed, but city officials say the effort was not in vain.

A caravan of 10 motor coaches, staffed with medical crews, social service workers and police officers, departed Friday in hopes of bringing 400 evacuees to the District and sheltering them at the D.C. Armory. By the time they made it to New Orleans, though, crowds at the convention center and Superdome had been evacuated, city officials said. The caravan tried other areas, but crowds had been cleared or evacuees declined a free trip to the capital.

The District's convoy carried 19 social service workers, two mental health workers, three emergency management employees, two doctors and one physician assistant from Georgetown University and 28 police officers, said Jo'Ellen Countee, a spokeswoman for the D.C. Emergency Management Agency.

As the buses returned, Countee said, the only evacuees on board were one or two college students who needed to get to Washington.

Council member David A. Catania (I-At Large) said the mission was a success. The convoy delivered food, water, fuel, diapers and medical aid and equipment to evacuees and emergency responders.

The District received about 200 evacuees yesterday, flown in from New Orleans International Airport.

US Economy Takes Big Hit (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, September 7, 2005

As devastating storms go, hurricane Katrina has packed an unusually big punch to the United States economy.

Though the full impact of the Aug. 29 superstorm is still being assessed, the economic brunt differs in at least three major ways from a typical recovery led by armies of insurance adjusters bearing clipboards and checkbooks.

· A region's major city has been entirely displaced, throwing hundreds of thousands of people out of work and casting doubt on the financial future of New Orleans itself.

· The movement of goods through America's heartland has been disrupted, with key ports still closed and the channel of the Mississippi narrowed by the storm.

· Oil and gas drilling platforms, refineries, and pipelines are damaged, and some will take months to bring back on line.

The result is a barrage of challenges likely to affect everything from the US unemployment rate to winter heating costs for months to come. The typical forecast now is for slowing growth rather than outright recession.

With unprecedented prices at gasoline pumps and an unprecedented humanitarian crisis fast rippling outward, the deeper worry is that Katrina's aftereffects could erode consumer confidence.

"That's what we're very concerned about," says Robert Dye of Economy.com. "This is really an unprecedented event."

American consumers have consistently surprised economists in recent years with their buoyancy amid rising debts and difficult job markets. That could happen again, but evidence was mounting even before Katrina that consumer confidence may be weakening in the face of high gasoline prices. The red-hot housing market shows signs of cooling, for example, as "for sale" signs stay up longer in some cities and demand for home mortgages shrinks.

"Consumers are unlikely to be able to rely on their homes for a ready source of cash," as they have in the recent past, concludes Gina Martin, an analyst with Wachovia, a bank based in Charlotte, N.C. This, coupled with "out of gas" signs at service stations, could prompt a pullback in consumer spending, but not a sustained decline, she predicts.

The prevailing view now is that Katrina will curb the nation's economic growth - which has been running at an annualized rate of more than 3 percent - by perhaps 0.5 percent in the second half of 2005. Then, the economy could get a Katrina stimulus, as rebuilding gets under way in earnest early in the new year.

Still, for now, the storm's shock remains significant and unpredictable, given the magnitude of job losses and the damage to industrial infrastructure.

In the Gulf region, where the effects are concentrated, the human impact begins with a death toll expected to be in the thousands. Countless survivors in one of the nation's poorest regions now face a future with uncertain job prospects and no earthly belongings. Insurance payouts, which eventually may reach $25 billion by some forecasts, will cover only part of the storm's damage.

"In our preliminary analysis, employment levels will not be back to pre- hurricane levels for another six to seven years" in New Orleans, says Mr. Dye.

DOJ_NMG_0003623

The city, ranked ninth lowest in the US in median income, faces a twin challenge: Its labor force is now almost totally absent, and the city was already struggling economically before Katrina.

To be sure, many residents will return, eager to revive the cacophony of jazz and jambalaya. But it's also safe to assume that a number of businesses will never reopen - or will relocate for good, Dye says.

The now-displaced labor force, too, "will want to start working as soon as possible," he says, even if it's in Memphis rather than Metairie.

A silver lining, for these workers, is that the national job market has been improving in recent months. Still, their migration onto jobless rolls could yield somber national job reports for several months, predicts economist Nariman Behravesh of Global Insight in Lexington, Mass.

Ripples from Katrina have hit far inland as well, as a disruption of shipping impedes the flow of goods up and down one of the world's most important rivers. Some 60 percent of US grain exports flow down the Mississippi, while imports, from steel to tropical fruits, travel upstream.

The Port of New Orleans, usually one of the nation's busiest, has been scrambling to restore electricity, putting out an urgent call Monday for diesel fuel to run generators. The Mississippi is now open to ships with a draft of 35 feet or less during daylight hours, but it is unclear how soon full-scale traffic will resume.

"It's a major disruption and it's going to continue for a while," says Jerry McReynolds, president of the Kansas Association of Wheat Growers.

Growers in his state, already coping with a six-year drought, now face falling prices for their product, because of the uncertainty about how to ship it to foreign customers. At the same time, Mr. McReynolds says, "Our fuel costs have skyrocketed."

Indeed, it is via energy costs that Katrina reaches into the pocketbook of every American.

Foreign governments have moved to open international reserves, to ease the burden of slowed US oil production. That has helped stabilize crude oil prices below $70 a barrel for now.

From pipelines to refineries, much of Louisiana's energy infrastructure appears to be coming back quickly. But four refineries - representing 5 percent of US capacity - could be off-line for weeks or longer, so the price of gasoline, jet fuel, and other refined products may spike higher than crude-oil prices suggest.

"You don't burn a barrel of oil," says John Tobin of the Energy Literacy Project. "You burn the products that it makes."

Even at $70, the price of oil reflects a new dynamic of tight supply worldwide. Supplies, as a sum of commercial stocks, strategic reserves, and excess capacity, "are going to be at their lowest levels in history by next week," says A.F. Alhajji, an oil expert at Ohio Northern University in Ada.

The ability to transport oil and natural gas from offshore rigs is also impaired.

"Prices are going up," Dr. Alhajji says. "Or at least they will stay high."

Long-Term Impact Depends On Consumers (WP)

By Margaret Webb Pressler And Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

The long-term economic impact of Hurricane Katrina will hinge in large part on how U.S. consumers react to the disaster and resulting surge in gas prices. Will they fall into the camp represented by Lisa Kays of the District or Heather Rories of Burke?

Kays, who works in international development, said the hurricane has forced big changes in her spending plans.

"It reinforced to me the need to save, to have cash," Kays said while sitting in a sandwich shop near Dupont Circle. "We've been thinking about buying a car, but after this, I'm like, no, it's not worth it."

Likewise, one of Kays's lunch companions said she and her boyfriend had planned to drive to New York over the weekend but settled on a day trip to Annapolis instead.

But a little farther down Connecticut Avenue, Rories, a librarian for a downtown law firm, said rising gas prices have had no impact on her spending or travel plans. She and her family drove to Charlotte over the holiday weekend, she said, and "every time we stopped, the gas prices had gone up."

"I just felt fortunate we could afford it," Rories said.

Consumer spending on food, clothing, services and big-ticket items accounts or about 70 percent of U.S. economic output. So much is riding on the extent to which Americans change their spending in response to high gas prices.

The surge in gasoline prices in the week ending on Labor Day was virtually unprecedented -- the retail price rose 45 cents, to a nationwide average of about $3.057 a gallon (with prices in the Washington area about 20 cents above that). In inflation-adjusted terms, that's the highest since 1981.

DOJ_NMG_0003624

"Of course, we don't know whether the price is going to stay at $3," said Nigel Gault, U.S. economist at Global Insight Inc., a forecasting and research firm. "But the longer prices stay at this level, the harder it is to believe that consumers will just carry on doing what they were doing."

Even before Katrina laid waste to the central Gulf Coast, gas prices were dampening consumption, according to a survey in early May for the National Retail Federation. People with low incomes are those most likely to economize when gas prices rise. That is one reason Wal-Mart Stores Inc. reduced its earnings forecast for the third quarter.

Americans are hardly about to abandon their free-spending ways. Craig Johnson, president of Customer Growth Partners, a retail consultancy in New York, issued a study yesterday showing that after disasters, U.S. consumers tend to be "resilient."

Citing evidence from Hurricane Andrew in 1992; the Northridge, Calif., earthquake in 1994; the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks; and the four hurricanes in Florida last year, Johnson said, "Although the months of the event may briefly stun retail momentum, consumer spending tends to snap back sharply." On average, the firm's data show, retail spending (excluding autos and food service) was nearly 6 percent higher than the year before by the first Christmas after the event.

Katrina, however, knocked out a substantial portion of the nation's petroleum infrastructure, especially refineries that produce gasoline, when gas supplies were already stretched thin. "The larger worry may not be Katrina itself," Johnson said, "but if energy prices were to continue their sharp climb."

Since the price of gas has risen about 70 cents a gallon since early August, keeping it at that level for a year would mean motorists would have to pour an additional $84 billion into gas pumps -- equal to almost 1 percent of their incomes. "So it's not trivial," Gault of Global Insight said.

What people choose to pass up will also affect the severity of the economic impact. Larry Osborne of Forestville said that it costs him $70 to fill up his Cadillac Deville, up from about $35 not long ago, and that as a result he is eating out less. "It's impacted food and entertainment, mostly," he said.

Some economists say that continued strong sales of luxury goods will help offset cutbacks consumers are making on other retail products. But they wonder how long those pockets of strength can hold out as the storm's effects widen.

The storm's impact will come in phases, said Michael P. Niemira, chief economist for the International Council of Shopping Centers. "We haven't really seen the impact from the home heating oil and natural gas use that will kick in in the wintertime."

Storm's Economic Impact Is Felt Around Globe (WSJ)

By Patrick Barta, Marcus Walker and Jon E. Hilsenrath

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

The economic waves from Hurricane Katrina are being felt not just in the U.S., but around the globe, particularly in countries such as Indonesia and Italy that already were straining from soaring oil costs before the storm disrupted energy supplies.

In Australia, economists blame Katrina for a roughly 15-cent-a-gallon increase at the pumps. Germany saw gasoline prices jump by about the same amount, and a car drivers' association accused gasoline companies of gouging customers in the hurricane's aftermath. In Asia, government subsidies widely used to shield consumers from high oil prices, which already were costly before the storm, are pressuring government finances and boosting the odds of a slowdown in consumer spending.

Few economists expect the global economy to grind to a halt because of the storm alone. Just as the U.S. has become more resilient to energy shocks in the past two decades, so have many of its trading partners.

But given the U.S. role as the world's economic locomotive, the likely slowing of growth and employment here in the months ahead is likely to restrain growth elsewhere.

"Katrina has made it less likely that there will be [an energy] price fallback and more likely that there will be a price increase," says Michael Mussa, an economist with the Institute of International Economics. "It has made a growth slowdown that was already in the cards probably a little bit steeper and more likely."

In April, Mr. Mussa projected growth in the global economy would slow to an annual rate of just under 4% in 2005 and 2006 from around 5% in 2004. He is sticking to his 2005 projection, but now says growth next year is likely to be a little more than 3%. Morgan Stanley is paring its world growth forecast to 3.7% in 2006 from its earlier 4.1%, primarily because of the accumulated impact of higher energy prices over the past few months.

Though oil prices have returned to pre-Katrina levels, the retreat has come only after a drawdown of emergency reserves in the U.S., Europe and Asia. The shutdown of refineries in the U.S. is putting strain on global gasoline prices, pushing up consumer costs everywhere there are drivers. Many U.S. trading partners depend on U.S. consumers to gobble up their exports of cars, sneakers, appliances and other products. With U.S. households tested by a combination of low savings and rising costs at the pump, the ripple effects of a consumer slowdown in the U.S., if any, will be widespread.

DOJ_NMG_0003625

"Should the overextended American consumer falter under the weight of the energy shock -- a distinct possibility, in my view -- China would be on the leading edge," said Stephen Roach, the chief global economist at Morgan Stanley and a well-known "bear" on the economy. "Asian vulnerabilities cannot be minimized."

Even before Katrina, growth had slowed sharply in Thailand. At the Siam Square Mall, a giant complex of shops and restaurants popular among Thai teenagers, stores are reporting weaker sales. Maitong Sonakum, who manages a shoes and handbags shop called Lovely Shoes, said sales have dropped by half since oil prices started rising. The store hung a sign promising discounts of 50% to 80%, "but we still don't have as many customers as before," she said.

China, too, has been grappling with unexpected problems. Because of government rules that force refineries to cap the price they charge consumers for refined products, many Chinese refineries are opting to sell their products abroad where they can get higher prices. That has resulted in gasoline shortages and forced some users to ration fuel or delay travel, which in turn could slow economic growth.

In Indonesia, Southeast Asia's largest economy, worries over fuel subsidies helped push the local currency, the rupiah, to its lowest level in four years last week, forcing officials to raise interest rates and pledge politically explosive fuel-price boosts in the months ahead. On Friday, credit rating agency Standard & Poor's downgraded the outlook on Indonesia's single-B-plus rating to "stable" from "positive."

In India, state oil companies reported a cumulative $280 million loss in the last quarter to pay for oil subsidies, according to UBS. India has raised gasoline prices about 7% in an attempt to ease the burden, but some analysts said it wasn't enough to dispel the worries. India's minister for petroleum and natural gas recently predicted revenue losses due to subsidies at oil companies such as Indian Oil Corp., Bharat Petroleum Corp. and Hindustan Petroleum Corp., could hit about $9 billion in the fiscal year ending March 31.

The effects on America's closest trading partners, Mexico and Canada, are more mixed, because both are net exporters of energy.

But Europe has its own problems. In Italy, truckers who deliver new cars to dealerships recently walked off their jobs for an entire month to protest higher diesel prices. The strike blocked the delivery of 140,000 new cars and forced Fiat Auto SpA to temporarily shutter all of its Italian factories when it ran out of space to store cars that couldn't be delivered.

Energy-related woes have continued to pile up in recent days. Yesterday Belgian industrial foam maker Recticel SA blamed the higher price of raw materials influenced by the oil market for the company's 35% drop in operating profit during the first half of this year.

Rising energy costs currently are adding about one percentage point to consumer inflation in the euro zone, which is eroding the purchasing power of slow-growing personal incomes in the 12 countries that share the euro. Higher energy prices are making it harder for the European Central Bank to cut interest rates to stimulate the euro-zone economy, despite political pressure from national governments to do so.

With consumer spending forecast to remain weak, Germany's meager economic growth is expected to reach little over 1% this year, leaving it heavily dependent on rising exports -- and therefore consumer demand in the U.S.

OECD Tells Banks To Relax Over Rates (FT)

By Chris Giles

Financial Times, September 7, 2005

The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development on Tuesday urged the world's central banks to adopt a relaxed attitude to interest rates in the wake of surging oil prices and Hurricane Katrina.

Describing the $20-a-barrel rise in oil prices since May as a big economic shock, Jean-Philippe Cotis, the OECD's chief economist, said the ability of economies to shake off its effects would depend on their underlying momentum. The US and Japan were better placed than the eurozone or the UK, he said.

The OECD said the economic effects of Katrina “cannot yet be gauged with any confidence”, although Mr Cotis quoted independent economists who are tending to estimate that it will have a temporary effect, reducing US economic output by 0.25-0.5 per cent in the second half of 2005.

The OECD delivered recommendations to each of the four most important central banks, some of which will not be received gratefully.

Mr Cotis said he thought the underlying strength of the US economy left it well placed but the rise in oil prices without any corresponding pick-up in core inflation meant monetary policy tightening could be slowed.

“The Federal Reserve should continue to move back towards neutrality, although possibly at a more measured pace thanhitherto,” Mr Cotis said.

DOJ_NMG_0003626

Worried that the Bank of Japan might move away from its zero interest rates, the OECD warned that it should maintain its extremely easy monetary policy for “as long as underlying inflation is not durably positive”.

He also advised the Bank of England to set lower interest rates than would have been the case before the oil price rises.

Steel Prices Could Rise Further As Flooding Stalls Key Materials (WSJ)

By Paul Glader

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

The price of steel used to make cars and industrial equipment is expected to rise by as much as 20% in coming months because New Orleans flooding has limited the supply and distribution of raw materials such as liquid hydrogen and scrap steel.

The increase would be in addition to roughly 20% price increases by steelmakers including Pittsburgh-based U.S. Steel Corp. and Nucor Corp., of Charlotte, N.C., that became effective on Sept. 1 for shipments of key products like hot-rolled coil.

Liquid hydrogen is needed to make higher-quality steels such as galvanized or cold-rolled coils, which are used in products from auto panels to garage doors. Scrap steel is used to make new steel.

As buyers begin stockpiling to avoid higher prices and shortages, prices could escalate by as much as $80 a ton on such products, according to some analysts, although others forecast a more modest increase. Currently, hot-rolled coil, which is used to make cold-rolled coil, costs about $500 a ton. Concrete reinforcing bar, used in construction, also is expected to rise.

"To the extent that supply becomes somewhat impacted, there could be further increases in steel prices in general as a result of Katrina. But the magnitude of those prices is yet to unfold," says Mark Parr, a steel analyst at KeyBanc Capital Markets in Cleveland.

Steel-company shares are already seeing a boost. Nucor's shares were at $57.65 on the New York Stock Exchange in 4 p.m. composite trading yesterday, up nearly 11%, from $52 a share when Hurricane Katrina first hit the Gulf Coast. U.S. Steel's share price was $43.77 a share in 4 p.m. trading, up about 9% over the same period.

Analysts suggest some larger auto makers may begin looking to ship extra supplies of steel from abroad. Dave Elshoff, a Detroit-based spokesman for DaimlerChrysler AG, says his company is monitoring the situation, but "as of this time, all our suppliers have found alternate sources" of hydrogen.

Steel prices soared last year amid strong global demand. Prices have eased as China's growing steel production contributed to a glut. But in recent months, steelmakers have said they expected price increases as the glut has diminished.

Air Products & Chemicals Inc., a major U.S. producer of hydrogen, says it can't deliver liquid hydrogen to customers because of damage to its plant in New Orleans. The Allentown, Pa., company is uncertain when it can restart production.

Steelmaker Steel Dynamics Inc., of Fort Wayne, Ind., told customers Friday it is suspending future orders of value-added products such as cold-rolled, galvanized and painted sheet-steel products because Air Products was its main hydrogen supplier. U.S. Steel, Nucor and Netherlands-based Mittal Steel Co. said they have alternate supplies of hydrogen and don't expect the shortage to affect them greatly.

Surviving Katrina's Huge Damage Claims (WP)

By Albert B. Crenshaw

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

Hurricane Katrina seems likely to become the most expensive natural catastrophe in U.S. history, but unless insured damages go far higher than the current high-endestimate of $35 billion, the insurance industry should be able to pay the claims without threat to its own solvency, industry experts said yesterday.

Because of the nature of the storm and the type of damage inflicted, private insurers will probably bear only a fraction of the total losses suffered in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama -- estimated at more than $100 billion by Risk Management Solutions Inc., a California firm that does computer modeling of damages from catastrophes.

But taxpayers, insurance ratepayers and others are likely to be feeling the economic effect of the giant storm for years to come, they acknowledged.

And some risk experts are starting to raise the question of how -- or if -- houses or other buildings in low-lying areas such as New Orleans should be rebuilt.

"There is a lot of variability" in loss estimates so far, said Robert P. Hartwig, chief economist at the Insurance Information Institute, an industry group, adding that insurers are expecting more than 1 million claims. Adjusters are already at work in some areas, though not yet in New Orleans.

But "the industry approached the '05 hurricane season in a position of financial strength," following eight months of very strong earnings, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0003627

Insurers "were able to bear the $23 billion [in losses] from last year's four storms" in Florida with no significant insolvencies, and "that situation will remain the same this year," Hartwig said.

The $100 billion loss figure includes damages covered by private insurers, those covered by the federal government's National Flood Insurance Program and those not covered by any kind of insurance, often because the owners couldn't afford coverage or because they self-insured. Many municipalities self-insure with roads, bridges and other infrastructure, on the ground they can simply fix anything that goes wrong.

Laurie Johnson of RMS said the company is analyzing satellite images to try to determine how much of the flooding coincided with the coverage area. "When we know much of that flood exposure" was actually flooded, she said, "we will see the loss."

But ultimately the numbers suggest that $60 billion to $70 billion in property losses from Katrina will have to be absorbed by taxpayers, through government programs and repairs, and by owners of homes and businesses.

The storm will push insurance rates up for some consumers. "It always does, because in the end, who else is there to pay the bill except ultimately the consumer?" said Tom Upton, a financial services analyst with Standard & Poor's in New York. But the Insurance Information Institute's Hartwig said the impact should be confined to hurricane-prone areas. "It does put upward pressure on rates as to higher risk areas," he said. "That's been the case in Florida. But those effects are isolated to the states likely to be impacted."

A key reason is that rates, at least for personal insurance, are regulated by states, and state officials aren't likely to allow a company to raise rates because of risks elsewhere. Regulators in Minnesota wouldn't approve a company's request to raise rates there because of what happened in, say, Florida, Hartwig said.

However, several experts said Katrina will increase companies' and regulators' awareness of the risk involved in coastal areas.

It could be the largest "housing reconstruction project this country has ever known," involving tens of thousands of units, said RMS's Johnson.

But if that is done, how much protection should new units be given?

"Challenge number one is the decision, not 'do we repair the levees to the preexisting level' but 'what is the design scenario we want them built to,' " Johnson said. Noting that there are 350 miles of levees around Lake Ponchartrain and New Orleans, she said "the cost of bringing that up to a design" that could protect the city from a Category 4 or 5 storm "has to be explored, and a benefit-cost analysis has to be done."

"That will really define the rest of the reconstruction project," Johnson said. "The second major decision that follows," she said, is whether there are "certain parts of the city we are not going to rebuild," where it may make sense to buy out those properties and relocate the people.

There is precedent for such action, though on a much smaller scale. Twice in the 1990s following floods in the Midwest, small communities were partly or totally bought out by federal and state agencies and the residents relocated to higher ground.

But in coastal resort areas, the years following severe hurricanes have also brought into sharp relief the continuing conflict that pits developers and their customers who want to live close to the shore against insurers who don't want to underwrite such risks, at least not at a price the developers and homebuyers find acceptable.

Unwilling to either cut off development or drive out insurers, politicians in Florida and some East Coast states have increasingly allowed insurers to add wind or hail deductibles to their policies. These deductibles, rather than flat dollar amounts, are a percentage of the home's value, such as 5 percent. This shifts more risk to the homeowner.

Also, some states have turned to "pools" and other state-sponsored arrangements to provide coverage that would not otherwise be available. Florida's Hurricane Catastrophe Fund, for example, is funded by insurers but backed by the state.

Wall Street Rallies As Crude Prices Ease (FT)

By Stephen Schurr

Financial Times, September 7, 2005

If muted activity last week in the face of Hurricane Katrina was an exercise in restraint, yesterday's market performance could be called a return of animal spirits. Stocks rallied solidly and broadly, with every sector in the S&P 500 posting gains.

The S&P 500 rose 15.38 points, or 1.3 per cent, to 1,233.40, the biggest percentage gain since the recent bottom on April 21. The Nasdaq Composite added 25.79 points, or 1.2 per cent, to 2,166.86 and the Dow Jones Industrial Average increased 141.87 points, or 1.4 per cent, to 10,565.12.

Declining crude prices were a tailwind for equities. Light sweet crude for October delivery fell $1.61 to $65.96 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange; the contract price is off 7 per cent since surging above $70 last week. Hopeful for an interruption in interest-rate increases, Wall Street was also optimistic the rebuilding of the Gulf Coast would stimulate the economy.

DOJ_NMG_0003628

Not everybody was so cheery. Stephanie Pomboy, who runs the research firm MacroMavens, warned that the markets were being cavalier about risk. “The markets are priced for absolute perfection at a time when, in my mind, the imperfections are manifold. It just strikes me that you have an environment that’s highly risky and nobody is paid to acknowledge that.”

For one day, at least, such concerns were cast aside. Every sector on the S&P 500 came up a winner. The real estate index and the retailers index rose more than 2.3 per cent apiece, and even the lagging energy index inched up 0.7 per cent.

Shares of Wal-Mart, which have been reliably moving in the opposite direction of energy prices amid concerns about consumer spending, posted a moderate rally. They gained 2.6 per cent to $45.69, but the shares remain 21 per cent off their 52-week high. Other retailers performed well, with discount-store Dollar General up 1.2 per cent to $18.41 and Target rising 1.5 per cent to $53.96.

Energy stocks lagged but held up; the group lead the market last week amid concerns about soaring energy prices and distribution gridlock. Valero Energy, this year’s strongest S&P component, added 0.9 per cent to $109.41, while Dynegy declined 3.1 per cent to $4.36. The support for energy stocks suggested Wall Street was not convinced the sector’s rally was finished.

Katrina was still affecting the market. Home Depot added 3.4 per cent to $41.71 on the belief that the home-improvement retailer would increase sales in the rebuilding effort. Tenet Healthcare fell 0.6 per cent to $11.93 as its six hospitals in the affected region continued to evacuate patients and employees.

Elsewhere, Chiron added 1.7 per cent to $43.51 after the drug company rejected a bid from Novartis, fuelling Wall Street hopes for a higher offer. Novartis added 0.4 per cent to $49.28.

Apple shares added 5.6 per cent to an all-time high of $48.80 ahead of the consumer-technology company’s plans to launch iTunes for mobile phones. Apple’s stock, which had retreated earlier this year after 2004’s robust gains, now stands at an all-time high.

Investors Gauge Katrina Impact (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

Stocks soared Tuesday as investors sensed relief from two places that have kept equities on a leash this year: oil prices and interest rates.

The surge in stocks has left the three major benchmark indexes well higher than they were before the Hurricane Katrina struck last Monday. An economic report indicating momentum in the service sector ahead of the storm also buoyed stocks.

A sharp decline in oil and gasoline prices gave some hope that an energy shock might be avoided after Katrina disrupted a vital cog in the nation's energy-distribution network. Speculation that the Federal Reserve may pause in its interest-rate tightening campaign at one or more of its meetings this year added further fuel to equities, and boosted shares of financial companies such as American Express and Citigroup, which jumped 2.9% and 1% respectively.

Investors "clearly are responding to the possibility that the Fed will postpone rate hikes until it can assess the damage that has been done to the economy" from Katrina, said Ned Riley of Riley Asset Management.

"The Fed pause is one element of what might be economic stimulus from the rebuilding efforts from Hurricane Katrina," said Kenneth Tower, chief investment strategist at CyberTrader.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 141.87 points, or 1.36%, to 10589.24. Home Depot gained 3.4% amid expectations of higher demand for the home-improvement wares in the rebuilding effort in Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi. Coca-Cola added 1.4% after a Bank of America upgrade to "buy" from "neutral." McDonald's rose 2.4% and Johnson & Johnson gained 1.4%. Wal-Mart Stores, which has suffered from concern that high gasoline prices could eat into its sales, tacked on 2.6%.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index added 15.42, or 1.27%, to 1233.02 and the Nasdaq Composite Index gained 25.79 points, or 1.2%, to 2166.86.

Oil prices slid after last week's decision by industrialized nations to release 60 million barrels of crude from strategic stockpiles. Light, sweet crude for October delivery fell $1.61 to $65.96 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Meanwhile, unleaded gasoline futures shed nearly 13 cents to $2.06 a gallon.

More than a week after Katrina struck the U.S. Gulf Coast, investors continued to take stock of the economic impact. Some analysts argued that reconstruction will help boost the profitability of a number of companies, such as Home Depot, and help the economy continue to grow.

DOJ_NMG_0003629

Others weren't as sanguine. Jeffrey Saut, chief investment strategist at Raymond James, wrote that "the downside risks to the economy have increased" after Katrina. "We think investors are ignoring the potential economic impact of the situation, as well as the potential inflationary impact of the rebuild," he wrote.

Lehman Brothers analyst Chip Dickson said in a note that the hurricane has "increased the level of economic risk," warranting an increase in his recommended cash weighting to 20% from 12.5% and a decrease in equity weighting to 65% from 70%. "Rising energy prices and health-care costs put the consumer under more pressure," he said.

A report showing solid growth in the nation's service sector in August reinforced Wall Street's expectation that the nation's economy was chugging along solidly before the hurricane. The Institute for Supply Management said its index for nonmanufacturing activity rose to 65 from 60.5 in July, well above expectations for a reading of 60. It was it highest reading since April 2004.

The Minerals Management Service, an arm of the Department of Interior, said 28% of drilling platforms and oil rigs remained evacuated in the Gulf of Mexico, down from 40% on Friday. About 70% of oil production and 52% of natural-gas production remains offline, the MMS said.

Still, gasoline prices remain high as several refineries in the Gulf are shut down. AAA on Monday said the nationwide average price of regular unleaded gasoline reached $3.06 a gallon, up more than 30% from $2.31 a month earlier. The storm disrupted roughly one million barrels a day of gasoline output, about 10% of U.S. capacity.

In major market action:

Stocks rose. On the Big Board, where 1.4 billion shares traded, 2,389 stocks rose and 882 fell on Friday. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 1.4 billion shares traded, 2,034 stocks advanced and 1,032 declined.

Bonds declined. The benchmark 10-year Treasury fell 13/32, or $4.06 per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.086% early Tuesday. The 30-year bond was off 1 2/32 to yield 4.357%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar advanced. It traded at 109.72 yen, down from 109.65 yen late Friday, while the euro slipped to $1.2474 from $1.2543.

Stocks Rally With Investors' Outlook (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, September 7, 2005

NEW YORK — The Dow Jones industrial average posted its biggest point gain since early July on Tuesday, bolstered by a sizable drop in the price of oil and evidence that progress was being made in fixing energy-related infrastructure damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

Wall Street sent its most forceful message to date that the initial doomsday scenarios of a national recession and a 1970s-style oil shock are unlikely to come to fruition as a result of the hurricane early last week.

The Dow rose almost 142 points, or 1.4%, to 10,589. It was the Dow's best rally since July 8 and boosted its gain to nearly 200 points, or 1.8%, since Katrina struck Aug. 29.

“Investors are now realizing that their (worst fears) were overblown,” says John Bollinger, president of Bollinger Capital Management.

Wall Street is also benefiting from two key factors that seemed unlikely a week ago:

·Energy prices are retreating. Initially, with little information on how badly oil pipelines, refineries and rigs were damaged, crude oil spiked above $70 a barrel, a record. And some pundits warned of even higher prices.

But the gradual recovery of petroleum operations in recent days has minimized fears of long-lasting supply disruptions, sending the price of crude lower, says Jack Ablin, chief investment officer at Harris Private Bank.

A barrel of crude closed down $1.61 to $65.96 Tuesday. Gasoline futures also fell, raising hopes that pump prices above $3 a gallon gas won't last much longer.

·There's a possibility that the Federal Reserve might pause or halt its campaign to raise interest rates until it can measure the fallout from Katrina, says Chuck Carlson, CEO of Horizon Investment Services. The Fed has raised its target for short-term rates to 3.50% from 1% since June 2004.

The market's resilience may be proof that “investors have gotten used to the fact that natural disasters do not have long-lasting impact” on the stock market, says Byron Wien, market strategist at Morgan Stanley.

In Katrina's Wake, Law Firm Disaster Teams See Action (LAW)

By Leigh Jones, The National Law Journal

Law.com, September 7, 2005

Much of the New Orleans legal community is in shambles following the devastation from Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0003630

Attorneys and staffers at some law firms were still unaccounted for last week, and office buildings and courthouses -- and the documents inside -- remained soaking under water.

Legal professionals said that they thought they had planned for the worst, but until some levees collapsed flooding almost 80 percent of the city after the hurricane hit, they believed they had escaped much of the damage predicted from the massive storm.

"We have never dealt with something of this magnitude, but we're going to have to," said Gregory Bodin, president of the Baton Rouge Bar Association. With offices at the Louisiana State Bar Association and the New Orleans Bar Association flooded, the Baton Rouge organization is serving as the headquarters for the other groups.

The New Orleans area was home to about 7,500 lawyers, Bodin said, which equals about one-third of the state's attorneys. "Most of the lawyers lost their homes, jobs and maybe their practices," he said.

As most phone and electronic communications remained useless after the barriers protecting the low-lying city failed, law firm leaders and court personnel were struggling to find offices and even housing for their workers.

"We're totally unaware of when we might have access to the building," said Charles Landry, managing partner of Jones, Walker, Waechter, Poitevent, Carrere & Denegre's Baton Rouge office. The New Orleans-based firm had 300 people, including 165 attorneys, working at its location on St. Charles Avenue.

Its building "appeared to be sound" said Landry, according to preliminary information he had received, but it was surrounded by water. Landry said that the firm had heard from most of its New Orleans workers, who had evacuated the city before the storm. But it had not made contact with one attorney who had stayed in the city, he said.

The condition of the New Orleans offices of Baker, Donelson, Bearman, Caldwell & Berkowitz was unclear, said firm Chairman Ben Adams. The firm has offices in New Orleans and Mandeville, La., where a total of 70 people work, including about 35 attorneys.

"We don't have them all accounted for yet," Adams said. "Each day we're tracking down more and more people."

'DISASTER TEAM' IN ACTION

The firm's "disaster team" met last week to implement a plan for its displaced workers, which may include opening an office in nearby Baton Rouge, Adams said. Leaders of both firms said that they had backed up electronic data before the storm, but the condition of paper documents was uncertain.

Web sites also were down at many law firms and government offices, or were operating with limited messages. Posted on Jones Walker's Web site last week was an urgent message to New Orleans attorneys asking them to contact the firm's Baton Rouge office.

"We need to know your needs and how to contact you," the message said.

Landry said that workers were using BlackBerry messaging to help make contact, a plan that the firm formulated before the hurricane hit. He said the firm's real estate group was trying to find housing for its displaced workers.

Phelps Dunbar, which is based in New Orleans and had about 90 attorneys at its offices on Canal Street, also posted a message on its Web site announcing that its New Orleans and Gulfport, Miss., offices were closed. It urged employees to call its emergency hotline phone number.

Atlanta-based Fisher Phillips, which had 14 attorneys working from its New Orleans location before Katrina landed, had obtained photographs of its offices, which showed shattered windows and curtains flapping in the wind. Roger Quillen, managing partner of Fisher Phillips' Atlanta location, said the New Orleans office would stay closed at least until Sept. 15.

The Web site of Tulane University, which houses its law school in New Orleans, included a "current status" report, updated every few hours, notifying readers that it had evacuated its campus. No other information besides the status reports appeared on the school's Web site.

Offices for the Committee on Bar Admissions also were flooded. Those offices contained recent bar examinations, which examiners were slated to evaluate this month.

The Baton Rouge Bar Association was in the process last week of implementing a nationwide lawyer donation program on its Web site. The program, which the Louisiana State Bar Foundation will handle, will enable lawyers and others across the country to assist Louisiana practitioners. Bodin said that eventually the bar associations would like to train local lawyers to help area residents fill out government assistance forms and other documents to obtain financial relief.

Note: For related news, see Kicked Out of the Big Easy by Katrina, the 5th Circuit Heads to Houston.

Social Security Reform 'Off Radar'? (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003631

With two Supreme Court vacancies and a massive hurricane-relief effort dominating the agenda now, senators said they don't think they will act on Social Security legislation this year, which would be the final blow to President Bush's signature domestic issue.

The Senate was already having major problems agreeing to a Social Security proposal -- even Republicans couldn't agree on whether a bill should include the Social Security private accounts Mr. Bush has pushed for. With recent events, members on both sides of the aisle said chances of action are even more unlikely.

"It's off the radar," said Sen. Gordon H. Smith, Oregon Republican, adding that hurricane relief is much more important now, and Social Security is an issue "we'll eventually deal with" down the line, though not likely this year.

"Social Security? I think not much is going to happen there this year," agreed Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican.

"I can't imagine President Bush is going to go back to it," Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat, said of Social Security.

"That is not likely to be part of any future agenda in Congress," he said, clarifying that he meant not the near-future agenda at least.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican, said he will continue talking to his colleagues to try and reach agreement on a Social Security bill, but conceded the issue now ranks about fourth or fifth on his agenda. His top priorities now are crafting Hurricane Katrina relief legislation, helping fellow Judiciary Committee members fill the Supreme Court vacancies, dealing with must-pass spending bills, addressing budget-reconciliation legislation, and then tackling Social Security.

Mr. Grassley said House passage of a Social Security bill might provide the Senate yet another opportunity to act, but noted even House action isn't certain. "They may not move," he said. "But if they do move, that gives us another bite at the apple."

It's been anticipated that the House would take the lead on Social Security legislation this fall. Last week, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, Texas Republican, said he still hopes to move a retirement-security bill this fall that includes voluntary personal accounts, but he also hedged by saying a floor vote can't be guaranteed until the House Ways and Means Committee produces a bill.

Behind the scenes, rank-and-file House Republicans are divided on whether or not it's wise to act now. Last week, Rep. Jack Kingston, Georgia Republican, a strong supporter of Social Security reform, said House Republicans would likely spend the next few weeks hammering out strategies on hurricane disaster relief, gas prices and illegal immigration. "In that mix, we will need to decide whether we're going to move forward on Social Security or not," he said.

Some Senate Republicans still say action is possible in their chamber this year.

Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican, said the issue probably "has to be deferred for a while," but isn't dead yet, since there are a group of senators who really want to get something done this year. "It's going to be tough, but I think there's a chance," he said.

Sen. Craig Thomas, Wyoming Republican, agreed action is indeed possible this year, predicting the Senate will produce a bill that begins to fix Social Security's long-term financial problems, but doesn't include personal accounts.

U.S. Agency Funded Opinion Columns (DMN)

By G. Robert Hillman, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON – The Department of Education paid education advocacy organizations to submit opinion pieces to newspapers and produce other ads, brochures and postcards – and many did not disclose their government ties, the department's inspector general has concluded.

"People looking at advertisements or reading their local newspapers would have had no idea that what they were reading was bought and paid for with their tax dollars," said Rep. George Miller of California, the ranking Democrat on the House Education and Workforce Committee who requested the review.

"No matter which way you slice it, that is propaganda," he added Tuesday in a prepared statement.

Mr. Miller had sought the review last January after reports that the department had paid commentator Armstrong Williams $240,000 to promote President Bush's No Child Left Behind initiative. Again, there were no disclosures.

Among the advocacy groups, Inspector General John Higgins concluded the arrangements were not "covert propaganda," though further review was required on one contract.

There was also no evidence, he said, that the contracts were awarded with any "intent to influence public opinion through the undisclosed use of third-party grantees."

DOJ_NMG_0003632

Still, Mr. Higgins said, the opinion pieces and other material financed by the department should have disclosed the government relationship, and efforts should be made to recover at least some of the money. Contracts totaling several million dollars were reviewed, but not all were found to violate the disclosure requirement.

Responding, department spokeswoman Susan Aspey cited a letter to the inspector general from Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, who said she agreed with most of the findings and that the department already had moved to "strengthen the grant-making and contracting processes."

Two of the opinion pieces cited by the inspector general were in The Dallas Morning News and another in its Spanish-language newspaper Al Día.

The author, Marcela Garcini of Dallas, director of parent outreach for the Hispanic Council for Reform and Educational Options, said she and her organization had "never had any bad intentions."

Keven Ann Willey, vice president and editor of the editorial page at The News, said the newspaper had solicited the first column in an outreach for diverse parental views and paid Ms. Garcini a freelance writer's fee. The second column was offered by Ms. Garcini, Ms. Willey said, and the newspaper did not pay her.

"We regret there was not greater disclosure in the financial relationship that her organization had with the Department of Education," Ms. Willey said of the second piece. Al Día editors expressed similar regrets.

In the second piece, critical of the Dallas Independent School District, Ms. Garcini said she was "tired of hearing excuses about the lack of funding for schools, particularly under No Child Left Behind."

"We parents must be prepared to transfer our children to other schools that can better serve their needs," she wrote.

Responding to the inspector general's report, Dallas schools spokesman Donald Claxton said, "It would be disappointing to find out the federal government is paying someone to write ugly things about us."

Under another contract with the Education Department, the inspector general said that Kate Walsh, president of the National Council on Teacher Quality, had authored several opinion pieces for other newspapers.

Her organization had not known of the disclosure requirement, she said, and had returned the federal money later and sent letters of apology to the newspapers.

Staff writer Tawnell D. Hobbs in Dallas contributed to this report.

Ethics Staffing Slow As Panel's Caseload Mounts (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, September 7, 2005

As the House returns from the month-long August recess, the top two Members of the ethics committee, Reps. Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.), face new questions on when they will complete hiring staff for their panel, as well as what cases they will take up once they have investigators in place.

Hastings and Mollohan, chairman and ranking member of the committee, hope to select a new chief counsel/staff director by the end of September or early October, according to sources close to the panel. Mollohan also wants to hire at least two additional investigators before initiating any inquiries, and Hastings is expected to accede to that request.

But the slow pace of hiring signals that the committee will likely not have completed a preliminary investigation of House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) over his dealings with former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff by the end of this year. DeLay then faces the possibility of a second straight election cycle in which the ethics committee releases findings on an investigation of him before voters go to the polls, a daunting challenge for even the most politically astute Member.

Hastings and Mollohan have begun reviewing résumés of applicants for the chief counsel post, said the sources. The new chief counsel will have to be approved by both men, and with the leadership of each party monitoring the vetting process closely, the new counsel will have to be someone viewed as free from any partisan bias.

"The bar is very high for the Republicans," said a senior House Democratic aide. "Any sign of partisan background in a candidate will be met with strong opposition and continue the stalemate of a non-functioning ethics committee, one that is unprecedented and unacceptable."

Once a new chief counsel and additional investigators are in place, the ethics committee is expected to initiate informal probes into DeLay and House Administration Chairman Bob Ney (R-Ohio), both of whom have ties to Abramoff. Abramoff and a former business associate recently were indicted in Florida on federal fraud charges related to their purchase of a Miami-based gambling cruise ship company.

Neither DeLay nor Ney have been implicated in that case, but the two lawmakers face questions about their dealings with Abramoff on other issues, as well as allegations that Abramoff may have improperly funded overseas trips taken by the two men and their aides.

DOJ_NMG_0003633

Those two informal probes could become full-blown investigations featuring investigative subcommittees with subpoena power appointed to oversee the inquiries, according to House insiders and ethics experts.

Abramoff's indictment in Florida, however, could present problems for a Congressional ethics probe. Traditionally, the ethics committee has steered clear of cases in which federal or state officials are already investigating Members over allegations of criminal conduct, as was the case last year when the ethics committee declined to look into a case involving DeLay associates already being probed by a Texas grand jury.

But that abstention by the panel is not an ironclad one, and the committee in the past initiated its own probes of former Reps. Bud Shuster (R-Pa.) and Jay Kim (R-Calif.) even as the Justice Department was investigating the lawmakers.

Regarding Abramoff's indictment in Florida, legal experts suggest that case is so specific — centering on alleged efforts in September 2000 by Abramoff and Adam Kidan, his then business partner, to falsify loan documents used to help purchase Sun Cruz Casinos — that the ethics committee could begin its own investigation of DeLay and Ney without jeopardizing the government's case.

"I don't see any problem for the ethics committee on that front," said a GOP ethics lawyer who requested anonymity. "They can do whatever they want."

Where there may be problems, however, is if a Washington, D.C.-based federal grand jury investigating Abramoff over his dealing with American Indian tribes indicts the former lobbyist. Ney, in particular, has faced allegations that he attempted to help Abramoff enact legislation to help one of his tribal clients in return for campaign contributions, a charge that the Ohio Republican has vehemently denied. If Abramoff were indicted by the grand jury over his actions on behalf of Indian tribes, then any probe of Ney could touch directly on that case.

"Ney, in a weird way, could benefit if Abramoff were indicted again," said the GOP lawyer. "There is no way Abramoff could or would testify before the ethics committee, so it becomes all Ney's side of the story."

Republicans are not alone in facing ethics problems, however. An investigative subcommittee has already been appointed to look into Rep. Jim McDermott's (D-Wash.) leaking of an illegal recorded 1997 phone call between House GOP leaders. McDermott and Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio) have been involved in a long-running legal dispute over the tape, and McDermott could end up having to pay hundreds of thousands of dollars in lawyers' fees in the case. A complaint with the ethics panel against McDermott was filed by Rep. David Hobson (R-Ohio), a close Boehner ally.

Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) also faces questions over potential violations of House ethics rules. Several House insiders predict that the ethics panel will approve a full-blown investigation into whether Conyers improperly allowed partisan political activity by his staff designed to benefit Conyers' wife, who was running for a state office.

Other lawmakers, including Reps. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), John Murtha (D-Pa.) and Maxine Waters (D-Calif.), could also come under scrutiny by the Ethics panel as well. All three have been alleged in media reports to have used their official offices to help out business activities by family members.

Two other Members — Reps. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) and William Jefferson (D-La.) — are the subject of ongoing federal corruption investigations, and the outcome of those probes will have an impact on whether the ethics committee gets involved in either case.

Cunningham is being investigated by a federal task force over his ties to a defense contractor, MZM Inc., and its former CEO, Mitchell Wade. Wade purchased Cunningham's San Diego-area home in 2003 and then later resold it at a $700,000 loss. Cunningham also lived on a yacht berthed in Washington that was owned by Wade. MZM, with backing from Cunningham and other lawmakers, has helped snare more than $160 million in federal defense contracts, mainly in intelligence-related activities. Cunningham serves on the House Appropriations and Intelligence committees. Cunningham, who has stated that he did nothing wrong in his dealings with Wade, has already announced his decision to retire from Congress at the end of next year.

Jefferson is being investigated over his dealings with a high-tech startup company. The Maryland home of a top Nigerian official with ties to Jefferson was searched by the FBI in early August. Jefferson has denied any wrongdoing in the matter.

Both Cunningham and Jefferson have faced searches of their homes and other property by federal agents. In Jefferson's case, federal agents reportedly found a bundle of cash in his freezer, according to the Washington Post.

As is the case with the Abramoff-related probes, the ethics committee will have to move cautiously to not interfere with the Justice Department investigation into either lawmaker, although that does not mean the committee can't begin a probe into either lawmaker on its own.

"Just because the Justice Department is looking into something, that doesn't preclude the ethics committee from investigating as well," warned a senior House Democrat familiar with the situation. "The ethics committee has the authority to do what it must to guard the integrity of the House, and it will do so how it best sees fit."

DOJ_NMG_0003634

OTHER NEWS:

Zinc Tumbles 3.7% After Stockpiles Prove Unaffected By Storm (WSJ)

By Emily Parkinson

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

LONDON -- Zinc futures at the London Metal Exchange fell sharply following reports that warehouse stocks in New Orleans were unaffected by Hurricane Katrina.

Zinc for three-month delivery fell 3.7%, or $21, to $1,391 a metric ton, but had rallied as high as $1,452.50, an eight-year high. The market rose earlier in the session after the LME temporarily suspended warrants for zinc stored in New Orleans warehouses and imposed a backwardation limit on the zinc market, the exchange said.

A market is in backwardation when the futures price is lower than the cash price. LME warrants are documents enabling the holder to take possession of a specified parcel of metal at a specified LME warehouse.

The decision was made in light of the potential effect on the LME markets of flooding in New Orleans following Hurricane Katrina.

The LME said that "to safeguard the orderliness of trading, the exchange has decided temporarily to suspend New Orleans warrants until the situation can be clarified."

In other commodity markets:

CRUDE OIL: Petroleum futures on the New York Mercantile Exchange fell 2.4% as Gulf of Mexico oil production continued to recover in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. The massive government response to the supply disruptions caused by the storm eased traders' concerns about curtailed U.S. production. October crude fell $1.61 to $65.96 a barrel.

GASOLINE: Nymex gasoline futures plunged 6% as some of the U.S. refineries shut by Hurricane Katrina restarted. About half of the affected refining capacity was either back on line or expected back by midweek. A surge in European gasoline imports and a seasonal decline in demand was also seen easing supply tightness. October gasoline futures fell 12.87 cents to $2.0550 a gallon.

Crude Oil Lower After Saudi Price Cut (FT)

By Chris Flood

Financial Times, September 7, 2005

The price reduction on its heavy crude is likely to lead to a production increase by the world's largest exporter. This may be confirmed this weekend when the kingdom nominates its October oil export programme.

The move comes ahead of the meeting of the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries later this month, when Saudi Arabia may push for an increase in the Opec quota from its current level of 28m b/d in an effort to stem the rise in global oil prices.

Saudi Aramco, the state oil company, lowered its monthly crude oil selling prices to the US, Europe and Asia and made the largest cut to the price of its heaviest grades, which are harder to refine, with Arab Heavy down $2.75 for Europe and $2.25 for the United States. The discount of Arab Heavy to the European benchmark is close to the record discounts seen last October of about $14 a barrel.

Although more than two-thirds of US Gulf of Mexico oil production remains closed, according to the US Minerals Management Service yesterday, US energy prices retreated as traders returned after the Labor Day holiday. The October West Texas Intermediate contract fell $1.67 to $65.90. IPE Brent for October delivery declined 19 cents to $64.66 a barrel.

Refiners have until Friday afternoon to submit bids for 30m barrels of crude offered for sale from the US government's emergency stockpile with a base reference price of $68.67 a barrel set for sweet crude and $61.66 a barrel for sour crude.

Nymex October gasoline declined 6.6 cents to $2.1177 a gallon while Nymex October heating oil fell 1.21 cents to $2.0790 a gallon.

Zinc prices hit an eight-year high after the London Metal Exchange suspended delivery against warranted metals stored in New Orleans where almost half of the LME stockpile is stored.

Traders said high inventory levels had prevented prices from rising as fast as other base metals in recent years, but the market was increasingly nervous about availability of supplies.

Three-month zinc prices reached $1,452.50 a tonne before easing back to $1,394.5. Three-month copper edged lower to $3,655.5 a tonne after reaching an all-time peak of $3,725 a tonne on Friday. Analysts expect higher demand for base metals like copper from a surge in reconstruction spending in areas affected by Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0003635

Gold prices eased modestly to $443.95 a troy ounce from Monday's close in London of $445.85 after a bounce in the dollar. Traders said that a correction to lower levels was still a risk due to speculative long positions.

Gulf's Energy Infrastructure Begins To Regain Its Footing (WSJ)

By Thaddeus Herrick, Russell Gold and John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

The Gulf Coast network of production platforms, pipelines and refineries hammered by Hurricane Katrina last week took a step toward normalcy yesterday, helping to temper the price of crude oil and offering hope that the worst of the current energy crunch may have passed.

The U.S. average retail price for unleaded gasoline -- having matched an all-time high Monday -- eased about a cent to $3.04 a gallon yesterday, according to AAA, formerly the American Automobile Association, as Labor Day marked the end of the summer driving season. While analysts said it was unclear whether Americans were conserving gasoline, the supply shortages and gas-station lines so far have failed to match those of the oil shocks of the 1970s and 1980s.

"You may not be able to find gasoline where and when you want it," said Geoff Sundstrom, a spokesman for AAA. "But there is gasoline."

The sharp rise in gasoline prices -- and forecasts that oil companies will see increased profitability as a result -- have drawn congressional scrutiny. Leaders of the Senate Energy Committee yesterday said that Congress will "revisit" auto fuel-economy standards and more-flexible leasing of federal offshore land for energy exploration. But Republican lawmakers showed little enthusiasm for Democratic proposals for a federal law on price gouging.

Late yesterday afternoon, benchmark crude for October delivery fell $1.61 to $65.96 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. The drop came as Saudi Arabia slashed prices by more than $2 a barrel on its high-sulfur grades of oil, which now sell for roughly $50 or more a barrel. Because the U.S. temporarily has relaxed tough environmental standards for oil products, refineries may be able to use more high-sulfur Middle Eastern crudes that normally need more refining.

Gasoline futures declined 12.87 cents to $2.055 a gallon in Nymex trading. Natural-gas futures, which have maintained higher levels even as oil has slipped, fell 3.4 cents to close at $11.657 per million British thermal units.

Questions remain about the swirl of pipelines that feed into the southeastern tip of Louisiana. These pipelines are particularly susceptible to the underwater mudslides triggered by Katrina. Mudslides can snap pipelines, moving segments hundreds of feet, and leave them inoperable until they can be reconnected. Similar damage in the wake of last year's Hurricane Ivan reduced production for weeks.

Weather continues to hamper assessment: El Paso Corp., which operates the Southern Natural Gas pipeline system in the gulf, said surveying has been postponed at least until tomorrow Yesterday, a Department of Energy official told the Senate Energy Committee damage hasn't yet been found, though inspections continue.

Also yesterday, the U.S. Coast Guard increased its count of destroyed platforms to 29 from 26. Still, the U.S. Minerals Management Service said that more than 50% of the combined oil and natural-gas production idled in anticipation of Katrina had been restarted. The oil and natural-gas equivalent of 1.6 million barrels a day still was shuttered.

Crews have had adequate time to bring a number of large, oil-and gas-producing platforms and accompanying pipelines back to service. BP PLC said its deep-water Holstein platform, just west of Katrina's path, has resumed production, pumping the oil and gas equivalent of 70,000 barrels a day. Two pipelines that connect Holstein to the shore are running again.

Oil companies are beginning their search for new oil and gas. Anadarko Petroleum Corp. said at least five drilling rigs, moveable floating platforms that can drill wells to depths of about 26,000 feet, have started churning through the earth again. An additional two drillers are being assessed for damage, the company said.

More importantly, perhaps, two critical pipelines carrying fuel to the Northeast U.S. are running again and four of eight refineries in the hurricane's path are in the process of restarting, with Marathon Oil Corp.'s Garyville, La., plant the first of the group to begin processing crude oil into products such as gasoline and diesel.

Still, the hurricane's wrath has laid bare the vulnerabilities of the U.S.'s oil and gas supplies. The region ravaged by Katrina is home to about a quarter of America's oil and natural-gas production -- with pumping platforms far out to sea, refinery complexes that turn crude into gasoline, and pipelines linking them all. The storm temporarily closed down about two million barrels a day of oil-refining capacity, resulting in the loss of one million barrels a day of gasoline output, representing 10% of U.S. capacity.

And while capacity representing 5% of U.S. demand appears likely to restart in coming days and weeks, four refineries that represent the other 5% will be offline for at least a month. Among them are two industry heavyweights: Exxon Mobil Corp's 185,000 barrel-a-day plant in Chalmette, La., co-owned by Petróleos de Venezuela, and Chevron Corp.'s plant in Pascagoula, Miss., which processes 325,000 barrels of crude oil a day.

DOJ_NMG_0003636

Even more, expectations of bigger profits for energy companies, especially refiners, following Katrina, have touched off a political storm. Sen. Byron L. Dorgan, (D., N.D.) said he will introduce a "windfall profits rebate act" today that would penalize oil companies for reaping above-normal profits unless they made new investments in domestic oil and gas production or in oil-refining capacity.

While Democrats slammed the oil industry for alleged "price gouging," several witnesses told the committee that the impact of Katrina on an already tight supply market for gasoline made it extremely difficult to set prices. "Last week was one of the most unusual weeks I've ever been through," said William Shipley, the chairman and chief executive of Shipley Stores, which runs a chain of 26 gasoline-selling convenience stores in central Pennsylvania. He said he ordered price increases of 15 cents a gallon each day because he saw his wholesale costs were rising. "You have to pay for the next shipment and anticipate the increased cost."

Lawmakers also said they plan to take another look at a proposal to allow states to lease land for exploration for natural gas in federal lands offshore.

Guy Caruso, administrator of the DOE's Information Administration, said that "significant numbers of tankers" coming from Europe carrying gasoline should put "some downward pressure" on U.S. prices during the next two to three weeks. His agency predicted that gasoline prices will drop to $2.60 a gallon by the end of October and to $2.40 by next year.

Also yesterday, the Japanese government unveiled plans to release some of its strategic oil reserves held by refiners to the oil market. Shoichi Nakagawa, minister of Economy, Trade and Industry, said Japan will start releasing about 200,000 barrels a day of crude oil and refined products from its oil reserves held by refiners to the market beginning today.

The International Energy Agency, the energy watchdog for industrialized nations, announced Friday that its 26 members, including Japan, would draw on two million barrels a day of oil during the next 30 days to help offset the loss of output and refining capacity in the U.S.

Gas Prices At Pumps Show Signs Of Easing (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj And Jad Mouawad

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

Gasoline prices at the pump inched lower yesterday for the first time since Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast last week, suggesting that fuel costs, while still high, are leveling off and may not lead to as severe an energy shock as once feared.

But even as the surge in prices appeared to be easing, policy makers and consumer groups nationwide increased calls for a host of government interventions to punish those shown to be profiteers, reduce gas taxes and institute price caps.

In Washington, a Senate committee held the first of two scheduled hearings on energy supplies and gasoline prices, which topped $3 a gallon last week after Katrina knocked out vital parts of the nation's energy supply system. [Page C5] At the same time, officials from several states said they were taking forceful measures against what they viewed as price gouging.

Nationwide, retail prices averaged $3.041 a gallon for regular unleaded gasoline yesterday, up significantly from a week ago but down from a peak of $3.057 on Monday, according to AAA. At the wholesale level, gasoline for October delivery fell by 12.87 cents a gallon, or 5.9 percent, to $2.055 after climbing past $2.60 last week on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Crude oil prices fell $1.61 a barrel, to $65.96; last week they closed as high as $69.81.

The stock market also rose as investors sensed some relief on the energy front and expressed more optimism that the Federal Reserve might pause soon in its campaign of regular interest rate increases. The Standard & Poor's 500 index climbed 1.3 percent, to 1,233.39; the Dow industrials gained 141.87 points, to 10,589.24.

While a majority of the gulf's offshore production remained down yesterday, oil companies have been achieving steady gains in restoring output and are moving aggressively to resume wider refining and distribution of oil products.

About 870,000 barrels a day of oil, or 58 percent of the gulf's total output, are still shut down, according to the latest government figures. That is an increase from last week when the storm cut 95 percent of the gulf's production. The region accounts for more than 25 percent of domestic oil production and about 2 percent of global oil supplies.

Still, a public reaction against sharp gasoline price increases appeared to be rising and some policy makers called for reimposing energy price controls, which were eliminated in the early 1980's.

"We have a million people displaced and we have 100 million Americans that are opening up their hearts and homes," Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, said in a telephone interview yesterday. "We have some people who are trying to take advantage of it for their own personal profit. And we should stop them in their tracks."

Mr. Levin asked President Bush to impose emergency price caps on gasoline until supplies are restored to levels before the hurricane struck.

Most economists are extremely wary of price caps and say they do more harm than good by leading to artificial shortages caused in part by encouraging consumers to buy more gasoline when they should be curbing demand. By contrast, market-driven price increases, as painful as they may seem, help reduce unnecessary driving and bring out additional supplies, allowing the system to return to balance, economists say.

DOJ_NMG_0003637

"Let prices do a good job of telling people what cars to drive and how much to drive them and how to spend their weekends," said Stephen P. A. Brown, director of energy economics at the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas. "I don't have any statistics on it, but my understanding was that a lot of people didn't travel this weekend, the roads were a lot less crowded, and $3 gasoline did it."

Mr. Levin dismissed that analysis: "By that logic," he said, "you could raise prices to $10 a gallon and you make sure that people walk." Most consumers cannot choose to stop driving, he said, adding that imposing a short-term cap on prices would not hurt oil companies, which are already making record profits.

State and federal officials say that consumer complaints have soared as they have registered outrage at price increases of 30 to 80 cents a gallon - sometimes more - that gas stations instituted literally overnight last week.

The Energy Department said yesterday it had created a toll-free number, (800) 244-3301, for consumers to lodge complaints about prices. Those complaints will be sent to the Federal Trade Commission, the Justice Department and state attorneys general. Consumers can also complain online at gaswatch.energy.gov.

"While we've largely seen the best of American generosity and unity throughout the recovery effort, we recognize that there are some bad actors that may try to take advantage of the situation," Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman said in a statement.

In Florida, Attorney General Charlie Crist said that his office had dispatched 40 investigators to canvas gasoline stations to see if any were violating a price gouging law that went into effect when Governor Jeb Bush imposed a state of emergency in July just before Hurricane Dennis struck Florida. The statute defines gouging as any price increase in "gross disparity" to what was being charged before.

"It's somewhat subjective, obviously, and intentionally so, I presume," Mr. Crist, a Republican who is running for governor, said. "What we are trying to calculate into the equation are the market forces that are fairly apparent to all of us as it relates to refineries and pipelines and some offshore rigs that have been displaced."

Mr. Crist has already subpoenaed Murphy Oil and Colonial Oil Industries, two independent oil companies with retail outlets in Florida. His office is also coordinating investigations with attorneys general from Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana. In the Midwest, Illinois, Wisconsin and Iowa have undertaken similar joint efforts.

When asked what he thought about economists' view that allowing market forces to set prices served a useful function, Mr. Crist said "being unfair is never appropriate."

"I am not very sympathetic to the economic theory that it's good for people to charge them through the nose," he said.

Economists say they recognize the appeal of that sentiment but also note that without the pain of higher prices consumers might buy more gasoline and make a bad supply situation worse.

"The trade-off is the following: if you keep the price low you have to ration in some other way," said Steven Suranovic, an associate professor of economics at George Washington University in Washington. "And rationing is going to come about in lines forming at gasoline companies and some stations being closed."

Other lawmakers and officials suggested the federal and state governments should reduce or suspend taxes on gasoline purchases. The federal government imposes an excise tax of 18.4 cents a gallon on gasoline; the states, on average, add another 21 cents a gallon in excise taxes. At least 11 states also impose sales and other additional taxes.

On Friday, Governor Sonny Perdue of Georgia suspended that state's 7.5-cent excise tax and 4 percent sales tax on motor fuels. On Monday, Senators Jon Corzine, Democrat of New Jersey, and Charles F. Schumer, Democrat of New York, offered conditional support for removing the federal gasoline taxes.

Here too, many economists parted with politicians, noting that reducing taxes would also encourage consumers to buy more gasoline.

Some analysts said gasoline prices might have already peaked. "Futures prices have come down and spot prices have gone down, and retail prices have already started to decline," said John Felmy, chief economist at the American Petroleum Institute.

But even though driving demands are expected to ease now that the summer vacation period has ended, prices are likely to remain elevated well above pre-hurricane levels for at least the next few weeks or months as energy companies turn to restoring full refinery operations and begin shifting to greater output of heating oil. Imports of gasoline from Europe and improved offshore production should also help increase supplies within the next few weeks.

Four major refineries are expected to remain out of service for at least the next several weeks. Meanwhile, workers are just beginning to return to offshore platforms - at least 20 of them missing or adrift - and starting to examine underwater pipelines to assess the damage to the gulf's intricate energy infrastructure.

DOJ_NMG_0003638

Gas Prices Ease As Gulf Production Up (USAT)

By James R. Healey

USA Today, September 7, 2005

U.S. gasoline prices appear to have peaked as energy operations in the Gulf of Mexico, clobbered by Hurricane Katrina last week, resume production.

Other energy prices also retreated Tuesday. But damage to the economy already could be significant.

“American consumers spent nearly $10 billion more last week on energy than they did in the same week three years ago. That's not sustainable,” energy price consultant Peter Beutel says.

Most Americans — eight of 10 — told USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup pollsters Monday and Tuesday that gasoline suppliers are taking advantage of the hurricane to charge unfair prices. Prices zoomed past $6 a gallon in some areas after Katrina, and average more than $3 currently.

The official view is opposite.

“Energy prices are being set fairly,” James Overdahl, chief economist at the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, said in remarks prepared for a Senate hearing Tuesday. The CFTC regulates exchanges that trade futures contracts for energy and other commodities.

U.S. average for unleaded regular was $3.041 a gallon, AAA said Tuesday. That was down 1.6 cents from a nominal record $3.057 over the Labor Day weekend. The inflation-adjusted record is $3.113, set in March 1981, the U.S. Energy Information Administration says.

“Demand has dropped off the table” as high prices and shortages discourage driving, but it's unclear how long that will last, says Tom Kloza, analyst at the Oil Price Information Service.

Cheapest gas, averaging about $2.74, was in the states hit hardest by Katrina, Louisiana and Mississippi, because of anti-price-gouging regulations and because some “major oil companies froze prices in those areas to assist recovery efforts,” AAA's Geoff Sundstrom says.

Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue signed an order suspending state gas taxes temporarily to keep prices down. Other governors are considering it, and some in Congress are asking for “gas-tax holidays.”

Oil closed Tuesday at $65.96, down $1.61. Wholesale gasoline for October delivery was $2.055, down 13 cents. Gas for immediate delivery was about $2.18 at the gulf, roughly 90 cents cheaper than “the most manic number last Thursday,” Kloza says.

Retail gas prices tend to be 60 to 65 cents a gallon more than the average wholesale prices, EIA says.

The U.S. Minerals Management Service reported Tuesday that gulf oil production was 616,000 barrels a day, or 42% of normal, up 9% from Monday.

Says Beutel: “Unless Tropical Storm Maria follows in Katrina's footsteps, we may be able to look back on this weekend as the worst of a bad situation.”

Senators Urge Boost In Standards Of Fuel Economy (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

Congress should consider raising fuel-economy standards for all vehicles for the first time in 30 years in light of the gasoline shortages and huge spike in pump prices caused by Hurricane Katrina, key senators said yesterday.

"I believe we must take another look at the CAFE standards," said Sen. Pete V. Domenici, New Mexico Republican and chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, referring to the Corporate Average Fuel Economy rules enacted in the mid-1970s but not updated since.

"We looked at that before, and it was not politically possible. I'm not sure that will be the case after Katrina," he said.

His comments came as the government reported that gas prices last week breached the $3 level for the first time on average nationwide, with the biggest increases seen in Mid-Atlantic states such as Virginia and Maryland, and in the District, where the average price for regular was $3.29 a gallon.

Republicans and Democrats both said they suspected price gouging as gasoline costs soared in the aftermath of Katrina, but they complained that the government doesn't have the ability to prevent such market abuses.

"The American people are being victimized more than any free market would warrant," said Sen. Gordon H. Smith, Oregon Republican.

Mr. Smith and other senators at a committee hearing yesterday said regulators, including the Federal Trade Commission, are not aggressively pursuing price gouging and other market manipulation by energy companies reaping huge profits.

DOJ_NMG_0003639

"There are growing concerns that oil companies are making too much in profits at the expense of consumers," Mr. Domenici said.

Some relief at the pump is on the way as the prices of crude oil and wholesale gasoline dropped for a second day in New York trading, and are close to levels that prevailed before the hurricane struck the Gulf Coast, the heart of the nation's oil-producing sector.

Witnesses at yesterday's hearing said pump prices will remain high for weeks and possibly months, however, because the hurricane knocked out about 10 percent of production at oil wells and 5 percent of production at refineries that could take up to a half-year to restore.

Mr. Domenici acknowledged that the energy law his committee drafted and enacted this summer did not go far enough to prevent crises such as the current one, although the Bush administration last week did use the new powers it received to temporarily lift environmental requirements for fuels during emergencies.

"We left some issues out" in the interest of getting the much-debated legislation passed, Mr. Domenici said. "Things that were not politically possible two months ago are now before us."

Sen. Jeff Bingaman, New Mexico Democrat and the committee's ranking member, said he also hopes Congress will revisit whether to require cars, trucks and sport utility vehicles to give better mileage than the current standard, which is 27.5 miles per gallon on average for cars.

Witnesses at the hearing agreed that the sharp spike in fuel prices in the past week shows that Congress needs to rethink policies that have led to an overwhelming dependence on heavy, inefficient cars and trucks at a time of tight supplies and turmoil in world oil markets.

"As Hurricane Katrina has reminded us, we are never more than a disaster away from this type of crisis," said Robert L. Darbelnet, president of AAA, a driver advocacy group.

"If we do not reduce our dependency on fossil fuel or increase our access to a reliable source of it, the narrow margin we rely on for stability will continue to erode."

Mr. Darbelnet said the improved fuel-efficiency standards for SUVs and light trucks proposed last month by the administration do not go far enough, particularly because they do not "address the largest and heaviest passenger vehicles on the road today."

The Environmental Protection Agency also needs to revise the fuel-efficiency tests that result in estimated miles per gallon for each vehicle on the road, he said. It has been substantially overstating mileage potential by assuming that, among other things, drivers do not use their air conditioners or drive faster than 55 miles per hour.

Since the hurricane struck more than a week ago, the shutdown of nearly all the oil and gas facilities in the Gulf of Mexico has been partially reversed, witnesses said, and the three major pipelines feeding gasoline to the Northeast, Mid-Atlantic and Midwest have been mostly restored to operation.

The availability of fuel to feed into the pipelines will remain a problem, however, as four heavily damaged oil platforms producing about 10 percent of the Gulf oil will take three to six months to repair, said Rebecca Watson, assistant interior secretary for land and minerals management.

Ms. Watson said her office and the oil companies it supervises are working hard to get facilities back in operation, but continue to be hampered by flooding, a lack of power and the loss of workers. Her agency's office in New Orleans had to be closed, for example, and 67 employees remain missing.

Although half of the 1.8 million barrels a day of lost refining capacity should be restored by the end of the week, that still would leave gasoline output about 5 percent lower at a time when fuel is in short supply worldwide, said Guy Caruso, head of the Energy Information Administration.

Some Senators On Panel Ask Angry Questions About Gasoline Pricing And Profits (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6 - Opening a series of Congressional hearings on rising fuel prices, the Senate energy committee vented bipartisan wrath Tuesday over accusations of energy-company profiteering after the Gulf Coast was struck by a hurricane.

"Hurricane Katrina exposed the harsh reality that we have been skirting and skating on thin ice when it comes to this country's energy concentration on the Gulf Coast," said Senator Pete V. Domenici, the New Mexico Republican who is chairman of the panel.

DOJ_NMG_0003640

"Why are the oil companies making record profits, and what are they doing with them?" he asked. "Our job is to make sure that one, price gouging, and, two, unfair profiteering and unconscionable profiteering, do not take place and especially does not take place as a result of the hurricane."

With gasoline prices hovering near the peaks set over the weekend, members of Congress say they consider fuel costs the biggest issue on voters' minds. On their first day back from the summer recess they began debating potential remedies with an intensity not seen since the oil shortages of the 1970's.

Lawmakers of both parties were eager to warn oil producers to watch their prices.

Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, said: "The distrust is enormous. I hope somebody out there is listening who controls these prices."

Several senators from both parties called for the Federal Trade Commission to vigorously investigate charges of price gouging. On Wednesday, the commission chairwoman, Deborah Platt Majoras, will testify at a House committee hearing also investigating price increases.

Mr. Domenici said he hoped public reaction might press Congress to pass measures that were excluded from the energy bill passed in July, including new vehicle fuel efficiency standards, the expansion of offshore drilling and support for building new refineries.

Several agreed that the concentration of refineries had created a dangerous dependence on the gulf region to process a large share of the nation's fuel supplies. "We are just in the beginning of the hurricane season," said Senator Lisa Murkowski, Republican of Alaska. "What happens if there is another hurricane?"

Senator Domenici and Senator Jeff Bingaman, who is also from New Mexico and the ranking Democrat on the committee, agreed to send a letter to President Bush asking him to require government agencies to begin conserving gas in their vehicles, saying that would set an example for consumers.

Democrats called for more aggressive measures. Senator Byron L. Dorgan, Democrat of North Dakota, said he was introducing a bill to tax oil companies for high oil profits and pay a rebate to consumers. "There is nothing about this market that is free," he said, arguing that the OPEC cartel sets prices and that the consolidation of petroleum companies had made the pricing situation worse for consumers.

Senator Maria Cantwell, Democrat of Washington, called on the president to reinstate the emergency powers that expired after the 1970's "to look at this issue of price gouging and look at what level of price increase is realistic."

Republicans on the committee, however, argued that price controls of the 1970's had worsened shortages. Senator George Allen, Republican of Virginia, said Congress should instead consider extending the temporary lifting of some regulations on gasoline contents that the president imposed after the hurricane.

Several others argued for expanding domestic oil drilling in Alaska and offshore. Pointing the finger at environmental regulations he blamed for constricting domestic oil supplies, Senator Larry Craig, Republican of Idaho, questioned his colleagues stern words for the oil companies and other energy producers.

"Is it possible," he asked, "that the anger of the American consumer is misdirected at those who produce it instead of those who deny production?"

Senate Holds Hearing On Gas Price Gouging (AP)

By H. JOSEF HEBERT, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 7, 2005

Sep. 7, 2005 - Senators, both Republicans and Democrats, said Tuesday that they suspect price gouging as gasoline costs soared in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina but complained that the government doesn't have the ability to investigate or prevent such market abuses.

"The American people are being victimized more than any free market would warrant," said Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore., at Senate hearing on the impact of the hurricane on energy prices.

Smith and other senators said regulators, including the Federal Trade Commission, are not aggressively pursuing price gouging and other market manipulation by energy companies reaping huge profits.

Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., chairman of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, which held hearings into the recent price spikes, said Congress needs to give agencies the tools to investigate price-gouging complaints.

"There are growing concerns that oil companies are making too much in profits at the expense of consumers," said Domenici.

Sen. Jon Corzine, D-N.J., said that even as crude prices were declining, gasoline prices at the pump soared by 25 percent. "There's something not right in how the market is working," he said.

Several Democrats called for gasoline price controls.

DOJ_NMG_0003641

"The president needs to have emergency powers to halt gas price gouging," said Sen. Maria Cantwell, D-Wash.

Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., said he will introduce legislation for a windfall profits tax on oil companies, with the proceeds used to rebate consumers who have paid huge prices at the pump. He was not optimistic about the proposal's prospects.

"Most likely Congress will do little or nothing but talk a great deal and hold hearings," said Dorgan.

Twenty-three states have price-gouging statutes, but Domenici acknowledged they are "all over the waterfront" as to how they are used. In Virginia, a government must declare an emergency for the law to be used.

The FTC does not have authority over price gouging unless it involves an antitrust or market monopoly issue.

The afternoon of testimony demonstrated that one person's price gouging may be another person's justified price response to changing conditions of supply and demand.

James Overdahl, chief economist for the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, said the agency is stepping up its oversight of the gasoline futures markets but has not seen evidence of price manipulation related to Hurricane Katrina.

Industry representatives blamed retail-price spikes on the disruption of supplies and the anticipation of shortages.

Separately, the Energy Department said it was expanding its "hotline" for complaints from motorists about price gouging at pumps to including a toll-free number, 1-800-244-3301, that can be used for complaints.

"We recognize there are some bad actors that may be to take advantage of the situation," said Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman. Complaints to DOE are forwarded to the Federal Trade Commission.

Meanwhile, the federal Energy Information Administration told lawmakers that the high gasoline prices triggered by disruptions from Hurricane Katrina were expected to ease in the coming weeks.

Crude prices and wholesale gasoline prices dropped for a second straight trading day Tuesday on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

"We expect gas prices to ease off in the coming weeks" and more Gulf refineries return to operation and more gasoline imports begin coming into the country, said EIA Director Guy Caruso.

Caruso said if recovery of Gulf refineries and offshore production facilities goes as anticipated, EIA projects gasoline prices to average $2.60 a gallon nationwide in the third quarter of this year and $2.40 a gallon next year. The EIA said the average price of regular-grade gasoline soared by nearly 46 cents a gallon to an average of $3.069 nationwide last week.

The Interior Department reported that offshore oil production facilities in the Gulf, though temporarily shut down, avoided extensive, long-term damage from Katrina.

The hurricane disrupted 95 percent of Gulf oil production, a region that accounts for 29 percent of U.S. domestic production.

Interior Assistant Secretary Rebecca Watson said many of those platforms are coming back into operation and that 90 percent of the offshore production facilities in the Gulf avoided extensive, long-term damage.

In Praise Of 'Gouging' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

One test of leadership in a crisis is whether politicians keep cool enough to resist populist furies, especially when it comes to the inevitable economic fallout. Sadly, that's not what we're seeing in the current demagoguery over alleged oil-profiteering.

"Price gouging," says Missouri GOP Governor Matt Blunt, "is unconscionable and illegal ... and should be rooted out and punished." In Georgia, Republican Governor Sonny Perdue has signed an emergency executive order imposing sanctions on service stations that raise their prices too much. In Illinois, Democratic Governor Rod Blagojevich has pledged to prosecute gas companies that profit from the price spike, as has Ernie Fletcher, his Republican counterpart in Kentucky.

Some 20 states, most of them in the south, already have anti-price-gouging laws on their books -- and many governors have declared emergencies to invoke them. These de facto price controls typically place ceilings of between 10% and 25% on how much companies can raise prices in the wake of a natural disaster. In almost all cases such laws are wrong-headed, because they exacerbate supply problems by short-circuiting the price system that matches supply with demand.

As infuriating as higher gas prices will be over the next weeks and perhaps months, there is one economic certainty here: If governments will not allow the price system to ration the demand for gas, a new "price" system will emerge called gas lines, which have already appeared in many locales.

Let's explain why prices have been rising. Katrina has knocked out about 90% of Gulf crude oil production and about 80% of natural gas output. That translates into about two million barrels a day that are not available to consumers, an 11% decrease in supply. This means that in the near term Americans are going to have to consume two million fewer barrels of gas every day, at least until the refineries are brought back on line and increased output and supplies from other nations arrive. The way the market achieves this reduction in consumption is through a higher price.

DOJ_NMG_0003642

The argument is also made that energy companies are reaping windfall profits from the Katrina catastrophe. That is in one sense true -- the oil they've already extracted and refined is more valuable now, and we would be pleased to see some of these extra profits donated to the relief effort. But artificially holding down the price of gas makes a bad situation worse.

This is also why many of the nation's governors are misguided, even if well-intentioned, in their attempts to suspend state gas taxes. Given the high demand for gas and constricted supply, this gas tax cut will have one of two undesirable consequences. If the savings are somehow passed on to consumers at the pump, demand will be elevated, thus heightening the risk of gas lines and/or "sold out" signs at service stations. The alternative is that energy companies will keep the market-clearing pump price the same, and pocket the 10 to 20 cents a gallon reduction in the tax -- which would only increase their windfall. Either way, consumers won't benefit.

So are the gas sellers guilty of "profiteering?" Price gouging laws say companies can't charge significantly more than their "cost." But what matters for wholesalers and gas stations isn't what they paid for the last tanker of fuel but what they expect to pay for the next one. Economists call this the "replacement cost," and any gas station owner would soon be out of business if he charged $2 a gallon for gas that he knew would cost him $2.50 a gallon to replace. As these replacement costs soar, it is entirely appropriate for gas stations to raise prices on a daily, or even hourly, basis.

"If prices do not increase," explained the White House Council of Economic Advisers in a section on "unexpected shortages" its 2004 Report to the President, "consumers do not receive a signal to cut their consumption and suppliers might not have the proper incentives to increase supply adequately."

Anti-gouging laws also punish companies for building excess capacity and reserves in advance of a crisis like the one we're now having. One lesson of Katrina is that we should reward companies for stockpiling oil and gas for the times when it is most urgently needed. Price gouging laws give them no incentive to endure the costs of carrying this excess inventory.

We could fill these pages with all the ways government has undermined U.S. energy security and raised production costs. These include reformulated gas mandates, prohibitions on offshore and Alaska oil drilling, and environmental regulations and price controls that go a long way to explaining why not a single new oil refinery has been built in the U.S. since 1976. Not one -- in 29 years.

These are the longer-term causes of the post-Katrina price increases. And they are energy policy dysfunctions that Congress would do well to fix before the memory of this catastrophe fades. In the meantime we can only hope politicians don't make this crisis worse by engaging in profiteering of their own, at everyone else's expense.

Tom DeLay: No Support To Roll Back Gas Tax (REU-Y2)

Reuters, September 7, 2005

House Republican Leader Tom DeLay said on Tuesday there was no support for rolling back the federal gasoline tax to offset higher prices.

"Absolutely not," he told reporters after a meeting with President George W. Bush on issues related to Hurricane Katrina.

"Now more than ever you're going to need ... that infrastructure, those highway trust funds, to rebuild the bridges that were destroyed, rebuild the railroads that were destroyed. You have to have the infrastructure or you can't have a recovery," DeLay said.

Iran Five Years From Nuclear Arms, Says IISS (FT)

By Peter Spiegel

Financial Times, September 7, 2005

A London-based think-tank which has become a leading authority on the unconventional weapons capabilities of so-called “rogue states” has estimated that Iran could develop enough weapons-grade uranium to develop a nuclear weapon within five years.

But in a 128-page dossier on Iran on Tuesday, the International Institute of Strategic Studies (IISS) also said Iran’s was more likely to build up a production capability over more than a decade and then decide whether to acquire atomic weapons.

The five-year estimate is more aggressive than reported projections of US intelligence agencies, which are believed to have determined Iran is six to ten years away from such a breakthrough. But in spite of a capability to develop weapons-grade uranium by the end of the decade, John Chipman, the IISS director, said that would require Iran to “throw caution to the wind” and ignore the threat of international sanctions, a move Tehran has been reluctant to pursue.

He noted that a more cautious approach – which would involve building a more sophisticated “industrial-scale” centrifuge plant at Natanz – would allow Iran to have a much greater capability to produce the higher enriched uranium needed for weapons in the long-term. Building such a plant would take more than a decade.

DOJ_NMG_0003643

The IISS assessment comes as the 35-member governing board of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) prepares for a crucial meeting on September 19 to decide whether the Iran case should be reported to the UN Security Council for reprimand.

"The logical next step is for this to be reported to the security council," a senior EU diplomat said on Tuesday. The US and Europe face resistance from Russia and China, which argue that Iran has not breached its obligations under the Nuclear non-Proliferation Treaty, which allows it to build a civilian nuclear programme.

The IISS also found that in spite of progress on a centrifuge enrichment programme, it is unclear whether Iran has the capability to actually design and fabricate nuclear weapons from any fissile material it produces.

Moreover, after two years of inspections by the IAEA "Iran does not have any significant stocks of undeclared nuclear weapons-usable fissile materials or is hiding facilities capable of producing such material," said the report.

Although there has been speculation that Iran may have acquired a nuclear design from the network of disgraced Pakistani physicist AQ Kahn, John Chipman, IISS's director, said there is no publicly-available evidence of such a link.

Gary Samore, the former US administration counter-proliferation official who authored the report, declined to comment on any discrepancies between the IISS assessment and official US findings, noting that American intelligence estimates remain classified and reporting on the Bush administration's assessment has been conflicting. Mr Samore added, however, that almost all analysts, including those in the US intelligence community, are relying on a "very similar database" from inspections by the IAEA. Any differences in estimates, he said, are different interpretations of the same data.

"No one can estimate with any precision how long this will take," Mr Samore said, noting there is a long list of hurdles in developing a centrifuge plant that can produce enough "clean" fissile material for a weapon. "Nobody can actually know, including the Iranians themselves, how long it will take to work out those problems."

Nuclear Weapon Is Years Off For Iran, Research Panel Says (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

LONDON, Sept. 6 - A leading British research institute said Tuesday that Iran was at least five years away from producing sufficient material for "a single nuclear weapon," and that it could make one only if it chose to ignore international reaction and "throw caution to the wind."

The researchers, at the International Institute for Strategic Studies, said the conclusions were based on public sources of information, including visits to nuclear sites arranged by Iranian authorities. "Nevertheless," the institute's director, John Chipman, told reporters, "there remains a good deal that cannot be known for certain from the outside."

Dr. Chipman presented the report at a diplomatically delicate time. Iran angered Western negotiators by resuming limited uranium conversion at Isfahan on Aug. 8, ending a suspension of nuclear activities agreed with the European Union last November. And on Sept. 19, the board of the United Nations nuclear watchdog agency is to meet to consider the next step.

Western nations, including the United States, have threatened to refer Iran to the Security Council, where it could face an array of penalties over its nuclear policies.

The United States argues that Iran is using its program to further its ambitions to produce nuclear weapons, but Iran maintains that the program has only peaceful purposes.

The new report broadly concurs with one completed in May by American intelligence agencies, which concluded that Iran was not expected to build a nuclear weapon before the next decade.

The institute's report suggests that Iran has two principal options to produce highly enriched weapons-grade uranium, one at a relatively small pilot centrifuge at Natanz and the other at a planned industrial-scale centrifuge there, which might take more than a decade to build.

"If Iran threw caution to the wind and sought a nuclear weapon capability as quickly as possible without regard for international reaction, it might be able to produce enough highly enriched uranium for a single nuclear weapon by the end of this decade," and then only if it overcame an array of technical difficulties, the report said.

By contrast, "if Teheran does not feel compelled to acquire nuclear weapons urgently or judges that the risk of breaking out with a marginal capacity is too great, it could wait until it completes the industrial-scale centrifuge plant at Natanz."

While that might take more than 10 years, it would make it easier "to pursue covert enrichment options," the report said.

It said Iran's "ability to produce weapons-grade plutonium seems more distant."

The report described Iran's chemical and biological weapons as "much more difficult to assess." In a section on missiles, it said Iran had deployed up to 72 short- and medium-range missiles and possibly 12 intermediate-range missiles capable of striking targets in Israel, Turkey and southern Russia.

Dr. Chipman said the liquid fuel technology for the missiles had been acquired from North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0003644

"As far as is known, Iran's missile forces are armed with conventional high-explosive warheads," he said, adding that Iran could probably build primitive chemical or biological warheads "if it chose to do so."

Describing the diplomatic calculations, Dr. Chipman said it would be important for negotiators "to apply pressure and create inducements to persuade Iran not to develop a fuel-cycle capability that it could turn later into a weapons program."

"On the other hand, it will be important to apply international diplomacy in such a way that does not inspire Iran to abandon all restraint and seek a nuclear-weapons capability without regard to international repercussions," he said.

Compromise Sought For U.N. Meeting (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 6 (Reuters) - Ambassador John R. Bolton of the United States on Tuesday offered compromise language on development and aid spending and climate change to try to resolve a deadlock over a list of goals being prepared for a world summit meeting here next week.

Washington has long and adamantly resisted the Kyoto Protocol on climate change and the United Nations target for increasing foreign aid, supported by most other members.

But with disagreements on those and many other issues surfacing again as a logjam in the preparation of the goals list, Mr. Bolton said the United States was ready to accept the use of the catch-all phase "millennium development goals" throughout the text, "provided it can be properly defined."

He submitted amendments to the group of 32 ambassadors negotiating over issues to be discussed at the summit meeting, which will be held from Sept. 14 to 16.

The phrase millennium development goals refers to objectives on poverty, hunger, primary education, AIDS and other issues, with specific goals to be achieved by 2015. The goals were generally agreed to by leaders at a summit conference in 2000.

In essence, the United States-proposed language including the phrase would commit world leaders to meet obligations they had undertaken in United Nations climate change agreements, including "for many of us, the Kyoto Protocol," according to Mr. Bolton's prepared speaking notes.

The Bolton Edit (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

What's wrong with the following:

"We are encouraged by recent commitments to substantial increases in official development assistance, while recognizing that a substantial increase in ODA is required to achieve the internationally agreed goals including, by 2015, the MDGs."

If your answer is that it's incomprehensible, you're right. But here's another answer: The statement forms part of the document that is Secretary General Kofi Annan's vision for a reformed U.N. and to which world leaders are supposed to affix their names when they meet next week in New York. It is a product of an opaque U.N. process presided over by a former Minister of Information of Gabon.

And it is antithetical to American interests, which is why new U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. John Bolton has taken a red marker to it and dozens of other misbegotten statements and suggested new language in their place. This is causing consternation in predictable quarters, but we hope Mr. Bolton keeps at it.

On foreign aid, for example, he wants to stress not just the amount of assistance, which is the main concern at the U.N. Mr. Bolton wants the U.N. to acknowledge what leaders of the G-8 nations recently agreed to, which is that the aid should go "particularly for countries that are making efforts to use resources wisely, strengthen governance, and reduce poverty through sustainable economic growth."

That is, the aid should go to countries that aren't corrupt and will do something useful with it. By the way, the U.S. has increased its development assistance by 90% since President Bush took office, to $19 billion from $10 billion -- a point rarely mentioned by those who carp about U.S. "stinginess."

There's more. In the section on nonproliferation, the U.N. draft offers a windy sentence on the need for progress in disarmament. Mr. Bolton rightly wants to strike that language, which is often used by Iran and other rogue states as an alibi to skirt their nonproliferation commitments. In its place, he suggests: "The proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and their means of delivery, and the possibility that terrorists might acquire such weapons, remain the greatest threats to international peace and security." As Henry Kissinger likes to say, that has the added advantage of being true.

Some of Mr. Bolton's edits seem small but are literally worth hundreds of millions of dollars. The U.N. draft "commends" the Secretary General "to modernize the United Nations, in particular its headquarters." Mr. Bolton deletes the language about headquarters. Why? The U.N. is seeking to move into temporary Manhattan real estate as it renovates its Turtle Bay facility. Government auditors fear a billion-dollar boondoggle there, and believe millions in savings could be realized if the U.N. alters existing plans.

DOJ_NMG_0003645

He also focuses on management reform, which will come into special focus with the release today of Paul Volcker's fourth report on the Oil for Food scandal. The report will stress Mr. Annan's multiple supervisory failures, yet Mr. Annan wants the world's leaders to accept his reform plan as a fait accompli before Mr. Volcker's findings are even read, much less considered.

For years, the U.N. has got by on the assumption that nobody, at least nobody in the U.S., is paying much attention. Its defenders have spun Mr. Bolton's efforts as a last-minute rogue operation designed to hurt the U.N. But in fact Mr. Bolton is doing Turtle Bay the favor of taking its words seriously. Those who want something more than a feckless and corrupt world body should welcome his efforts.

White House Questions Israel Construction (AJC/AP)

By Barry Schweid, Ap Diplomatic Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — The State Department said Tuesday it had raised with the Israeli government the approval of construction of 117 houses in the Ariel settlement in the heart of the West Bank.

Spokesman Sean McCormack provided no details, but he left little doubt that the administration was displeased.

"Our views on that issue are well-known," McCormack said. And they were expressed recently to the Israeli government, he said.

"We have had an ongoing discussion on this, as well as other issues, with Israel," McCormack said. "It's a close friend and I'm not going to get into the content of those diplomatic exchanges."

The long-held view of U.S. administrations is that an expansion of Israeli settlements on the West Bank could complicate negotiations with the Palestinians over the future of the territory.

Still, the presence of Israeli settlements in Sinai did not prevent a peace treaty in 1979 in which Israel gave all the territory to Egypt. Nor did Israeli settlements in Gaza stop Israel from relinquishing the territory to the Palestinians.

However, the Palestinians and their supporters suspect Prime Minister Ariel Sharon intends to hold onto much of the West Bank and is expanding settlements to tighten Israel's grip on the area.

Meanwhile, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met Tuesday for a half-hour with Karen Koning AbuZayd, counsel-general of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency, on the post-withdrawal situation in Gaza.

"They had a good meeting," McCormack said.

Arafat's Cousin Is Assassinated (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

JERUSALEM — Unidentified gunmen in the Gaza Strip shot and killed Moussa Arafat, a former Palestinian Authority security chief and a cousin of the late Yasser Arafat, at his home in Gaza City before dawn today.

The brazen assault heightened worries about chaos and factional violence in the Gaza Strip following Israel's withdrawal from all 21 Jewish settlements there. Israeli forces are expected to hand over the Gaza Strip in coming weeks, turning the impoverished enclave into a test of Palestinian rule.

Police and witnesses said the attackers arrived at Moussa Arafat's house in a convoy of cars and began firing rocketpropelled grenades at the home, overwhelming his bodyguards. The men then pulled Arafat, 66, from the house and shot him in the street, witnesses said.

The gunmen also seized Arafat's son, Manhal, a security officer thought to be in his 30s, and drove away. Witnesses reported heavy gunfire during the incident.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility. The Palestinian Authority had no immediate comment; officials said they were investigating.

Arafat, who was sacked as head of military intelligence this year, made numerous enemies during his years as a ranking security official and was viewed by many Palestinians as corrupt.

He had survived several assassination attempts, most recently in October when a car parked nearby exploded as his convoy was leaving the main security headquarters in Gaza City. Arafat was not injured.

The shooting may stem from infighting among the rival forces that have sown disorder in Gaza since Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's death in November.

DOJ_NMG_0003646

Moussa Arafat had headed the powerful military intelligence agency since arriving in Gaza in 1994, when the Palestinian Authority was created as a result of the Oslo peace accords.

Over the years, he tangled with Palestinian militants, spearheading a crackdown on Hamas in the mid-1990s.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas removed Arafat from his post but kept him as an advisor.

Transatlantic Divide Deep, Not So Wide, Poll Finds (LAT)

By Sebastian Rotella

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

PARIS — Europeans and Americans have often starkly different views of each other and the world, but agree on some major issues such as promoting democracy and avoiding war with Iran, according to a survey being released today.

As Western leaders try to mend rifts exacerbated since 2003 by the Iraq war, the fourth annual study of European and U.S. public opinion by the German Marshall Fund depicts a complex, wary transatlantic relationship. But the report, an advanced copy of which was given to The Times, also contradicts stereotypes and common wisdom.

Although a majority of Europeans remain hostile to American global dominance and President Bush in particular, they are enthusiastic about the centerpiece of Bush's foreign policy: promoting democracy around the world.

Despite three major terrorist attacks in Europe during the last two years and increased debate about the difficulties of integrating a large Muslim population, Europeans fear terrorism, Islamic extremism and immigration less than Americans do, according to the survey.

And Americans agree with Europeans that the European Union, an economic giant but a military dwarf, should evolve into a global superpower even if that means Europe asserts increasing independence.

The findings reflect the fact that the U.S. and Europe work well together in many places other than Iraq, said John K. Glenn of the German Marshall Fund, a U.S.-European think tank that studies and promotes transatlantic relations.

"The rift over Iraq has taken longer to heal than expected, but things haven't gotten worse," said Glenn, the fund's director of foreign policy, who is based in Washington. "There are very real differences in the way that Americans and Europeans view the world…. You have to separate out the trauma of Iraq, which has been more enduring, more searing if you will, for Europeans than Americans might have expected. The data shows enough common ground that I don't think we are at the beginning of a civilizational split."

The report compiles polling data from the United States, Britain, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, Slovakia, Spain and Turkey, which straddles the Asian and European continents and aspires to join the EU. Pollsters questioned about 1,000 men and women in each country and identified a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

The questions were designed to take the "temperature" of the transatlantic relationship. If Europe and the U.S. were a married couple, the findings suggest that divorce is not imminent, but aggressive counseling would be a good idea.

Europeans have "moderately warm" feelings toward Americans overall, the survey found. Britons and Italians are the most positive, Spaniards and Turks the most anti-American.

In contrast, the survey found, "Americans give their European allies more positive evaluations." The surge of anti-French feeling after Paris' leadership in opposing the Iraq invasion has apparently abated. American warmth toward France increased for the second year in a row, going from 45 to 53 on a scale of 1 to 100. Because European politics tend to be further to the left than those in the U.S., ideological antipathy to the Bush administration shapes European attitudes.

But Europeans agree with the president's drive for democracy in the Middle East and elsewhere, the centerpiece of his foreign policy in his second term, the survey found.

About 74% of European respondents, compared with 51% of Americans, want their governments to help establish democracy in other countries. The breakdown in responses among Americans was 76% among Republican voters and 43% of Democrats, probably because the latter associate the "democracy promotion" phrase with Bush, Glenn said.

That means European views on the matter resemble those of the GOP, contradicting at least on this issue the image of Democrats as being ideologically closer to Europe.

Both Americans and Europeans favor "soft" tactics such as election monitoring over use of force to spread democracy, the poll found.

"There are unexpected areas where Europeans and Americans can work together if we separate military intervention as an exceptional case from overall policies," Glenn said.

In fact, the Bush administration teams with France and other European allies in hot spots such as Ukraine, where they collaborated in helping reformists take power; Lebanon, where they joined to pressure Syrian forces to leave; and Afghanistan, where European troops play a front-line role.

DOJ_NMG_0003647

The public on both continents backs the EU diplomatic approach to the dispute with Iran over Tehran's nuclear ambitions. Only 5% of Europeans and 15% of Americans support a military solution. And slim majorities want human rights reforms in China as a condition for increased trade with Beijing.

Nonetheless, the transatlantic divide widens when it comes to global threats. Americans consistently see the world as a more dangerous place.

"Americans feel significantly more likely to be personally affected by terrorism (71% vs. 53% of Europeans), by the spread of nuclear weapons (67% vs. 55%) and by Islamic fundamentalism (50% vs. 40%)," the report says. At the same time, Europeans worry more than Americans (73% to 64%) about global warming, the survey found.

A key factor for the divergence is the resounding effect on the American psyche of the Sept. 11 attacks, Glenn said.

U.S. Fails To Mend Image In Europe (WSJ)

By Marc Champion

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

LONDON -- Months after President Bush launched a campaign to repair strained relations with Europe, he has made no progress with Europe's public.

An annual survey of opinion in 11 countries published today finds that, while the U.S.'s image no longer is sliding downward, Europeans feel no warmer toward the U.S. than they did a year ago, are no less hostile to U.S. global leadership and still disapprove overwhelmingly of the way Mr. Bush handles foreign policy.

"We found that, despite major efforts to repair relations, there is still a rift in how we view each other and the world," said Craig Kennedy, president of the German Marshall Fund, which conducted the survey of roughly 1,000 people in the U.S. and about 1,000 people in each of nine European Union countries, plus Turkey, in June.

After his re-election last year, Mr. Bush selected Europe for the first trip of his second term and visited Brussels, home to the EU institutions, and Germany. His new secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, had just visited Paris on her tour to prepare the visit. The efforts were intended to offer an olive branch to the countries that opposed the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003.

With Mr. Bush's fellow leaders, also eager to repair bridges, his outreach seemed to work. Since last year, the U.S. has cooperated closely with France to help push Syria out of Lebanon; it has held out the possibility of World Trade Organization membership to Iran in an effort to help the Europeans negotiate nuclear concessions from that country; and it has gained some credit for Israel's pullout from the Gaza Strip. A disagreement over the EU's plan to lift its arms embargo on China also receded when the EU delayed a decision in June.

For the wider public, however, continuing bloodshed and instability in Iraq dominate. Since the poll was taken, the recent hurricane disaster on the U.S. Gulf Coast also appears to have rekindled distaste for the U.S.'s political system and social values, which are blamed here for leaving thousands of mainly poor and black New Orleans residents behind when the rest of the city evacuated.

"A presidential visit to Europe doesn't counteract all the media attention to the Iraq war," Mr. Kennedy said.

The survey points up some bedrock differences between American and European values. For example, more Americans than Europeans consistently favor the use of force and economic sanctions, while fewer Americans worry about global warming.

Hostility toward U.S. foreign policies also is clear in the 10 non-U.S. countries surveyed: France, Germany, the U.K., Italy, the Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, Spain, Slovakia and Turkey. Some 36% of Europeans think it is desirable that the U.S. exert strong global leadership, while 59% don't -- almost identical to last year and approximately the inverse of findings in 2002. The survey's margin of error was plus or minus three percentage points.

Similarly, 23% of Europeans approve and 72% disapprove of the way Mr. Bush handles foreign policy -- compared with 20% who approved last year and 75% who disapproved. Asked to say how warmly they felt about countries on a scale of 1 to 100, Europeans gave the U.S. 50 -- compared with 52 last year and 64 in 2002. Britons remain warmest to the U.S., at 57, down from 62 last year. Turks remain the coolest, at 28.

The survey also found that European hostility toward EU membership for Turkey is growing as the start of membership talks approaches on Oct. 3. Just 22% of Europeans outside Turkey said its membership would be a good thing, compared with 30% a year earlier.

Zoellick Details Discussions With China On Future Of The Korean Peninsula (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003648

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her deputy, Robert B. Zoellick, have begun to explore with Chinese leaders the economic and political future of the Korean Peninsula "because the status quo was not going to hold," Zoellick said in an interview with a small group of reporters yesterday.

China is North Korea's chief patron, supplying much of its energy, and has played an important role in prodding the reclusive communist country to return to six-nation talks about the elimination of its nuclear programs. The talks are in recess but could resume as early as next week.

Zoellick, who held nearly 20 hours of talks on a variety of issues in Beijing in early August, said it was clear the Chinese did not "want a collapsed state on their border," a concern that he suggested had hamstrung Chinese officials in pressing North Korea on its illicit weapons programs. He said that in his talks, he picked up a discussion on the Korean Peninsula's future that Rice had initiated during an earlier trip to Beijing.

"Part of what I was trying to explain to them was that the status quo was not going to hold anyway," Zoellick said. "The status quo wouldn't hold in part because we would have to take defensive countermeasures of various types" against not only Pyongyang's nuclear activities but counterfeiting and other criminal activities. "It's a criminal state," he said.

The effort by Rice and Zoellick appeared to be aimed at reducing the anxiety of the Chinese over a possible reunification of North and South Korea. The North is viewed by China as a buffer against having U.S. troops close to China's border.

Zoellick also suggested that the United States was interested in using the six-nation talks -- which also include South Korea, Russia and Japan -- as a springboard for creating a multilateral security framework for northern Asia that would mirror organizations in the southeastern part of the continent.

Zoellick said he urged the Chinese to consider scenarios for the Korean Peninsula that "would be benign to us and which would be benign to them." He said he told the Chinese that the United States had always supported reunification and emphasized that "we think it would be healthy if the North Koreans took a Chinese model of economic development."

President Bush postponed a planned visit to the White House today by Chinese President Hu Jintao to continue dealing with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. The visit has not been rescheduled, but Bush and Hu will meet on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly next week.

Zoellick said that the Chinese, preoccupied with managing internal challenges, indicated they were puzzled by the anxiety in Washington over China's economic rise.

He said he tried to explain why China's integration into the world economy had generated such concern, although yesterday he offered a relatively benign interpretation of Chinese intentions in the energy field.

Zoellick said that in a global marketplace, China cannot simply lock up energy resources, as some have feared. He said that if China obtains its oil from Venezuela, a major U.S. supplier, he did not feel the United States would be "threatened . . . because if it is an emergency situation and we had to interrupt the energy flow, would you rather interrupt it in the Caribbean or in Russia?"

He said he did not know if the Chinese deals being struck with countries the United States considers problematic were driven by individual bureaucracies seeking market openings or part of a "strategic plan."

But Zoellick said he warned the Chinese that the deals with such countries as Sudan, Burma and Iran had the prospect of backfiring, from a broader foreign policy perspective, because "what advantage do you really gain over time if you are associated with genocide and guys who are running their countries into the ground?"

Rural Activist Seized In Beijing (WP)

By Philip P. Pan

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

BEIJING, Sept. 6 -- Local authorities on Tuesday seized a rural activist who has been leading a high-profile legal campaign against the use of forced sterilization and abortion in China, in an apparent effort to block him from meeting with senior government officials who had expressed support for his cause.

The detention of Chen Guangcheng, 34, a blind peasant who has been preparing a class-action lawsuit to challenge population-control abuses in the eastern city of Linyi, occurred a few days after he arrived in Beijing for meetings with lawyers and journalists. He was seized just as the Chinese government opened an international legal conference here.

Several men in plain clothes grabbed Chen when he left an apartment building on Tuesday afternoon, witnesses said. The men did not identify themselves, and Chen resisted, shouting for help as they dragged him across a parking lot and pushed him headfirst into an unmarked car with tinted windows, the witnesses said.

A small group of people, upset by seeing the rough treatment, surrounded the vehicle and prevented it from driving away. As two men held Chen down in the back seat, he could be heard screaming and appeared to be in pain.

DOJ_NMG_0003649

Residents called Beijing police. Two uniformed officers arrived, consulted with the men who had seized Chen, then cleared a way for the car to leave. The officers said the men who seized Chen were police from China's Shandong province, where Linyi is located. Tu Bisheng, a friend who was with Chen at the time, said local officials from Linyi were also present.

"We feel this is extremely inappropriate," said Li Heping, one of the lawyers working with Chen. He said the Linyi officials appeared to be "taking revenge on him for trying to protect the rights of local citizens and exercising his right to criticize the government."

A spokesman for the Shandong public security bureau said he knew nothing about Chen's detention and declined to accept questions about the case.

Chen was seized just hours after meeting with a reporter who works for Time magazine, Tu said. Over the past few days, Chen also met with a Washington Post correspondent, diplomats from the U.S. Embassy and several lawyers in Beijing who have volunteered to help him sue officials in Linyi, a city of 10 million located about 400 miles southeast of Beijing.

In March, residents said, the Linyi government began requiring parents with two children to be sterilized and forcing women pregnant with a third child to have abortions. Officials also have been detaining family members of such people who fled, beating them and holding them hostage until their relatives return and submit to the operations, according to residents interviewed in Linyi.

Chen's attempt to organize a class-action lawsuit against Linyi was the subject of a report in The Washington Post on Aug. 27. At the time, officials in Beijing said the practices described by Linyi residents were illegal and expressed support for the lawsuit.

After publication of the article, the National Population and Family Planning Commission, the cabinet-level ministry that manages population growth in China, sent a team of officials to investigate the allegations in Linyi. The investigators tried to meet with Chen, but he had already traveled to Beijing.

In an interview before his arrest, Chen said he was thinking about meeting with commission officials, but was worried about being arrested.

A commission official, contacted by telephone, said the ministry was unaware of Chen's detention and could not immediately comment on it. The official said the ministry would try to contact Shandong authorities to determine what happened to Chen. The ministry considers the Linyi case a priority and will severely punish family planning officials who violate the law, the official said.

Provincial authorities wield tremendous power in China's one-party political system and often disobey ministries in the central government. But the seizure of Chen represents an unusually public act of defiance, which could embarrass the governing Communist Party as it seeks to project an image that it has abandoned coercive methods to limit population growth.

Local officials throughout China began using forced abortions and compulsory sterilization to enforce the one-child policy in the early 1980s, but the central government since the mid-1990s has tried to eliminate such practices and move toward a more flexible system of economic rewards and fines to slow population growth.

Jerome Cohen, a specialist on Chinese law at New York University who is teaching in Beijing this fall, said he met with Chen on Monday night and discussed the risks of the lawsuit with him. Chen was determined to press ahead, Cohen said.

"This seems to be a case of local officials who have blatantly abused their legal powers, and have no legitimate defense against the case he brought against them, resorting to extralegal methods to cut off his ability to pursue justice," Cohen said. "It's very, very sad, and another example of how rough the legal situation is in rural areas."

For First Time, Egypt Has More Than 1 Presidential Candidate (USAT)

By Charles Levinson

USA Today, September 7, 2005

CAIRO — Egyptians will have a choice for the first time in their country's 7,000-year history when they vote for a leader at polls today. But a majority appear likely to vote for the man who has ruled this country for the past 24 years.

President Hosni Mubarak, 77, who is running for a fifth six-year term, is backed by a formidable party machine and a regime that controls the media, the economy and the government.

“No one seriously doubts that Mubarak is going to win a fifth term in Egypt's first competitive presidential elections," says Michael C. Dunn, editor of The Middle East Journal, a quarterly publication of the Middle East Institute. “Because of the nature of the elections — the high bar for independent candidates, which virtually prevents their running, and the restrictions on who may run from a recognized party, which prevents Muslim Brotherhood candidates from standing under another party banner — many dismiss the whole exercise. It is certainly not a competitive race in any normal sense."

Mubarak has been elected four times, but always in single candidate yes-no referendums. In February, facing growing pressure at home and abroad, he announced that Egypt would hold its first multi-candidate presidential election.

DOJ_NMG_0003650

Of the nine men challenging Mubarak, only two are widely known. Noman Gomaa, 71, leads the weak Wafd Party. Ayman Nour, 41, is a lawyer who took the helm of the 11-month-old Tomorrow Party, which is competing against long-established and well-organized parties. Both are self-identified liberals. The Muslim Brotherhood, a better organized Islamic opposition group, has been banned for 50 years.

Egypt is contending with double-digit unemployment and inflation. Still, many voters remain loyal to Mubarak. In a region beset by conflict, Mubarak has guided Egypt through a period of protracted stability. Egyptians who remember the wars and tumult of earlier eras say they are thankful to Mubarak.

"I care about my children, and we haven't had a war," says Eid Tilib, 57, a teacher with rutty scars on his legs and arms from the 1967 and 1973 wars against Israel. "I know Mubarak is old, and there are problems. There is unemployment. But Mubarak has protected my children, so I must protect him."

Today's vote follows three weeks of rare political openness. During the 19-day campaign, opposition candidates toured the country freely, staged public rallies and railed against corruption, unemployment — and even Mubarak. A few years ago, few dared to publicly criticize the president. "This is a total mindset change for the country that is going to enrich the political system," says Hossam Badrawi, a Mubarak campaign official.

However, a government-appointed election commission has been given unimpeachable powers over the vote. It rejected a court ruling allowing independent monitors. A higher court then supported the commission's decision. The government also has ignored requests by the Bush administration to allow international observers.

Angry over the refusal to allow monitors, hundreds of judges, the traditional overseers of Egyptian elections, have begun to speak out. They say there is nothing to prevent widespread fraud. .

"Egyptians are no longer afraid," says Saad Eddin Ibrahim, a democracy advocate jailed by the regime in 2000 after he pointed out electoral fraud. Ibrahim, speaking Tuesday at the Woodrow Wilson Center for International Scholars in Washington, said Egypt still doesn't have democracy as it is known in the West. "That will take another generation," Ibrahim says.

Germans Lean To Right (CSM)

By Andreas Tzortzis

The Christian Science Monitor, September 7, 2005

BERLIN - A few days after the only TV debate between Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and his conservative challenger Angela Merkel in the run-up to Sept. 18 elections, the verdict was almost unanimous.

The media-savvy chancellor had, as expected, won the exchange, according to flash polls. But Germans elect parties, not the main candidates. And for three months, those poll numbers have shown Mr. Schroeder's Social Democratic Party (SPD) a good 10 points behind Ms. Merkel's Christian Democratic Union (CDU) - pointing to a growing likelihood that the former East German physicist will end the chancellor's seven-year rule.

In a campaign that has taken cues from US-style spin and image-shaping, a Merkel win would bring a shift to the right that promises better communication with the US, a critical voice in the pledge to include Turkey in the European Union, and - most important - a more aggressive approach to Germany's greatest problem: the economy.

Seven years since he made his promise to bring down unemployment to less than 3 million, the country's jobless number more than 4.7 million.

The economic situation, and the political defeats it has caused his party in several state elections over the past year, is what prompted Schroeder in May to call for elections one year early.

For the roughly 30 percent of people who polls show as undecided, Sunday's debate offered little that is new. The flash polls conducted after the debate showed people had more or less expected each candidate to perform as they did: Schroeder was confident and jovial; Merkel, not as warm, but very authoritative.

The impressions gell with the packaging that hordes of advisers and campaign staff for the country's two major parties had fashioned for their lead candidates at rousing party congresses and flashy stump speeches ahead of Sunday's debate. If the methods employed - campaign theme songs, bus tours throughout the country, even call centers - look familiar, it's because they are. In shaping their candidates and messages, the parties are increasingly borrowing methods fashioned and perfected in the United States, say former media advisors and analysts.

"The Americanization of German campaigning is, above all, a professionalization of the campaigns," says Michael Spreng.

In 2002, Mr. Spreng managed the conservative candidate Edmund Stoiber's failed campaign bid to unseat Schroeder as chancellor. The election marked the first time in Germany candidates held televised debates with one another. Spreng sent an assistant to the US to research debate rules and watch videotape of past debates.

DOJ_NMG_0003651

The 2005 campaign has seen even more borrowed elements from the US. Merkel's campaign team has set up a professional call center to handle queries from voters, and a so-called "rapid response" team that contradicts inaccuracies made by Schroeder in speeches or attacks on his opponent, says a CDU campaign official.

The conservatives' party congress, held on Aug. 21, featured a one-and-a-half-hour performance by singers from the musical "Queen" and the arrival of Merkel to raucous cheers and a sea of orange placards bearing the name "Angie," a very un-German nickname given the candidate by her campaign and likely designed to broaden her appeal.

"It was completely new in the party's history," says the official. "Almost the entire party congress was designed with show and television in mind. It was pretty modern for a conservative, white-bread party like ours."

Like the party's use of the Rolling Stones song "Angie" at stump speeches, the congress was designed to lend a little flash to a candidate who voters think of as capable, but uninspiring, says the official. "We wanted to stir up some emotions," he says.

The SPD offered a toned-down version of their party congress last week in order to serve as a contrast to the conservatives. Campaign manager Kajo Wasserhoevel said the party will use grass-roots methods like canvassing - that the SPD first learned by watching John F. Kennedy's campaign in 1960 - in the final weeks. But the party will continue to personalize the campaign, building on Schroeder's high popularity ratings in an effort to sway voters to his party.

"We want to show his strengths, his courage in reforming the country and his work for peace," says Mr. Wasserhoevel.

Some critics say this type of personalization is strange in a political system where the party, not the individual, is the focal point and worry about a campaign future based on style, not substance. But campaign veterans like Peter Radunski, a political consultant and former campaign manager for Chancellor Helmut Kohl, say it's the natural development in the age of television, and with a candidate as telegenic and accomplished in front of the camera as Schroeder.

"You could call it Americanization, but you could also call it a modernization," says Mr. Radunski. "If there's television, then you should use it."

There are some things German strategists will never be able to copy. Broadcast rules restrict campaign ads to being shown only on select channels in the evening time, sparing voters an avalanche of campaign spots.

German campaigns will also never be able to match the money shelled out by US Democrats and Republicans. Germans typically don't contribute to campaigns, and the 25 million euros ($31 million) the SPD is planning to spend and the 23 euros million the CDU will spend, pale in comparison to the figures spent on the other side of the Atlantic. Even if they had such cash, Spreng says a complete adoption of American campaign tactics would be a waste of money.

"It's never going to be as showy as in America," says Spreng. "The voters understand it's part of a show ... but they know not to mix more politics and show business. The Germans are more fact-based and skeptical."

Venezuela Seizes Idled Plant Of Heinz Subsidiary (WSJ/DJN)

By Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

CARACAS, Venezuela -- Alimentos Heinz, a Venezuela subsidiary of H.J. Heinz Co., said a government takeover of an inactive tomato-processing plant in recent days lacks legal backing.

The company, which makes Heinz ketchup, yesterday said the government never notified it of a possible takeover or of any plans to expropriate the plant.

"We hope the reasons for these actions are clarified since the company has received no notice from the authorities about the intervention/expropriation," the company said.

Heinz officials couldn't be reached for additional comment.

The plant, in the state of Maturin, wasn't operating because low market demand and low prices didn't make it feasible to keep it running, the company said. Company officials are seeking a meeting with Vice President José Vicente Rangel and Agriculture Ministry officials to discuss the problem, the statement added.

A Venezuelan state governor ordered the military to seize the inactive plant late last week.

State officials said the takeover sought to protect the plant from looting.

President Hugo Chávez has warned that idle land and company assets could be declared as "public interest" and expropriated. His government already has seized the assets of two failed companies by first sending in troops to secure the assets and then approving an expropriation in Congress.

The Chávez government has recently taken over the grain-storage facilities of Alimentos Polar, the largest food company in Venezuela. Polar also is disputing the takeover.

Why Japan Seems Content To Be Run By One Party (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

DOJ_NMG_0003652

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

TOKYO, Sept. 6 - The Liberal Democratic Party, which has governed Japan nearly continuously for half a century, appears headed for another victory in the general election on Sunday - a big one, if polls are correct.

And this will delay, again, the start of a new political era in which power is transferred regularly from one party to another, as it is in other democracies.

Japan's democracy is East Asia's oldest, but its ruling party has held power almost as long as the Communist parties in China and North Korea. Younger democracies in South Korea and Taiwan have already experienced changes in ruling parties, and the underpinnings of democracies, from vibrant civil societies to strong, independent news media, appear to be flourishing there more than they are here.

Since calling an early election last month, Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi has shrewdly refashioned the image of the Liberal Democrats into the party of reform by fielding telegenic women as candidates and portraying opponents of his signature postal privatization bill as reactionaries. The main opposition Democratic Party, whose gains in recent years now face erosion, has looked on helplessly.

In the past, when issues were rarely raised in campaigns, politicians ran simply by promising favors to supporters, said Masayasu Kitagawa, a former Liberal Democratic lawmaker, independent governor of Mie Prefecture and now a professor at Waseda University.

"The relationship was that of patron and client," Mr. Kitagawa said. "This was not actually democracy, but rather the opposite of democracy."

To encourage political accountability and voter awareness, Mr. Kitagawa has been the leading proponent of election "manifestoes" detailing parties' agendas. The word and concept was little understood in the general election two years ago, but it has taken root this time, with both main parties proffering their manifestoes.

"I'd be satisfied if the introduction of manifestoes made Japanese realize that what they had believed to be democracy was an illusion," he said.

The illusion was formed in 1955 with the foundation of the Liberal Democratic Party, which focused single-mindedly on turning Japan into an economic power. With strong support from the United States and the powerful bureaucracy, as well as effective pork-barrel politics, the party's grip on power went unshaken for decades.

Internal factions vied for power, but decisions were made and some prime ministers even chosen in backroom deals. Because of the cold war and Japan's military dependence on the United States, the longtime opposition, the Socialists, were never taken seriously.

Voters feared that "the friendly Japan-U.S. relationship would be destroyed and Japan would become poor once more if the L.D.P. government collapsed and the Socialists came to power," said Eiji Oguma, an associate professor of policy management at Keio University.

A split inside the party led to a 10-month ouster from power in 1993. During that brief period, however, a coalition of minor parties pushed through far-reaching reforms, including changing multiseat districts into single-seat ones, that would eventually weaken the dominance of the Liberal Democrats.

The present main opposition Democratic Party, which was formed in 1998, has been gaining voters in recent years, especially in urban areas. But the half-century rule by a single party has stunted the growth of Japanese democracy, experts say, and its effects are still being felt today.

Civil society remains weak. Although private organizations focusing on welfare and international aid have mushroomed in recent years, those delving into delicate issues, like human rights, freedom of information and the workings of government, wield little influence. Japanese feel little personal connection with their country's democracy, said Yukiko Miki, executive director of Information Clearinghouse Japan, a private group that fights to gain access to government-held information.

"Japanese citizens are ultimate free riders," Ms. Miki said. "Support from citizens is necessary to form a base for democracy, but Japanese people don't seem to feel they are the ones who should support civil society."

The Liberal Democrats' grip on power has also limited the dissemination of information. For instance, the Internet has raised interest in elections elsewhere and was widely credited with helping propel South Korea's president, Roh Moo Hyun, to power in 2003. But here in one of the world's most wired countries, election law bars Web sites from promoting candidates for a specific election and candidates from renewing their home pages during the 12-day campaign period.

The Liberal Democrats have maintained the restrictions because their core supporters tend to be older and are not likely to be heavy Internet users.

Yoshito Hori, an entrepreneur, recently created the YES! Project, a Web site that encourages young Japanese to vote and discuss politics. "By using the Internet, you can reach people in their 20's to their early 40's, people who were uninterested in politics," Mr. Hori said.

DOJ_NMG_0003653

With no history of power alternation, the mass media tend to stick to the Liberal Democratic Party's line. In this election, the press has ignored issues like Mr. Koizumi's policy toward Asian countries or his deployment of troops to Iraq that would likely hurt the party at the ballot box. (The opposition Democratic Party has said it would withdraw Japanese troops from Iraq and repair relations with its Asian neighbors.) Since April 2004, no major Japanese news organization has sent a journalist to cover the Japanese troops in Samawa, in southern Iraq.

Just as these pillars of Japanese democracy tend to be tenuous, experts doubt the soundness of the main Democratic Party opposition. The party, made up of former Liberal Democrats, Socialists and other groups, famously lacks unity and could disintegrate if it loses badly.

But Park Cheol Hee, an expert in Japanese politics at Seoul National University, said a more mature democracy was set to emerge here.

"This is the last stage of one-party rule," Mr. Park said. "I don't think the L.D.P. will rule for another 50 years - possibly another 5 or 10. The Democratic Party might fail this time, but they will try again. This will eventually produce a competitive, two-party system and lead Japan to a true democracy."

As Japan Votes, Aid To Countryside Hangs In Balance (WSJ)

By Sebastian Moffett And Ginny Parker Woods

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

HIWA, Japan -- In elections this Sunday, Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi is betting he can win a mandate to engineer a shift no other Japanese leader has ever dared. His goal: To cut off the decades-long tradition of propping up Japan's declining countryside, and channel resources into the nation's successful cities and industries instead.

To achieve that vision, Mr. Koizumi plans to dismantle one of the countryside's biggest crutches, the huge and unusual post office, which in addition to selling stamps also acts as a bank and insurer. It is a vast network of 26,000 offices with 280,000 public employees, plus $3 trillion in savings and life-insurance deposits. The deposits are typically funneled into public-spending projects that have boosted rural economies.

That system has long been a boon to remote villages like Hiwa in the mountains of western Japan. Hiwa's 600 residents are mainly elderly and get around on electric wheelchairs. Its only industry is rice farming.

Hiwa has benefited from many public-works projects through the post office, such as a new tunnel and a smooth road partly connecting the village to a neighboring town -- even though there's hardly any traffic. When the weather is bad, the local postmaster helps residents by withdrawing their cash from the post-office bank and delivering it to their doors.

"It would be tough if the post office went away," says 88-year-old Shizue Miura, who walked 20 minutes to the post office recently to withdraw money. Without the branch, Ms. Miura says she would have to travel more than six miles to the next village to get her money from a different branch.

Mr. Koizumi says bitter medicine is the only way for Japan to survive. The country's central government stoked rural economies for more than three decades with road and bridge projects, trying to haul up the countryside to city levels of prosperity. But the attempt to invigorate the rural economies failed. The spending added to snowballing national debt, which is now 163% of gross domestic product, the highest level among major industrialized nations. In the U.S., national debt is 66% of GDP, according to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development.

So Mr. Koizumi is withdrawing support for villages like Hiwa. Since taking office in 2001, he has promoted a small-government recipe for Japan, slashing subsidies to the regions. "They said there's no money anymore," says Katsumasa Miyake, who leads policy planning for the prefecture government of Shimane, where Hiwa is located. "Part of the process of putting the national finances right is that the regions have to suffer."

Mr. Koizumi is betting Japan's future on proven successes. That means big cities like the capital Tokyo, which is emerging from the nation's "lost decade" of economic gloom and is bustling with new office and shopping developments. It also includes private corporations, many of which have reported record profits over the past two years, spurred by deregulation and lowered corporate taxes that Mr. Koizumi put in place.

Mr. Koizumi's attempt to overhaul Japan is crucial to the world's second-largest economy. The country entered a long slump in the early 1990s after its stock and property bubbles burst. When Mr. Koizumi took office, prices of land, industrial products and consumer goods were falling steadily in the economy-shrinking phenomenon known as deflation. Japan's financial system was also jammed with bad loans made during the bubble era.

Since 2003, the economy has brightened, fueled by corporate cost cutting and surging exports to China's roaring manufacturing sector. Mr. Koizumi's policies have also helped. Following a bank-cleanup package in 2002, bad loans are now less than half their 2002 total of $480 billion. Unemployment has fallen to 4.4% from a 2002 peak of 5.5%. The economy grew 2% in 2003 and 1.9% in 2004, and economists are expecting similar growth this year.

DOJ_NMG_0003654

Still, Japan's fast-aging population and declining birthrate are causing a long-term decline in the size of the total work force. With fewer workers, the country could find it hard to grow. One solution is to use resources more efficiently so each Japanese worker produces more.

Mr. Koizumi called the election last month after failing to pass bills to privatize the post office. He has vowed to revive the plan if he wins. In the bills, Mr. Koizumi proposed splitting the post office into four separate and privatized businesses -- one each for mail delivery, banking services and insurance, with a fourth handling employee salaries and managing post-office properties. If the plan had been put in place, postal workers would have lost their civil-servant status. The privatization process would have kicked off in 2007, and the post office would sell shares in its four companies by 2017.

The bills were rejected largely because of the workings of parliamentary politics. The main opposition Democratic Party of Japan voted against the bills because they favor a different form of post-office privatization. In a crucial swing vote, some rebel lawmakers from Mr. Koizumi's ruling Liberal Democratic Party also opposed the bills.

Postal privatization has since gained public support because Mr. Koizumi's risky and dramatic decision to call an election over the issue appealed to voters. According to the most recent poll by the daily newspaper Sankei Shimbun, 38% of respondents supported Mr. Koizumi and the LDP, compared with just 20% for the opposition Democratic Party. If his party and a coalition fail to win a majority of seats, Mr. Koizumi says he will resign, clouding the future of his plan.

All of this leaves provinces like Shimane on edge. The prefecture thrived under Japan's old system. With its local industries -- silver mining and charcoal -- long dead, Shimane received a steady flow of public-works projects from the central government, some of which were financed by savings in the post-office bank. The prefecture has two airports, even though it is sparsely populated. Public investment is 15.7% of the prefecture's gross domestic product, compared with 2.1% for Tokyo, according to the San-in Economics and Management Institute, a research center affiliated with Shimane's biggest bank.

But these projects failed to spark momentum. One airport has just four flights a day. A 50-acre industrial estate set up near Hiwa in 1997 attracted one company. The estate is now being converted into a prison complex. Five years ago, a city government built a $60 million bridge to a nearby island with 324 inhabitants. It said it planned to build a fish breeding center there, but the facility hasn't materialized.

Since Mr. Koizumi took office, the value of public works in Shimane has been cut sharply. In 2004, the spending fell to $998 million, down 32% from $1.5 billion in 2002. It is set to halve again by 2008.

While reducing subsidies to the regions, Mr. Koizumi has lowered corporate taxes and boosted tax breaks for technology investments. In response, more than 760 large Japanese manufacturers surveyed by the nation's Ministry of Economy, Trade and Industry recently said they plan to increase domestic capital investment by 21% in the fiscal year through March 2006 over the previous year. Foreign firms such as Pfizer Inc. and Cisco Systems Inc. are also increasing their investment in Japan. Mr. Koizumi has "crafted a lot of policies that benefit companies," says Yoshiharu Obata, an official at the Keidanren, Japan's largest business organization.

As Shimane struggles, Tokyo is thriving. Tokyo's land prices began rising this year for the first time in 13 years, while Shimane's continued to fall. Tokyo's population has grown to 12.2 million, up 5.2% from 11.6 million in 1997. Shimane's population has fallen 20% to 749,000, down from a 1955 peak of 929,000. A quarter of its residents are over 60, making Shimane Japan's oldest prefecture.

The migration to cities will likely increase as Japan's population declines and ages, says Hiroyuki Tada, general manager of the Space and Environment Institute, a research institute at Mitsui Fudosan Co., one of the country's largest real-estate developers. He says the elderly will relocate to urban areas where medical care is concentrated. Younger people are also moving to cities to find jobs.

That trend is apparent to Shimane resident Toshimitsu Fukushima. The 70-year-old worked for telephone company Nippon Telegraph & Telephone Corp. in Shimane's biggest city, Matsue, where he met his wife nearly half a century ago. He maintained wireless equipment and she worked in the telephone exchange. "Fifty years ago there were more jobs," he says. "Now there is no need for those kinds of jobs."

All three of Mr. Fukushima's children have moved to the Tokyo area. His son, Masao, 41, works for a big shipping company and says in an interview that he plans to spend his working life in the city. He envies high-school friends who stayed in Shimane for their spacious homes with yards, while he lives in a small apartment in central Tokyo. But, he says, "I couldn't return home to Shimane if I wanted to -- there's hardly any work there."

Shimane voters are split over Mr. Koizumi's plans. In the past, they always delivered an LDP representative to the national parliament in Tokyo. But this time, postal reform has complicated matters.

Mr. Koizumi is refusing to let the rebel LDP politicians who voted against the postal bills to stand as party candidates. One of those is Shimane politician Hisaoki Kamei, 65, who is now running as a candidate for a small, newly formed party in the western part of the prefecture, which includes Hiwa.

DOJ_NMG_0003655

Mr. Kamei's posters call him the "Friend of the Common People." He doesn't like Mr. Koizumi's administration, which he says has widened the gaps between the city and country, large and small business, and the rich and poor. "You have to have public infrastructure that allows people everywhere -- in the cities and the country -- to have the same quality of life," he says. "Otherwise, the countryside is just going to become harder and harder to live in."

Mr. Kamei's opponent, the official LDP candidate, is Wataru Takeshita, half-brother of a former prime minister. Mr. Takeshita supports postal privatization.

One voter, Kazuharu Shimogaki, is president of a construction company in central Shimane, and did well out of Japan's old system. At its peak in 1995, his company, Shimogaki Construction Co., generated $5.5 million of revenue from publicly funded civil-engineering projects.

Today, such work brings in just a tenth of that amount. Mr. Shimogaki has branched out to new businesses like growing blueberries, which are popular among Japan's elderly after reports several years ago that the fruit may be good for eyes.

Mr. Shimogaki accepts the days of big public works projects are over, and thinks it's time to move on and develop new businesses rather than cling to the past. So he has decided to vote for Mr. Takeshita as a way of backing Mr. Koizumi. "Japan has come to a turning point," he says.

In Hiwa, many residents aren't as confident. Mr. Koizumi's postal bills provided some funds to maintain the post-office network. But because a privatized organization would have to try to make a profit, village locals assume those funds wouldn't last. Eventually, many believe, branches such as Hiwa Post Office would disappear.

Hiwa Postmaster Chikashi Teramoto, the local postmaster for the past 16 years, won't say which way he plans to vote. But the 46-year-old admits to being concerned about the future of the shrinking village. The automated teller machine at the local agricultural cooperative, the only one in the village besides the one at the post office, is scheduled to disappear next year. After that, without the post office, villagers would have to travel through a 1.5-mile tunnel to the next village to withdraw their pension money.

"What would happen if a wheelchair battery went dead in the tunnel?" Mr. Teramoto says.

On a recent outing, Mr. Teramoto surveyed Hiwa. An elderly couple struggled to gather the first rice of their harvest from a paddy field. He pointed to a building that looks inhabitable. "That's an empty house," he said. "They've gone to Osaka," the biggest city in western Japan. Further along the road, he pointed again: "They've gone to Hiroshima."

Chirac's Illness Remains A Mystery, Despite Official Details (NYT)

By Katrin Bennhold And Elisabeth Rosenthal, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

PARIS, Sept. 6 - After a series of minimalist medical bulletins describing President Jacques Chirac's stay in a Paris hospital, it is still a public mystery what kind of neurological malady has befallen him, although French military doctors at this point certainly know the diagnosis, independent experts said.

Because of the French tradition of secrecy regarding the health of its leaders, it is unclear if Mr. Chirac is suffering from a minor condition or a potentially life-threatening illness. He has not been seen on television since his admission.

The terse phrases officially released have sought to play down the illness, but they have often sounded like a contradiction in terms, talking of a "little vascular accident," and a "slight vision problem," which nonetheless merited a week's hospital stay.

A vascular accident means a problem with a blood vessel, which is almost always serious - or a signal of something serious to come. It includes strokes, torn blood vessels and clots that block vessels, causing damage to the eye or brain.

The most detailed official bulletin said only that Mr. Chirac had suffered from "a small-sized hematoma, explaining the isolated and limited character of his vision trouble." It did not say anything about the location of the hematoma, a pool of blood that has leaked outside blood vessels, or the cause.

Experts said the details that had been released did not add up to a clear-cut diagnosis. "The whole story is hard to put together," said John Pike-Spellman, professor of Neurology and Radiology at Columbia Presbyterian Hospital in New York.

But several neurologists agreed that Mr. Chirac had most likely suffered a small stroke at the back of the brain, as a result of high blood pressure, that is now slowly resolving. "If it was a small hemorrhage in that part of the brain it would explain the visual symptoms, that could be limited and settled down quickly," said Dr. Peter Rothwell, professor of clinical neurology at Oxford University.

He said the main reasons for hospitalization were to run tests and to control the patient's blood pressure in order to prevent subsequent incidents. After such strokes there is statistically a 10 percent to 20 percent chance of a second stroke in the next year, Dr. Rothwell said.

Dr. Olivier Simon, a neurologist at Bichat Hospital in Paris, said that when a brain vessel ruptured under the force of high blood pressure, the onset of symptoms was usually sudden, as it appears to have been for Mr. Chirac on Friday night. "We see this pretty regularly around here," he said. "A small artery probably burst in the posterior part of his brain, which is mostly linked to vision."

DOJ_NMG_0003656

After a full day of meeting and receptions last Friday, Mr. Chirac developed a bad headache and vision problems in one eye. It was presumably rather extreme, since he called the doctor. "The president is of a school where you don't complain about pain, you deal with it," an aide said.

He was admitted to Val de Grâce Military Hospital that night, although the hospitalization was not reported to the press or even government officials until the next day. Aides said he still tentatively planned to travel to a summit meeting at the United Nations in New York next week, although the foreign minister or prime minister would take his place if doctors advised against it.

President Chirac's sudden illness has reignited a debate about the secrecy traditionally surrounding the health of France's head of state.

The news media, opposition leaders and even politicians from the president's own political camp have sharply criticized his office for the sparse and vaguely phrased health updates issued in the past four days.

"In France, we practice a cult of secrecy which would have done the Kremlin in the former Soviet Union proud," Le Monde said in an editorial on Tuesday.

If Mr. Chirac has not had a stroke, other conditions that may explain the symptoms are bleeding in an eye itself, or the rupture of a brain aneurysm, a weak and bulging area of a blood vessels.

Leaking aneurysms tend to announce themselves with a severe headache and neurological symptoms - although those symptoms are seldom limited to a bit of vision loss in one eye. Instead they are generally catastrophic events that lead to death or severe disability.

Free Speech For Turkey (WP)

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

Orhan Pamuk, one of Turkey's most acclaimed writers, is facing up to three years in prison. His offense, according to the state prosecutor? "Public denigrating of Turkish identity." Specifically, Mr. Pamuk told a Swiss newspaper in February that certain topics were off-limits for discussion in Turkey -- citing the massacre of Armenians in 1915 and the more recent conflicts between Turkish security forces and Kurdish separatists. "Thirty-thousand Kurds were killed here, 1 million Armenians as well. And almost no one talks about it," he said. "Therefore, I do."

As mild as these comments sound to American ears, they touched off a firestorm in Turkey, where the government line is that the Armenian deaths were the consequence of war, not genocide, and public discussion of the issue is hazardous. The uproar over Mr. Pamuk's remarks, which included death threats and burnings of his books, culminated with the filing of the criminal case under Article 301/1 of the Turkish Penal Code, which applies criminal penalties to "a person who explicitly insults being a Turk, the Republic or Turkish Grand National Assembly." Under Turkish law, Mr. Pamuk isn't even permitted to comment on the charges before his case is heard in December.

The prosecution of Mr. Pamuk is, of course, outrageous; the charges should be dropped as soon as possible. The ill-advised use of this ill-advised provision to punish Mr. Pamuk contravenes Turkey's commitment to comply with the free-speech provisions of international agreements such as the European Convention on Human Rights. It's exactly the wrong signal for Turkey to be sending as Europe debates its admission to the European Union. As Mr. Pamuk's translator, Maureen Freely, wrote in the British newspaper the Independent, "There is no doubt that it will raise questions about the wisdom of Turkey's EU membership bid. How can it possibly claim to be a European country if it has such laws on the books, and if public prosecutors can bring such cases?"

This reaction, indeed, may be exactly what those pushing for a prosecution intended; the timing of the charges, as European ministers meet in Wales to discuss Turkey's membership, is suspicious. That makes it even more important for the national government, though it doesn't control the prosecutor who brought the case, to do what it can to halt this case and others like it. Turkey has made important strides in protecting freedom of expression in recent years, including reforming its penal code. The charges against Mr. Pamuk underscore how far it still has to go.

DOJ_NMG_0003657

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Wednesday, September 07, 2005 10:41 AM
To: Allen, Gary (CIV); Apisson, Elizabeth M; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Branda, Joyce (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Eubanks, Sharon (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Figley, Paul (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D. (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Meron, Daniel (CIV); Morgan, Julian (CIV); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Thirolf, Eugene; Wiggins, Mike; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 9/7/05 Civil Division News

ACLU: Govt. memo exaggerates police rights

U.S. Resident Held in Iraq Is Freed

Judge dismisses lawsuit seeking to keep Fort Monmouth open

State will sue to save Otis

Judge tosses governor's lawsuit

Opinion: Media lets DOI off the hook on trust fund

AP
9-7-2005

ACLU: Govt. memo exaggerates police rights

By Michael Weissenstein
Associated Press

NEW YORK - The Justice Department believes state and local police have the right to enforce federal immigration laws, according to a government memo released Wednesday by the American Civil Liberties Union.

The ACLU said the Justice Department opinion makes the "sweeping and unprecedented" legal argument that state and local law enforcement officers can arrest anyone who violates a federal law.

"We therefore do not believe that the authority of state police to make arrests for violation of federal law is limited to those instances in which they are exercising delegated federal power," the memo says.

A Justice Department spokesman had no immediate comment.

A coalition of civil and immigrants' rights groups received the memo under court order in July after suing under the Freedom of Information Act.

Then-Attorney General John Ashcroft and his staff had repeatedly used the memo to justify a decision to start letting local police arrest people after traffic stops and other encounters if they were found to have committed civil immigration violations, such as overstaying a visa.

The ACLU said the memo, by then-Assistant Attorney General Jay S. Bybee, stretched the definition of local law enforcers' roles so far that it could be used to justify giving them the right to enforce the U.S. tax code, environmental rules and other federal laws.

"That result is simply absurd," the group said in a statement released with a government-redacted copy of the memo.

The 2002 opinion reversed a 1996 letter of advice from the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel, which said that state and local police could enforce only criminal immigration violations such as sneaking across a border.

Bybee wrote Ashcroft three years ago that the Office of Legal Counsel had determined that its initial decision was wrong. It was based on three state and federal appeals court rulings, a federal law and a previous internal opinion.

"We believe that the authorities we cited in the 1996 OLC opinion provide no support for our opinion," that state police could not enforce civil immigration laws, wrote Bybee, who later became a federal judge.

Bybee made headlines around the world by arguing in a Jan. 22, 2002, memo that the president has the power to issue orders that violate the Geneva Conventions and international and U.S. laws prohibiting torture.

The government argued that the Justice Department was not required to release Bybee's immigration memo because it had not formally adopted the document and because of attorney-client privilege.

An appeals court rejected both arguments, saying it could not let the government "make public use of the memorandum when it serves the department's ends but claim the attorney-client privilege when it does not."

The court noted that Ashcroft and his representatives used the memorandum to justify and explain the department's policy of expanded local immigration powers.

END

The Los Angeles Times
September 7, 2005

U.S. Resident Held in Iraq Is Freed

By Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writer

More than two months after authorities cleared him of suspicion in a mortar attack on a United States base in Baghdad, an Iraqi man was released Tuesday from military custody, just days before government lawyers were due in court to answer questions about his captivity.

Tuesday's release of Numan Adnan Al-Kaby, a longtime lawful U.S. resident, from a military prison outside Baghdad marked the second time in two months that authorities freed a captive in Iraq within a week of the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California filing a federal lawsuit in Washington.

Mark Rosenbaum, legal director of the ACLU's Southern California chapter, said he was pleased that Al-Kaby had been released but disturbed that the prisoner had been held two months after a military review board first declared him an "innocent civilian."

"The U.S. government does not want to appear in front of a federal judge and answer questions about their indefensible detention policies in Iraq. This is a military and executive scandal," said Rosenbaum, who believes that more people are being held illegally by the U.S. military in Iraq.

A Pentagon spokesman, speaking on condition he not be identified, said, "I certainly understand the frustration people would feel by what they perceive is a delay, but it's a delay out of necessity, making sure that we are not releasing someone who is a threat to the security of Iraq or the Iraqi people."

Al-Kaby, 38, was originally taken into custody in April after calling in sick the day of a mortar attack on the base where he was doing construction work. He strenuously denied any advance knowledge of the attack, and was cleared by a military review board on July 4, but not released.

On Aug. 31, the ACLU filed suit after learning of Al-Kaby's situation from Los Angeles filmmaker Cyrus Kar, who also was freed from a Baghdad prison with the ACLU's intervention. The Times ran a story on Al-Kaby's detention the same day.

The suit was due to be heard Thursday in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C. But late Friday afternoon, Justice Department attorneys in Washington, led by Assistant Atty. Gen. Peter D. Keisler, filed papers seeking a 23-day delay to respond to the ACLU's suit.

The Justice Department did not mention that Al-Kaby had been cleared July 4, but said the ACLU suit raised "novel factual and legal questions."

In a motion filed Sunday, the ACLU issued a sharp retort: "The only truly novel question here is chilling … whether a determination of innocence of a lawful permanent resident by a military tribunal may be arbitrarily voided or ignored such that liberty becomes illusory."

On Tuesday, Col. James Coyne, staff judge advocate for the multinational force in Iraq, filed a declaration saying the military had held Al-Kaby past July 4 based on "new factual information." He did not provide details.

However, Coyne said that on Friday — just two days after the ACLU filed suit — the military had conducted another review and again recommended that the captive be freed.

The ACLU suit asserted that Al-Kaby was being held in violation of the U.S. Constitution, the Geneva Convention and international law.

As part of the suit, friends and relatives filed declarations stating that Al-Kaby was a Shiite whose family had long been opposed to the Sunni regime of Saddam Hussein. He fled Iraq in 1991 following the first Gulf War, and spent three years in a refugee camp in Saudi Arabia before coming to the U.S. and gaining political asylum.

He settled in Kalamazoo, Mich., where he opened a small restaurant with his cousin Haider Al-Saedy.

In 2003, both men applied for U.S. citizenship. Al-Kaby provided assistance to the FBI "to assist the government in the U.S. invasion of Iraq and even took a polygraph test to prove that the information he gave was truthful," the ACLU suit said.

After U.S. forces toppled Hussein, Al-Kaby decided to return to his native land to rejoin family members.

The day of the mortar attack, Al-Kaby had taken the day off so he could take his brother to buy a car in Baghdad, the ACLU contended.

Kar met Al-Kaby while both were incarcerated at Camp Cropper in Baghdad — where Saddam Hussein also is being held. Kar was released July 10 after being held captive in Iraq for 55 days.

In a court declaration last week, Kar said both he and Al-Kaby had received identical letters from the U.S. military declaring that each man was an "innocent civilian."

ACLU attorney Ranjana Natarajan said that if the government "had new information on Al-Kaby, it did not bother to tell the court what it was," in papers filed last week.

Her colleague Rosenbaum added, "The so-called new evidence is a transparent fabrication, intended to provide a fig leaf to cover five months of solitary confinement of an innocent man. This is an administration whose trademark is incompetence and indifference to human suffering."

END

AP
September 7, 2005

Judge dismisses lawsuit seeking to keep Fort Monmouth open

By GEOFF MULVHILL
Associated Press Writer

TRENTON, N.J._A federal judge has dismissed a lawsuit filed by several New Jersey politicians seeking to keep Fort Monmouth open.

U.S. District Judge Mary L. Cooper said in a ruling issued late Tuesday that federal courts do not have jurisdiction over the federal Base Realignment and Closure Commission process.

Cooper's decision mirrored the arguments of a U.S. government lawyer who argued the matter before her Tuesday afternoon.

Lawyers for the politicians who filed the lawsuit last week in a last-ditch effort to keep the base open said they expected it would ultimately be decided by a higher court _ a hint that they would appeal if they lost.

Lawyer Eugene M. LaVergne said Tuesday night that his clients, including U.S. Sens. Jon Corzine and Frank Lautenberg and several other political leaders and union officials, would have to decide whether to appeal.

But he said in light of a ruling last month from a judge in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, which found that the federal courts do have jurisdiction in base-closure matters, Tuesday's ruling seemed like an invitation to appeal to the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which handles appeals from both New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

U.S. Rep. Frank Pallone, D-Long Branch, one of the plaintiffs, said he would recommend to the others involved that they appeal. A decision could be made as soon as Wednesday, he said. The government has already appealed in the Pennsylvania case, which came down on Aug. 26.

The BRAC recommendations are expected to go to President Bush on Thursday. He has pledged not to make any changes to them when he sends them to Congress for an up-or-down vote.

While politicians across the country are angry about bases in their areas being on the closure list, New Jersey leaders believe they have sound legal grounds to object to Fort Monmouth's inclusion on the list.

They say the Eatontown base did not meet six of the eight criteria for closures that Congress directed BRAC to consider.

Also, of the 62 major bases and 775 smaller installations slated for closure or consolidation, only Fort Monmouth came with an asterisk: Fort Monmouth should be closed, the commission said, only if doing so would not interfere with the fort's work supporting the war on terror.

The closing would mean the loss of thousands of military and civilian contractors' jobs at a base where research is conducted. Fort Monmouth is headquarters of the U.S. Army's Communications Electronics Command, which designs radios, computers and software that keep troops in contact with each other. Many of the fort's duties _ along with thousands of jobs _ would move to Aberdeen Proving Ground in Maryland under the commission's recommendation.

The effort to use the courts to save Fort Monmouth is probably a long shot, the lawyers conceded. But Corzine and the others insisted the lawyers "leave no procedural stone unturned," lawyer Frank G. Capece said, and pursuing a lawsuit now leaves open the possibility of further action later.

END

Cape Cod Times
9/7/05

State will sue to save Otis

By KEVIN DENNEHY
STAFF WRITER

Attorney General Thomas Reilly today will file litigation against the federal government to block the closing of Otis Air National Guard base.

In a lawsuit being submitted in the United States District Court in Boston, the state will argue the U.S. government cannot close a state National Guard unit without consent of the governor.

Named as defendants are Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, the independent Base Realignment and Closure Commission, and all nine commission members.

Reilly and Gov. Mitt Romney announced the lawsuit yesterday in a joint statement as the region prepared for the Otis arrival of more than 2,500 evacuees of Hurricane Katrina.

Reilly's case will mirror arguments being made, with mixed results, by state leaders nationwide: that the federal government cannot move or dissolve state Guard units without the governor's approval.

"As governor, I have not agreed to the closing of Otis," Romney said in a late afternoon statement, "and therefore the BRAC commission's failure to solicit and obtain my consent as governor renders its recommendations legally deficient."

Reilly, a Democratic candidate for governor, said he was "proud to stand with Governor Romney" in this fight.

"There is an important principle at stake here," he said, "that the governor must have input on decisions that impact the security of our state."

On May 13, the Pentagon recommended the closure of Otis, the Cape Cod home to the first military unit to respond to the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks. That recommendation, part of a broader Air Force plan to consolidate its fighter assets, was approved two weeks ago by the independent BRAC commission.

If the plan is approved, the Cape base's F-15 fighter jets would be moved to Barnes Air National Guard Base in Westfield.

Reilly wanted to submit the litigation before the BRAC commission sends its final recommendation for base closings to President Bush tomorrow.

No state has successfully fought the closure of a military base since the BRAC law was passed in the late 1980s.

But those familiar with the process suggest there may be some legal argument this time because the federal government has targeted so many Air Guard units, which are jointly overseen by the Pentagon and state governors.

In states from Tennessee to Pennsylvania, governors have staked their cases on questions of federalism and states rights.

"That's the kind of question that can wind up very easily in the Supreme Court," Jeremiah Gertler, an analyst during the 1995 BRAC process and fellow with the Washington-based Center for Strategic and International Studies, said last week.

But it's no sure thing. After Pennsylvania Gov. Edward Rendell convinced a federal judge that the BRAC process doesn't allow the Pentagon to dissolve an Air Guard unit, the BRAC commission maintained the Pennsylvania Guard's 111th Fighter Wing, but took away its jets. In Illinois, a judge threw out a similar lawsuit altogether.

In the Bay State, Reilly's office will seek a temporary restraining order, though a hearing date has not been scheduled.

State Sen. Therese Murray, D-Plymouth, said state plans to invite hurricane victims from the Gulf Coast shows the importance of the base.

"It is obvious that we need to be better prepared in this nation to deal with any disaster," she said in a statement early last night, "and the federal government is doing a disservice to this nation by closing this critical homeland security base."

END

Copley News Service
Sept. 7, 2005

Judge tosses governor's lawsuit

By Adriana Colindres
OF Copley News Service

SPRINGFIELD - U.S. District Judge Jeanne Scott on Tuesday dismissed a lawsuit that Gov. Rod Blagojevich filed last week to try to block the transfer of Illinois Air National Guard fighter jets from Springfield to Fort Wayne, Ind.

Blagojevich lacks legal standing to sue U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and members of the Defense Base Closure and Realignment Commission, Scott said in a 10-page opinion.

"This case is closed," she wrote.

But in a statement, the governor said he would continue his efforts to prevent the fighter jets from leaving Springfield. If the 183rd Fighter Wing of the Air Guard is realigned, its 15 active F-16s would go to Fort Wayne International Airport to become part of another Air Guard unit, and 163 full-time personnel would leave the Springfield base.

"Our battle to do what is right for Illinois and our country is certainly not over," Blagojevich said.

The dispute centers on a recommendation from the Pentagon to realign the Illinois Air National Guard's 183rd Fighter Wing, headquartered at Abraham Lincoln Capital Airport. The BRAC Commission endorsed the Pentagon's recommendation last month, and it is to present a report to President Bush by Thursday. The president has until Sept. 23 to either accept all of the commission's recommendations or reject all of them.

Blagojevich, who is represented in the lawsuit by Attorney General Lisa Madigan's office, contends that federal law requires governors to agree to any type of realignment of a state's National Guard bases. Blagojevich did not consent to the plan to move the fighter jets out of Springfield, and he said his rights have been violated.

But Scott, citing a 1994 U.S. Supreme Court decision, rejected Blagojevich's argument.

"The Supreme Court has determined that the recommendations of the Secretary (of Defense) and the (BRAC) Commission in the base-closing process are only preliminary recommendations to the President that have no legal effect," Scott's opinion said.

Those recommendations "do not cause injury to the Governor," she added.

Scott also canceled a hearing that had been scheduled for Wednesday to consider state officials' motion for a preliminary injunction intended to stop the BRAC Commission from sending President Bush its recommendation to realign the 183rd.

Representatives for Blagojevich and Madigan said Tuesday they were still reviewing Scott's opinion and deciding what steps to take next.

Blagojevich said: "As the commander-in-chief of the Illinois Air National Guard, I will never consent to a recommendation that would compromise our homeland and national security, in addition to wasting $10 million to move our F-16s to Indiana. Throughout this entire process, the Pentagon and the BRAC Commission has conveniently ignored the facts, but we are making sure they can't ignore the law."

Springfield Mayor Tim Davlin issued a statement expressing disappointment with the judge's opinion. But he also noted the local BRAC committee will pursue other missions for the Air National Guard facility.

END

Indianz.Com.
Wednesday, September 7, 2005

Opinion: Media lets DOI off the hook on trust fund

"One of the biggest problems covering civil litigation that has lasted for nearly a decade is simply remembering who said what.

That's an issue I have encountered in assisting a group that filed a lawsuit in 1996 over the federal government's long-troubled Indian Trust program. I covered the filing of the suit when I was a Washington Post reporter. None of the other reporters from those days are still around and, as a result, government officials are getting away with misstatements about the lawsuit, titled Cobell versus Norton. The tempo of their misstatements has increased as Congress has begun to explore ways of settling the suit by legislation.

What is happening now is that Interior officials are attempting nothing short of trying to rewrite the history of the trust, contending that there are, in reality, few problems with the trust's current accounts.

One example of a rewrite is a comment by Ross Swimmer, the senior Interior official in charge of the Indian trust programs, who says the Cobell lawsuit is not about mismanagement at all. That’s not the way others see it. As the US Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia said in 2001 in ordering the government to make an accounting of the Indian trust accounts: 'These trusts were created over 100 years ago through an Act of Congress and have been mismanaged nearly as long.'"

END

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, September 9, 2005 8:21 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing 9/9/05
Attachments:	agnb050909.pdf; agnb050909.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 2005 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Alleged Torture Victim Indicted For Bush Assassination Plot. ..4
Appeals Court Panel Questions Detainee's Lack Of Court Access. 4
Witness Testifies Al Arian Associates Linked To PIJ-Connected Mosque. 4
Aswat To Remain In Custody Pending Extradition Hearing. 4

Patriot Act:

Michigan Town Rejects Anti-Patriot Act Resolution. 5

Homeland Response:

New York Recognizes 9/11 EMT Victim With Rescuer Status. 5
Study Finds Mismanagement Of 9/11 SBA Program 6
Citing Lack of Confidence In CIA Leadership, Senior Clandestine Service Official Retires. 6
Pentagon's Freedom Walk Has "Unusual" Security Constraints 6
Ground Zero Rebuilding Could Take "A Generation" To Complete. 6

War News:

Powell Regrets Relying On Intelligence Pointing To Existence Of Iraqi WMD 7
200 Insurgents Captured In Syrian Border Staging Ground. 7
Iraqi Forces Prove Effective In Identifying Insurgents. 7
US Forces Struggle With Toll Of Duty In Iraq. 7
Indicators Highlight Importance Of Passing Iraq Constitution. .7
Oil-For-Food Report Reflects Badly On Democratic Party "Icon" Sorensen. 8
Taliban Insurgents Kill Six Afghan Policemen. 8
Funds For War On Terror Said Better Spent On Disease Prevention, Research. 8
US Strategy In "Global War Against Terrorism" Critiqued. 9
9/11 Recruits' Motivations, Fates Examined. 9
Panel Disciplines New York Judge Who Left Bench To Work In Iraq. 9

Corporate Scandals:

Lay, Skilling Attorneys Allege Prosecutorial Misconduct. 10
Florida Attorney Charged In Currency Trading Scheme. 10

Criminal Law:

DOJ In Settlement Talks With Boeing To Close Two Probes.10
Lawyers Say Plame Leak Probe Could Be Nearing End. 11
Berger Fined $50,000 For Taking Documents. 11
Federal Agents Raid Chicago-Area Police Station 11
Philadelphia Defense Lawyer Sentenced To House Arrest In Ticket Fixing Probe 12
FBI, Minneapolis Police Raid City Councilman's Home. 12
North Carolina Housing Official Pleads Not Guilty To Embezzlement Charges. 13
New Jersey Bribery Probe Suspect Arrested On Assault Charges. 13
Fourth Person Charged In Alleged Scheme To Defraud Kodak. 13
Tennessee Lt. Gov. Reverses Statement About Loan Under Federal Scrutiny 13
Grand Jury Indicts PAC Linked To DeLay. 13
Missouri Senators Seek To Close Sexual Predator Loophole. 14
California City To Ask For DOJ Audit Of Accounts. 14
US Charges Florida Deputy Sheriff With Embezzlement. 14
Minnesota School District Sues For Items Seized In FBI Probe Of School Shooting. 14
Arizona Man Sentenced To Prison For Child Pornography. 15
Wisconsin Murder Trial Pits Rural, Urban Ways. 15

Civil Law:

Ginsburg Rejects Administration Appeal To Block BRAC Challenges 15
Caremark Settles Whistleblower Suit With DOJ. 15

Senate Panel To Subpoena Asbestos Companies. 16
US Alleges Safety Violations By American Airlines. 16
SCOTUS Could Broaden Civil RICO's Reach. 16
Bankruptcy Attorneys Brace For Changes To Code. 16
Pope Seeks Head-Of-State Immunity From Texas Lawsuit... 17

Civil Rights:

DOJ Settles Pregnancy Bias Charges With DC Fire Department. 17
Jury Acquits Border Officer Of Civil Rights Violation. 17
NAACP Calls For Immediate FBI Probe Of Ohio Police Shooting Death. 18
FBI Finds No Racial Motivation For UVa Graffiti. 18
Azeri Man In California Sentenced To Prison For Immigrant Smuggling. 18
Massachusetts Anti-Gay Marriage Initiative Moves Forward.. 18

Antitrust:

DOJ Files Antitrust Suit Against Realtors Association Over Internet Listings. 18
Taubman Family To Relinquish Control Of Sotheby's. 20
Investment Group To Purchase Hertz For $15 Billion. 21
European Companies Takeovers "Surge. 21
Dell To Retain E-Mail, Data For Use In AMD-Intel Suit. 21

Environment:

Bipartisan Resolution Would Block Rule On Mercury Emissions. 22
3rd Circuit Rejects Substantial Continuity Test In Superfund Case. 22
NYTimes Applauds Challenge To Administration On Forest Protection. 22

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Five California Prison Gang Leaders Sentenced To Life. 23
Hundreds Of Suspected Latin Gang Members Arrested In International Crackdown. 23
Federal Agents Arrest 10 Suspects In Haiti-Miami Cocaine Ring. 24
DEA, Local Authorities Arrest 44, Seize Drugs In East Palo Alto, California Crackdown. 24
US Illicit Drug Use Down In 2004. 25
House Government Reform Panel Mulls What To Do About Palmeiro. 25
San Antonio Couple Pleads Guilty To Drug Ring Role. 25

Immigration:

Danbury, CT, Police Enforcing Federal Immigration Laws.... 26
Schwarzenegger Expected To Veto Immigrant Drivers License Bill. 26
Immigration Judge Orders Minnesota School Squatter Deported. 26

Tax:

US Indicts "Survivor" Winner Hatch For Tax Evasion. 27

Congress-Administration:

Bush Signs Katrina Relief Bill, Vows Federal Action "For The Long Haul. 27
Brown's Résumé Said To Contain Fabrications. 32
FEMA To "Rethink" Debit Card Distribution Following Problems. 34
Cheney Visits Hurricane Zone. 35
First Lady Defends Government Response. 36
White House Considered Taking Direct Control Of Louisiana Relief Effort. 36
Landrieu Defends Louisiana Response. 37
Police, Military Urge Remaining New Orleans Residents To Leave. 38
FEMA Restrictions On Media Access Draw Criticism. 39
Katrina Sparks Debate About Military Role In Disaster Response. 39
Honoré Seen As "Giuliani Of The Gulf Coast. 39
Hurricane Decimates Region's Legal System. 39
Administration Hires Contractors, Suspends Davis-Bacon Rules. 41
Relief Agencies Organize Emergency Medical System. 41
HUD, VA Offer Some Southern Homes To Katrina Victims. ...41
Computer Forecast Last Year Predicted Damage Similar To Katrina. 42
Officials Urge Insurers To Pay Valid Claims. 43
US Seeks NATO Help In Transporting Aid From Abroad. 43
MoveOn Anti-Roberts Ad Will Not Use Images Of Katrina Evacuees. 43

Other News:

Economists Expect Katrina To Cut GDP By 0.4% In Second Half Of Year. 44
Analysts Suspect Strategic Oil Release Aimed At Price, Not Supply. 45
State Department Shifts Position On Cuban Biological Weapons. 46
China Announces Resumption Of North Korean Nuclear Talks. 47
Ukrainian President Fires Cabinet. 47
West Praises Egyptian Vote Amid Fraud Charges. 48

DOJ_NMG_0003668

Koizumi Coalition Poised To Win Election. 48
EU Nations Raise Billions For Vaccination Of Needy..... 48
China Unexpectedly Rehabilitates Reformer Whose Death
Triggered Demonstrations. 49
Columnist Says Administration Deference To Chavez Due
To "Sheer Ignorance. 49

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington. 49

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages..... 51

DOJ_NMG_0003669

TERRORISM NEWS:

Alleged Torture Victim Indicted For Bush Assassination Plot. The Washington Post (9/9, A4, Markon) reports, "An American student was charged yesterday in an al Qaeda plot to kill President Bush, with prosecutors alleging that Ahmed Omar Abu Ali and his confederates planned to use multiple snipers to shoot Bush or to blow him up in a suicide bombing." The Post continues, "The expanded indictment of Abu Ali, returned by a federal grand jury in Alexandria, also claimed for the first time that he proposed a plan to bring members of an al Qaeda cell into the United States through Mexico. They would then link up with Abu Ali to conduct terrorist operations in this country, the indictment said." The Post adds, "Abu Ali, 24, of Falls Church was first charged in February with terrorism counts that included trying to establish an al Qaeda cell in the United States. That indictment referred to the plot to kill Bush, but Abu Ali was not charged with conspiring to assassinate the president until yesterday. The case is among the highest-profile terrorism prosecutions in the United States since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. … The new nine-count indictment also adds charges of conspiracy to commit aircraft piracy and destroy aircraft, part of the Justice Department's allegations that Abu Ali was plotting with al Qaeda to conduct a Sept. 11-style attack in the United States that would include hijacking planes."

Appeals Court Panel Questions Detainee's Lack Of Court Access. The AP (9/8, Yost) reports, "A federal appeals court Thursday questioned the Bush administration's handling of detainees at Guantanamo Bay, suggesting the judiciary might have authority to delve into the conduct of military tribunals which have categorized almost all of the inmates as enemy combatants." The AP continues, "The two hours of arguments were in sharp contrast to those of several years ago when the appeals court suggested detainees at the Guantanamo Naval base were not entitled to have access to the U.S. courts, and then ruled against them. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed that decision a year ago." The AP adds, "On Thursday, a panel of three appeals court judges two appointed by Republican presidents and one by a Democratic president aggressively questioned Justice Department attorney Gregory Katsas about the possibility of court scrutiny over the detainee review process. … 'There is nothing in the habeas statute that requires us to defer to a military tribunal,' A. Raymond Randolph, an appointee of President Bush's father, told Katsas. The other judges on the panel are David Sentelle, an appointee of President Reagan, and Judith Rogers, an appointee of President Clinton."

Reuters (9/8, Vicini) reports, "Guantanamo Bay prisoners should be given the chance to prove in court that they have been mistakenly labelled as 'enemy combatants' and have been unlawfully detained, their attorney said on Thursday. … 'Since day one, these people have been saying you've got the wrong guys. They want a fair hearing to show that,' attorney Thomas Wilner told a U.S. appeals court during more than two hours of arguments. … But Justice Department lawyer Gregory Katsas repeated the Bush administration's position that the prisoners were not entitled to any constitutional due process rights, and he defended the military tribunals set up to review their cases."

Witness Testifies Al Arian Associates Linked To PIJ-Connected Mosque. The Tampa Tribune (9/9, Silvestrini) reports, "A witness in the trial of Sami al-Arian testified Thursday morning that Ramadan Shallah served briefly as the religious leader of a mosque in Chicago. Mohammed Hasan, who testified under a grant of immunity, also placed Al-Arian codefendant Hatim Fariz at a 1991 rally in Chicago." The Tribune notes, "Prosecutors have alleged in court papers that the mosque was 'an entity we believe to be a component of the PIJ enterprise.'"

CAIR To Run Anti-Terrorism Ad In Tampa Markets This Weekend. The AP (9/9) reports the Council on American-Islamic Relations "plans to denounce terrorism in a paid television commercial airing in the Tampa market this weekend to coincide with the anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. The 30-second spot…features two American Muslims, a man and a woman, denouncing violence in the name of Islam and vowing to 'not to allow our faith to be hijacked by criminals.' The spot will run 105 times Thursday through Sunday on 13 cable channels in Tampa, including CNN, Fox Sports Net and the Weather Channel, according to CAIR's Florida office."

Aswat To Remain In Custody Pending Extradition Hearing. BBC (9/8) reports on its Web site, Haroon Rashid Aswat, "accused of trying to set up a terror training camp in the US has been ordered to remain in custody while an extradition case is prepared. … A lawyer for US authorities told Bow Street magistrates the extradition case would be complete within 10 days." Aswat "is due to appear again on 6 October."

DOJ_NMG_0003670

PATRIOT ACT:

Michigan Town Rejects Anti-Patriot Act Resolution. The Grand Rapids Press (9/8, Martinez) reports that the Holland, MI, City Council "on Tuesday rejected a resolution expressing concern with sections of the federal Patriot Act." The Press continues, "The resolution was proposed by the city's Human Relations Commission and on put on the agenda Wednesday by Councilman David Hoekstra. … The council rejected the resolution 5-2, with only the 6th Ward councilman Hoekstra and Councilman At-Large Jerome Kobes voting in favor. Mayor Al McGeehan and 2nd Ward Victor Orozco were absent." The Press adds, "Both Mayor Pro-Tem Craig Rich and 5th Ward Councilman Kurt Dykstra said they felt the Patriot Act doesn't fall under the council's jurisdiction. … 'I'm one of those people who don't think its appropriate (for the City Council) to take a stand on a national issue. What's next? Are we going to be asked to vote on gay marriages next week or the war in Iraq the following week?' Rich said. 'We are elected to represent our constituents on local issues...This is grandstanding if we do it. That's all it is.'" The Press notes, "While he didn't agree with the HRC's recommendation, 4th Ward Councilman Bob Vande Vusse said he appreciated the work of the HRC, which spent more than a year studying the issue."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New York Recognizes 9/11 EMT Victim With Rescuer Status. The AP (9/8, Gormley) reports, "On Sept. 11, 2001, as Glenn Winuk's co-workers were ordered to run to safety from their lower Manhattan office building, he ran the other way a block toward ground zero. There he told New York City fire officials he was an emergency medical technician in his hometown volunteer fire department and wanted to help the victims. … Moments later, he died when the South Tower collapsed, the medical kit he was issued at his side." The AP continues, "On Thursday he was officially recognized by the state as a rescuer in the historic effort that saved thousands, rather than as a civilian casualty, a distinction his family has been seeking for nearly four years. … 'They all ran for safety, but he ran toward the scene as he did in "93"' for the first World Trade Center bombing, said Winuk's brother, Jay Winuk. 'He ran toward danger because he knew he could save lives.'" The AP notes, "The recognition was delayed because Glenn Winuk was technically an associate member of the Jericho Volunteer Fire Department in Nassau County and was no longer an active firefighter or EMT in the department he served with for 19 years. His status changed when he moved to Manhattan and became a partner in his law firm, keeping him from being recognized by the federal government as an official rescue worker for memorials, historic records, and for a $278,658 Public Safety Officers benefit for his parents. … The federal government rejected the family's request citing, in part, the fact that Winuk hadn't even been officially recognized by the state as a rescue worker, said state Sen. Carl Marcellino, a Long Island Republican. But his bill, co-sponsored by Democratic Assemblyman Charles Lavine and recently signed by Pataki, changed that. … A federal decision is expected in 30 days."

Port Authority Workers Among Posthumous Medal Of Valor Awardees. The Newark Star-Ledger (9/8, Marsico) reports, "After the terrorist planes hit the Twin Towers on 9/11, Edward Calderon, a civilian employee with the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, told a colleague by phone he was staying inside one of the buildings to help with evacuation operations. … 'I'm a Marine and we don't leave anyone behind,' snapped Calderon, a former member of the corps and a resident of Union." The Star-Ledger continues, "James Barbella, an agency property manager from Oceanside, N.Y., led would-be rescuers up the stairs desperately trying to find a way to save people trapped in the top-floor restaurant, Windows on the World. … Robert Lynch, another property manager from Cranford, ensured that a child-care facility and bookstore were clear before heading through the plaza to help with the evacuation of a tower." The Star-Ledger adds, "Lynch, Barbella and Calderon were killed when the buildings collapsed. Tomorrow, they will be among 13 Port Authority civilian employees given a special 9/11 heroes' 'Medal of Valor' posthumously by President Bush in Washington, D.C., along with the 37 Port Authority Police officers who also died that day. … Port Authority officials successfully lobbied to get the employees' families the medals because the 13 individuals provided critical electrical, structural, mechanical and operations information to police and fire officials during the evacuation that saved thousands. Officials said their role has been little known by members of the general public. … 'There was a great deal of unforgettable tragedy on 9/11. One positive note, however, was that approximately 25,000 people were evacuated from the World Trade Center,' the agency's chairman and executive director wrote in a June letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. 'These fallen Port Authority civilians assisted all uniformed rescue workers in all aspects of the evacuation and collectively all groups significantly contributed to saving all those lives.'"

DOJ_NMG_0003671

Study Finds Mismanagement Of 9/11 SBA Program. The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 11, 0:30, Roberts) reported, "An investigation by the Associated Press finds the Federal Government's $5 billion program to help businesses recover after 9/11 was so badly managed, it gave low-interest loans to companies not affected by the attacks. Loan recipients included a country music radio station in South Dakota, a perfume shop in the Virgin Islands, a dog boutique in Utah, and more than 100 Subway Sandwich and Dunkin' Donuts shops."

Most Post-9/11 Loan Funds Went To Firms Far From New York, DC. The AP (9/9, Dobbin) reports, "An Associated Press review of two Small Business Administration programs that doled out Sept. 11 recovery loans, found the government provided, approved or guaranteed nearly $4.9 billion in loans, and took credit for saving 20,000 jobs. That puts the average cost of saving a job at about a quarter million dollars each." The AP continues, "Of the 19,000 loans, fewer than 11 percent went to companies in New York City and Washington, an AP computer analysis showed. Officials conceded the SBA allocated few resources to oversee the congressionally-approved loan programs, leaving banks on an honor system to determine who should get terror recovery loans." The AP adds, "SBA documents obtained by AP show the banks had a strong incentive to approve as many loans as possible from the terror program - their cost was reduced in half. … The SBA said it first learned of the problems through AP's review and was weighing whether an investigation was needed. … Among the hardest-hit enterprises in places far removed from the devastation were travel agencies, tourist shops, food caterers, limousine fleets, hotels and bars. Americans weren't traveling far from home like they used to."

Citing Lack of Confidence In CIA Leadership, Senior Clandestine Service Official Retires. The Washington Post (9/9, A5, Priest, Pincus) reports, "Robert Richer, the second-ranking official in the CIA's clandestine service, has announced his retirement, telling colleagues that he lacked confidence in the agency's leadership." Some officials say "Richer's decision revolved around an ongoing debate over how to improve human intelligence and the direction of the CIA," but other assert it "involved disputes over 'operational issues' that they would not specify, and a clash of personalities between Richer" and CIA Director Porter J. Goss "and his top aides," the reason "Richer's predecessor and his boss resigned" last year.

Pentagon's Freedom Walk Has "Unusual" Security Constraints. The Washington Post (9/9, A1, Dvorak) reports that the Pentagon's 9/11 memorial Freedom Walk has "extraordinary measures to control participation in the march and concert." The route has "not been specified but will be lined with four-foot-high snow fencing to keep it closed and 'sterile,'" and "the U.S. Park Police will have its entire Washington force of several hundred on duty and along the route," ready to "arrest anyone who joins the march or concert without a credential and refuses to leave." It's "unusual" for an event on the Mall to have "fences, required preregistration and the threat of arrest." Allison Barber, deputy assistant secretary of defense, said "police had requested" the "stringent measures," but Park Police Chief Dwight E. Pettiford said "the Pentagon restricted the event in its permit application."

Ground Zero Rebuilding Could Take "A Generation" To Complete. The Christian Science Monitor (9/9, Marks) reports that rebuilding at ground zero in New York City "has been slow going, due in part to the seeming incompatibility of rebuilding a vital commercial, retail, and financial hub on what many now consider to be a sacred burial ground." Also, it takes extra time to ensure "that ground zero…rises stronger than before." The project is "expected to be the most publicly debated, disputed, reviewed, and revised in world history," an "urban rebirth that could take more than a decade, if not a generation, to complete."

DOJ_NMG_0003672

WAR NEWS:

Powell Regrets Relying On Intelligence Pointing To Existence Of Iraqi WMD. In an interview to be broadcast on ABC Friday evening former Secretary of State Colin Powell reiterated his disappointment with US intelligence on Iraqi weapons programs. The New York Times (9/9, Weisman) reports Powell says "his 2003 speech to the United Nations, in which he gave a detailed description of Iraqi weapons programs that turned out not to exist, was 'painful' for him personally and would be a permanent 'blot' on his record." Powell said he felt "Terrible" when he learned "that he had been misled about the accuracy of intelligence on which he relied" and "added that it was 'devastating' to learn later that some intelligence agents knew the information he had was unreliable but did not speak up." He "also implied in the interview that the United States did not go to war in Iraq with sufficient troops to secure the country and failed to keep sufficient Iraqi forces to help stabilize the country." Powell's "expressions of regret about the weapons intelligence and the lack of troops were consistent with many of his statements in office, especially after it became clear that Iraq had none of the weapons that Mr. Powell had said it was stockpiling."

200 Insurgents Captured In Syrian Border Staging Ground. US and Iraqi forces captured 200 mostly foreign insurgents at a staging ground near Tall Afar along the Syrian border. The New York Times/AP (9/9) reports the US-Iraqi operation to clear Tall Afar of insurgents "would intensify." And "one of captives was Amr Omayer, an Iraqi who was believed to be commander of all insurgent operations stemming from Tal Afar." Some captives were believed to be from Afghanistan while others "were from Syria, Sudan, Yemen and Jordan."

Iraqi Forces Prove Effective In Identifying Insurgents. Iraqi forces are becoming increasingly effective as they work with US forces, particularly in helping interrogate insurgents. The Washington Post (9/9, A21, Finer) reports that "identifying fighters who blend seamlessly into the local population" is one of the most difficult tasks facing US forces and "American commanders have long insisted that growing numbers of Iraqi security forces will make that job much easier." But, "U.S. commanders also acknowledge that the Iraqi troops' reputation for heavy-handed treatment of prisoners cuts two ways: It can terrify prisoners into talking but undermine the rapport policemen and soldiers have with the populations they serve." Another negative is that few of the Iraqi forces are Sunni. Iraqi forces are not only "fully integrated into nearly every aspect of the Tall Afar operation," but hundreds "are also being brought to the city to man stations that U.S. forces have said they will establish once the fighting wanes." According to US commanders, the "performance of Iraqi troops in this region has improved dramatically since the 3rd Armored Cavalry arrived in April."

Insurgents Forced Out Of Tall Afar. The Washington Post (9/9, A21, Finer), in an article on the improvement of Iraqi forces, also reports, "Heavy bombing continued Thursday evening, as U.S. jets dropped 500-pound J-DAM precision bombs and other munitions into the insurgent-controlled neighborhood of Sarai, while playing messages over loudspeakers that called on residents to evacuate. Nearly 1,000 people left the city through U.S. checkpoints Thursday, and commanders said intelligence showed that insurgent leaders were attempting to vacate the city."

US Forces Struggle With Toll Of Duty In Iraq. The Washington Post (9/9, A1, Fainaru) in a front page story examines the daily dangers facing US troops operating in Iraq. After describing the aftermath of an IED attack on one US platoon the Post reports, "Six hours after the attack, and with only a few hours of sleep" the platoon was "back patrolling the bomb-cratered streets of Balad. … The attack quickly faded, taking its place alongside myriad others that have occurred during the platoon's first eight months of a yearlong combat tour in Iraq." Their experiences "go to the heart of the growing debate over the continued involvement of U.S. troops in Iraq. The days are infused not with the politics of war but the stark realities of it: tragedy and loss, loneliness and exhaustion, resilience and camaraderie in the face of a stubborn and deadly insurgency. The platoon's daily life has been ordered by nothing more than the merciless patrol schedule, twice-daily, four-hour combat missions that inevitably place the soldiers in the paths of attacks aimed at killing them." In interviews "the physical and emotional toll of prosecuting the war in Iraq was vividly apparent."

Indicators Highlight Importance Of Passing Iraq Constitution. Nina Kamp and Michael O'Hanlon, a senior research assistant and a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, and graphic designer Amy Unikewicz in an op-ed in the New York Times (9/9) updates their chart tracking progress in Iraq and warn, "It was not a good summer in Iraq. After the midwinter bright spots -- reductions in violence, greater economic vitality, the famous purple fingers of voters -- the situation worsened as the weather warmed. Most worrisome, the constitutional process has failed to bring aboard Sunni Arabs, who remain the core of the insurgency. While Shiites and Kurds wisely compromised on some key points, they favor an oil-allocation scheme that Sunnis fear could deprive them of their fair share of Iraq's natural wealth." Despite some positive news, "on balance the indicators are troubling. … On one point at least, pessimists and optimists about Iraq tend to agree: the situation needs a major boost from the political process. In that light, the Oct. 15 referendum on the draft constitution looms very large."

DOJ_NMG_0003673

Columnist Urges Iraqi Political Factions To Support Constitution. Thomas Friedman in his column in the New York Times (9/9) urges Iraqi Shiites, Kurds and Sunnis to work together to approve a constitution because in the aftermath of Katrina the US may become distracted. Friedman says "most Democrats have opposed the war from the start, and many Republicans no longer support the war per se, but only George Bush." Bush "has carried this war on his shoulders, and the more he's weakened politically by Katrina, the less he will be able to carry. Yes, Mr. Bush has said we'll do whatever it takes to finish the job in Iraq, but he said that before there was another huge job to do." Friedman states, "If there is a constitution basically supported by all the key parties, a decent outcome is still possible in Iraq. Yes, Mr. Bush says he intends to stay the course there no matter what, but without a constitution embraced by all three communities, there will be no course to stay. The pressure on us to leave will only grow."

Oil-For-Food Report Reflects Badly On Democratic Party "Icon" Sorensen. The New York Sun (9/9, Avni) reports, "A Democratic Party icon of the Kennedy days, Theodore Sorensen, was hired in 1993 by an agent of Saddam Hussein, Samir Vincent, to influence top Turtle Bay officials, according to Wednesday's Volcker report on the U.N. oil-for-food program. Vincent and his Korean partner, Tongsun Park, also financed an American pro-U.N. organization known as UNA-USA with Taiwanese money." Sorenson was hired by Vincent "to shape what ultimately became oil for food."

WSJournal Says Volcker Report Shows Corruption At Heart Of UN. The Wall Street Journal (9/9) says in an editorial, "With the release Wednesday of Paul Volcker's fourth report on Oil for Food, we have the clearest account yet of what this quote-unquote" oil for food "scandal is really about." Oil for Food is "not about some isolated incidents of perceived or actual wrongdoing during the course of a seven-year effort to maintain sanctions on Iraq, monitor its oil flows and feed its people. Oil for Food is a story about what the U.N. is. And our conclusion from reading the 847-page report is that the U.N. is Oil for Food." Press reports "often cite the overall size of Oil for Food at $60 billion, but Mr. Volcker's report makes clear that the real figure was in excess of $100 billion. From this, Saddam was able to derive $10.2 billion from illicit transactions. But the important point is that he was able to steer 10 times that sum toward his preferred clients in the service of his political aims." Volcker's report "is replete with examples of incompetent U.N. oversight and tales of political wrangling among the permanent members of the Security Council. But the abiding fact is that it was the Western powers, not Saddam, who wanted Oil for Food at virtually any cost, because it offered the appearance of a meaningful policy in the absence of a real one, namely regime change."

The Wall Street Journal (9/9) also excerpts a portion of the latest report of Paul Volcker's Independent Inquiry Committee on the United Nations' Oil for Food program.

Taliban Insurgents Kill Six Afghan Policemen. The New York Times (9/9, Gall) reports Taliban insurgents "attacked an Afghan National Army weapons depot south of Kabul on Thursday, killing six Afghan policemen, the state Bakhtar news agency said." Two suspected Taliban insurgents "were killed in the firefight that ensued, and one was captured, Bakhtar reported, quoting the press office of the Interior Ministry." Gunmen "also attacked a parliamentary candidate in eastern Afghanistan. The candidate, Safia Siddiqui, a well-known figure and spokeswoman at the national constitutional convention in 2004, was campaigning in her native Nangarhar Province when she came under fire. She was not injured, but three of her supporters were wounded, Agence France-Presse reported."

Funds For War On Terror Said Better Spent On Disease Prevention, Research. Reuters (9/9,

DOJ_NMG_0003674

Fox) reports Dr. Erica Frank of the Department of Family and Preventive Medicine at Emory University School of Medicine in Atlanta says "the US 'war on terror' is saving fewer lives than just spending the money on disease prevention and research, and has probably caused deaths by taking money away from basic services." The "accusation is not new, but" Dr. Frank "said she has calculated the cost, in terms of lives, of the Bush administration's terror policies." Frank "warned there is a threat that because of the U.S. government's policy, enormous numbers of Americans will die unnecessarily."

US Strategy In "Global War Against Terrorism" Critiqued. In a Washington Post op-ed (9/9, A25), former diplomat Richard Holbrooke says global war on terror "is not an accurate description of America's enemy or of what we are engaged in. Unless people know whom we are fighting, it will be virtually impossible to win the war of ideas that is such a key part of this struggle. The new undersecretary of state for public diplomacy, Karen Hughes, who is charged with primary responsibility for this part of the war, has a chance to fix the problem, but only if she is willing to change some deeply ingrained rhetoric and the political reasons behind it." The "long-term battle is against the underlying ideas and leaders behind these specific groups of terrorists. Despite factionalism and fierce doctrinal disputes, our enemies, broadly speaking, constitute a movement, with goals, gurus, ideologues, myths and martyrs. They share a core set of virulently anti-Western beliefs and have common goals: to destroy the moderate (and still majority) wing of Islam, to establish Islamist theocracies that look backward toward a mythic 'golden age,' to seek the destruction of Israel, and to inflict maximum damage and human suffering through acts of terrorism." But the US "has not made it a primary goal to expose Osama bin Laden as the monster he is, something Roosevelt and Winston Churchill did to Hitler, and American leadership did to communism during the Cold War by demonstrating its moral and intellectual bankruptcy."

Mark Helprin, Senior Fellow of the Claremont Institute and Distinguished Visiting Fellow of Hillsdale College, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (9/9) faults the Administration for not committing enough resources to national security and says, "The war in Iraq has been poorly planned and executed from the beginning, and now, like a hurricane over warm water, the insurgency is in a position to take immense energy from the fundamental divisions in that nation. The rise of Chinese military power, although lately noted, has met with no response. America's borders are open, its cities vulnerable, its civil defense nonexistent, its armies stretched thin. We have taken only deeply inadequate steps to prepare for and forestall a viral pandemic that by the testimony of experts is a high probability and could kill scores of millions in this country alone. That we do not see relatively simple and necessary courses of action, and are not led and inspired to them, represents a catastrophic failure of leadership that bridges party lines."

9/11 Recruits' Motivations, Fates Examined. USA Today (9/9, Hampson) report that "contrary to popular belief, there never was an upsurge in military enlistments as a result of the attacks that killed almost 3,000 people four years ago. But in a time of retreat and collapse, when Americans were urged to maintain their routines and get on with their lives, a few people stepped forward and did just the opposite. Although statistically insignificant, they epitomized a raw patriotism that bolstered the nation's spirit in the bleakest days since Pearl Harbor." USA goes on to profile a number of 9/11 recruits.

Panel Disciplines New York Judge Who Left Bench To Work In Iraq. The New York Law Journal (9/9, Caher) reports, "For the first time in its history, the New York State Commission on Judicial Conduct has disciplined a judge for flat-out failing to do his job." The Journal continues, "In a determination released Thursday, the commission called for the removal of North Hudson Town Justice Glenn T. Fiore of Essex County, who abandoned his judicial position to take a yearlong position as a truck driver in Iraq." The Journal adds, "Justice Fiore continued to draw his $10,000 a year judicial salary, leaving North Hudson, where he was elected, without a town judge. The town had to pay a neighboring judge to handle matters within its borders while Justice Fiore worked for a private subsidiary of the Halliburton Corp. … Records show that Fiore returned from Iraq after four months, indicating that he was giving up his private position to resume his judicial duties. However, he did not resume his position and ultimately resigned under pressure last month for what he said were patriotic reasons."

The AP (9/9, Johnson) reports, "Fiore, 54, said he would not appeal the ruling. … In March, he took a one-year job in Iraq driving a truck for Kellogg, Brown & Root Services Inc. … He didn't give the town of North Hudson, 90 miles north of Albany, any notice that he was leaving. Instead, he left his son in place as court clerk to cover for him and planned to render decisions when he returned." The AP adds, "Fiore said Thursday that he took the job in Iraq because he went out of business as an independent truck driver and needed to pay some bills. Fiore, who served in the Marines in Vietnam, said he also headed to Iraq out of a sense of patriotism."

DOJ_NMG_0003675

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Lay, Skilling Attorneys Allege Prosecutorial Misconduct. The AP (9/8, Hays) reports, "Lawyers for Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling say 'deliberate, systematic prosecutorial misconduct' has choked their efforts to prepare for trial in January." The AP continues, "Lay, Skilling and the third defendant in their case, former top Enron accountant Richard Causey, say obvious or veiled threats from prosecutors that dozens of witnesses may be indicted or, if they have pleaded guilty to crimes, face harsh prison sentences if they talk to the former executives has shut off critical information sources." The AP adds, "Daniel Petrocelli, Skilling's lead trial lawyer, said the defense teams have whittled that list to 38 particularly crucial witnesses who have consistently refused to talk to them. … Lay's lawyer, Michael Ramsey, told U.S. District Judge Sim Lake in a hearing Thursday that the defense teams have seen a 'pervasive freeze-up of witnesses,' though he acknowledged out of court that it was possible at least some just don't want to help his client or the others." The AP notes, "The trio wants to dismiss the sprawling case against them on grounds that the Justice Department's Enron Task Force 'has engaged in deliberate, systematic prosecutorial misconduct that has irreparably harmed defendants' ability to prepare for trial,' according to a court filing made public this week. … But while awaiting Lake's ruling on that request, the trio wants the judge to compel those witnesses to appear in court later this month so Lake can assure them that they can talk to the defendants about the case and testify on their behalf without fear of government reprisal. … Sean Berkowitz, head of the task force, insisted that prosecutors do not want to block anyone from talking to the defense teams. … 'The government does not want any witness to not speak to the defense out of fear of retribution from the United States,' he said."

Florida Attorney Charged In Currency Trading Scheme. The Palm Beach Post (FL) (9/8, Sedore) reports, "A federal grand jury in Cleveland has indicted a Palm Beach County securities lawyer on charges of securities fraud in connection with a $14 million currency trading scheme." The Post continues, "The indictment, dated Sept. 1, alleges that Delmer C. Gowing III, 61, of Ocean Ridge helped a Cleveland-based brokerage, Capital Markets Trading Group, convince 10 investors that they could earn yields as high as 20 percent a month through a currency trading deal Capital Markets claimed it had with insurance giant AIG. That arrangement didn't exist, and most of the millions invested four years ago was either lost in trades or allegedly pocketed by Capital Markets' principals, including Gowing." The Post adds, "Gowing, arrested Friday by U.S. marshals, was released Monday from the Palm Beach County Jail on $100,000 bond. He faces a trial in federal court in Cleveland. A call Wednesday to the U.S. attorney's office in Cleveland wasn't returned. … Gowing's attorney, Gary Eric Susser of Boynton Beach, said his client is innocent and denies that he had an active role in the scheme other than acting as the lawyer for Capital Markets. … According to the indictment, Capital Markets began soliciting money in early 2000 from investors by claiming it had an arrangement to trade foreign currencies through AIG, one of the largest insurers in the world. … But the indictment alleges that no such arrangement existed. Instead, Capital Markets wired the money to an Irish company called Magenta Forex Corp. Ltd., which did the trading and produced 'substantial losses' that weren't disclosed to investors."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ In Settlement Talks With Boeing To Close Two Probes. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Pasztor, Squeo) reports, "The Justice Department and Boeing Co. are negotiating a settlement in which the company could be required to pay up to $500 million but would avoid prosecution in two federal probes, said people familiar with the details." The Journal continues, "The settlement would resolve allegations that Boeing improperly acquired thousands of pages of Lockheed Martin Corp.'s proprietary documents dealing with rocket programs, and illegally recruited a senior Air Force official while she still had oversight of billions of dollars in other Boeing contracts." The Journal adds, "Talks are continuing and details could change, these people said, with a final agreement expected to take at least several more weeks to emerge. But the terms currently under discussion would make the pact one of the largest and most comprehensive corporate fraud settlements in recent years. … Based on the broad outlines so far, the settlement also is likely to entail the stiffest financial penalty ever imposed on a U.S. defense contractor for alleged procurement violations, said people familiar with the situation -- far exceeding those meted out during Pentagon scandals in the 1980s and 1990s, which stayed under $200 million." The Journal notes, "The two separate, much-publicized probes, which spanned two years, sent two former high-ranking Boeing executives to jail and set off events that helped lead to the departure of two Boeing chief executives. The company wasn't formally charged in that period, but it was stripped of some important contracts, became a frequent target of Congressional critics and ended up embroiled in the most serious military-procurement scandal of the past two decades."

DOJ_NMG_0003676

Lawyers Say Plame Leak Probe Could Be Nearing End. The Boston Globe/Reuters (9/9) reports, "New York Times reporter Judith Miller, locked up for refusing to reveal who told her a covert CIA operative's name in a probe that may be nearing a conclusion" this week "marked two months -- 65 days as of Thursday -- at the Alexandria Detention Center just outside Washington for refusing to testify to a grand jury trying to determine who in the Bush administration leaked CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity." Miller's attorney Floyd Abrams "said Miller remained 'resolute' and would not reveal her confidential source to a grand jury in the case, which could shake up an administration already reeling from criticism over its response to Hurricane Katrina. The probe has ensnarled President George W. Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove. … But lawyers close to the investigation say there are signs that the 20-month-long inquiry could be wrapped up within weeks in a final flurry of negotiations and legal maneuvering." Reuters adds, "Asked if talks were under way with special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald, a Justice Department prosecutor, to secure Miller's testimony and release, Abrams said: 'If there are any discussions, they would be private.'" Reuters notes, "Several lawyers involved in the case say Fitzgerald was likely to wrap up his inquiry this fall, if not sooner, though they say they have not heard from his office in weeks."

Berger Fined $50,000 For Taking Documents. Former Clinton national security advisor Sandy Berger was fined $50,000, ordered to serve 100 hours of community service and sentenced to two years' probation for removing classified documents from the National Archives. The Wall Street Journal/AP (9/9) reports the fine "exceeded the $10,000 fine recommended by government lawyers. Under the deal, Mr. Berger avoids prison time but he must surrender access to classified government materials for three years." The Washington Post (9/9, A7, Leonnig) adds Berger "admitted to stuffing copies of documents in his coat jacket as he left the National Archives and then destroying some at his office and pretending he had never possessed them."

The New York Times (9/9, Lichtblau) reports, "His motivation in taking the documents remains a matter of fierce debate in political circles, and Mr. Berger himself did little to shed light on the mystery Thursday, except to say, without elaboration, that he had put his own 'personal convenience' in reviewing the documents ahead of federal law." But new court records provide some possible explanations, suggesting "that prosecutors and defense lawyers believe Mr. Berger's decision to remove the documents was triggered by pressure, fatigue and confusion, rather than by any intent to hide damaging information about the Clinton administration, as Republican critics have charged." Berger's lawyers "said in their pre-sentencing memorandum to the judge this week that Mr. Berger, in reviewing material at the archives for several days for as long as 10 hours a day, became overwhelmed." DOJ prosecutors "offered no evidence to suggest any ulterior motive by Mr. Berger. On the contrary, prosecutors noted that the Sept. 11 commission reviewed copies of all the documents that Mr. Berger took and that there was 'no evidence that any unique document was destroyed or lost.'"

Federal Agents Raid Chicago-Area Police Station. The AP (9/9) reports, "Federal agents armed with a search warrant raided the police station in suburban Melrose Park on Thursday, an FBI spokesman said." FBI spokesman Ross Rice said that the raid "was part of an ongoing investigation but he declined to give details. He also declined to say what the agents were looking for and what, if anything, they found. 'No arrests have been made and no charges have been filed,' he said." The AP notes, "In recent years, a federal investigation of illegal electronic gambling devices controlled by the mob found that many were installed in Melrose Park taverns and strip joints. And the FBI said recently that the mob has a street crew based in the suburb."

DOJ_NMG_0003677

The Chicago network affiliates also report on the raid on their Web sites from stories broadcast Thursday. WLS-TV (9/8, Thomas) reports, "ABC 7 has learned the investigators were searching employment records going back several years to determine on what days and at what times certain officers worked." WMAQ-TV (9/8, Rogers) adds, "The investigators came from the FBI and the IRS, as well as the postal inspectors and the U.S. Department of Labor. The investigation has been lengthy and there are no signs it is nearing completion," and "it is believed that the federal agents on Thursday were seeking records relating to a private security firm operated by Melrose Park Police Chief Vito Scavo." WBBM-TV (9/8, Tucker) notes, "For four hours the FBI agents, along with investigators from the labor department and the U.S. Postal Service, collected documents and information."

Powerful Illinois Lobbyist's Top Aid Sentenced To Probation In Operation Safe Road Probe. The Chicago Tribune (9/9, O'Connor) reports, "Saying she regretted ever getting involved in 'the world of politics and political favors,' a former trusted lieutenant to one of the state's most powerful lobbyists was spared prison Thursday for lying to investigators in the Operation Safe Road probe. Julie Starsiak, a longtime close aide to lobbyist Al Ronan, was placed on probation for 5 years and ordered to complete 200 hours of community service by U.S. District Judge Blanche Manning. Ronan hasn't been charged with wrongdoing, but his lobbying firm, Ronan Potts LLC, pleaded guilty to rigging a bid so a client won a contract to oversee a huge expansion at McCormick Place." The Tribune notes, "Assistant U.S. Atty. Scott Levine called Starsiak's cooperation valuable and confirmed her help resulted in the opening of an investigation that 'is bearing fruit.'"

The AP (9/9, Robinson) notes Starsiak "pleaded guilty in February 2004 to making false statements to FBI agents who were investigating bid rigging in the competition to get the contract to manage the expansion. She said she lied when she told them" Ronan "was the one who called an engineering firm with confidential bidding information. Starsiak now says that she made the call, although defense attorney Chris Gair told Manning that Ronan was part of the scheme."

Daley Names Former Federal Prosecutor Chicago Inspector General. The AP (9/9, Reichgott) reports, "Mayor Richard M. Daley, struggling to clean up his administration's image amid an ongoing federal investigation of bribe-taking and political hiring, named a former federal prosecutor Thursday to be his new inspector general. David Hoffman will take over for Alexander Vroustouris, who resigned in June amid allegations that investigations performed by his office were delayed and incomplete." The AP notes, "Eight members of Daley's Cabinet have either resigned or been fired since May as the mayor has worked to maintain the public's confidence. Federal investigators have been looking into City Hall for months, first examining bribes traded for jobs in a contract hauling program and most recently looking into allegations of fraud in the city's hiring practices." The Chicago Tribune (9/9) also reports on Hoffman's appointment.

Philadelphia Defense Lawyer Sentenced To House Arrest In Ticket Fixing Probe. The Philadelphia Daily News (9/9, Warner) reports, "A widely known defense attorney who admitted taking $7,000 in bribes in a parking-ticket scandal was spared a jail sentence yesterday by a federal judge. Charles P. Mirarchi III, who cooperated with prosecutors and pleaded guilty to one count of mail fraud, will have to spend six months under house arrest, pay a $5,000 fine and face additional restitution payments, U.S. District Judge Bruce W. Kauffman ruled." Kauffman "cited Mirarchi's 'substantial and significant cooperation' with the prosecutors and wished Mirarchi 'Good luck' after pronouncing the sentence." The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/9, Ditzen) notes, "The moral of the story yesterday…was this: He who admits his crime and diligently atones for it may hope for kindness at sentencing."

FBI, Minneapolis Police Raid City Councilman's Home. KARE-TV Minneapolis (9/8) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Thursday, "FBI agents pulled up to the home of Minneapolis City Councilman Dean Zimmerman around 3 p.m. on Thursday afternoon. Agents were executing a search warrant at the councilman's home. … Neither the FBI or the Minneapolis Police, who were assisting in the removal of items from Zimmerman's home, would comment on the reason for the search warrant. But during the three hours police and FBI officials were at the house, they were seen removing everything relating to Zimmermann's re-election campaign plus personal financial records." WCCO-TV (9/8) notes, "The FBI said they executed a 'court-authorized federal search warrant as part of an ongoing federal investigation.'" Zimmerman campaign manager Lauren Maker "said she believed the search was politically motivated because it was so close to the election."

DOJ_NMG_0003678

North Carolina Housing Official Pleads Not Guilty To Embezzlement Charges. The Winston Salem Journal (9/9, Gutierrez) reports, "A senior official with the Housing Authority of Winston-Salem pleaded not guilty yesterday in U.S. District Court here to three felony charges: stealing, embezzlement and money laundering. Federal prosecutors filed the charges Aug. 30 against Kenneth Love, the assistant director of housing services for the housing authority, after a four-year investigation by the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and the FBI. The same charges were filed against a Virginia businessman, Sylvester Clay, who pleaded not guilty on Tuesday. … Federal investigators say that Love and Clay worked together to bid on contracts and get paid for phantom jobs through Clay's maintenance companies."

New Jersey Bribery Probe Suspect Arrested On Assault Charges. The AP (9/9) reports, "A developer accused of bribing officials in Monmouth County has been charged with threatening a 22-year-old woman at gunpoint in a community-college parking lot." Anthony Spalliero "fled when an officer at the Middletown campus of Brookdale Community College heard the woman scream about 1:30 p.m. Tuesday, college spokesman Stephen Nacco said. Spalliero had put a gun against the woman's ribs and told her to come with him, Nacco said. … He was charged with possession of a weapon for an unlawful purpose, making terroristic threats, and aggravated assault, the Monmouth County Prosecutor's Office said." The AP notes, "In May, Spalliero was arrested by the FBI and charged with passing bribes, including offering then-Mayor Matthew V. Scannapieco of Marlboro about $143,500 from 2001 to 2003."

Fourth Person Charged In Alleged Scheme To Defraud Kodak. The AP (9/9) reports former Eastman Kodak executive David Finnman "on Thursday became the fourth person charged in a multimillion-dollar scheme that federal prosecutors claim defrauded the company and suburban Rochester taxpayers." Finnman "faces two felony counts of mail fraud and one count of conspiracy to defraud. He worked at Kodak from 1970 to 1999. … The FBI said Finnman and co-defendant Charles Schwab, a former Greece assessor, created a business in the Bahamas around February 1998 to hide bribes and kickbacks paid by co-defendant John Nicolo, a regional appraiser. Investigators claim Finnman and Schwab each admitted receiving about $200,000 and investing it in an offshore account. The new charges said another company, Global Crossing, was the victim of fraud because Finnman worked there until 2003."

Tennessee Lt. Gov. Reverses Statement About Loan Under Federal Scrutiny. The AP (9/8, Gouras) reports Tennessee Lt. Gov. John Wilder "has changed his position on whether he talked to a fellow lawmaker about a bank loan now involved in a federal fraud trial." On Wednesday, Wilder said that "he was incorrect when he said last week that he had talked with Sen. Jerry Cooper about getting a loan at Wilder's bank." Cooper "is an unindicted co-conspirator in a federal indictment alleging fraud against two men involved in the sale of property owned by Cooper." The AP notes, "It's the second time this year that Wilder has backtracked from public comments. In May, right after the Tennessee Waltz sting that nabbed five current and former lawmakers, Wilder criticized the FBI for 'entrapping' the indicted legislators. A week later, he said the remarks were meant to express only his belief that 'entrapment is wrong.'"

Grand Jury Indicts PAC Linked To DeLay. The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Schmitt) reports, "A Texas grand jury today indicted a political action committee affiliated with House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), alleging that it took illegal campaign contributions during the 2002 election that led to a historic realignment of the Texas Legislature."

The Washington Post (9/9, A3, Smith) reports, "DeLay, who was a member of the committee's advisory board, signed fundraising solicitations and participated in at least one conference call to discuss the committee's plans." But "DeLay spokesman Kevin Madden responded to the indictment with a written statement saying that it 'is limited to a political organization and does not affect Mr. DeLay.'" He "also disclosed for the first time that DeLay had 'voluntarily' talked to Earle's office about the investigation last month, and that DeLay said then that his involvement in the committee's activities was 'limited to serving on the political action committee's advisory board along with other elected Texas officials and…appearing at fundraising events.'"

DOJ_NMG_0003679

The New York Times/AP (9/9) reports DeLay "was not indicted by a Travis County grand jury in the charges made public Thursday, although three of his political associates were charged earlier." Reuters (9/9, Seba) also reported the details of the indictment.

Missouri Senators Seek To Close Sexual Predator Loophole. The AP (9/9, Hananel) reports, "Missouri's senators want to close a legal loophole they say allowed a Missouri judge to throw out a conviction of a sexual predator." The AP continues, "Sens. Kit Bond and Jim Talent, both Republicans, introduced a bill Thursday that makes it a crime to solicit sex online from a minor even if the person solicited is an undercover agent over 18. … The move is a response to the case of Jan P. Helder, a Mission Hills, Kan., attorney accused of using an Internet chat service to solicit sex from someone he believed to be a 14-year-old girl." The AP adds, "A federal jury convicted Helder, 42, but U.S. District Judge Dean Whipple in Kansas City threw out the verdict last month, saying Helder could not be guilty because the person he communicated with online was actually an undercover Platte County detective. … Whipple's decision outraged children's advocates who worried it could curb the success of such Internet stings. Undercover agents typically pose as minors, waiting for sex offenders to make contact and arrange in-person meetings. … Don Ledford, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Todd Graves in Kansas City, said the government plans to appeal Whipple's decision. Ledford said the office would have no other comment on the decision or the legislation because the case is pending." The AP notes, "At least four federal appeals courts have rejected the type of defense used by Helder, but those decisions are not binding on Whipple. The 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers Missouri, has not yet addressed the issue. … Under the change proposed by Bond and Talent, federal law would expressly provide that communicating with a law enforcement officer pretending to be a child is not a defense. Such language is already included in state law in Missouri."

California City To Ask For DOJ Audit Of Accounts. The Palm Springs (CA) Desert Sun (9/8, Rodriguez) reports, "The Desert Hot Springs (CA) City Council voted unanimously to ask the U.S. Department of Justice to look into the city's accounts for the past five years." The Sun continues, "Interim City Manager Corky Larson said she was approached by city residents in the past month who suggested that the city - growing fast, but struggling with City Hall openness and budget issues - ask for a Department of Justice forensic audit." The Sun adds, "Asked what types of things the citizens asked for the Department of Justice to look at, Larson said one example might be building fees, but she would not elaborate. … Desert Hot Springs - exploding with residential growth - has in recent years been collecting millions in building fees, which are required by state law to be deposited in particular city accounts. … Any audit performed would check all revenue and expense flows for the city, receipts, contracts and ensure that any fees associated with planning and building the thousands of new homes going up in the scenic city at the base of the mountains were sent to the appropriate budget accounts."

US Charges Florida Deputy Sheriff With Embezzlement. The Orlando Sentinel (9/9) reports, "An Orange County deputy sheriff indicted on federal embezzlement charges was arrested today by deputy U.S. marshals and relieved of duty without pay, authorities said. The Sentinel continues, "Deputy Tawanda McNeil, a four-year veteran, was assigned to the agency's uniform patrol division in the agency's Sector 2, which covers east Orange County." The Sentinel adds, "The U.S. Attorney's Office in Orlando said a federal grand jury indicted McNeil on Wednesday on 18 counts of embezzlement related to payments she erroneously received when the U.S. military called her up for duty. … McNeil was not activated and was not entitled to the the payments, said Carolyn Adams, chief of the U.S. Attorney's Office in Orlando."

Minnesota School District Sues For Items Seized In FBI Probe Of School Shooting. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (9/9, Haga) reports, "Red Lake's school district has gone to federal court to seek recovery of documents and equipment seized by the FBI during its investigation of the March 21 shootings on the reservation, in part to protect itself against potential liability lawsuits. In a motion filed Thursday in U.S. District Court in Minneapolis, the district said it needs the return of security video footage, education records of shooter Jeffrey Weise, witness statements of district employees and computer hard drives, among other things. Those materials are 'crucial,' according to the filing, for the district to evaluate its security system and procedures in effect on March 21 'and to defend against likely lawsuits.'" Red Lake District attorney Shamus O'Meara said that "federal investigators 'basically told us to seek access to the materials through the Freedom of Information Act. … We did that, and it was denied. From the district's perspective, this is a last resort.'"

DOJ_NMG_0003680

The St. Paul Pioneer Press (9/9, Ragsdale) notes, "U.S. Attorney Tom Heffelfinger, whose office is leading the criminal investigation into the shootings, said he had not yet reviewed the papers and could not comment on the district's request. … The school district said it is also seeking access to educational records for Weise, who was at home that day on the school's homebound instruction program. Included in the district's request are records from the teacher who visited Weise at home during the school year. The district also said it believes the FBI has a psychiatrist's report on Weise."

Arizona Man Sentenced To Prison For Child Pornography. The Tucson Citizen (9/9, Rowley) reports, "A Tucson martial arts instructor has been sentenced to 2.5 years in federal prison for possessing hundreds of child pornography images." The Citizen continues, "David Michael Lader, 41 will also be fined $30,000 followed by lifetime supervised release with sex offender conditions, a U.S. Attorney's Office news release said. He was ordered to provide a DNA sample." The Citizen adds, "Lader pleaded guilty to possessing more than 300 child pornography images on his home computer. Many were acquired over the Internet and involved children younger than 12, officials said. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents arrested him in April 2004. Lader, who is not in custody, must surrender to U.S. marshals Oct. 12. … In delivering the sentence yesterday, U.S. District Judge Raner Collins noted that at the time of the crime, Lader was a registered sex offender yet was teaching children and adults."

Wisconsin Murder Trial Pits Rural, Urban Ways. The New York Times (9/9, Ruethling) reports, "A jury was chosen in this liberal bastion on Thursday for the trial of a Hmong immigrant charged with killing six hunters, causing consternation in the North Woods, where the shootings took place." The Times continues, "Some residents of Rice Lake, where all the victims lived or grew up, said they were concerned that the jurors from Dane County, which encompasses Madison, might not grasp the nuances of rural life." The Times adds, "Judge Norman L. Yackel of Sawyer County Circuit Court ruled in June that the jury for the trial of the immigrant, Chai Soua Vang, would be chosen from Dane County after the defense argued that publicity and strong emotions in the Rice Lake area jeopardized Mr. Vang's chances for a fair trial. … The concern about the composition of the jury stems in part from the racial overtones of the case. Mr. Vang, 36, a refugee from Laos who lived in St. Paul, Minn., told police that he had been sitting in a tree stand on private hunting land about 25 miles northeast of Rice Lake one Sunday last November when the hunters, who were white, swore at him and used ethnic slurs."

CIVIL LAW:

Ginsburg Rejects Administration Appeal To Block BRAC Challenges. The New York Times/AP (9/9) reports, "The Bush administration lost a last-minute bid on Thursday to persuade the Supreme Court to intervene and protect a federal panel's recommendations for the closing and realignment of military bases." The AP continues, "Judges in Connecticut and Tennessee had blocked the panel from recommending changes at local Air National Guard bases, and Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg on Thursday rejected the administration's request for intervention. Another appeal could be filed later and handled by the full court."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post/AP (9/9, A26) reports, "Separately, Illinois, Missouri and New Jersey lost emergency Supreme Court appeals intended to stop the commission from sending the report to the president. Facilities in those states are among hundreds targeted by the panel for closure or consolidation in the first round of base closings in a decade."

Caremark Settles Whistleblower Suit With DOJ. The AP (9/8) reports, "Pharmacy benefits manager Caremark and the Justice Department agreed Thursday to a $137.5 million settlement of lawsuits originally filed by whistleblowers claiming a predecessor company received kickbacks affecting several federal health care programs." The AP continues, "Nashville-based Caremark Rx Inc. admitted no wrongdoing in making the settlement, which was approved by a Philadelphia federal court Thursday. … The lawsuits were filed in 2002 under the whistleblower provisions of the Federal False Claims Act by three former executives of AdvancePCS Inc., a Texas-based pharmacy benefits manager that Caremark acquired in March 2004. The Justice Department joined the lawsuits after they were filed." The AP adds, "The lawsuits contended AdvancePCS took kickbacks from drug manufacturers to give their products favorable treatment under contracts with the Federal Employees Health Benefit Program, the Mailhandlers Health Benefit Program, Medicare+Choice and other government programs. … The court filings also charged that AdvancePCS paid existing and potential customers kickbacks to sign pharmacy benefits management contracts. All the allegations date to before Caremark took over AdvancePCS. … Also pending against Caremark is a separate Justice Department and whistleblower lawsuit alleging the company did not appropriately repay Medicaid and other federal health insurance programs. Caremark has denied those claims."

DOJ_NMG_0003681

Senate Panel To Subpoena Asbestos Companies. Reuters (9/9, Cornwell) reports in a unanimous vote the Senate Judiciary Committee "gave its leaders authority to subpoena information from companies facing asbestos lawsuits as lawmakers work on legislation creating a $140 billion fund for asbestos victims." Chairman Arlen Specter "told members he did not know if subpoenas would be necessary, but he wanted 'a little muscle' in case companies continued to resist producing the data." He "said he hopes to bring the bill to the Senate floor the first week of October. Aides said the industry information could be used to make changes necessary to build Senate support for the bill."

US Alleges Safety Violations By American Airlines. The AP (9/9) reports, "American Airlines put its passengers at risk and violated multiple U.S. air-safety regulations in 2003 by allowing one of its jets to fly with a leaky fuel tank, according to a civil complaint filed by the U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn." The AP continues, "The complaint, which was made public on Thursday, seeks more than $1 million in penalties against the airline." The AP adds, "The complaint alleges that on Nov. 17, 2003, a Federal Aviation Administration inspector was a passenger on an American flight from Orlando, Florida, to New York's La Guardia Airport when he saw fuel leaking from a wing of the McDonnell Douglas MD-82. … The inspector warned the flight crew about the leak and demanded it be recorded in the aircraft's maintenance log. However, 'no such entry was made by the pilot or maintenance personnel,' the complaint said."

SCOTUS Could Broaden Civil RICO's Reach. The National Law Journal (9/9, Maclean) reports, "Many believe that the 1970 civil racketeering law was created to apply only to traditional Mafia-style criminals as a way to force them to pay for their criminal enterprise." The Journal continues, "Over the years, interpretation of civil RICO (Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act) has evolved into a tug of war between the U.S. Supreme Court, which reads the law broadly to reach beyond the mob, and appellate courts, which have repeatedly curtailed plaintiffs' use of the act." The Journal adds, "The notion that the law should only allow recovery for harm caused by organized crime members is a myth, said G. Robert Blakey, drafter of the original statute and a law professor at Notre Dame University. … 'The mob was the occasion for RICO but it does not define its scope,' he said. 'When it was argued on the House and Senate floors, the principal spokesman said, "No, it is not a mafia statute,"' Blakey said." The Journal notes, "The welter of legal standards imposed by courts over the years has created a patchwork of splits in the circuits around the country. Despite this, the Supreme Court has been 'vacillating in the degree to which it is willing to intervene to clarify,' Blakey said. … But the new term may change that. The justices have granted review in two RICO cases, and the U.S. solicitor general is pushing for review of a third, while a fourth appeal is on the way."

Bankruptcy Attorneys Brace For Changes To Code. The National Law Journal (9/9, Geier) reports, "The bankruptcy bar is bracing for the bumpy landing many practitioners expect when the new Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 touches down next month." The Journal continues, "Most bankruptcy lawyers agree that the new code is highly complex and technical, that it will cause significant changes in consumer and business bankruptcy practice, and that it is so poorly drafted that it will take time for the courts to sort out its ambiguities." The Journal adds, "Observers also warn that a law purportedly aimed at financially undisciplined consumers is sure to bear unintended consequences for entrepreneurs, independent contractors and self-employed people -- particularly innovators who use bankruptcy relief when caught in a lean business cycle. … Alan N. Resnick, a co-editor-in-chief of 'Collier on Bankruptcy,' a comprehensive 23-volume treatise on statutory and procedural bankruptcy law and a professor of bankruptcy law at Hofstra University School of Law in Hempstead, N.Y., said lawyers will have their hands full getting used to the changes. … 'First and foremost for lawyers and practitioners is the learning curve. It's a very large bill, it's voluminous -- over 500 pages. Every time you look at the bill you see something else,' said Resnick, also of counsel to the bankruptcy and restructuring department at Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver & Jacobson in New York and a member of the bankruptcy rules advisory committee of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He agrees with many other bankruptcy practitioners that the legislation, which becomes effective Oct. 17, is very poorly written and filled with ambiguities. … 'I don't think there's any doubt that we will see a lot of litigation in the year to come over interpreting many ambiguities in these provisions. It needs a technical amendments bill to clean it up,' Resnick said."

DOJ_NMG_0003682

Pope Seeks Head-Of-State Immunity From Texas Lawsuit. The Texas Lawyer (9/9, Jeffreys) reports, "Joseph Ratzinger, a defendant in a Texas suit filed before he was elected Pope Benedict XVI, wants to be dismissed from the litigation, arguing he has head-of-state immunity. … But lawyers for the three plaintiffs, who allege in the civil suit they were abused by a former seminary student in Houston, vow to challenge any suggestion of immunity issued by the U.S. Department of State in response to Ratzinger's request, a challenge that could put the immunity argument to a test. … 'This is a case of first impression,' says plaintiffs lawyer Tahira Kahn Merritt of Dallas. … 'We shall see what the political arm of government does,' says Daniel Shea, a solo practitioner in Houston who represents one of the plaintiffs in John Doe 1, et al. v The Archdiocese of Galveston-Houston, et al., which is pending before U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal in Houston. … 'It's a legitimate political question,' Shea says. 'I would assume that they wouldn't make a decision on that without running it by the president of the United States.'" The Texas Lawyer continues, "According to a status report filed by Ratzinger on Aug. 23, the request remains under review before the State Department. Joanne Moore, a press officer for the State Department, says it does not comment on specific cases. … A lawyer for Ratzinger, Jeffrey S. Lena, a solo practitioner in Berkeley, Calif., says he cannot comment on the allegations in the suit or on the request for immunity. But in Ratzinger's Amended Motions to Dismiss, filed in May, the pope alleges he should be dismissed from the suit on several grounds, including his presumed immunity. … Ratzinger also says he should be dismissed from the suit on First Amendment grounds because the plaintiffs' claims would intrude on the internal working of the Roman Catholic Church and would require the court to interpret the meaning of religious documents and resolve issues of church governance."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Settles Pregnancy Bias Charges With DC Fire Department. WUSA-TV, CBS 9, Washington, DC (9/9) reports, "The Justice Department today announced a settlement agreement with the District of Columbia regarding pregnancy-related discrimination in the District's Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department (FEMSD)." WUSA-TV continues, "The complaint alleged that individuals seeking employment as emergency medical technicians with the FEMSD were required to undergo a pre-hiring pregnancy test, with subsequent employment offers contingent on a negative test result. The complaint further alleged that, once hired, emergency medical technicians were advised by FEMSD management that any technician who became pregnant during her first year of employment would be in jeopardy of losing her job. … 'Using pregnancy as a barrier to a woman's entry into the workplace and continued job security is illegal and inexcusable,' said Bradley J. Schlozman, Acting Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division. 'Forcing women to choose between their baby and their job clearly contravenes federal law and will not be tolerated by this Administration.'"

Jury Acquits Border Officer Of Civil Rights Violation. The AP (9/8, Thompson) reports, "A Homeland Security officer was found not guilty (in Buffalo, NY) Thursday of beating a female Chinese tourist." The AP continues, "Jurors deliberated about five hours over two days before acquitting Robert Rhodes, a Customs and Border Protection officer, of a single federal count of violating the civil rights of Zhao Yan, 38, a businesswoman from Tianjin, China, who was touring Niagara Falls." The AP adds, "The case provoked anger in China after pictures of Zhao, her face swollen from pepper spray and her eyes and forehead bruised, were widely published after the incident last July. … Defence lawyer Steven Cohen accused the U.S. government on Thursday of prosecuting Rhodes to protect delicate U.S.-Chinese relations. Cohen said Rhodes was an easy target because he was openly gay and had complained about discrimination on the job. … Despite that, Cohen said, Rhodes would like to return to the job he has held for 17 years." The AP notes, "Government prosecutors claimed Rhodes used excessive force by slamming Zhao's head into pavement and striking her with his knee after pepper-spraying her at a Niagara Falls inspection station in July 2004. … Rhodes told investigators he believed Zhao and two companions might have been associated with a drug suspect who had just been caught and that the women ran when ordered inside. He said he followed proper Customs and Border Protection procedure in subduing the struggling woman."

DOJ_NMG_0003683

NAACP Calls For Immediate FBI Probe Of Ohio Police Shooting Death. WEWS-TV Cleveland (9/8) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Thursday, "Funeral services were held Thursday for a Cleveland teen shot and killed by police last week, and now the Cleveland NAACP is joining the chorus of those calling for answers and for action. Brandon McCloud, 15, was shot by police last Thursday in the bedroom of his home. … Police were carrying out a search warrant at McCloud's Jeffries Street home when they say the teen came at the officers from a closet with a knife. The preliminary ruling was that the shooting was justifiable." WEWS notes, "Cleveland police said they have asked the FBI civil rights team to step in and monitor their process. But the NAACP wants specific action taken, and they want it now."

FBI Finds No Racial Motivation For UVa Graffiti. The Charlottesville Daily Progress (9/9, Mayhew) reports, "Cryptic graffiti scrawled on the University of Virginia's Beta Bridge…was not racially motivated, the FBI has concluded. UVa President John T. Casteen III recently asked the Civil Rights Unit of the FBI in Washington to review photos of the graffiti images to determine their meaning. James Lamb, an FBI special agent, reported the FBI's findings to university police. 'A review by agents in the Civil Rights Unit found nothing to suggest racial implications,' Lamb said." The Daily Progress notes, "Members of two historically black organizations had painted announcements for their events on both sides of the bridge. Shortly after they began advertising their events, the graffiti appeared. … The information from the FBI is one more step in quelling hatred at the university, said Leonard W. Sandridge Jr., executive vice president and chief operating officer."

Azeri Man In California Sentenced To Prison For Immigrant Smuggling. The San Diego Union Tribune (9/7, Soto) reports Azeri native Yervand Asriyants was sentenced on Tuesday "to three years in prison and forced to give up his house." The Union Tribune notes, "Asriyants was arrested after an investigation by FBI and Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents into a series of smuggling attempts at the region's border crossings involving Eastern European men, women and children. 'He was smuggling aliens across the border that were not what we consider to be typical,' said FBI agent Roy Lemons, who added that the case had special urgency because of security concerns after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Lemons said no terrorist links were found."

Massachusetts Anti-Gay Marriage Initiative Moves Forward. The AP (9/9, Emery) reports, "A proposed ballot initiative that would ban gay marriage passed a key hurdle Wednesday when the state attorney general ruled it would be permitted under a section of the state constitution allowing voters to overturn court decisions." The AP continues, "The action by Attorney General Tom Reilly, a Democrat who is expected to run for governor in 2006, clears the way for conservative groups to begin the long process of gathering signatures and lobbying lawmakers in hopes of putting the issue before voters in 2008." The AP adds, "Supporters now must go out and gather the signatures of at least 65,825 Massachusetts voters. If they are successful, the question then must by approved by 25 percent of two successive sittings of the 200-member state Legislature. The question would then be placed before voters again as a constitutional amendment in 2008. … The state's highest court ruled in 2003 that it was unconstitutional for the state to ban marriages between gays and lesbians. The following spring, the nation's first state-sanctioned same-sex marriages began taking place in Massachusetts and thousands of gay couples have since tied the knot."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Files Antitrust Suit Against Realtors Association Over Internet Listings. The AP

DOJ_NMG_0003684

(9/9) reports, "The Justice Department sued the National Association of Realtors on Thursday, claiming it unfairly limits competition by allowing real estate agents to withhold home listings from Internet-based brokers." The AP continues, "The antitrust lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in Chicago, follows lengthy negotiations in which the government pressed the Realtors to drop restrictions designed to protect traditional brokers. … The association announced changes to its original plan Thursday, but the new steps were insufficient to ward off the lawsuit because the organization kept in place brokers' ability to discriminate against competitors who post listings online, said J. Bruce McDonald, deputy assistant attorney general in the Antitrust Division."

The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Wilke, Hagerty) reports, "The lawsuit is part of a broader effort by the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission to protect competition in the residential-real-estate market. Strong sales and rising prices have been a huge boon to brokers, who despite higher prices continue to charge commissions of 5% to 6% of a home's sale price -- reaping an estimated $60 billion in such fees last year." The Journal adds, "Officials of the National Association of Realtors defend their bylaws as promoting competition, and they had hoped that a revised, less-restrictive Internet rule that was offered in settlement talks with the government might head off a suit."

Reuters (9/9) reports, "The Justice Department said in a statement that the National Association of Realtors (NAR) rule 'prevents consumers from receiving the full benefits of competition and threatens to lock in outmoded business models and discourage discounting.'" Reuters adds, "The NAR said in May it would back away from the disputed bylaw that the department's antitrust division feared would allow real estate brokers to bar their property listings from being displayed by some discount rivals. … The Justice Department Thursday acknowledged that the NAR had revised the rule but said the modified version still discriminated against 'innovative' brokers and did not resolve its concerns."

The Washington Post (9/9, Downey) reports, "Discount brokerages are undercutting the traditional 6 percent commission rate that has continued to dominate even as home prices in some markets, including the Washington area, have doubled over the last five years. … The Realtors group announced yesterday that it was changing its online sales listing policy to make listings more widely available, but Justice Department officials said the changes do not go far enough." The Post adds, "At issue in the lawsuit are Internet listing rules adopted by the Realtors in 2003 that would have allowed real estate brokers to opt out of having their listings appear on the Web sites of other brokers. The rules were controversial from the beginning and association officials said they were never fully implemented, but Justice Department officials said at a news conference yesterday that of about 1,000 affiliated multiple listing services, about 200 adopted the restrictive policy."

The Agence France-Presse (9/9) quotes McDonald as saying, "The purchase of a home is one of the most significant financial decisions a family can make, and NAR's policy stifles competition to advantage some of its members at the expense of home buyers and sellers across the country … Consumers benefit when real estate brokers are free to compete vigorously by offering innovative services."

The Chicago Tribune (9/9) reports, "The suit is the latest chapter in a long-running industry fight over who should be able to access home listings. The earlier policy, known as Virtual Office Website, allowed brokerages that are members of multiple listing services to pick and choose which competitors' Web sites could display their listings. … Critics said VOW effectively undercut smaller, Internet-based competitors with lower overhead than traditional bricks-and-mortar brokerages. But many brokerages maintain that they spend so much money in marketing in order to obtain the listings--essentially their "inventory"--that they don't owe competitors any such access." The Tribune adds, "The new policy, called Internet Listing Display, forbids real estate agents from selecting which brokers can and can't receive their listings. However, individual real estate companies can opt out of sharing their data across the board. … 'The new policy raises some of the same problems as the old one,' said Deputy Assistant Atty. Gen. J. Bruce McDonald. He said the Justice Department would like to eliminate the opt-out provision entirely because consumers should have full access to online listings in order to find homes more efficiently, presumably at a lower cost. … 'The way we go about obtaining goods and services on the Web is threatening to bricks-and-mortar business models,' McDonald said."

Bloomberg News (9/8) reports, "The lawsuit is part of a broader effort by U.S. authorities to open the real estate business to more competition, McDonald said. Internet brokers, who seek to cut costs by letting customers do much of the work of traditional real estate agents, sprung up in the late 1990s and now operate in all major metropolitan areas."

DOJ_NMG_0003685

Bloomberg adds, "The Chicago-based realtors group announced a revised policy earlier today that it said responded to Justice Department concerns. The association has more than 1 million members who work in residential and commercial real estate. … Responding to today's lawsuit, the realtors issued another statement saying their new 'policy is fair, pro-consumer, pro- competitive and accommodates innovation' in the real estate business."

Inman News (9/8, Swesey) reports, "While NAR's new policy no longer allows brokers to pick and choose who among their competitors is allowed to display their listings, it still enables them to withhold listings from all brokers in the MLS. The Justice Department claims the NAR policy prevents consumers from receiving the full benefits of competition and threatens to lock in outmoded business models and discourage discounting. … 'The repackaged policy narrows the opt-out a bit, but it remains effective,'" McDonald said. "

The Baltimore Sun (8/9, Mirabella) reports, "The suit…highlights the profound transformation the Internet is bringing to the housing market, just as it has changed the way consumers shop for everything from airline tickets to stocks, cars, books and music. The NAR has reported that seven of 10 home buyers turn to the Internet when buying a home." The Sun adds, "The Realtors contend that brokers who work for their listings should be able to choose whether or not to help their competitors' business. … 'A broker gets the opportunity to choose whether or not he wants to facilitate the business fortunes of another competitor, and he ought to have that right,' said Ralph Holmen, associate general counsel for NAR in Chicago. 'Real estate is unique in that competitors cooperate in the sale of property in a way you don't see in many other industries.' … But one local Realtor, John E. Rawlings Jr., a Coldwell Banker agent in Owings Mills, said the Internet has already become a crucial tool for both traditional and Web-based brokers and agents. … 'It's the wave of the present,' he said. 'Most people shop on the Internet for listings before they even call their Realtor. It would do a disservice to the seller if they didn't have the maximum coverage possible. ... A full-service company has to show the value clients are getting for the service we offer.'"

The IDG News Service (9/9, Gross) also reports on the suit.

Taubman Family To Relinquish Control Of Sotheby's. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Baram) reports, "Sotheby's Holdings Inc. announced a major recapitalization that saw the auction house's leading shareholders, the Taubman family, relinquish control and open the company to more outside investment." The Journal continues, "As of midnight Wednesday, former chairman A. Alfred Taubman and his family and affiliates reduced their stake in Sotheby's from almost 22% of total shares outstanding and 62% of the votes to 12.4% of both. They exchanged 14 million of their special Class B shares for 7.1 million in common stock and $168 million in cash from the auction house. As a result, Sotheby's dropped its two-class voting structure involving Class B super shares and Class A shares for a single class of stock. The dual class share structure, which is rare in public companies, had been instituted at Sotheby's before the New York-based company went public in 1988. … 'There are a lot more investors who will consider investing in Sotheby's when you have a single class of stock,' says William Ruprecht, Sotheby's president and chief executive officer. 'This will give us a degree of financial flexibility and open us up to a lot of opportunities for the future, such as equity-linked securities.' … The move also represents a retreat for Mr. Taubman, a real-estate developer, who bought the company in 1983 and served as its chairman until he was convicted of price fixing in 2001. … Mr. Taubman will remain an investor for at least two years and his son, Robert, will remain on the board of directors but will step down as a member of the executive and nominating committees, the company said. With the Taubmans ratcheting down, the largest shareholder now is Ariel Capital Management, which currently owns 8.7 million shares. Last June, Ariel informed their investors that despite Sotheby's tough year so far, they 'are confident in the long-term prospects of the business.'"

The New York Times (9/9, Sorkin, Vogel) reports, "The deal closes the chapter on the Taubman family's long role at Sotheby's and has already ignited speculation that the transaction could be a precursor to a sale or merger of the company, the largest publicly traded auction house in the nation." The Times adds, "The price-fixing scandal sent Mr. Taubman to prison for 10 months starting in July 2002 after he was convicted of conspiring to rig auction prices with Sotheby's archrival, Christie's. Afterward, employees say, he lost interest in the auction house. His son, Robert, who joined the board, had little interest in the art world and was just keeping an eye on the family investment." The Times notes, "The exorbitant expenses of the price-fixing scandal drained Sotheby's cash. The company became so cash poor that two and a half years ago it was forced to sell its York Avenue headquarters to RFR Holding for $175 million."

DOJ_NMG_0003686

Art Dealers Spar With Archaeologists Over US-Italian Art Pact. The New York Times (9/9, Eakin) reports, "Lawyers representing art dealers and Sotheby's auction house sparred with archaeologists and cultural property experts on Thursday at a State Department committee hearing on the future of a sweeping agreement banning the import of antiquities from Italy." The Times continues, "Known formally as a memorandum of understanding, the five-year-old agreement is intended to reduce the flow of illicitly excavated Italian antiquities to the United States in return for heightened cultural cooperation between the Italian government and American arts institutions. … In the hearing, before the State Department's cultural property advisory committee, archaeologists argued for the effectiveness of the agreement, which is set to expire in January unless it is renewed. … 'The agreement has had very significant consequences,' said Malcolm Bell III, a University of Virginia archaeologist and specialist in Sicilian archaeology, citing improved policing of looting of ancient artworks in Italy and the availability of long-term archaeological loans to American institutions." The Times adds, "Mr. Bell's comments were echoed by Patti Gerstenblith, a law professor at DePaul University and cultural property specialist, who said the agreement helped provide a basis for a growing number of international regulations for the antiquities trade. … But William Pearlstein, a lawyer representing several dealers, asserted that Italian officials were not living up to the agreement. … 'In contrast to the love fest portrayed here, there is a not-so-quiet war between Italy and American museums against which it is trying to pursue cultural patrimony claims,' he said, referring to Italian action to recover some artworks."

Investment Group To Purchase Hertz For $15 Billion. The New York Times (9/9, Sorkin) reports, "In one of the largest leveraged buyouts in more than a decade, the Ford Motor Company yesterday agreed to sell Hertz, the nation's largest rental car company, to a consortium of private investors for about $15 billion in cash and debt, executives involved in the negotiations said. … Ford is expected to announce the transaction as early as today, the executives said." The Times continues, "The sale, to a group including Clayton, Dubilier & Rice, the Carlyle Group and Merrill Lynch Global Private Equity, is the latest super-sized buyout by a team of private equity firms. … Earlier this year, a consortium of investment firms paid $11.3 billion for SunGard Data Systems, which provides software and services to financial companies." The Times adds, "The largest leveraged buyout ever remains the purchase by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company of RJR Nabisco in 1989 for $25 billion. … The deal ends a heated auction for Hertz, which started after Ford announced in April that it was considering putting the company up for sale or spinning it off. The winning investor group beat another team that included Bain Capital Partners, the Blackstone Group, the Texas Pacific Group and Thomas H. Lee Partners. "

European Companies Takeovers "Surge." The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Singer, Karnitschnig) reports, "A sudden surge in takeover activity in Europe, with more than $70 billion of potential deals disclosed in the first several working days of September alone, highlights a new willingness by European corporate chiefs to pursue mergers and acquisitions." The activity is "unusual in its outright aggressiveness," suggesting the region's approach to business "may have changed for good." The activity "is notable because the deals are bigger and there are more of them" than normal, and "executives and bankers say there are signs the spurt will continue." While the many industries are involved in the trend, "fueled by a confluence of factors," the "main driver of the new deal-making is a realization that shareholders have started rewarding ambitious tie-ups."

Takeover Bid Sides Seek Favorable Regulators. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Singer, Jacoby, Johnson) reports that in Gas Natural SDG SA's $28 billion hostile takeover bid for domestic rival Endesa SA, the two companies are "clashing over who would approve any potential deal: the Spanish government or the European Commission," with each seeking the "regulator it thinks will be most sympathetic to its side." However, "lawyers who specialize in European antitrust issues say Endesa won't be able to wrest control of the approval process from Madrid."

Dell To Retain E-Mail, Data For Use In AMD-Intel Suit. Reuters (9/9) reports, "Dell Inc. has agreed to retain e-mail and other documents that could be used against its close partner Intel Corp. in a private antitrust suit filed by Intel rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc. , court papers show." Reuters continues, "The agreement, filed on Wednesday in the U.S. District Court in Delaware, comes as AMD presses its case against Intel, accusing the world's largest chip maker of using its market power to lock out AMD and its microprocessors from computer makers such as Dell, Hewlett-Packard Co. and others." Reuters adds, "Dell, the largest PC maker, buys microprocessors exclusively from Intel. The Texas-based PC maker agreed to preserve relevant information and copy hard drives of employees identified as 'custodians' -- those who were involved in negotiating microprocessor purchases. … Among the 28 custodians listed were Michael Dell, the company's founder and chairman. Dell Inc. reserved its right to contest a subpoena for the documents." Reuters notes, "AMD has sought information on pricing, contracts and other information from dozens of PC makers and distributors, and virtually all companies in the United States and Japan have agreed to take steps to protect data, AMD's lead counsel, Chuck Diamond, said in an interview. … AMD began talks with companies on legal document preservation in early July, Diamond said. A process of culling millions of pages of documents will follow before the case goes to trial. AMD has already served a subpoena on PC maker Gateway Inc. , according to court papers filed this week."

DOJ_NMG_0003687

ENVIRONMENT:

Bipartisan Resolution Would Block Rule On Mercury Emissions. The New York Times (9/9, Janofsky) reports, "With a deadline for action approaching," Sens. Susan Collins, Patrick Leahy and James Jeffords "rallied support on Thursday for a resolution that would kill the Bush administration's proposed rule to limit mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants." They "said the rule was written to satisfy the utility industry and would take too long to produce benefits, causing serious health problems for thousands of people, especially pregnant women and young children living near the plants." The Times notes, "The deadline for the vote is Monday, although Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, said other issues might force him to extend it by several days."

3rd Circuit Rejects Substantial Continuity Test In Superfund Case. The Legal Intelligencer (9/9, Duffy) reports, "It's not too often that a federal judge declares that five of the judges on her own bench were wrong about a point of law in a string of decisions spanning a decade. … What's even rarer is when that lone judge learns, just days after she sticks her neck out, that she was right to do so -- due to the coincidence of an appellate court decision in an unrelated case that tackles the same legal question." The Intelligencer continues, "Both decisions are sure to grab the attention of environmental lawyers because they clarify the rules courts should use in deciding when a corporation may be held liable under the Superfund law on a theory of 'successor liability.' … On Aug. 31, U.S. District Judge of the Eastern District of Pennsylvania Anita B. Brody handed down a 37-page decision in Action Manufacturing Co. Inc. v. Simon Wrecking Co., in which she rejected the plaintiff's argument that Marcegaglia USA Inc. should share responsibility for the costs of an environmental clean-up in Malvern, Pa. … Lawyers for Action Manufacturing had argued that Marcegaglia was also liable as the successor-in-interest to Bishop Tube Co. because it had purchased the assets of Bishop Tube in a bankruptcy court sale. … To win its argument, Action Manufacturing had to persuade Brody to apply the so-called 'substantial continuity' test." The Intelligencer adds, "Brody said she recognized that five of her Eastern District colleagues have applied the substantial continuity test in toxic clean-up cases brought under the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act, or CERCLA, in a string of decisions spanning from 1993 to 2002. … Although the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has never endorsed the test, Brody found that, in light of the 1998 decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in United States v. Bestfoods, it is no longer good law, and that 'the national trend is to reject the substantial continuity test.'"

NYTimes Applauds Challenge To Administration On Forest Protection. The New York Times (9/9) editorializes, "The Bush administration has largely succeeded in its systematic effort to roll back environmental protections for America's national forests." But now "a rebellion is brewing where the White House least expected it. Western governors are challenging the most controversial rollback of all: the decision to repeal a popular rule approved near the end of the Clinton administration to protect nearly 60 million acres of remote national forest from commercial development." It "is an embarrassment for an administration that had assumed that the governors would leap at the chance to exercise states' rights." It "should also improve the prospects of" a bipartisan bill introduced by Rep. Sherwood Boehlert and Rep. Jay Inslee "to restore the old roadless rule. Now that the governors have spoken, there seems to be no reason to further indulge the commercial interests of a few timber companies."

DOJ_NMG_0003688

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Five California Prison Gang Leaders Sentenced To Life. The AP (9/9) reports, "Five Pelican Bay State Prison gang leaders were sentenced Thursday to life in federal prison on various racketeering, drug and weapons violations after Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger commuted their state terms." The AP continues, "The inmates were already serving life sentences at the notorious state prison in Crescent City that houses California's worst offenders. With their convictions, they will be transferred to separate federal prisons around the country. … 'By incarcerating these defendants in federal maximum security prisons, this organization's operational capabilities will be seriously disrupted,' U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said." The AP adds, "Defendants Cornelio Tristan, 44, James Morado, 57, Joseph Hernandez, 55, Gerald Rubalcaba, 50, and Tex Hernandez, 50, were leaders of the Nuestra Familia prison gang. They admitted that while they were behind bars, the organization murdered two former gang members and engaged in numerous drug transactions from which they profited. … The five defendants were the last of 22 Nuestra Familia members and associates sentenced in the federal case that began five years ago." The AP notes, "The U.S. Justice Department's key witness in the case, former Nuestra Familia leader Daniel Fred Hernandez, will soon walk free even though he admitted to selling drugs and committing other crimes while working for the government. … Hernandez, 42, cut a deal with federal prosecutors for a reduced sentence in return for providing evidence against fellow gang members. He was arrested nearly five years ago and faced life in prison on the same racketeering charges as the others. … As part of his plea deal, Hernandez agreed to wear a wire and set up drug and gun buys for fellow gang members."

The Monterey Herald (9/9, Reynolds, Sanchez) reports that after the sentencing, US District Court Judge Charles Breyer said that "federal prison officials now…need to make sure they keep the gang from spreading throughout the country the way it spread though the California prison system. … 'At the time of the pleas, I voiced concerns' about the potential for contamination of the federal system, Breyer said. 'I think what I said then is true today. It is a serious concern.'" The Herald notes, "Operation Black Widow began with the promise of crippling the Nuestra Familia. In 2000, federal prosecutor Robert Mueller, now head of the FBI, began the case in Salinas with 11 indictments, saying the arrests would have 'a dramatic impact on criminal activities' in Monterey County and elsewhere. This week, it all ended quietly and without fanfare."

Hundreds Of Suspected Latin Gang Members Arrested In International Crackdown. The AP (9/9, Sherman) reports, "More than 650 suspected members of MS-13 and other gangs were arrested in the United States, Mexico, El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras in a coordinated crackdown on violent Hispanic gangs, officials said Thursday. But even as a senior FBI official set a goal of dismantling MS-13 in the next 18 months, police officials from the other countries described vast challenges in quelling gang activity in their prisons and disrupting recruitment. The roundup, conducted Wednesday by 6,400 law enforcement officers in the five countries, was run out of FBI headquarters in Washington, FBI assistant director Chris Swecker said. 'Our end game is to take out the leadership elements especially,' Swecker said at a news conference. 'These arrests are a means to that end.' Police and federal agents made 73 arrests, more than half on immigration charges, in 13 states, Swecker said." The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Kraul) notes, "U.S. police and federal agents made 73 arrests, more than half on immigration charges, in 13 states, Swecker said. Thirty-two of the arrests were in California.

CNN.com (9/8, Frieden) adds, "Top officials from each country coordinated from a joint command post at FBI headquarters in Washington. 'I haven't seen anything like this in 23 years,' said veteran FBI Assistant Director Chris Swecker, who oversaw the operation. … The operation's scope and collaborative effort 'sent a message to MS-13 and other like gangs that their criminal enterprise and the violence they perpetrate will not be tolerated,' Swecker said." KNBC-TV Los Angeles (9/8) reports on its Web site that Swecker said in a statement, "These gangs are organizing internationally, and so are we." KNBC adds, "The effort was..coordinated by the FBI's National Gang Task Force, which was established last year to fight gang violence. … Swecker described Thursday's operation as 'historic ... unprecedented in scope.' … 'This represents but a beginning, another step, in an ongoing national and international effort to go on offense and to strike back against gang violence,' Swecker said."

DOJ_NMG_0003689

Oregon Arrests. The Oregonian (9/8, Crombie) reports, "Federal agents arrested five self-described MS-13 gang members on Wednesday as part of a nationwide crackdown on the notoriously brutal street gang. … Immigration authorities would not release the names, citing their practice of not identifying individuals accused of administrative violations." FBI Oregon SAC Robert Jordan "announced the arrests, saying authorities are 'seeing the beginnings of a movement of members to Oregon, and we are very serious about making sure MS-13 can't establish a strong foothold in our communities.' The suspected gang members were identified through criminal investigations throughout the country, said Dan Nielsen, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI in Portland." The AP (9/8) notes that Jordan, announcing the arrests, "said the FBI is serious about ensuring that MS-13 can't establish a strong foothold in the communities. Last year, the FBI set up a national task force to focus on dismantling MS-13."

Georgia Arrests. The Gwinnett Daily Post (9/9, Brooks) reports, "Four arrests were made Wednesday in Gwinnett County as part of an international investigation into the violent street gang 'Mara Salvatrucha,' federal officials said Thursday. Nationwide, 73 individuals were arrested in the FBI-led crackdown involving local police officers and federal agents in 15 states. … Six gang members were arrested across metro Atlanta, including four in Gwinnett, said FBI Special Agent Steve Emmett." The Daily Post notes that among those arrested was Gustavo 'Conejo' Martinez, who "is the leader of a local 'set of MS-13,' according to the FBI."

Wisconsin Police Arrest OTC Drug Theft Suspects With Possible MS-13 Ties. WMTV-TV Madison (9/8, Swaby) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Thursday, "'$45,000 to $55,000 on an average day,' says Captain Richard Bach of Madison Police's North District. Police claim that dollar figure is what their suspects brought in by allegedly stealing over the counter medications while having ties to MS-13, a violent gang." WMTV notes, "An FBI tip brought officers to a Northside Madison motel on August 29th. A four hour stake out brought in the two suspects, 21-year old Leonel Avendano and 23-year old Elvis Fuentes-Lazo as well as two boxes of evidence. Bach says, 'in their possession was about $10,000 worth of stolen over the counter medication that they had stolen from about 22 Walgreens in the Madison area the day before.'"

Federal Agents Arrest 10 Suspects In Haiti-Miami Cocaine Ring. The Miami Herald (9/9) reports, "Federal agents arrested 10 suspects in an alleged Haiti-to-Miami cocaine-smuggling ring whose members include a trio of baggage handlers at Miami International Airport, according to sources familiar with the investigation. The illegal drugs were transported in suitcases on American Airlines flights departing from Port-au-Prince and arriving at MIA, sources said. The baggage handlers received tips about which luggage contained the cocaine, so they could unload it to evade authorities." The Herald notes, "The unsealed indictment names 11 defendants, including one who is still at large. The investigation, by the FBI, Drug Enforcement Administration and Immigration and Customs Enforcement, is targeting other suspects. Officials with the FBI, which is leading the inquiry, declined to comment."

US Law Enforcement Fighting Increased Drug Gang Currency Smuggling. Reuters (9/8, Gaynor) reports, "For decades, U.S. law enforcement agencies have clamped down on Mexican drug cartels hauling cocaine, marijuana, heroin and amphetamines north over an ever-more tightly watched border to the United States. Now, with stricter controls on bank accounts and wire transfers, officials are concerned that drug gangs are increasingly running illicit profits back to Mexico in piles of hard cash in cars, trucks and even on foot. U.S. authorities have seized almost $40 million in bank notes headed into Mexico since 2002." Reuters notes, "Hard currency seizures are also vigorous within the interior of the United States, where the Federal Bureau of Investigation netted $12 million bound for the so-called Juarez cartel in just one operation last year, dubbed 'Baja Kings.'"

DEA, Local Authorities Arrest 44, Seize Drugs In East Palo Alto, California Crackdown. The San Francisco Chronicle (9/9, Gaura) reports that a "crackdown on organized drug gangs in East Palo Alto has resulted in 44 arrests and the seizure of $500,000 worth of crack and powdered cocaine, methamphetamine and heroin, police officials announced today. Police are searching for another 12 fugitives connected with the case. Spurred by a rising tide of violence and homicides in East Palo Alto, which has seen 13 killings since January, local officials teamed up with an array of state and federal law enforcement agencies to crack down on drug gangs that have taken over local parks and terrified residents here." East Palo Alto Police Chief Ron Davis said the city "acted on lessons learned in the early 1990s, when gang warfare and 42 homicides in one year made the town the per-capita slaying capital of the United States. 'We made promises at that time that we would never let the violence rise as high as it was in the '90s,' Davis said. Officials sought help from state and federal agencies in March, when the city had experienced four homicides, but observers could tell that gang violence was on the rise. The resulting collaboration with the Mobile Enforcement Team -- a special group of agents within the federal Drug Enforcement Administration -- brought together officers from Palo Alto police, the San Mateo County Sheriff's Department, the San Mateo County Narcotics Task Force, the U.S. Attorney's Office, the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and U.S. Immigration and Customs. In the course of serving 20 search warrants, agents seized 6.1 pounds of crack cocaine, 3.8 pounds of powdered cocaine, 2.7 pounds of methamphetamine, 3.5 pounds of heroin, five vehicles, 17 firearms and $129,113 in cash. Those arrested face anywhere from 10 years to life sentences in prison, according to DEA Special Agent Javier F. Pena."

DOJ_NMG_0003690

The San Francisco Examiner (9/9, Carpenter) reports, "Sheriff Don Horsley said the DEA was brought in for its Mobile Enforcement Team program, which can be deployed to a city to investigate individuals and organizations involved in drug trafficking. 'We asked that the DEA come and give us a hand on this, in light of an 18-month upswing in gang violence' in East Palo Alto and other Peninsula cities. Since January, 13 people have been shot to death in East Palo Alto. Horsley pledged to continue working with state and federal authorities to gather intelligence on the most violent gangs and those responsible for drug distribution in the county over the long term. The increased gang activity in East Palo Alto and on the Peninsula in general can be largely attributed to recruitment efforts by prison parolees looking to regain territorial control in the area, police said."

US Illicit Drug Use Down In 2004. USA Today/AP (9/9) reports that the "percentage of Americans using illicit drugs declined slightly last year, though the results were more pronounced for youths, according to a survey released Thursday. For people ages 12-17, there was a 9% drop in illicit drug use between 2002 and 2004, the federal government announced." ONDCP Director John P. Walters said, "Today's survey confirms the welcome trend on teen drug use." Overall, "19.1 million Americans used illicit drugs last year, or 7.9%. The numbers were basically the same for the surveys taken in the previous two years, when about 8% of Americans reported using illicit drugs within the previous month. The National Survey on Drug Use and Health is an annual survey of close to 70,000 people. It measures drug and alcohol use through several categories, including age, ethnicity and type of drug. The survey showed that illicit drug use dropped from 11.6% to 10.6% among youths ages 12-17 from 2002 to 2004. However, binge drinking, which is defined as five or more drinks in one setting, increased in the same age group -- from 10.6% to 11.1% from 2003 to 2004."

House Government Reform Panel Mulls What To Do About Palmeiro. The Baltimore Sun (9/9, Barker) reports that the House Committee on Government Reform "remains uncertain whether there is enough evidence to warrant referring Rafael Palmeiro's steroids case to the Justice Department for a perjury investigation, and it is considering several options for handling his case." In one scenario, the committee "would make public the documents it received Aug. 12 from Major League Baseball related to the Orioles first baseman's positive steroids test, according to officials familiar with the discussions. That way, the public could decide for itself about Palmeiro, who had told lawmakers in a March 17 hearing that he had never used the performance-enhancing drugs. The document release could happen in the next two weeks. The documents include the results of Palmeiro's drug tests, the date of the tests and a record of secret proceedings before an arbitration panel to which Palmeiro had appealed the results of his positive test. His appeal was denied, and Palmeiro served a 10-day suspension beginning Aug. 1." Releasing the documents "would answer at least one important question: How did Palmeiro choose to defend himself when he appeared before the arbitration panel several months ago with his reputation at stake?"

San Antonio Couple Pleads Guilty To Drug Ring Role. The San Antonio Express-News (9/9, Contreras) reports, "A San Antonio couple pleaded guilty Thursday to charges they were involved in a drug-distribution cell linked to the Texas Mexican Mafia that used a local police officer to avoid detection." Mike Flores and Toni Lopez "also admitted that federal prosecutors could show at trial that they dealt heroin and cocaine and that then-San Antonio police officer Enrique Hinojosa, 32, tipped them off to drug investigations. The conspiracy is alleged to go back to at least April 2001. Flores pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute more than 100 grams of heroin, and Lopez pleaded guilty to aiding and abetting the possession of heroin. Their pleas came just days before their trial was to begin. Hinojosa, who worked with the San Antonio Police Department from January 2001 to March 2004, is now the only one in the case scheduled for trial Monday before U.S. District Judge Orlando Garcia."

DOJ_NMG_0003691

IMMIGRATION:

Danbury, CT, Police Enforcing Federal Immigration Laws. The Danbury (CT) News-Times (9/9, Reid) reports, "Earlier this year, (Danbury, CT) Mayor Mark Boughton wanted the federal government to deputize state police officers so they could enforce immigration laws. … As it turns out, the extra authority might not have been needed." The News-Times continues, "A recently unearthed U.S. Justice Department memo says state and local cops can make arrests after traffic stops if they find civil immigration violations, such as someone overstaying a visa. … No specific federal authority is needed for local officers to make such arrests, according to the 2002 memo, which came to light in a recent court case." The News-Times adds, "Danbury officials said the memo will have little impact on law enforcement in a city that has seen a sizable increase in South American immigrants in recent years. … At the same time, however, Danbury officials confirmed city police officers are checking the immigration status of some drivers and making some arrests on immigration charges. … They complained, however, they receive little help from the federal government in prosecuting the cases. … 'The problem of enforcement is not at the local level,' Boughton said. 'We don't get the cooperation we need from Immigrations and Custom Enforcement.'"

Schwarzenegger Expected To Veto Immigrant Drivers License Bill. The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Salladay, Vogel) reports, "The fate of a bill that could extend driver's licenses to illegal immigrants remained unclear today as some Californians condemned it and others praised the measure." The legislature sent it to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "despite signals that the Republican governor would veto it" because he is waiting for the DHS to implement new Federal regulations. Federal lawmakers "gave states the option to create distinct driver's licenses for illegal immigrants under the Real ID Act passed in May. That sweeping law will require most states to change the information they include on driver's licenses, the documents they require to issue a license and how they store driver's license data." Many state are waiting for the new DHS rules which will be issued in 2006.

NYTimes Criticizes Expected Veto Of Gay Marriage Bill. The New York Times (9/9) in an editorial says, "Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger was a profile in timidity this week when he vowed to veto a pioneering bill authorizing gay marriage in California." He "could not find the courage to sign the bill into law. Instead, even before receiving the bill, he announced a tortured rationale for vetoing it." The Times surmises he vetoed the bill because while he "was initially hailed as a centrist Republican superhero…his popularity has plummeted, and polls show that most Californians are inclined to oppose his re-election. Only his Republican base continues to back him." His "own views of gay marriage are hidden beneath vague, elusive, sometimes contradictory comments that add up to ducking the issue." He "is afraid to say what he really thinks. He falls back on a rationale that would leave the issue to the courts or another vote of the people. Anything to get him off the hook."

Immigration Judge Orders Minnesota School Squatter Deported. The AP (9/9) reports, "A Mexican immigrant who was found living at a (Bloomington, MN) high school last winter must leave the country, an immigration judge decided Wednesday." The AP continues, "Francisco Serrano was ordered to depart within 120 days, though he plans to appeal the decision." The AP continues, "Serrano, who is in his early 20s, hid at Apple Valley High School, which he had once attended, and was arrested by immigration officials after he was discovered in the school's boiler room. … He has said he and his family moved to Connecticut after his sophomore year here. He said he returned to Minnesota on Christmas Eve with only $200 in his pocket." The AP adds, "Serrano's situation drew some support from parents who e-mailed the school after the man was discovered, though the school was also criticized for allowing someone to live there undetected. … Tim Counts, a spokesman for the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said it was a clear case of someone abusing their visa privileges."

DOJ_NMG_0003692

TAX:

US Indicts "Survivor" Winner Hatch For Tax Evasion. Reuters (9/8) reports, "A federal grand jury on Thursday indicted Richard Hatch, who took home $1 million as the first winner of the CBS hit reality show 'Survivor,' for tax evasion, bank fraud and other charges." Reuters continues, "The U.S. Attorney's office in Providence, Rhode Island, accused Hatch, a motivational speaker, of failing to report the $1 million winnings in 2000 and about $391,000 he earned from half a dozen other sources. … The 10-count indictment follows a grand jury investigation that began in March when Hatch backed out of a deal with prosecutors to plead guilty to two tax evasion charges that carried a maximum 10-year jail sentence and a $500,000 fine."

The AP (9/8, Johnson) reports, "Hatch faces 10 charges, including tax evasion, filing a false tax return, wire fraud, bank fraud and mail fraud. U.S. Attorney Robert Clark Corrente said Hatch, 44, did not pay taxes on his 'Survivor' prize, income from a radio show and rental income. The Newport resident also allegedly used donations to his charity, Horizon Bound, to cover personal expenses." The AP adds, "Prosecutors charged Hatch with two counts of tax evasion in January. He agreed to plead guilty, but backed out of the deal in March, saying he thought CBS was responsible for paying the taxes on his prize. CBS has said Hatch was well aware of his obligations to pay taxes on the money. … The grand jury, which received the case after the plea deal fell apart, indicted Hatch for filing false 2000 and 2001 tax returns, which omitted his income from the reality show, $327,000 he was paid to co-host 'The Wilde Show' on a Boston radio station and $28,000 in rent on a property he owns in Newport."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Signs Katrina Relief Bill, Vows Federal Action "For The Long Haul." President Bush last night signed a $51.8 billion relief package for Katrina recovery aid. The President also vowed to take steps to speed up the Federal effort in the affected region, and tried to reassure the victims that the government will be at their side "for the long haul." Throughout the day, the President continued to come under fire from Democrats and media commentators, and new polls show the American people are also giving him low marks for his handling of the hurricane's destruction. These developments take place in an atmosphere of increased partisan sniping in Washington. As the Washington Post (9/9, A18, Babington) says this morning, yesterday's events "left little doubt that political reaction to the catastrophic storm will be dramatically more partisan than was the response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks." GOP Sen. Jeff Sessions of Alabama may have summed up mood on Capitol Hill when he told reporters, "We are reaching a perfect political storm."

Earlier yesterday, the President tried to reassure the hurricane's victims. ABC World News Tonight (9/8, lead story, 3:25, Vargas) reported, "A week and half after Hurricane Katrina, the government and the country's major relief agencies are still struggling in a major way to get hurricane victims the help they need. $10 billion has already been spent on that effort. $10 billion. And today, President Bush said it was only the beginning." Bush was shown saying, "The government is going to be with you for the long haul. In all the steps we take, our goal is not simply to provide benefits, but to make them easy and simple as possible to collect." CNN's The Situation Room (9/8, Blitzer) added Bush also" declared next Friday, September 16, a national day of prayer and remembrance."

Reuters (9/9, Cowan) reports Bush signed the aid bill last night. The Senate approved it "by a vote of 97-0 after receiving it from the House of Representatives," where it "also passed it overwhelmingly." In a statement, the President said, "The people affected by this storm have immediate needs that we must continue to meet without delay. More resources will be needed as we work to help people get back on their feet."

Analyzing the politics of the Katrina recovery effort, the CBS Evening News (9/8, story 2, 2:50, Borger) added, "There's no rallying around the President as there was after 9/11. This time, the enemy is incompetence." A "new CBS poll shows that two out of three Americans think the President himself responded too slowly. His leadership rating, usually his strong suit, is the lowest of his presidency, a full 35 points less than it was after 9/11. Democrats see a political opportunity, criticizing what they describe as the President's mismanagement of the crisis and his skewed domestic priorities. The Republican refrain: Look ahead, blame later." NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 2, 2:10, Gregory) added, "The criticism grows. A new Pew Research poll shows two-thirds think the President should have done more to speed up relief efforts. And the President's mother has herself been criticized as being insensitive" for her remarks about Katrina victims.

DOJ_NMG_0003693

CNN's The Situation Room (9/8, Bash) analyzed the Administration's moves yesterday from a political standpoint, saying, "What we're seeing here at the White House…is a continuation of the attempt to try to reverse some of that initial criticism. Today, what the President announced were some initiatives to try to cut through the red tape, some initiatives like relaxing requirements in order to get some of these evacuees their benefits, federal benefits, like Medicare, Medicaid, unemployment checks faster." He also "promised that states taking in evacuees would be reimbursed. All of this, the president said, is part of an effort that will take some time." CNN added, "The White House is well aware of the fact that Americans will start seeing a lot more of what we have been record reporting on CNN today, bodies being recovered. And they want to show that the President is, first of all, in touch with what was is going on, on the ground. And also, they understand that Americans might have some more outrage when they hear more and more of the grim news."

The Washington Post (9/9, A1, Baker, Goldstein) reports on the new poll numbers, and says Bush "has scrapped his schedule to focus on hurricane relief after being criticized for reacting too slowly to Katrina's devastation." A Pew Research Center survey "found that 67 percent of Americans think Bush could have done more to respond to the storm. The survey placed his overall job approval rating at 40 percent, down 10 points since January. A poll by Zogby America recorded its lowest-ever approval rating for Bush, 41 percent." The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Vieth, Curtius) also says "new polls suggested that many Americans were displeased with the government's performance. … The dissatisfaction suggested that the White House was still struggling to divert attention from mistakes made during the initial response and focus instead on signs of progress moving forward." The Financial Times (9/9, Daniel), Reuters (9/9, Whitesides) and Bloomberg (9/9), among other sources, also report on the new poll numbers.

The Christian Science Monitor (9/9, Feldmann) says this morning, "As distasteful as it is to many Americans, the politics of hurricane Katrina have rushed in to fill the agendas of elected officials nearly as quickly as the floodwaters inundated New Orleans." Katrina, says the Monitor, "has become an anti-9/11 of sorts. Whereas four years ago people dropped their red and blue identities to rally around their leaders, Katrina seems to have exacerbated the extreme polarization of the Bush years."

The Baltimore Sun/AP (9/9, Espo) notes Congress acted "with extraordinary speed" on the spending bill. White House "officials said the money was needed without delay to prevent an interruption in the massive operation designed to repair the damage along the Gulf Coast and bring hope to an almost unimaginable number of evacuees forced to flee." The bill "brought the total in disaster aid to $62.3 billion -- a total that is certain to rise as the full impact of the storm becomes clear." Also commenting on the speed of Congress' actions, the Wall Street Journal (9/9, Rogers) adds, "Rarely has the House, for example, considered such a large appropriations bill under the strict procedures applied yesterday, which severely limited debate and permitted no amendments."

Throughout the day, TV broadcasts across the nation continued to provide saturation coverage of Katrina's aftermath. On the networks' evening news shows, approximately 60% of the coverage of the hurricane zone last night was devoted to stories of human suffering and hardship, such as the ongoing evacuation of New Orleans and health threats in the city, difficulties in finding aid or applying for it, and other stresses on social service networks coping with the influx of Katrina survivors. About 40% of the coverage was devoted to the Federal Government's response to the disaster, including political debate over the funding for relief efforts, criticism of FEMA's response, and events such as visits to the zone by Vice President Cheney and First Lady Laura Bush.

A majority of local newscasts chose to lead their coverage with the news that a large hurricane aid package has been approved in Washington. KCAL-TV Los Angeles (9/8, 8:00 p.m.) reported, "Late tonight, Congress joined forces to approve the $51.8 billion bill that will help victims of Hurricane Katrina. The Senate vote was unanimous." KTVT-TV Dallas (9/8, 10:11 p.m.) noted that the bill has already been signed by the President: "Nearly $52 billion of Federal aid will pour into areas hit hard by Hurricane Katrina. Congress approved the aid package requested by the White House and President Bush immediately signed it."

Many reports also noted Bush's call for a day of prayer. For example, WABC-TV New York (9/8, 5:08 p.m.) reported, "President Bush has called for September 16th as a National Day of Prayer for the victims of Hurricane Katrina." Many other stations pointed out that Vice President Cheney paid a visit to the region affected by Katrina. KTVI-TV Chicago (9/8, 5:40 p.m.) reported, "Fresh from his vacation in Wyoming,

DOJ_NMG_0003694

Vice President Dick Cheney is touring the hurricane devastation." Cheney "arrived in Mississippi today to meet with local and state officials and [assess] the damage caused by Hurricane Katrina. His wife, Lynne, and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales are with him on the trip." KGMH-TV Denver (9/8, 11:01 a.m.) led with the Cheney story, stating that he was also "accompanied by [Homeland Security Secretary] Michael Chertoff."

KSAZ-TV Phoenix (9/8, 9:41 p.m.), as many other stations across the country, put the story in the context of criticism being lobbed at the Federal government for its performance in response to the disaster. As the station reported, "In wake of bitter criticism [that] this Federal government bungled its response to Hurricane Katrina, Vice President Cheney toured Gulfport, Mississippi, promising to cut through the red tape."

Some stations noted criticism of the Administration from local lawmakers. WLS-TV Chicago (9/8, 5:06 p.m.) reported, "US Senator Dick Durbin is joining the Democratic chorus demanding that the FEMA head resign. Durbin says Michael Brown lacked experience and exercised poor judgment in the early response to Hurricane Katrina." Still, even with such accusations seeming commonplace, WGN-TV Chicago (9/8, 12:05 p.m.) reported, "A widespread 'blame game' on the response to Hurricane Katrina has been going on for days. But a new CNN/USA Today poll finds most of people surveyed think no one is to blame. Of the 609 people questioned, 38% said no one is to blame"

Other stations focused on the economic impact the hurricane will have on the country as a whole. A good example of this was WAGA-TV Atlanta (9/8, 6:23 p.m.), which reported, "Experts say Hurricane Katrina will impact more than just jobs and the price of gasoline. The storm's destruction will put a strain on home-building supplies made from oil such as asphalt, shingles, plastic plumbing pipe and some types of insulation. The Farm Bureau estimates that Katrina caused a billion dollars in damage to agriculture, wrecking sugar cane and poultry farms. The price of coffee could also go up."

"Yankee Reserve," Management Style Among Reasons Offered For Bush's Performance. A number of newspaper stories this morning analyze Bush's actions in Katrina's aftermath, and offer differing explanations for what many consider a lackluster performance. USA Today (9/9, Keen, Benedetto) says, "Bush has shown that he can be empathetic, sensitive and decisive." But "there's another side to Bush. He can seem detached and unaware of the messages conveyed by his words and conduct." Bush's "critics say his response to the hurricane proves that he's not a leader. … Others say he inherited from his parents a Yankee reserve that sometimes prevents him from quickly grasping the emotional requirements of pivotal events." In his 1992 re-election campaign, "President George H.W. Bush seemed disconnected from the pain of persistent joblessness and glanced at his watch during a debate with Bill Clinton. Bush's mother, former first lady Barbara Bush, said Monday at Houston's Astrodome that some evacuees there 'were underprivileged anyway, so this is working very well for them.'" NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 2, 2:10, Gregory) also reported "the President's mother has herself been criticized as being insensitive" for remarks about Katrina victims.

Meanwhile, Knight Ridder (9/9, Thomma) blames Bush's perceived failure on his "long record of avoiding critics, rewarding loyalty even in the face of failure and shunning -- even punishing -- those who disagree with him. It's a management style that shapes how he governs -- disdaining compromise with Democrats in Congress, for example -- and one that brushes off whole sectors of the American electorate." That "could come back to haunt him, as is now evident in the two problems -- Iraq and Katrina -- that together have sent his approval ratings to the lowest levels of his presidency and threaten his second-term agenda." His "style of isolating himself from unwelcome voices pleases his core supporters, who don't want him to compromise, but it sacrifices the broader public appeal that helped Ronald Reagan and Bill Clinton weather second-term setbacks."

More criticism of Bush's performance appears in the opinion pages of major newspapers today. Al Neuharth writes in his USA Today column (9/9), "Bush used to be part owner of a major league baseball team. He once coveted the Baseball Commissioner's job. So, he'll understand this baseball parlance." He "has had three really big at-bats during his four-plus years in the White House. First, 9/11. Then, the Iraq War. Now, the Katrina Hurricane tragedy. His batting performance: One home run (9/11). Two strikeouts (Iraq and Katrina)." Neuharth adds, "A .333 batting average is pretty good for a baseball player." But "in the Oval Office, two strikeouts in three crucial at-bats is bringing boos from more than half the crowd, as national polls show."

Columnist David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (9/9, A25) reports, "In the aftermath of Katrina, there's an opening for a different kind of politics in America. The new politics isn't about values; it isn't about settling scores. It's about performance. It's about putting a wounded, shaken country back on its feet, much as Franklin Delano Roosevelt did in his famous First Hundred Days." The Administration "remains in its hunkered-down defensive crouch," and it is "outrageous to read that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has been telling members of Congress that media reports are overstating the problems for storm survivors -- this from a man who was denying on National Public Radio last Thursday that there was any crisis at the New Orleans convention center at the very hour reporters were finding dead bodies and abandoned, starving people there. If the administration maintains that tone, it will self-destruct."

DOJ_NMG_0003695

E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (9/9, A25), "'Accountability.' Keep that word in mind whenever you hear defenders of President Bush accusing his political opponents of playing the 'blame game' by daring to pose pointed questions about why so many people in New Orleans, most of them very poor, had to wait so long for relief from their suffering." The White House "must have run the phrases 'blame game' and 'finger-pointing' through its focus groups. In his Wednesday briefing, White House press secretary Scott McClellan used variations on those formulations eight times each." Bush's critics "aren't backing off, because they've been here before. Former Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle, who cooperated with Bush in the days after Sept. 11 but lost his South Dakota seat after a long, White House-inspired campaign accusing him of being 'obstructionist,' speaks from experience. 'Democrats to this day remain outraged at the blatant efforts that Republicans, especially in the administration, made to undermine the perception of our patriotism and our motivations,' Daschle said in an interview."

Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (9/9), "Now that the Bush administration has botched its own response to disaster, we're not supposed to play the 'blame game.' Scott McClellan used that phrase 15 times over the course of just two White House press briefings." Krugman later writes, "In Iraq, the administration displayed a combination of paralysis and denial after the fall of Baghdad, as uncontrolled looting destroyed much of Iraq's infrastructure. The same deer-in-the-headlights immobility prevailed as Katrina approached and struck the Gulf Coast. The storm gave plenty of warning."

Dana Milbank wrote in Washington Post's (9/9, A2) "Washington Sketch" column, "The image of the United States has taken a beating over the past 10 days, as foreign television and newspapers show images of death, chaos and disease in New Orleans. Even lowly Bangladesh (per capita income: $400 a year) was moved to send $1 million in foreign aid. But Karen Hughes has another view. The Bush confidante, now undersecretary of state for public diplomacy, held a meeting with her staff in Foggy Bottom yesterday and was asked about the international ramifications of the response to the New Orleans flooding. The problem, Hughes replied, was not a failed relief effort but a foreign press that did not appreciate the federal government's good work. … Ten days after Katrina struck, the administration and its critics faced credibility challenges. On one side, Bush and his aides continued to admit what even key Republicans in Congress have said: that the response to the hurricane was a debacle. On the other side, liberals ratcheted up their criticism of the administration, giving Bush support for his accusation that they are playing politics. … Yet the Bush administration, whether discussing Iraq or Katrina, remains unfailingly upbeat."

GOP Senators Ask Bush To Appoint Relief Czar; Giuliani, Powell, Franks Mentioned. Reuters (9/9, Zakaria) reports GOP Sens. Sens. Kay Bailey Hutchison and Rick Santorum "pressed President George W. Bush on Thursday to appoint a top official to lead the long-term recovery from the devastation of Hurricane Katrina." White House officials "have not ruled out such an option, saying it is among several being discussed for confronting long-term problems in Katrina's aftermath." Reuters adds, "Various names have been mentioned in Washington for the job, such as former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, former Secretary of State Colin Powell and retired Gen. Tommy Franks, former head of the US Central Command."

Democrats Reject GOP Plan For Hill Inquiry, Will Not Appoint Members. The New York Times (9/9, Hulse) reports, "Congressional Democratic leaders said Thursday that they would not appoint members to a new House-Senate committee to investigate failures in the government response to Hurricane Katrina, calling instead for an independent inquiry." House Minority Leader Nancy Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "said they would not cooperate because the committee would be controlled by Republicans, would have uncertain authority and was created without consultation with Democrats." Reid "said he would not place any Senate Democrats on the panel 'as it is currently described,' adding: 'The only way to ensure that all levels of our government are held accountable to the people is to take this process out of the hands of politicians with a vested interest in the outcome.'" Republicans "said they would still move forward with the panel initiated Wednesday by the House speaker, J. Dennis Hastert, and Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader, and would try to persuade Democrats to drop their objections."

DOJ_NMG_0003696

Reuters (9/9, Smith) adds, "While the joint congressional inquiry appears to be getting off to a rocky start, a Senate panel began its investigation into the government response effort." Sen. Susan Collins, "who heads the Senate Homeland Security Committee, said she is committed to pushing the inquiry forward on a bipartisan basis." She and Sen. Joseph Lieberman, the top Democrat on the panel, "spoke to reporters following a closed-door committee session with officials from the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Coast Guard."

Democrats Forced Vote On Taking Control Of Relief Funds Away From FEMA. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Rogers) reports that during debate on the relief package in the House, there was "growing frustration that Congress finds itself in a situation where it is pouring tens of billions of dollars into disaster accounts administered by the same Federal Emergency Management Agency that many lawmakers have so roundly criticized." On a "party-line 221-193 vote," Democrats "made a doomed attempt to permit a vote calling for a reorganization of the relief effort." The House "modified the administration's request to provide $15 million to beef up the inspector general's office at the Department of Homeland Security to audit FEMA's expenditures. But the agency is spending money so quickly that neither the House nor Senate has held a single hearing on the requests."

Costs Of Relief Effort Generate Partisan Sniping. As estimates of the costs from Hurricane Katrina exceed $100 billion, the political debate in Washington over how to fund the unprecedented disaster relief and recovery effort also took on a more charged and partisan tone. ABC World News Tonight (9/8, story 3, 2:45, Vargas) reported "people are asking all across the country and in Washington, can this country really afford it?" ABC (Moran) added there is "going to be a huge political fight over how to pay" for Katrina. Treasury Secretary John Snow "said the growing US economy can handle it." Secretary Snow was shown saying, "The fact that the underlying fundamentals are so solid, gives us a better ability to deal with the disaster." Moran: "Many Democrats are mindful that the country is spending $5 billion per month in Iraq, and demand that Mr. Bush curtail his tax cuts." Conservatives "are worried about the costs, too, with some House Republicans suggesting a one-year delay in the new prescription drug benefit program." The Administration "says the country can simply borrow the money, since the costs of Katrina, while huge, are one-time expenses." White House spokesman Scott McClellan: "It will have an impact on the budget, at least in the short-term. But these are one-time costs we're talking about."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/8, Henry) reported that "today for the first time we started hearing some tough questions by leaders in both parties about how high this price tag will be and whether or not it's a blank check. You're hearing Republican lawmakers like Mike Pence say they're concerned. They want to see some cuts in other federal programs in order to offset all this relief money. You're hearing Democrats like Senator Harry Reid say they're concerned that over 90 percent of the money is going to go to FEMA, the beleaguered federal agency that has had a lot of questions about its management raised. … And Senator John McCain told me that Congress could probably have a better job of finding ways to pay for this if they cut some of the pork out of the recent highway and energy bills, but obviously that's very unlikely to happen."

USA Today (9/9, Wolf) reports Katrina "has set the federal government on a spending spree. … As the months pass, the government will face pressure to pay for health and education services usually rendered by states, cities and school districts. That will apply not just in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, but in states housing and caring for Katrina's evacuees." That is "likely to push the deficit for fiscal year 2006, which begins Oct. 1, beyond last year's record $412 billion. Before Katrina, the 2006 deficit was projected to be $314 billion." Bill Hoagland, the top budget aide to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, "agreed that the deficit is likely to top $400 billion." Leon Panetta, White House chief of staff and budget director under President Clinton, "said it could hit $500 billion."

The New York Times (9/9, Andrews, Hulse) adds, "Other ideas circulating through Congress that could entail significant costs include these notions: Turning New Orleans and other cities affected by the storm into big new tax-free zones. Providing reconstruction money for tens of thousands of homeowners and small businesses that did not have federal flood insurance on their houses or buildings. Making most hurricane victims eligible for health care under Medicaid and having the federal government pay the full cost rather than the current practice of splitting costs with states." The Times adds, "The torrent of money -- more than $2 billion a day over the weekend, and expected to remain above $500 million a day for the foreseeable future -- prompted several lawmakers to warn about the perils of an open checkbook."

DOJ_NMG_0003697

Lobbyists Try To Work Projects Into Katrina Relief Bills. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Mullins) reports, "Bolstered by the shift in political winds from Hurricane Katrina, US corporations are pressing lawmakers to approve a range of issues that have languished on Capitol Hill, some of which have little to do with hurricane relief." For example, "airlines are asking Congress to suspend federal jet-fuel taxes. Oil and gas companies want drilling rights in new parts of the Gulf Coast. Insurance companies want the ability to use tax-free funds to create a multibillion-dollar industry fund to cover future claims from natural disasters. Shipbuilders such as Northrop Grumman Corp. want billions of dollars to help rebuild shipyards in Mississippi. Even small chicken farmers are asking Congress for low-interest loans to fix or replace hundreds of damaged or destroyed chicken coops in Mississippi."

Katrina Evoked In Medicaid Overhaul Debate. The Wall Street Journal's (9/9, A4, Harwood) "Washington Wire" reports, "A bipartisan group of senators urges Finance Chairman Grassley to delay slicing $10 billion from Medicaid and other entitlement programs serving many of those displaced by Katrina. 'We must remain focused on the relief efforts and ways to deliver both short- and long-term aid,' write Republicans Smith and Snowe, joined by Democrats Bingaman and Lincoln." But "conservatives like Rep. Barton of Texas warn Katrina shouldn't become an excuse to block Medicaid overhaul. 'Let me repeat, so that everybody hears me -- evacuees from Hurricane Katrina would not be hurt!' he says."

LATimes Urges Congress To Reconsider Bankruptcy Law In Wake Of Katrina. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (9/9) discusses a specific category of Hurricane Katrina victims, those "families with the means to flee the hurricane, perhaps even with insurance to cover some losses, but without the resources to make a living immediately. … They have lost their homes but are living off their credit cards and maybe a little savings. As those savings dwindle, however, the mortgage keeps coming due and their credit card nears its limit. Soon the paycheck may stop, and with it their health insurance." The Times argues that Congress "should take this opportunity to revisit the new bankruptcy law, which goes into effect Oct. 17," and "treats those affected by a natural disaster the same as the deadbeat who spent it all on luxury cars, jewelry and cocaine." The Times states, "Before Katrina, supporters of the new law argued it would curb abuse of the bankruptcy code. This argument was always dubious, and in the aftermath of the hurricane, the new law appears simply callous. Does Congress really want to use Katrina's victims as test cases in some sort of grand experiment in bankruptcy reform?"

US Hurricane Response Criticized In World Media. USA Today (9/9) examines coverage in the world press of Hurricane Katrina. Mehdi Mohammadi, "in a column in Keyhan (Tehran, Iran): 'Reports come from New Orleans that show that the pitiful situation of the people in affected areas cannot be entirely attributed to Katrina. A greater tragedy that has astonished the world's people is the widespread chaos, insecurity and plundering that have been caused by thieves, criminals and murderers. ... What kind of human beings are these people who have ambushed and plundered the helpless men and women? ... Americans have created a nationwide scandal." People's Daily in Beijing editorialized, "People have reason to feel disgusted: when Indonesia was hit by a tsunami last year, everybody lent a helping hand and nobody looted. But now this happened in the United States, showing people another side of this 'civilized country.' In fact, it revealed a fragility of the American society, as well as despair and disorder." Ontario's National Post editorialized, "The sense that government would be there to make everything all right…is not surprising given that for so many New Orleanians, a general reliance on social assistance is a normal part of daily life. … If there was a problem, many of the residents had been conditioned to think, then surely the same people who came through every month with money for food, prescription drugs, housing and child care would be there to take care of it."

Brown's Résumé Said To Contain Fabrications. Time (9/8, Fonda, Healy) reports on its website that when President Bush nominated Michael Brown to head FEMA in 2003, "Brown's boss at the time, Joe Albaugh, declared, 'the President couldn't have chosen a better man to help...prepare and protect the nation.'" But Time has now "found discrepancies in his online legal profile and official bio, including a description of Brown released by the White House at the time of his nomination in 2001 to the job as deputy chief of FEMA." Before joining FEMA, Brown's "only previous stint in emergency management, according to his bio posted on FEMA's website, was 'serving as an assistant city manager with emergency services oversight.'" The White House said in 2001 that "Brown worked for the city of Edmond, Okla., from 1975 to 1978 'overseeing the emergency services division.'" But an Edmond official said Brown "was an 'assistant to the city manager' from 1977 to 1980, not a manager himself, and had no authority over other employees." And Brown's "lack of experience in emergency management isn't the only apparent bit of padding on his resume, which raises questions about how rigorously the White House vetted him before putting him in charge of FEMA." His FindLaw.com profile lists an Oklahoma university professorship that the school says he never held, and also says he directed an Edmond nursing home. An administrator at the home said Brown "is 'not a person that anyone here is familiar with.'"

DOJ_NMG_0003698

Criticism Of FEMA Moves Beyond Brown. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/8, Henry) reported that criticism of the relief effort has "gotten beyond Michael Brown at this point. The administration is not really putting him out there very much. You can see Michael Chertoff and other officials being put out further. And in fact, while some Republicans, like Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist just today, said that clearly the federal government, including FEMA, did not do enough early on."

DSCC Removes Fundraising Pitch From Online Petition Calling For Brown's Firing. The AP (9/9, Barrett) reports, "A new Democratic effort to whip up indignation about the Bush administration's handling of Hurricane Katrina also tried to raise money for Democratic candidates." DSCC Chairman Charles Schumer "issued an appeal Thursday urging people to sign an online petition to fire the head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency over his handling of the Katrina response." When the AP questioned the appeal "the DSCC quickly pulled down the page and said they would donate to charity any money raised by the anti-FEMA petition." At the top of the online petition a link "had asked for a donation to the DSCC." NRSC spokesman Brian Nick said, "It's a disgrace to exploit Hurricane Katrina to raise political funds."

NYTimes Says Brown Too Focused On Public Relations. The New York Times (9/9) editorializes that Brown "was made the director after he was asked to resign from the International Arabian Horse Association, and the other top officials at FEMA don't exactly have impressive résumés in emergency management either. … When Mr. Brown finally got around to asking Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff for extra people for Katrina, it wasn't much of a departure for Mr. Brown to say that one of the things he wanted them to do was to 'convey a positive image of disaster operations to government officials, community organizations and the general public.' We'd like them to stay focused on conveying food, water and medical help to victims."

Five Top FEMA Officials Had "Virtually No Experience" With Disasters. The Washington Post (9/9, A1, Hsu) reports that "five of eight" leading FEMA officials "came to their posts with virtually no experience in handling disasters and now lead an agency whose ranks of seasoned crisis managers have thinned dramatically since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks." Brown, Chief of Staff Patrick Rhode, and Deputy Chief of Staff Brooks Altshuler "arrived with ties to President Bush's 2000 campaign or to the White House advance operation, according to the agency. Two other senior operational jobs are filled by a former Republican lieutenant governor of Nebraska and a U.S. Chamber of Commerce official who was once a political operative."

The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Silverstein) also reports that Brown "is just one of at least five current and former senior FEMA officials appointed under President Bush whose professional backgrounds showed few qualifications in the area of disaster relief when they arrived at the agency." But Vice President Cheney "defended the administration's FEMA appointees in remarks to reporters on Thursday." Cheney said, "You've got to have people at the top who respond to and are selected by presidents, and you pick the best people you can to do the jobs that need to be done. We've also got some great career professionals, an absolute and vital part of the operation -- couldn't do it without them." But congressional Democrats "have attacked Brown and other top FEMA appointees." Rep. Henry Waxman said, "FEMA is an important agency and needs to be run by professionals, not political cronies. Instead of a loyalty test, we need people with experience and competence."

The New York Times (9/9, Stout) reports that Cheney said in Mississippi, "Most of government runs on the basis of the combination of civilian leadership that's elected and career professionals that fill the jobs underneath them. And we're always trying to strike the right balance. But I think generally that overall principle has served us well as a government over the years."

DOJ_NMG_0003699

FEMA Union Says Inclusion In DHS Hurt Disaster Response. ABC World News Tonight (9/8, story 5, 3:00, Stark) reported, "Inside FEMA, long-time employees were convinced FEMA wasn't ready for Katrina." Leo Bosner, FEMA employee union president: "All of us were just shaking our heads and saying, 'This isn't going to be enough, and the Director has to know this isn't going to be enough, but nothing more seemed to be happening." Bosner "says FEMA has been systematically dismantled since it became part of the massive Department of Homeland Security." Bosner: "One of the big differences I see, aside from taking away our staff, our budget and our training, is homeland security, now, in my view, slows down the process." Stark: "The union also sent this letter to Congress a year ago, warning about FEMA's decline. It's a view widely shared by stage emergency managers, who also warned Capitol Hill and the Department of Homeland Security, just weeks ago, that the department was too focused on" terrorism.

Meanwhile, USA Today (9/9) editorializes, "Katrina was a blow from nature, not man. But it has amounted to the first test of the new and improved security system constructed after Sept. 11, 2001. The storm's effects were much like an assault with weapons of mass destruction, something that has long been the worst U.S. terrorism nightmare: thousands of displaced people, many needing medical help along with food, shelter and information. … Have the past four years, and the vast sums spent on better protection, been squandered? By one measure, the answer would seem to be no. Since 2001, there hasn't been a terrorist attack on U.S. soil. … Nevertheless, as Hurricane Katrina has shown, the answers to three central questions are troubling: Are preparations in place if an attack happens? … What about the aftermath of an attack? … Is enough being done to prevent an attack?"

Columnist Finds Plenty Of Blame To Go Around. In his Washington Post (9/9, A25) column, Charles Krauthammer writes, "In less enlightened times there was no catastrophe independent of human agency. When the plague or some other natural disaster struck, witches were burned, Jews were massacred and all felt better (except the witches and Jews). A few centuries later, our progressive thinkers have progressed not an inch. No fall of a sparrow on this planet is not attributed to sin and human perfidy. The three current favorites are: (1) global warming, (2) the war in Iraq and (3) tax cuts. Katrina hits and the unholy trinity is immediately invoked to damn sinner-in-chief George W. Bush. … The author of this calamity was, first and foremost, Nature (or if you prefer, Nature's God). The suffering was augmented, aided and abetted in descending order of culpability by the following: 1. The mayor of New Orleans. He knows the city. He knows the danger. … The governor. It's her job to call up the National Guard and get it to where it has to go. … The head of FEMA. Late, slow and in way over his head. … The president. Late, slow, and simply out of tune with the urgency and magnitude of the disaster. … Congress. Now as always playing holier-than-thou. … The American people. They have made it impossible for any politician to make any responsible energy policy over the past 30 years."

FEMA To "Rethink" Debit Card Distribution Following Problems. ABC World News Tonight (9/8, lead story, 3:25, Vargas) reported that in Houston, "thousands and thousands of evacuees began lining up to get these -- debit cards from the Red Cross," but "many of those people came away, however, empty-handed." ABC (Osunsami) added, "Thousands of people showed up today, hoping for the FEMA credit card, worth $2,000. If they came home with anything at all, they walked home with a Red Cross debit card, worth much less. It was total confusion." Late today, FEMA "announced that their debit cards will only be distributed here, in Houston, which means evacuees in other locations have to wait for direct deposit to hit their checking accounts."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/8, Nguyen) reported, "FEMA has decided to rethink these debit cards, which they were planning to distribute tomorrow. We have learned that, indeed, they will continue distributing debit cards tomorrow. … But outside of this Houston area we've learned from a regional officer with FEMA that they've decided to rethink that, and they're going to go with electronic funds, transferring."

The New York Times (9/9, Dewan) reports that in announcing the debit card program on Wednesday, FEMA Director Michael Brown said it was "designed to 'empower' evacuees 'to make their own decisions about what they need to have to restart their lives.' But he did not say when and where the cards would be distributed. In Baton Rouge, The Associated Press reported, people went to a Red Cross office believing they could get the debit cards there. Callers to a Baton Rouge radio station from as far away as Atlanta and Houston complained that they did not know how to get the cards. One person said she had called the FEMA office in New York, only to be told that the cards were in Atlanta."

DOJ_NMG_0003700

The New York Times (9/9, Stout) additionally writes that the "continuing confusion in the federal response to the crisis could be discerned in a comparison of the president's remarks with those of Mr. Passey, the FEMA spokesman." Bush, "in speaking to those affected by the storm, said he understood that 'some of you do not have access to a savings or checking account, or ways to cash a check.'" But Passey said, "As we've looked at the logistics of expanding the debit card, we believe that our normal methods of delivery -- checks and electronic funds transfer -- will suffice."

The Houston Chronicle/Reuters (9/9) reports that "after seeing mile-long lines form today for Red Cross cards, authorities were urging those who aren't yet registered with FEMA to do so by calling 1-800-621-FEMA or going to the agency's Web site. … Organizers and evacuees alike are hoping that Friday's inevitable lines won't match today's, which included elderly hurricane victims in wheelchairs and children who haven't yet been registered for school. Hurricane victims held newspapers and scraps of cardboard over the heads to shield themselves from the sun as volunteers passed out water and doctors arrived to watch for overheating or dehydration."

FEMA's Website Found Difficult To Use. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 6, 1:35, Corke) reported, "It's supposed to be easy: If you're an evacuee displaced by Katrina, just click on FEMA.gov…to register for help. Of course, that assumes you're lucky enough to have Internet access to begin with." But it "took us six tries just to get onto the home page. Then we had to click here, and here, and here, and here, and here, and here -- seven pages total before we even got to the application."

Cheney Visits Hurricane Zone. Vice President Cheney yesterday visited areas affected by Hurricane Katrina. His trip was noted by all three networks. On CBS and NBC last night it was characterized in both reports as "damage control." The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 2, 2:50, Roberts) reported Cheney "got a look at" the scenes of devastation "as he flew from Mississippi to New Orleans to review the relief operations." CBS (Borger) added, "Ten days after Hurricane Katrina flooded the Gulf Coast, the Administration is still knee-deep in damage control." Cheney defended the relief effort, saying, "I think the progress we're making is significant."

NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 2, 2:10, Williams) reported, "On all fronts today, it was Administration damage control. The Vice President was dispatched to tour the hurricane zone." Cheney was shown saying, "The President asked me to come down to take a look at things, to begin to focus on the longer term."

ABC World News Tonight (9/8, story 2, 2:40, Woodruff) added the Vice President "was impressed by all of the relief efforts. Most of the people who the Vice President met today were happy he was there. Although a few said this was just a media opportunity for him."

The AP (9/9, Raum) reports, "Standing by Louisiana's governor, Democrat Kathleen Blanco, Cheney spoke of how the flooding of New Orleans and the destruction of many communities in the region was 'a major tragedy in modern times.'" Joining Cheney on the trip, says the AP, "were Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/8, Blitzer) said Cheney hailed "what he called significant progress made so far in devastated areas. The vice president saw a housing development in Gulfport that was leveled by the hurricane." CNN (Chernoff) added that Cheney "did try to lift spirits here. He said we face a tremendous challenge, but he also said he believes the country is up to the task and he certainly was very encouraging in terms of offering federal support."

Man Shouts Obscenity At Cheney. Reuters (9/9, Bohan) reports from New Orleans that "while he was speaking, a young man shouted an obscenity at the vice-president, saying 'Go fuck yourself, Mr Cheney' in an outburst that reflected frayed tempers and patience in the stricken region." The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 2, 2:50, Borger) showed an unidentified male shouting, "Go [no audio] yourself, Mister Cheney!"

The AP (9/9) also reports that while Cheney spoke, "a passer-by hurled an expletive at the vice president. 'First time I've heard it,' Cheney said, when asked if he was hearing a lot of such sentiments."

Gonzales Tours Gulf With Cheney. Attorney General Gonzales was often mentioned by local television news as accompanying Vice President Dick Cheney as he toured the hurricane damage and relief efforts in the Gulf. WWL-TV New Orleans (9/8, 12:01 p.m.) reported, "Vice President Dick Cheney and attorney general Alberto Gonzales toured stricken Gulf Coast areas this morning beginning with coastal Mississippi before heading later to Louisiana. Air Force 2 flew over heavily damaged houses as it landed at Gulfport Biloxi airport."

DOJ_NMG_0003701

WLBT-TV Jackson, MS (9/8, 5:01 p.m.) reported, "Cheney was also accompanied by attorney general Alberto Gonzales and homeland security secretary Michael Chertoff."

WAFB-TV Baton Rouge (9/8, 12:02 p.m.) reported, "Flew over heavily damaged houses as it landed at the Gulfport- Biloxi international airport this morning."

KRIV-TV Houston (9/8, 12:06 p.m.) reported, "They'll be busy spending the day visiting with storm victims and reviewing thousands of people still holding out."

WDAF-TV Kansas City (9/8, 5:59 p.m.) reported, "They met with local and state officials."

Amongst the other stations carrying this story are WJTV-TV Jackson, MS (9/8 6:15 p.m.), CLTV-TV Chicago (9/8, 11:04 p.m.), WJLA-TV Washington, DC (9/8, 12:00 p.m.), WAGA-TV Atlanta (9/8, 10:29 p.m.), KTVK-TV Phoenix (9/8, 7:00 a.m), WFOR-TV Miami (9/8, 12:21 p.m.) , WTAE-TV Pittsburgh (9/8, 12:01 p.m.), WCPO-TV Cincinnati (9/8, 4:57 p.m.), and WGME-TV Portland (9/8, 5:23 p.m.).

First Lady Defends Government Response. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 2, 2:10, Gregory) reported, "At a school in Mississippi, it was the First Lady defending the government's response to Katrina." Laura Bush was shown saying, "I think we've seen a lot of the same footage over and over that isn't necessarily representative of what really happened in both, in a lot of ways. Overall, it was a very good response." On the CBS Evening News (9/8, story 2, 2:50, Borger), the First lady was shown saying, "Well, I think across the board, very, very well."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/8, Blitzer) added Mrs. Bush "addressed the plight of children displaced by the hurricane. She urged parents to make sure their children are safe in school. And, earlier, she visited a school in Iowa that is taking care of children of evacuees."

The Des Moines Register (9/9, Beaumont) also reports the First Lady visited Des Moines, where she visited Lovejoy Elementary School. Mrs. Bush "toured the school" with US Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings.

The Biloxi Sun Herald (9/9) reports, "First Lady Laura Bush visited with hurricane victims in Southaven Thursday and cradled what could be the storm's youngest refugee -- a three-day old infant born to a New Orleans couple seeking shelter in Mississippi." She spoke at Greenbrook Elementary School and "praised DeSoto County residents and Superintendent Milton Kuykendall for enrolling storm refugees in the DeSoto County School District."

The Commercial Appeal (TN) (9/9, Covington) reports, "Hurricane evacuees at a Southaven church shelter said a visit by first lady Laura Bush on Thursday raised their spirits as they try to deal with their losses." Bush "drew applause from more than 100 evacuees and church volunteers when she entered the foyer of the church's education building shortly after 2 p.m." Bush "also was greeted warmly at Greenbrook Elementary School in Southaven, where she visited a second-grade music class and met with nine evacuee children at the school and 12 of their parents."

First Lady Describes Dean, West Criticism Of Bush As "Disgusting." The AP (9/9) reports, "Laura Bush described as 'disgusting' comments by rapper Kanye West and Democratic chairman Howard Dean blaming her husband for the disproportionate number of black hurricane victims. 'I think all of those remarks are disgusting, to be perfectly frank, because of course President Bush cares about everyone in our country,' the first lady said Thursday in an interview. … 'And I know that. I mean, I'm the person who lives with him,' she said. 'I know what he's like and I know what he thinks and I know how he cares about people.'" The AP notes, "On a nationally televised telethon Friday, broadcast live on NBC, West departed from the script to declare 'George Bush doesn't care about black people.'" Dean, earlier this week, "told the National Baptist Convention of America, a black religious group, that race played a role in the hurricane casualty numbers. Mrs. Bush said it was clear that poor people were more vulnerable when the hurricane hit. 'They lived in poorer neighborhoods. Their neighborhoods were the ones that were more likely to flood, as we saw in New Orleans. Their housing was more vulnerable,' she said. 'And that's what we saw, and that's what we want to address in our country.'"

White House Considered Taking Direct Control Of Louisiana Relief Effort. The New York Times (9/9, Lipton, Schmitt, Shanker) reports that as New Orleans "descended into chaos last week and Louisiana's governor asked for 40,000 soldiers, President Bush's senior advisers debated whether the president should speed the arrival of active-duty troops by seizing control of the hurricane relief mission from the governor. For reasons of practicality and politics, officials at the Justice Department and the Pentagon, and then at the White House, decided not to urge

DOJ_NMG_0003702

Mr. Bush to take command of the effort. Instead, the Washington officials decided to rely on the growing number of National Guard personnel flowing into Louisiana, who were under Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco's control." The debate began after officials realized Katrina "had exposed a critical flaw in the national disaster response plans created after the Sept. 11 attacks. According to the administration's senior domestic security officials, the plan failed to recognize that local police, fire and medical personnel might be incapacitated."

The Wall Street Journal (9/9, McKinnon) reports that while the "Bush administration briefly sought to take control of local law enforcement to quell the violence and get help to victims" in New Orleans. Blanco, "in a letter to the White House on Saturday morning, said she would retain control of her state's National Guard troops, and requested the creation a federal joint task force that combined regular military and National Guard units."

Chaotic Logistics, Flawed Decisions Said To Have Hurt Rescue Efforts. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 5, 2:40, Myers) reported, "As the floodwaters rose last Tuesday, the civilian director of the New Orleans Port Police," Cynthia Swain, "made a stunning decision. She ordered all harbor officers to abandon their posts and flee to higher ground," and "only the police chief and two officers stayed on duty." The decision "was just one of many questionable calls, at all levels of government, which delayed or deprived victims of desperately needed help." One medical assessment team, "veterans of 31 disasters, can treat hundreds of patients a day. But for 11 days, it's been repeatedly redirected by FEMA, from Alabama to Biloxi to Dallas to Galveston. So far, they've treated one small cut." Last Friday, Mississippi "asked FEMA for 20,000 trailers for temporary housing. On Monday, when nothing had happened, Sen. Trent Lott asked the President to intervene personally. The next day he was told that 400 trailers are on the way." Today "hundreds of trailers" are "still sitting in a facility in Georgia."

The Houston Chronicle/AP (9/9) reports that according to a Louisiana State University civil engineering professor, New Orleans officials "had 550 municipal buses and hundreds of additional school buses at their disposal but made no plans to use them to get people out of New Orleans before the storm. … Instead, local buses were used to ferry people from 12 pickup points to poorly supplied 'shelters of last resort' in the city." And "at least two public hospitals, loaded with more than 1,000 caregivers and patients, had their generators in their basements, which made them vulnerable in a flood. That violated the state's hurricane plan but had gone uncorrected for years because the hospitals did not have the money to fix the situation."

New Orleans Mayor's Office Lost Contact With Outside World For Days. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Rhoads) reports that a "small corps" of New Orleans city leaders, "holed up at the Hyatt Hotel," had "virtually no way to communicate with the outside world" for the first days of the crisis. At "12:27 a.m. on Wednesday, Aug. 31, the mayor's inner circle made its first outside call in two days. … During the first days of Katrina, the besieged mayor's office struggled to stay connected. It was forced to rely on ingenuity and extreme methods, including breaking in to an Office Depot -- as the chief of police stood watch and chased away unofficial looters -- to obtain necessary equipment."

Landrieu Defends Louisiana Response. USA Today (9/9, Stone) reports that Sen. Mary Landrieu "returned to Capitol Hill on Thursday to defend Louisiana's response to Hurricane Katrina and chastise how Washington handled the disaster." Landrieu, "speaking on the Senate floor for the first time since the disaster, dismissed critics who have blamed local officials." In an interview later, she said, "I'm angry that some people in Washington….would blame state and local governments for something that is a federal responsibility. For God's sake, they were trying to make decisions under 10 feet of water."

The Washington Post (9/9, C1, Leibovich) reports that as Landrieu returned to Washington yesterday, she "had the shellshocked bearing of someone who's been in a place difficult to describe. People greeted Landrieu delicately, like a mourner." Landrieu "had spent the past 10 days at an Embassy Suites in Baton Rouge after evacuating her family's summer home in Slidell on Lake Pontchartrain, since obliterated. Last she heard, her childhood home in New Orleans was filled with five feet of water. … She was reluctant to come back to Washington, Landrieu said. Don't focus on her, she pleaded -- a rare instance of a senator saying something like that and maybe even meaning it. But of course, there was fuss everywhere Landrieu went, the clop-clop-clop of her heels echoing down hallways amid camera clicks, processions of well-wishers, trailing reporters, the whole bit."

Displacements Could Alter Louisiana Political Equations. The Wall Street Journal's (9/9, A4, Harwood)

DOJ_NMG_0003703

"Washington Wire" reports Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu "could find margins squeezed if thousands of Democratic-leaning African-Americans don't return by her 2008 re-election. Louisiana political analyst John Maginnis says state could even lose one of seven House seats in next redistricting. Two shaky House incumbents, Democrat Melancon and Republican Boustany, hope response to hurricane rallies voters behind them. House Republican campaign chief Reynolds touts chance to market conservative social-policy solutions; Rep. Baker of Baton Rouge is overheard telling lobbyists: 'We finally cleaned up public housing in New Orleans. We couldn't do it, but God did.' Baker explains later he didn't intend flippancy but has long wanted to improve low-income housing."

Police, Military Urge Remaining New Orleans Residents To Leave. Police and the military set on what a front page story in the Washington Post (9/9, A1, Dwyer, Tyson) calls "an aggressive door-to-door campaign" Thursday to urge remaining New Orleans residents "to leave or be removed by force. … The evacuation effort, however, appeared haphazard at best. Affluent areas that were not flooded, such as parts of the Garden District and Uptown, appear to be a low priority for mandatory evacuations."

USA Today (9/9, Johnson) says police and soldiers "held back" from "their threatened use of force." Police Superintendent Eddie Compass "urged residents to leave and said that at some point police and the National Guard would begin using a 'minimal amount of force' to get people to leave. … Mayor Ray Nagin had said he would order people out of the city if they did not leave."

Knight Ridder (9/9, Pompilio, Nesmith, Merzer) says, "More people seemed motivated to leave, having heard the term 'mandatory evacuation,' and fewer than 10,000 people remained."

The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Cooper, Searcey) adds that "receding floodwaters could make some of those hunkered down in their homes more than 10 days after Hurricane Katrina hit even more determined to stay." The Journal adds that "key tourist and historic districts such as the French Quarter and Garden District, generally located near the Mississippi River, are dry, and soldiers said many people remain in those areas."

ABC World News Tonight (9/8, story 2, 2:40, Woodruff) reported the police and the National Guard "got a lot tougher on the holdouts. Not only the flooded areas. But New Orleans' driest and wealthiest neighborhoods, too." There are "no orders to use force, just strong persuasion. Sometimes entering open houses with guns drawn and instructions to disarm anyone inside." For "many of the police and guard troops, it is an uncomfortable job to do this in an American city."

The CBS Evening News (9/8, lead story, 3:35, Roberts) added, "The police say most who were willing to leave voluntarily have done so. For the rest, officers have orders to remove them, but they say they will do that with as little force as necessary."

Police Confiscate Weapons In Anticipation Of Forced Evacuations. The New York Times (9/9, Berenson, Broder) reports that police "began confiscating weapons from civilians in preparation for a forced evacuation of the last holdouts still living here, as President Bush steeled the nation for the grisly scenes of recovering the dead that will unfold in coming days. … Although it appeared Wednesday night that forced evacuations were beginning, on Thursday the authorities were still looking for those willing to leave voluntarily. The police said that the search was about 80 percent done, and that afterward they would begin enforcing Mayor C. Ray Nagin's order to remove residents by force."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/8, Penhaul) reported that there is "no idea when the process of forced evacuations will get underway. But it's essential to get the first wave out first. Nor any details of how those forced evacuations will get underway, because many of the agents that are involved in law enforcement here, although they say, yes, they're willing to take part in forced evacuations, say they don't yet feel comfortable going into people's homes and dragging people out. They say they feel that they have suffered enough so far."

Louisiana Provides 25,000 Body Bags To New Orleans. The CBS Evening News (9/8, lead story, 3:35, Pitts) reported, "There are still decomposing bodies on the streets here. But now, there are makeshift morgues sets up outside the city, and the state of Louisiana has provided 25,000 body bags to the city: A sign perhaps of what's to come."

Crews Work To Repair New Orleans Flood Walls. USA Today (9/9, Levin) reports on efforts to repair holes in New Orleans' flood walls. The Army Corps of Engineers "is leading the effort to drain the vast areas of rotting water covering this city. So far, water levels throughout the city have dropped no more than a foot or two. … With the closure earlier this week of a breach in the 17th Street Canal, the Army Corps' efforts to dry out New Orleans have shifted here to London Avenue. … Across the city, crews continued to try to get giant pumps that failed in Hurricane Katrina's wake to come back to life. The corps predicts it could take up to 80 days to drain the city. The debris clogging pumps could contain human remains, and in some cases that was slowing the recovery effort."

DOJ_NMG_0003704

USA Today (9/9, Cauchon) says the "skeleton of normality is slowly returning to the Mississippi Gulf Coast." In "a few patches…civil society is being restored thanks to electricity, running water, cellular phones and the extraordinary efforts of business owners and workers.'

Traditional New Orleans Funerals Gone In Wake Of Hurricane. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (9/9, Gray, Perez) reports, "Few cities bury their dead in the high style of New Orleans, where funerals can last a week, feature jazz bands as well as parades and draw bigger crowds than weddings do. But those traditions are, for the time being, yet another casualty of Hurricane Katrina. The same flood that ended so many lives in New Orleans shut down most of the city's institutions of death -- its funeral homes, churches and cemeteries. It also scattered the crowds that make New Orleans funerals so extraordinary. For thousands of survivors, this loss could complicate the effort to accept the death of a loved one."

FEMA Restrictions On Media Access Draw Criticism. The Washington Post (9/9, C1, Kurtz) reports in its "Media Notes" column, "As rescue and recovery efforts continue in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, reporters and press analysts are growing increasingly critical of restrictions on media access. The Federal Emergency Management Agency, under heavy journalistic fire for its slow response to the disaster, has sparked new criticism by asking news organizations not to take pictures of bodies being recovered in Louisiana and Mississippi. FEMA spokesman Mark Pfeifle said yesterday that the agency 'has asked that those images not be shown,' but that this is only a request. … Some Louisiana officials, whether taking their cue from FEMA or not, are attempting to make the policy mandatory."

Katrina Sparks Debate About Military Role In Disaster Response. The Washington Post (9/9, A15, Graham) reports that the "breakdown of local and state agencies" in the Katrina response has "spurred fresh debate about whether disasters of such magnitude ought to be turned over to the U.S. military and other federal authorities to manage at the outset. National plans developed after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks rest on the notion that police, fire and other emergency groups are best positioned to serve as first responders. Federal agencies are supposed to function as backup to state and local ones, and military forces are meant to play a largely supporting role to civilian authorities. But Katrina showed what can happen when the foundation of this organizational structure is quickly overwhelmed and disintegrates, according to government officials and independent analysts."

In his Wall Street Journal (9/9, A16) "Wonder Land" column, Daniel Henninger writes, "The popular impression left the past week -- that the government was wholly unprepared for Katrina -- is not true. Significant U.S. military assistance was on alert throughout the week prior to Katrina's landfall. Why those highly trained and drilled assets did not move into New Orleans sooner is a question that should now sit at the center of a debate over who should have the authority -- the states or the federal government -- to be the 'first mover.'"

Honoré Seen As "Giuliani Of The Gulf Coast." The Christian Science Monitor (9/9, Jonsson) profiles First Army Lt. Gen. Russel Honoré, who "has emerged as the Rudy Giuliani of the Gulf Coast." A "rough-talking Louisiana native, he is credited with changing the character of the relief effort from a mad scramble to an increasingly orderly and effective rescue and restoration. But General Honoré is also having to navigate a fine line between necessary leadership and the specter of federal troops using force against American citizens. So far, he appears to have succeeded."

Hurricane Decimates Region's Legal System. The New York Times (9/9, Applebome, Glater) says Hurricane Katrina "decimated the legal system of the New Orleans region. More than a third of the state's lawyers have lost their offices, some for good. Most computer records will be saved. Many other records will be lost forever. Some local courthouses have been flooded, imperiling a vast universe of files, records and documents. Court proceedings from divorces to murder trials, to corporate litigation, to custody cases will be indefinitely halted and when proceedings resume lawyers will face prodigious - if not insurmountable - obstacles in finding witnesses and principals and in recovering evidence." The Wall Street

DOJ_NMG_0003705

Journal (9/9, Burton) adds, "The extent of the destroyed evidence and lawsuit files remains uncertain, as several courts remain inaccessible or under water. But because of the damage, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco this week issued an order suspending all state civil-court deadlines, such as statutes of limitations dictating when cases must be filed, at least through Sept. 25. Many civil and criminal trial courts have suspended operations in the parishes, or counties, in the New Orleans area. The federal district court in New Orleans says it is 'closed until further notice' and that it hopes to reopen in three locations -- Houma, Baton Rouge and Lafayette, La. The Louisiana Supreme Court has moved to Baton Rouge, and the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals has shifted temporarily to Houston." Knight Ridder distributes a Dallas Morning News article (9/9, Townsend, Hancock) that reports, "The Louisiana Supreme Court building was flooded and many critical files and evidence boxes are presumably destroyed. City and district court buildings in neighboring parishes have been similarly hit. … Lawyers and judges alike are scrambling to answer previously unimaginable questions: What will happen to pending cases? What about the out-on-bail defendants, witnesses and even law-enforcement officials who are among the several hundred thousand evacuees sprinkled throughout the country, many in Texas?" The News adds, "Judge Patrick Higginbotham said his formerly New Orleans-based 5th Circuit Court of Appeals will be back in business in Houston by next week. … But Katrina's devastating aftermath will be 'enormously disruptive' for the Gulf Coast region's state and local courts, he said. … 'I don't think the tasks we face are nearly as difficult as those in the state courts in the Gulf Coast region,' the Austin, Texas-based Higginbotham said."

Compass Defends Efforts Of New Orleans Police. The New York Times (9/9, Longman) reports on New Orleans Police Superintendent P. Edwin Compass III, who has been "widely criticized for his inability to keep the peace as New Orleans sank into mayhem, and to sustain the morale of his officers, about 500 of whom abandoned the 1,700-member force in anger or despair." Compass "has returned the verbal fire with a raw, impassioned defense of his department. He pointed to those officers who stayed and helped restore order despite a shortage of manpower and ammunition, and volleys of gunshot from what he said were dozens of people trying to thwart rescue efforts." Compass "said he believed that his officers did the best they could, considering that their communications system was inoperable and that the city's ammunition depot was left inaccessible beneath 10 feet of water." The Times adds, "Some police officers, speaking on the condition of anonymity, complained Wednesday that the superintendent was largely invisible immediately after the flooding began. But others said he had maintained a strong public presence, and they praised him for supporting his officers in a department whose reputation suffered severe damage from corruption scandals in the 1990's."

Hundreds Of New Orleans Police Officers Missing. The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Cart, Chen, Gold) reports, "Hundreds of police officers are missing and many may be dead from Hurricane Katrina, according to a top police official, who in an interview today also said that the population of the city may sharply drop because of the storm. Deputy Police Supt. Warren Riley said about 700 of the city's 1,600-officer force was told to stay home until the storm passed so that they would be available to be deployed wherever they were needed. Between 400 and 500 officers remain unaccounted for and many are feared dead, though some are believed to have walked away from the job, he said."

DOJ To Set Up Katrina Anti-Fraud Task Force. Agence France-Presse (9/9) reports, "With billions of dollars pouring in to help victims of Hurricane Katrina, the US government has established a task force to hunt down fraud, White House spokesman Scott McClellan announced. … 'Unfortunately, there are some who are intent on setting up fraudulent schemes to take advantage of the victims and the people who are trying to help those who have been affected,' he told reporters. … 'These are despicable acts that will not be tolerated. Those who take advantage of the situation will be pursued and will be prosecuted,' said McClellan." AFP adds, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has created the Hurricane Katrina Task Force on Fraud 'to deter, investigate and prosecute disaster-related federal crimes including fraudulent charities, insurance fraud, identity theft and government benefit fraud,' said the spokesman. … The national task force includes officials with the Justice Department's criminal division and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, he said."

Experts Warn Katrina Victims Of ID Theft. Reuters (9/8, Sullivan) reports, "Birth certificates and other sensitive documents left among the waterlogged debris of Hurricane Katrina could put the storm's victims at heightened risk for identity theft, experts said on Thursday." Reuter continues, "U.S. officials and consumer advocates said they had not yet heard of any cases of identity theft related to the disaster because the crime usually takes months to unfold. … But consumers should keep a close eye on their bank statements and order a copy of their credit reports once they get their lives back together to make sure they are not being victimized, they said. … 'We tell people not to be alarmed but to be cautious,' said Betsy Broder, an assistant director in the Federal Trade Commission's Bureau of Consumer Protection." Reuters adds, "Those who wish to contribute to relief efforts are at risk as well. Internet-security company Websense said on Sunday that it had found a 'phishing' e-mail campaign that seeks to trick Internet users into providing their credit-card numbers to a Web site that looks like one run by the Red Cross. … In order to avoid such scams, donors should type the address of charitable Web sites directly into their browsers, rather than clicking on a link in the e-mail, experts said. … The FBI is investigating at least a dozen suspicious Web sites and e-mail messages for fraud, spokesman Paul Bresson said."

DOJ_NMG_0003706

Administration Hires Contractors, Suspends Davis-Bacon Rules. The Bush Administration has hired five private contractors to accelerate efforts to rebuild damaged areas in the Gulf region. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Dreazen) reports, "The Federal Emergency Management Agency announced yesterday that it was awarding contracts to Bechtel National Inc. of San Francisco and Fluor Corp. of Aliso Veijo, Calif., both of which are involved in Iraq. The other companies awarded FEMA work are Shaw Group of Baton Rouge, La., Denver-based CH2M Hill, which is providing housing in Alabama, and Dewberry Technologies of Fairfax, Va., which is providing planning and reporting tools to help guide the efforts." The White House also "took the controversial step" of "suspending in the disaster area so-called Davis-Bacon rules requiring prevailing wages be paid to workers on federal contracts." The Washington Post (9/9, D3, Edsall) adds "the action infuriated labor leaders and their Democratic supporters in Congress, who said it will lower wages and make it harder for union contractors to win bids."

Relief Agencies Organize Emergency Medical System. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 3, 1:55, Teague) reported on "the health threat all along the Gulf Coast: We know already of those four deaths from seawater-borne bacteria and several cases of Norwalk virus have broken out in a Mississippi shelter. Then there's the potential health disaster in New Orleans. But there's also been a huge medical response here." NBC (Bazell) added, "Navy hovercrafts are now bringing tons of medical supplies hourly to beaches in Biloxi. Nearby at a shelter, Navy and FEMA doctors form a so-called strike team today to check the residents for the first signs of illness. Those who are sick get care onsite immediately, while state and CDC experts monitor the medical records daily for any signs of a dangerous outbreak."

Norton Express Concern Over Water-Borne Diseases. In New Orleans. Interior Secretary Gale Norton said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/8), "We in the United States have been fortunate that we have not had to cope with the kinds of health problems that people in many parts of the world have to cope with on a daily basis. The concern about having clean drinking water for people is obviously a big one. The concern about water-borne diseases is something we usually don't have to cope with in the United States. We're working to try to address those things. My bureau of reclamation, for example, has just provided a water purification system for the hospital in Biloxi that will help 40,000 people have pure water. That's something that is vitally important that we focus on, the basic needs right now, for the health and safety."

Charity Hospital Doctor Profiled. The New York Times (9/9) reports on Dr. Norman E. McSwain Jr., Chief of Trauma Surgery at Charity hospital, who became "\would become one of the hurricane's reluctant celebrities. As Charity Hospital withered around him - low on electricity, water and oxygen; its food supplies down to canned fruit cocktail; surrounded by thugs firing at rescue boats - he finally despaired of official channels and cried out to the news media: 'We have been trying to call the mayor's office. We have been trying to call the governor's office. We are turning to you. Please help us.'"

HUD, VA Offer Some Southern Homes To Katrina Victims. USA Today (9/9, 1B, Koch) reports that the Federal government "is making some, but not all, of the thousands of homes it owns in Southern states available to displaced victims of Hurricane Katrina." HUD has "taken all its homes in stricken states off the market to consider which ones can house evacuees. It has identified 1,380 homes in seven states as livable and plans to move people into them, spokesman Lemar Wooley says. But the Department of Veterans Affairs continues to sell its homes. In some cases, wealthier Katrina evacuees are buying them." VA spokesman Scott Hogenson said, "If there's a need for additional housing, VA houses will be taken off the market immediately. We are ready to move." He adds that the VA is coordinating its efforts with HUD and FEMA.

DOJ_NMG_0003707

Evacuees Airlifted To New England. Hurricane evacuees were airlifted to the Northeast yesterday. The New York Times (9/9, Cowan) reports that they taken to Cape Cod "where they will be temporarily housed in a rejuvenated barracks at the Otis Air National Guard Base. The trickle of arrivals - 107 people moved out of homes or plucked off rooftops and off highways in recent days, and flown to Massachusetts by the Federal Emergency Management Agency - marked the first official evacuation to New England of victims of Hurricane Katrina. But thousands of beds in shelters, barracks and apartments have been prepared by state and local governments in the region, awaiting an influx of families from the South that has been slow to come."

Many Evacuees Leaving Astrodome For Other Housing. The New York Times (9/9, Romero) says the population at the Houston Astrodome "dwindled to about 3,000 on Wednesday from an estimated 15,000 over the weekend, with many people seizing on local job opportunities and inexpensive housing. Because of a building boom over the last few years, there is a glut of affordable housing in Houston and its metropolitan area, which includes about 4.5 million people. Hotels are also offering a 14-day stay at no charge to storm victims, with reimbursements to come from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Add the outpouring of offers of shelter across the country and an acknowledgment by the government that the original estimates may have been high, and it appears that the Astrodome might be empty soon."

Influx Of Katrina Survivors Strains Baton Rouge. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 4, 2:20, Williams) reported, "They call it West New Orleans these days because Baton Rouge has absorbed so many people. It has almost doubled in size overnight." NBC (Seigenthaler) added, "The influx of a quarter of a million evacuees has pushed Baton Rouge to its limit." The "parking lot at stores like Wal-Mart fills up quickly each day. Inside, there are plenty of empty shelves." People here "have to wait in line for almost everything, including gas. Housing here is also limited. There are no apartments available for rent. And some homebuyers are purchasing sight unseen." Some "are actually frightened that this sudden explosion in population will lead to an increase in crime, and that's why stores like this are selling 10 times the number of guns they sold before the storm." The Baton Rouge Police Department "has said there has been no increase in crime. But there is fear based on stereotyping of evacuees."

Small Texas Town Welcomes Hurricane Evacuees. The Washington Post (9/9, A16, Reid) reports on the town of Orange, Texas, "a bayou town on the Texas-Louisiana border that has seen its population swell from more than 18,000 to about 20,000 in one week as evacuees have moved in. … If New Orleans has been a locus of destruction, chaos and crime, the news from Orange and numerous other small-town havens is the old familiar story of neighbor helping neighbor. The exodus from Katrina has filled the string of hotels along Interstate 10 at the north end of town. Beyond that, Red Cross officials say five shelters have opened in Orange, plus two more in nearby hamlets."

Computer Forecast Last Year Predicted Damage Similar To Katrina. The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 10, 2:10, Mason) reported that while Katrina "seemed to catch many government officials by surprise," last summer, "this computer model forecast just what Katrina would bring." The storm surge projection for the fictitious Hurricane Pam "showed the levees" of New Orleans "would be overwhelmed by even a Category 3 hurricane they were designed to withstand, and the city would be swamped under 20 feet of water."

Hurricane Ophelia Lurking Off Florida Coast. ABC World News Tonight (9/8, story 4, :20, Woodruff) reported, "Another hurricane is brewing. This would be the seventh of the season. Ophelia is now 70 miles off the coast of Cape Canaveral, with sustained winds of 75 miles per hour. There's no way to tell right now if it will make landfall. But the coast is already seeing heavy rains and strong winds."

The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 5, 0:40, Roberts) reported, "Ophelia is expected to head farther out to sea then perhaps make a U turn back to Florida next week. But experts admit they really don't know yet where it's going."

WPost Calls For "Rational Construction" Of Gulf Coast. The Washington Post (9/9, A24) editorializes, "Even with the evacuation unfinished and the structural damage unassessed, it is not too early to start talking about how to rebuild New Orleans and the rest of the Gulf Coast. When residents return to their communities, many will want to rebuild everything exactly as it was. That is understandable.

DOJ_NMG_0003708

But lessons of the past suggest that this is exactly what should not happen. … The time to start planning for a rational reconstruction of the Gulf Coast is now. Six months or more down the road, when the rebuilding has already begun, will be too late."

Officials Urge Insurers To Pay Valid Claims. Mississippi's insurance commissioner has notified carriers that they will be required to prove that damage was caused by water, not by wind if they deny a claim. The Washington Post (9/9, D1, Crenshaw) reports that Lousiana's insurance commissioner "also urged a large group of insurers and reinsurers to pay all valid claims. In many cases, the key to deciding which homeowners recover will be whether wind or water caused the damage. Many homeowners' and business insurance policies exclude flood damage from their coverage. Flood coverage is written by the federal government through its National Flood Insurance Program, but only a small fraction of property owners in Mississippi and Alabama have bought it."

US Seeks NATO Help In Transporting Aid From Abroad. The Bush Administration has asked NATO for help transporting to the US relief equipment that has been offered by other nations to hurricane victims. The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Richter) reports, "Ninety-five countries have offered about $1 billion in cash and goods, as well as technical assistance, U.S. officials said. But some of the supplies remained abroad, where foreign officials in some instances said they had not heard back from U.S. counterparts on whether their offers would be accepted. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization told U.S. officials that its crews could transport aid to the Gulf Coast. Eleven cargo planes landed Thursday in Little Rock, Ark., carrying aid from abroad, after 11 others Wednesday. But some countries said they still had no word on whether their offers would be accepted."

MoveOn Anti-Roberts Ad Will Not Use Images Of Katrina Evacuees. USA Today (9/9, Memmott) reports MoveOn said "one of its officials was wrong when he said it would broadcast a TV ad with images of poverty-stricken hurricane victims to raise questions about the civil rights record of John Roberts." The "change underscores how quickly political messages can backfire if they trod too hard on sensitive issues, said Brooks Jackson, director of the University of Pennsylvania's Annenberg Political Fact Check program."

Conservatives Seek Female Supreme Court Nominee. The Wall Street Journal's (9/9, A4, Harwood) "Washington Wire" reports, "Conservatives tout female court pick to block Gonzales. Right rallies around antiabortion appeals-court judges, including Edith Jones and Priscilla Owen; Janice Rogers Brown, an African-American, would meet post-Katrina calls for Bush to appoint a minority. All are seen as more conservative than Attorney General Gonzales, who'd be the first Hispanic pick. Some close to White House predict Bush won't announce O'Connor's successor until Roberts clears Senate Judiciary Committee."

Bush Urged To Nominate Latino To Supreme Court. Attorney Raul A. Reyes, a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors, in an op-ed in USA Today (9/9) writes that "a Latino presence on the high court is overdue and would have monumental implications for the country." For example, a Latino "would recognize that 'Mexican appearance' is a flawed basis for an immigration check. He would see that English-only laws and the Real ID Act, which prohibits driver's licenses for illegal aliens, can be adversely applied to Hispanics." Reyes concludes, "It's worth noting that the Supreme Court will face issues with broad effect on Latinos: bilingual education, affirmative action, immigration and workers' and voters' rights. It is imperative that the concerns of Latinos are represented."

NC8-TV Washington, DC (9/8, 10:47 a.m.) reported, "President Bush has rekindled speculation that he may nominate attorney general Alberto Gonzales to the Supreme Court. The president said the list of potential candidates to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor is 'wide open,' then he proceeded to look directly at Gonzales, which drew laughs during the meeting."

Role Of Veteran Guides For Top Nominees Examined. Lobbyist Kenneth Duberstein describes the behind-the-scenes role of former top officials in helping top Administration nominees survive the nomination process. The Washington Post (9/9, A23, Lee) reports, "When John G. Roberts Jr. was nominated by President Bush in July to be an associate justice, he was promptly provided with two guides: former senator Fred D. Thompson (R-Tenn.) and former Republican National Committee chairman Ed Gillespie. Both are considered savvy Washington insiders who are now comfortably on the outside." Duberstein says, "There are several roles you play. … You are the chief strategist for the ultimate goal of getting that person confirmed. You are also the traffic cop, because everybody wants to see the prospective nominee. You are a coach and you're also a confidant of the nominee. You are the chief liaison with the Hill, but also the chief liaison within the administration. You are an enforcer, but you are also a negotiator.'" He "said the job of guiding Roberts should not change because he has been nominated for chief justice. 'I don't recall that there would be any distinction,' he said."

DOJ_NMG_0003709

OTHER NEWS:

Economists Expect Katrina To Cut GDP By 0.4% In Second Half Of Year. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Annett) reports a group of economists surveyed by the journal think Hurricane Katrina "is likely to slow growth and boost inflation pressures in the second half of this year," but "the economy could receive a modest boost early next year amid recovery efforts on the Gulf Coast." To "reflect the expected economic impact of Katrina," the surveyed economists "marked down their annualized forecasts for growth in gross domestic product for the second half of this year by 0.4 percentage point. The survey was conducted Sept. 2-7." These private-sector economists "expect a somewhat smaller impact than what has been predicted by the Congressional Budget Office, which has said that second-half growth could be trimmed by a half to a full percentage point." The 56 economists "now expect GDP, the broadest measure of U.S. economic activity, to expand at a 3.6% seasonally adjusted annual rate in the third quarter and at a 3.2% rate in the fourth quarter."

Katrina Expected To Affect Job Growth Adversely. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Rebello, Bater) reports Hurricane Katrina "caused at least 10,000 job losses in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama last week, although nationwide the number of U.S. workers filing first-time applications for unemployment benefits declined slightly, the government said Thursday." Initial jobless claims "declined by 1,000 to a seasonally adjusted level of 319,000 in the week that ended Saturday, the Labor Department said." However, a Labor Department statistician "said the claims numbers are likely to be revised upward in coming weeks." Economists "have begun to predict that the nation's job growth will suffer this month because of Katrina's devastation."

The Washington Post (9/9, D1, Williams) reports, "The assimilation of Hurricane Katrina evacuees into Texas's big cities and into communities across the country will be far from seamless. Almost all the evacuees are now unemployed, and many are also homeless. They are scrambling to find work so they can get out of the Federal Emergency Management Administration's massive shelters, into apartments and on with their lives. … The Congressional Budget Office has estimated that 400,000 jobs were lost throughout the Gulf Coast due to Katrina. So far, only an estimated 10,000 workers who lost their jobs have filed for unemployment benefits, the Labor Department said Thursday. That number would have been higher, but many claims offices in the affected region were shut down. The Labor Department predicted that the number of disaster-related claims will rise sharply in coming weeks and that hundreds of thousands of displaced workers will soon be seeking benefits."

The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 4, 2:30, Roberts) reported, "As many as one million survivors have been displaced. And then there's the growing economic toll of this disaster. The government said today that, so far, 10,000 of the workers who lost their jobs because of Katrina have joined the line for unemployment insurance. Others joined the line for those $2,000 debit cards the government is offering."

Katrina Expected To Boost Inflation. USA Today (9/9, Kirchhoff) reports Hurricane Katrina, "which has already pushed gasoline above $3 a gallon, is prompting higher prices for everything from building supplies to natural gas and chemicals." Economists have "increased their projections for consumer inflation, some significantly. Global Insight expects inflation to reach 5.7% at an annual rate in third-quarter 2005, compared with its earlier 3.4% estimate. Economy.com expects 3.4% inflation through the end of 2005, up from 2.7%." Both firms "expect the inflation gains to be transitory — oil is off its $70-a-barrel peak, though still running $64.49 — with more manageable inflation in 2006. There are questions regarding how much of the price increases will bleed through to core inflation, which excludes food and energy and is the inflation measure most watched by the Federal Reserve." But some "say price gains could last longer."

Stock Markets Down On Katrina Uncertainties. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 8, 0:15, O'Donnell) reported, "In business news tonight, economic uncertainties in the wake of this hurricane have pushed stocks lower. On Wall Street, the Dow lost more than 37 points today [to close at 10, 595.93]. NASDAQ ended this day down 6 points [to close at 2,166.03]."

DOJ_NMG_0003710

The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Patterson) reports after "two days of solid gains on Wall Street, investors stepped away from the plate Thursday, and stocks drifted lower as crude oil ticked up." Home builders "took it on the chin amid concerns that the housing boom could slow. The trigger was a lackluster earnings report by Hovnanian Enterprises, which posted net income of $1.76 a share for the third quarter late Wednesday, two cents below expectations." Light, sweet crude "jumped toward the end of open-outcry trading on the New York Mercantile Exchange, settling up 12 cents to $64.49 a barrel on news of a large decline in output from the Gulf of Mexico." The report "was one of the first yardsticks of the damage done to the oil-and-gas supply system in the Gulf Coast since Hurricane Katrina struck last Monday."

Gulf Coast Banks Rebound. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Sidel, Bauerlein, Hagerty) reports the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. "estimates that some 280 locally based institutions may have been affected by Katrina, representing $270 billion in assets and $201.3 billion in deposits. Big names in the area include Regions Financial Corp., AmSouth Bancorp, Compass Bancshares Inc. and Whitney Holding Corp." Although the "stocks of some affected banks tumbled last week when the storm's devastation became apparent, investors are betting that the area's economic recovery will generate enormous revenue and loan growth next year."

Other Gulf Coast Industries Hard Hit. The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 4, 2:30, Whitaker) reported, "The Mississippi Department of Wildlife, on a mercy mission delivering food to shrimpers trapped in a fetid canal, reeking of rotted shrimp, unrecovered bodies, sewage and fuel. … This is the $250-million a year Mississippi shrimp industry today." If you "made your living on the Gulf, you're hurting: Ports, from Gulfport, Mississippi to the granddaddy of them all -- New Orleans -- out of commission. In Mississippi, they build their casinos on the water. Katrina destroyed all of these along the Gulf Coast, washing away the $500,000 a day they pay in state taxes, a big hit for a poor state. Katrina closed down the Hard Rock even before its grand opening." But "things are slowly recovering."

NBC Nightly News (9/8, lead story, 2:45, Brown) reported, "There are signs that some are beginning to think about rebuilding." In the New Orleans suburbs "where flooding wasn't so bad, a few places are already up and running: Too few, judging by the line at this Domino's Pizza, or this Walgreen's, where dozens of people waited to fill prescriptions. And some here say they were told by their companies to show up for work as early as Monday." But the "number of people who will lose their jobs because of Katrina is staggering. The Labor Department estimates 10,000 people on the Gulf Coast have already filed for unemployment benefits, with that number likely to spike next week. And the government predicts another 400,000 jobs will be lost in the months ahead. Mitch Landrieu, Louisiana's lieutenant governor, is already asking businesses for a firm commitment to come back and expecting the Federal Government to step up." Lt. Gov. Landrieu: "What we need is a long-term commitment from the government to rebuild. If we don't get that, that's going to be very difficult thing to do." Brown: "He says the Federal government and others, meaning the taxpayers, will have to make a hefty contribution. They predict it will cost $150 billion to rebuild New Orleans."

WSJournal Calls For Cutting Duties On Four Products In Response To Katrina. The Wall Street Journal (9/9) says in an editorial that if "the feds really want to help the economy post-Katrina, here are four words: lumber, cement, shrimp and steel. They all have prices higher than necessary because of U.S. anti-dumping trade law." Lumber and cement "will soon be in great demand to rebuild the tens of thousands of damaged homes. Prices are sure to rise as reconstruction begins, but thanks to U.S. tariffs as high as 27% on Canadian lumber, American home buyers already pay an extra $1,000 on average for their shelter. The same goes for U.S. duties on Mexican cement, which have averaged 55% since 1990. Now would be an ideal time for Washington to declare a truce in these trade spats and reduce the price of rebuilding." Then "there's shrimp, an increasingly popular part of the American diet whose prices may well rise sharply in Katrina's wake. Louisiana shrimpers represent the bulk of the domestic industry and were all but wiped out by the hurricane." While "we're at it, consider specialty steel, which depends on hydrogen gas produced in the Gulf."

Analysts Suspect Strategic Oil Release Aimed At Price, Not Supply. The Financial Times (9/9, Hoyos, Blas) reports the US and Europe are "releasing more emergency crude oil than refineries in the Gulf of Mexico can handle, reinforcing suspicions that governments are using the crisis triggered by Hurricane Katrina to cap record oil prices." US refineries "will on Friday begin to bid for the 30m barrels of crude oil that the US government is releasing from the its emergency reserves but, with many refineries disabled, analysts say the additional supply may not be needed." Data released on Thursday "suggested that, while petrol is in short supply, oil companies still have plenty of crude in their inventories. The companies' stocks fell 6.45m barrels last week, significantly less than the 13.6m barrels of production capacity lost to the hurricane suggesting that the shortfall did not warrant the scale of the governments' responses."

DOJ_NMG_0003711

Energy Experts Predict Gulf Output Won't Recover For Some Time. The USA Today (9/9, Lynch) reports, "Restoration of energy output to pre-Katrina levels stalled late this week as industry specialists began addressing some of the worst damage to the region's sprawling energy infrastructure." Ten days after Katrina, "gulf oil production Thursday was less than 40% of normal levels, down from 43% one day earlier, according to the U.S. Minerals Management Service." Natural gas output Thursday "stood at 59%, almost unchanged from the previous day." Oil prices, which "had eased a bit earlier in the week, rose slightly on the discouraging gulf numbers. Light sweet crude for October delivery closed at $64.49 a barrel, up 12 cents, on the New York Mercantile Exchange."

Gas Inventories Fall To Lowest Levels In Five Years. The New York Times (9/9, Bajaj) reports the nation's gasoline inventories "fell last week to their lowest levels in almost five years, the government said yesterday, quantifying for the first time Hurricane Katrina's effect on energy supplies and production." Americans "bought and used about as much gasoline as they did a year earlier - 9.3 million barrels a day - in the week that ended last Friday, but gasoline inventories fell 2.2 percent from the previous week because of supply and production disruptions, the Energy Department reported." A gallon of regular unleaded gasoline "was selling yesterday for an average of $3.03 nationwide, down from $3.04 on Wednesday, according to AAA."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/9, Trumbull) reports gasoline prices "have begun to ease, but even when all Gulf Coast refineries are running again later this year, consumers may not see a full retreat to pre-Katrina levels. That conclusion, analysts say, stems from a simple equation involving the cost of a barrel of crude, markups by middlemen, and little margin for error in the nation's energy infrastructure." How far "and how quickly prices fall now depend on a few critical factors: When four damaged refineries come back on line, how quickly emergency shipments of gasoline from foreign refineries arrive, and most important, where oil prices go from here."

But Demand For Gas Appears To Have Dropped. The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Peltz, Hoffman) reports drivers' "demand for gasoline appears to have downshifted since Hurricane Katrina sent pump prices soaring above $3 a gallon across much of the nation." Katrina "initially sparked panic buying, sporadic shortages and televised images of long lines at some service stations. Then, consumers pulled back as prices hit record highs, analysts said Thursday."

The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Ball, Gold) reports Americans "used 4% less gasoline amid skyrocketing pump prices last week than they did the week before Hurricane Katrina hit, the federal government reported. But whether that indicates consumers have decided to conserve or merely that they couldn't find all the gasoline they wanted isn't clear."

Arizona Governor Says Administration Not Dealing With High Gas Prices. The Phoenix Business Journal (9/9, Sunnucks) reports Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano "criticized the Bush administration Thursday for failing to deal with the oil industry and record high gasoline prices." Napolitano said the Bush Administration "has not been aggressive enough in dealing with sky high gasoline prices in recent years and in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. The Democratic governor said the Republican White House has not been interested in consumers when it comes to the energy industry."

Gas Stations Report Growing Number Of "Drive Offs." The New York Times (9/9, Steinhauer) reports as "fuel prices rise, and the tempers of American drivers with them, so, too, has the number of people who are stealing gasoline." From Maine to Oklahoma, "gas station owners are reporting a surge in the number of drivers who pull up to the pump, fill up and drive off without paying. The incidents, known as 'drive offs' - which are typically concentrated at stations near big cities and Interstates - are forcing stations across the country to adopt prepay policies for cash customers."

State Department Shifts Position On Cuban Biological Weapons. The Christian Science Monitor (9/9) "Terrorism and Security" column writes that in 2002, John Bolton said Cuba had "'biological weapons capabilities' and was sharing them with 'rogue nations.' Mr. Bolton and the Bush administration were adamant that Cuba was a potential threat to the United States because of this. So it came as somewhat of a surprise last Tuesday when the US retreated from this early claim that Cuba has 'an offensive biological weapons effort.' The new position was made public in a State Department document released last Tuesday, when almost the entire United States was focusing on the effects of Hurricane Katrina in the Gulf of Mexico region." A Knight Ridder report "notes that this is the first time that the US has 'publicly softened' its charge that Cuba had biological weapons, which has been 'controversial from the outset.'"

DOJ_NMG_0003712

China Announces Resumption Of North Korean Nuclear Talks. The New York Times (9/9, Brinkley) reports that China said that "six-nation talks over North Korea's nuclear weapons program will resume Tuesday," prompting several parties to restate "positions that helped push the last round into a stalemate." The same day, Jay Lefkowitz, the US special envoy on human rights in North Korea, "said he planned to publicize whatever he learned about human rights abuses in North Korea," such as "starved to death" political prisoners. "North Korea typically reacts quickly and angrily to critical statements from Washington," and Lefkowitz's mere appointment to his position "was a factor in the North's decision to postpone resumption of the disarmament talks by two weeks."

Experts Brief Rice On North Korea Visit. The Washington Post (9/9, A21, Kessler) reports that John W. Lewis, a retired Stanford University professor, and Siegfried S. Hecker, retired director of Los Alamos National Laboratory, both "prominent experts on North Korea who recently made an unpublicized visit" there, "briefed Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday." They provided "details of their talks with key North Korean officials" and "summarized their conversations in Pyongyang, made some suggestions for bridging gaps, and provided an assessment of the chances of reaching an agreement." North Korean officials "made it clear that they intend to insist that the statement of principles acknowledge North Korea's right to peaceful use of nuclear power."

Ukrainian President Fires Cabinet. The Financial Times (9/9, Warner) reports, "Ukraine's President Viktor Yushchenko yesterday sacked his cabinet and appointed" Yuri Yekhanurov, a veteran government official "with a record of avoiding direct political confrontations," to take over as prime minister "from the populist Yulia Tymoshenko." The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Murphy) adds that the move was Yushchenko's "attempt to reassert his leadership. Tymoshenko's "popularity had been one of Yushchenko's most valuable weapons." The New York Times (9/9, Myers) adds that Oleksandr V. Turchinov, chairman of the Ukrainian Security Services, "resigned in protest" warning that "the president's decision 'threatened the national security of Ukraine.'"

The Financial Times (9/9, Warner) reports that Yushchenko cited "the long-simmering conflict between Ms Tymoshenko and" national security chief Petro Poroshenko, which reached a "crisis point after the surprise resignation earlier this week of Olexander Zinchenko, the president's chief of staff, who on Monday accused Mr Poroshenko of corruption and interference in the media and justice system."

The New York Times (9/9, Myers) adds that Yushchenko "described his decision as a reluctant, though necessary one, saying that as president he 'should not baby-sit' his squabbling aides." The "heart of the divisions - and evidently the source of the accusations of corruption - have been the government's efforts to undo some of the dubious privatizations that took place under Mr. Kuchma."

The Washington Post (9/9, A20, Finn) adds, "The dismissal was triggered by a series of resignations by top officials who charged that some of the most powerful people around Yushchenko were using their positions to enrich themselves and reneging on one of the most important promises of last December's revolt, the eradication of endemic graft." Analysts said that "the public airing of" allegations of corruption "was designed to force other divisions to a climax."

The Financial Times (9/9, Warner) reports that the "dismissal of Ms Tymoshenko is likely to lead to a damaging confrontation with her and her political team that could further bog down reforms."

The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Murphy) adds that Yulia Mostovaya, assistant editor of the respected liberal weekly Zerkalo Nedeli, said, "Without Tymoshenko's support…Yushchenko never would have become president," but he's now created his own powerbase, "building it up on a basement of wealthy, financially strong tycoons."

The Washington Post (9/9, A20, Finn) adds that after the next election "the prime minister and cabinet will be chosen by parliament rather than the president, as they currently are. The powers of the prime minister will also increase at the expense of the president." However, "the crisis is likely to deepen public disillusionment with the government's failure to deliver quickly on some of the basic promises of the Orange Revolution, particularly rapid economic improvement."

DOJ_NMG_0003713

Fate Of Ukrainian Reform Said To Rest With Tymoshenko. Robin Shepherd, an adjunct fellow of the Center for Strategic and International Studies, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (9/9, Shepherd) argues, "We are watching…the first tentative steps in a desperately difficult transition," and "will get a pretty good idea of whether that task can, in the end, be accomplished in the days and weeks ahead." The political crisis "should be understood…in terms of flaws in the" Orange Revolution "which were apparent from the start," especially "the fractious nature of the democratic forces that took power in January." Prime Minister Yulia Tymoshenko "has barely concealed her own ambitions to take the president's place as the key player in national politics and has been engaged in all-out warfare with other members of the government for months." If she works against Yushchenko and other reformers, it "could prove disastrous for the reform movement, either pushing it out of power completely or, more likely, forcing reformists to make damaging concessions to supporters of the previous administration in order to form a new government."

NYTimes Calls Political Upheaval "Serious Blow" For Regional Reform. The New York Times (9/9) editorializes, "Yushchenko declared that his one goal was to ensure stability. But the Ukrainian protesters wanted change." Tymoshenko "is certain to turn" her "fiery speeches and powerful presence" on "the president and his new government." The situation "is a serious blow to the hopes and expectations that had been raised for the future of Ukraine, and for reformers in Belarus and other former Soviet republics." Yushchenko and Tymoshenko "squandered the momentum generated on Kiev's streets, struggling over control of lucrative industries, over relations with Russia and over how to cope with soaring energy prices." Yushchenko "needs to convince his country, and a very wary West, that he not only believes in democracy, free markets and the rule of law, but is also capable of leading Ukraine in that direction."

West Praises Egyptian Vote Amid Fraud Charges. The Washington Post (9/9, A20, Williams, Wright) reports, "Egyptian government officials leaked partial results Thursday of the first multi-candidate presidential election to show that President Hosni Mubarak had won at least 70 percent of the vote, but controversy still swirled about alleged irregularities and fraud in Wednesday's vote." As "government officials worked hard to persuade the public that the vote was valid, outside Egypt Butros Boutros-Ghali, the former U.N. secretary general, "declared the election a 'positive experience,'" and the State Department "praised the vote." One senior administration official said, "it's important to get all the public political energy into the political sphere, or it will go elsewhere."

WPost Says Bush Needs To Push Egypt For Additional Reforms. The Washington Post (9/9) editorializes that when the results of Egypt's vote are announced, "there will be no reason for anyone to take them seriously," due to the irregularities Mubarak allowed. However, "another election coming this fall, for parliament, that in many ways is more important than the presidential poll … If the upcoming vote is fair, it will drastically reduce the suffocating authority of the ruling party." The Bush administration "cites the democratization of the Middle East as one of its top priorities," but "persists in describing" the election "as 'a positive first step,'" despite "Mubarak's insistence on heavy-handed steps to control the election's outcome." The Administration can do more, and "need not ask Mr. Mubarak for radical change -- only for steps that liberal activists in his own party favor," such as "allowing slates of parliamentary candidates to be elected by proportional representation," allowing "more of the real Egyptian opposition into the process," and making the "next vote…free and fair, and certified as such by both local and international monitors."

Koizumi Coalition Poised To Win Election. USA Today (9/9, Wiseman, Takahashi) reports, "Advocates for change in Japan could emerge rejuvenated from Sunday's legislative elections, thanks to Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi's decision last month to wage war on obstructionist lawmakers in his own ruling party. A poll this week by the daily Asahi Shimbun showed Koizumi's ruling coalition -- his Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) and its ally New Komeito -- leading the top opposition party." When members of his party in parliament defeated his plan to privatize the post office, he "dissolved the legislature and called the election," had an "internal purge of the party," then "recruited a group of attractive candidates, dubbed by the daily Mainichi the 'assassins' and 'female ninjas,' to defeat them in the polls."

EU Nations Raise Billions For Vaccination Of Needy. The New York Times (9/9, Dugger) reports,

DOJ_NMG_0003714

"Britain, France, Spain, Italy and Sweden will announce an agreement on Friday to raise almost $4 billion on the bond markets for an enormously expanded use of vaccines across the developing world … The pact marks the first time rich nations have used pledges of increased aid to back government bonds as a means of financing a major development program. This so-called international finance facility is the brainchild of Gordon Brown, Britain's chancellor of the exchequer." The World Health Organization estimates the money will "save the lives of five million children over the next decade." Administration officials explained earlier this year that they would not join the effort because "the long-term commitment to raise money through the bond market is not consistent with the annual appropriations process in Congress."

China Unexpectedly Rehabilitates Reformer Whose Death Triggered Demonstrations. The Washington Post (9/9, A1, Pan) reports, "Chinese President Hu Jintao has agreed to restore the standing of the reform-minded Communist leader whose death triggered the 1989 Tiananmen Square demonstrations, a surprising reversal of party dogma that could prompt new calls for democratic change in China." While there are "no plans to change the party's position that the 1989 Tiananmen Square protests were subversive, or to admit it was wrong to use troops to crush them," the "decision to rehabilitate Hu Yaobang…suggested such reversals might be possible in the future." It was "unclear why the Chinese president…decided to rehabilitate Hu Yaobang." The move "was out of character for the president, who has developed a reputation over a long career in the party as an extremely cautious bureaucrat unwilling to take risks" and "surprised many party officials."

Columnist Says Administration Deference To Chavez Due To "Sheer Ignorance." Anastasia O'Grady, in her column in the Wall Street Journal (9/9) argues, "The overly deferential Washington mindset toward Venezuela's Hugo Chávez, based on the myth that we need his oil," is a "display of sheer ignorance in the area of energy -- mixing dangerously with personal ambition, of course -- that threatens a policy mess." When the State Department endorsed "the results of the fraudulent recall referendum," it fed "the egomania of South America's newest would-be dictator." In reality, "Chávez has very little influence over how much the U.S. pays for oil, unless of course he wants to take Venezuela out of its role as a producer. That's unlikely, since he's now spending like a drunken sailor on arms and politics and relies on oil income to hold onto power." As long as Venezuela is selling oil to the world at large, economic theory shows it "cannot punish one buyer over another."

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Speaks at the swearing in ceremony for Karen Hughes as Undersecretary of State for Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs, State Department; remarks at the 9/11 Heroes Medal of Valor Award Ceremony, White House.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: PRESIDENT JALAL TALABANI OF IRAQ _ Highlights: 11 a.m. Holds news conference. Room 1528-A, VOA, 330 Independence Ave. SW. Event contact: Joe O'Connell, 202-401-7000. 1:15 p.m. Attends honor cordon at the Pentagon, hosted by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Pentagon steps, Pentagon River Entrance. Media must arrive no later than 12:45 p.m. at North Parking Entrance for escort.

BIOETHICS _ Meeting of the President's Council on Bioethics at which, among other things, it will continue its discussion of ethical issues relating to the treatment of the aged and the long-term care of patients with dementia. Location: Wyndham City Center, 1143 New Hampshire Ave. NW.

KATRINA-BLACK CAUCUS _ Rep. Melvin Watt, D-N.C., Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., and other members of the Congressional Black Caucus visit Baton Rouge, La. and Houston to visit hurricane evacuees. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Visit hurricane survivors, The River Center, 175 S. River Rd. East Baton Rouge, La. 1 p.m. Visit hurricane suvivors, George Brown Convention Center, Houston, Texas.

UN REFORM _ 8:30 a.m. - 12 p.m. Bridging Nations, CSIS, the Mansfield Foundation, and the Asia Society Washington Center, host a breakfast discussion on ``Prioritizing U.N. Reform" in advance of the September 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003715

UN summit in New York to review progress since the Millennium Declaration adopted by all member states in 2000. Participants include John Hamre, CEO, CSIS; Shirin Tahir-Kheli, advisor to the Secretary of State on UN Reform; Shashi Tharoor (via video), Under-Secretary-General for Communications at the UN; and John Zogby, CEO, Zogby International. Location: CSIS, Conference Room B-1, 1800 K St. NW.

COUNTER DEMONSTRATION _ 9 a.m. A coalition of conservative groups hold a news a news conference to announce a series of counter demonstrations to the anti-war protests scheduled around the World Bank-IMF meetings. Location: National Press Club.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION _ 9:30 a.m. The American Enterprise Institute (AEI) hosts three former secretaries of education and a former presidential education advisor to examine lessons learned about the crafting of federal education policy from the department's first quarter century, with William Bennett, Claremont Institute; Sen. Lamar Alexander, R-Tenn.; Rod Paige, Woodrow Wilson Center; Andrew Rotherham, Education Sector; and moderator Frederick Hess, AEI. Location: AEI, Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th Floor, 1150 17th St. NW.

HUGHES _ 10 a.m. Swearing in ceremony for Karen Hughes as Undersecretary of State for Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs. Location: Franklin Room, State Department.

TERRORISM-UNIVERSITIES _ 10 a.m. The University of Maryland, College Park, hosts a panel discussion on ``Strategic Visioning Four Years After 9/11: The University's Role in Informing Counter-Terrorism Policy and Practice. Panelists include: Melvin Bernstein, Department of Homeland Security director of university programs; Jacques Gansler, University of Maryland vice president for research and former U.S. under secretary of defense; Arie Kruglanski, University of Maryland psychologist and expert on the psychology of terrorism; Gary LaFree, University of Maryland criminologist and director of the National Consortium for the Study of Terrorism and Responses to Terrorism. The event is part of the official launch of a consortium of 25 institutions around the world focusing on research that can assist the war on terror. Highlights: 10:30 a.m. - 11 a.m. DHS Under Secretary Charles McQueary gives remarks. Location: Univerity of Maryland, College Park, Stamp Student Union, Colony Ball Room.

KATRINA-HEALING COMMUNITIES _ 10:15 a.m. Senators Edward Kennedy and Debbie Stabenow, Rep. Donna Christensen and others hold a news conference with NAACP President Bruce Gordon and members of the faith community to discuss long-term support for the communities destroyed by Hurricane Katrina. The news conference follows a closed meeting among the participants. Location: Capitol, LBJ Room, S-211.

WOLF-AFGHANISTAN _ 10:30 a.m. Rep. Frank Wolf holds a press conference to report on his most recent trip to Iraq and Afghanistan. Location: House Radio and TV Gallery.

CENSUS-UNINSURED _ 12 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute holds a panel discussion to discuss the Census Bureau's recent annual estimate of the uninsured, comparing it to other HHS estimates showing different results. Keynote address by Sen. Robert Bennett, with presentations by Linda Bilheimer and Robin Cohen of the National Center for Health Statistics, Steve Cohen of the Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality, others. Location: 12th floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

KATRINA-PROTEST _ 12 p.m. Black Voices for Peace and the National Black Environmental Justice Network hold a demonstration to demand accountability for the Hurricane Katrina response and to protest the treatment of victims. Location: Lafayette Park.

THE TROUBLE WITH MEDICAID _ 12 p.m. The Cato Institute hosts a Capitol Hill briefing on ``The Trouble with Medicaid." Speakers are Stephen Moses, president, Center for Long-Term Care Reform; Jagadeesh Gokhale, senior fellow, Cato Institute; and Michael Cannon, director of health policy studies, Cato Institute. Location: Room B-354, Rayburn House Office Building.

BIBLE CURRICULUM _ 1 p.m. Actor Chuck Norris, his wife Gena, Alveda king of King for America, others, hold a news conference to speak about the inclusion of an elective Bible course in schools nationwide. Location: National Press Club.

PELOSI-HOUSTON _ 1 p.m. House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and other members of Congress visit hurricane evacuees in Houston. Press availability to follow at 2 p.m. Location: George R. Brown Convention Center, 1001 Avenida de las Americas, Houston. Hall C Entrance.

KATRINA _ 3 p.m. Georgetown University Law Center holds a panel discussion on whether human decisions made the impact of Hurricane Katrina worse. Participants include Vicki Arroyo, Pew Center on Global Climate Change; Mark Davis, Coalition to Restore Coastal Louisiana; others. Robert

DOJ_NMG_0003716

R.M. Verchick, Loyola University, New Orleans. Location: room 200, at the law school, 600 New Jersey Ave. NW.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Bush Pledges Aid For 'Long Haul.'"
"Putting It All On The Line."
"Among The Ruins, Something To Build On."
"Lives And History Adrift On A Soggy Paper Trail."
"Many L.A. County Jail Inmates Still Held Too Long."
"Crews Roust Holdouts, Brace For The Body Count."

USA Today:
"9/11 Recruits: They Enlisted When USA Was Under Fire."
"Police Hold Off Use Of Force."
"Katrina Aid Package Could Push Deficit To New High."

New York Times:
"Cost Of Recovery Surges, As Do Bids To Join In Effort."
"Political Issues Snarled Plans For Troop Aid."
"Storm Leaves Legal System A Shambles."
"Holdouts On Dry Ground Say, 'Why Leave Now?'"
"9/11 Firefighters Told Of Isolation Amid Disaster."
"A Bleak Symbol Of Apartheid, Soweto Sees Signs Of Prosperity."

Washington Post:
"Congress Approves $51.8 Billion For Victims."
"Troops Escalate Urgency Of Evacuation."
"Leaders Lacking Disaster Experience."
"Tight Constraints On Pentagon's Freedom Walk."
"For U.S. Platoon In Iraq, Merciless Missions."
"China Plans To Honor A Reformer."

Washington Times:
"Congress OKs $51.8 Billion."
"Berger Fined For Taking Papers."
"Unwed Women Set Record For Births In 2003."
"Cropp Signs Proliferate In D.C."

Detroit Free Press:
"Michigan Squads Lay Down Law In The South."
"Grief Persists For Vets' Families."
"Veteran Journalist Joins Out Team Of Editors."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Thousands Seek Public Assistance."
"Inhaled Insulin Closer To Reality."
"Agencies Ease Rules For Evacuees With No ID."
"Thunderbolts Fly As Preachers Vie."

Dallas Morning News:
"Stragglers Surrender."
"Bush's Advisers Debated Seizing Louisiana Effort."
"N. Texas Absorbing Part Of Wiped-Out Economy."
"A Legal Quagmire Without Precedent."
"Business Group Charged With Illegal Funding."

Houston Chronicle:
"A Crush For Debit Cards."
"Relatives Cling To Hope, Anxiously Await Word."
"BP Kept Unit Running Despite Memo On Eroded Pipes."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Hurricane Relief Costs; New Orleans Evacuation; Hurricane Recovery Costs; Hurricane Ophelia; FEMA-Hurricane Response; Hurricane Zone-Reunited Families; Hurricane Zone-Animals.
CBS: New Orleans-Health Threat; Bush-Hurricane Response; Death Toll; Hurricane-Gulf Economy; Hurricane Ophelia; Iraq KIA Honored; Storm Babies; Hurricane Zone-Animals; FDA-Inhaled Insulin; FEMA-Hurricane Exercise; Mismanaged 9/11 Funds; Hurricane Relief Efforts.
NBC: New Orleans Evacuation; Bush-Hurricane Response; Medical Strike Teams; Baton Rouge-Overcrowding; Emergency Response Delays; FEMA-Complicated Website; Hurricane Zone-Animals; Stock Market; Galveston Hurricane Anniversary; Hurricane-Young Evacuees.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Congress-Hurricane Relief; Hurricane-FEMA Debit Cards; New Orleans Evacuations; Hurricane Preparations; Hurricane Ophelia.
CBS: Congress-Hurricane Relief; Hurricane-Red Cross Debit Cards; Hurricane-International Aid; Brown-Biography Questions; Hurricane Ophelia; CA-Illegal Immigrant Driver's Licenses; Hatch-Tax Evasion Allegations; ABC Television-Spanish Translations; Wall Street.
NPR: Congress-Hurricane Relief; Hurricane-Cheney Visit; New Orleans Evacuations; Hurricane-International Aid; FBI-Hurricane Charity Scams; Wall Street; Iraq-Saddam Confession; DeLay PAC Indictment.

Copyright 2005 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0003717

DOJ_NMG_0003718

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 2005 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Alleged Torture Victim Indicted For Bush Assassination Plot..... 3
Appeals Court Panel Questions Detainee's Lack Of Court Access. 3
Witness Testifies Al Arian Associates Linked To PIJ-Connected Mosque. 3
Aswat To Remain In Custody Pending Extradition Hearing. 3

Patriot Act:

Michigan Town Rejects Anti-Patriot Act Resolution..... 3

Homeland Response:

New York Recognizes 9/11 EMT Victim With Rescuer Status..... 4
Study Finds Mismanagement Of 9/11 SBA Program. 4
Citing Lack of Confidence In CIA Leadership, Senior Clandestine Service Official Retires. 5
Pentagon's Freedom Walk Has "Unusual" Security Constraints... 5
Ground Zero Rebuilding Could Take "A Generation" To Complete..... 5

War News:

Powell Regrets Relying On Intelligence Pointing To Existence Of Iraqi WMD. 5
200 Insurgents Captured In Syrian Border Staging Ground..... 5
Iraqi Forces Prove Effective In Identifying Insurgents. 5
US Forces Struggle With Toll Of Duty In Iraq. 6
Indicators Highlight Importance Of Passing Iraq Constitution. 6
Oil-For-Food Report Reflects Badly On Democratic Party "Icon" Sorensen..... 6
Taliban Insurgents Kill Six Afghan Policemen. 7
Funds For War On Terror Said Better Spent On Disease Prevention, Research. 7
US Strategy In "Global War Against Terrorism" Critiqued. 7
9/11 Recruits' Motivations, Fates Examined..... 7
Panel Disciplines New York Judge Who Left Bench To Work In Iraq. 8

Corporate Scandals:

Lay, Skilling Attorneys Allege Prosecutorial Misconduct. 8
Florida Attorney Charged In Currency Trading Scheme. 8

Criminal Law:

DOJ In Settlement Talks With Boeing To Close Two Probes. 9
Lawyers Say Plame Leak Probe Could Be Nearing End. 9
Berger Fined $50,000 For Taking Documents. 9
Federal Agents Raid Chicago-Area Police Station. 9
Philadelphia Defense Lawyer Sentenced To House Arrest In Ticket Fixing Probe. 10
FBI, Minneapolis Police Raid City Councilman's Home. 10
North Carolina Housing Official Pleads Not Guilty To Embezzlement Charges. 10
New Jersey Bribery Probe Suspect Arrested On Assault Charges. 11
Fourth Person Charged In Alleged Scheme To Defraud Kodak. 11
Tennessee Lt. Gov. Reverses Statement About Loan Under Federal Scrutiny. 11
Grand Jury Indicts PAC Linked To DeLay. 11
Missouri Senators Seek To Close Sexual Predator Loophole. ... 11
California City To Ask For DOJ Audit Of Accounts..... 12
US Charges Florida Deputy Sheriff With Embezzlement. 12
Minnesota School District Sues For Items Seized In FBI Probe Of School Shooting. 12
Arizona Man Sentenced To Prison For Child Pornography. 12
Wisconsin Murder Trial Pits Rural, Urban Ways..... 13

Civil Law:

Ginsburg Rejects Administration Appeal To Block BRAC Challenges. 13
Caremark Settles Whistleblower Suit With DOJ. 13
Senate Panel To Subpoena Asbestos Companies. 13
US Alleges Safety Violations By American Airlines. 13
SCOTUS Could Broaden Civil RICO's Reach. 13
Bankruptcy Attorneys Brace For Changes To Code. 14
Pope Seeks Head-Of-State Immunity From Texas Lawsuit..... 14

Civil Rights:

DOJ Settles Pregnancy Bias Charges With DC Fire Department.14
Jury Acquits Border Officer Of Civil Rights Violation. 15
NAACP Calls For Immediate FBI Probe Of Ohio Police Shooting Death. 15
FBI Finds No Racial Motivation For UVa Graffiti. 15
Azeri Man In California Sentenced To Prison For Immigrant Smuggling. 15
Massachusetts Anti-Gay Marriage Initiative Moves Forward. 15

Antitrust:
DOJ Files Antitrust Suit Against Realtors Association Over Internet Listings. 16
Taubman Family To Relinquish Control Of Sotheby's. 17
Investment Group To Purchase Hertz For $15 Billion. 18
European Companies Takeovers "Surge. 18
Dell To Retain E-Mail, Data For Use In AMD-Intel Suit. 18

Environment:
Bipartisan Resolution Would Block Rule On Mercury Emissions. 19
3rd Circuit Rejects Substantial Continuity Test In Superfund Case. 19
NYTimes Applauds Challenge To Administration On Forest Protection. 19

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Five California Prison Gang Leaders Sentenced To Life. 19
Hundreds Of Suspected Latin Gang Members Arrested In International Crackdown. 20
Federal Agents Arrest 10 Suspects In Haiti-Miami Cocaine Ring. 21
DEA, Local Authorities Arrest 44, Seize Drugs In East Palo Alto, California Crackdown. 21
US Illicit Drug Use Down In 2004. 21
House Government Reform Panel Mulls What To Do About Palmeiro. 22
San Antonio Couple Pleads Guilty To Drug Ring Role. 22

Immigration:
Danbury, CT, Police Enforcing Federal Immigration Laws. 22
Schwarzenegger Expected To Veto Immigrant Drivers License Bill. 22
Immigration Judge Orders Minnesota School Squatter Deported. 23

Tax:
US Indicts "Survivor" Winner Hatch For Tax Evasion. 23

Congress-Administration:
Bush Signs Katrina Relief Bill, Vows Federal Action "For The Long Haul. 23
Brown's Résumé Said To Contain Fabrications. 28
FEMA To "Rethink" Debit Card Distribution Following Problems. 29
Cheney Visits Hurricane Zone. 30
First Lady Defends Government Response. 31
White House Considered Taking Direct Control Of Louisiana Relief Effort. 31
Landrieu Defends Louisiana Response. 32
Police, Military Urge Remaining New Orleans Residents To Leave. 32
FEMA Restrictions On Media Access Draw Criticism. 33
Katrina Sparks Debate About Military Role In Disaster Response. 34
Honoré Seen As "Giuliani Of The Gulf Coast. 34
Hurricane Decimates Region's Legal System. 34
Administration Hires Contractors, Suspends Davis-Bacon Rules. 35
Relief Agencies Organize Emergency Medical System. 35
HUD, VA Offer Some Southern Homes To Katrina Victims. 36
Computer Forecast Last Year Predicted Damage Similar To Katrina. 36
Officials Urge Insurers To Pay Valid Claims. 37
US Seeks NATO Help In Transporting Aid From Abroad. 37
MoveOn Anti-Roberts Ad Will Not Use Images Of Katrina Evacuees. 37

Other News:
Economists Expect Katrina To Cut GDP By 0.4% In Second Half Of Year. 38
Analysts Suspect Strategic Oil Release Aimed At Price, Not Supply. 39
State Department Shifts Position On Cuban Biological Weapons. 40
China Announces Resumption Of North Korean Nuclear Talks. 40
Ukrainian President Fires Cabinet. 41
West Praises Egyptian Vote Amid Fraud Charges. 41
Koizumi Coalition Poised To Win Election. 42
EU Nations Raise Billions For Vaccination Of Needy. 42
China Unexpectedly Rehabilitates Reformer Whose Death Triggered Demonstrations. 42
Columnist Says Administration Deference To Chavez Due To "Sheer Ignorance. 42

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington. 42

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages. 44

DOJ_NMG_0003720

TERRORISM NEWS:

Alleged Torture Victim Indicted For Bush Assassination Plot. The Washington Post (9/9, A4, Markon) reports, "An American student was charged yesterday in an al Qaeda plot to kill President Bush, with prosecutors alleging that Ahmed Omar Abu Ali and his confederates planned to use multiple snipers to shoot Bush or to blow him up in a suicide bombing." The Post continues, "The expanded indictment of Abu Ali, returned by a federal grand jury in Alexandria, also claimed for the first time that he proposed a plan to bring members of an al Qaeda cell into the United States through Mexico. They would then link up with Abu Ali to conduct terrorist operations in this country, the indictment said." The Post adds, "Abu Ali, 24, of Falls Church was first charged in February with terrorism counts that included trying to establish an al Qaeda cell in the United States. That indictment referred to the plot to kill Bush, but Abu Ali was not charged with conspiring to assassinate the president until yesterday. The case is among the highest-profile terrorism prosecutions in the United States since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. … The new nine-count indictment also adds charges of conspiracy to commit aircraft piracy and destroy aircraft, part of the Justice Department's allegations that Abu Ali was plotting with al Qaeda to conduct a Sept. 11-style attack in the United States that would include hijacking planes."

Appeals Court Panel Questions Detainee's Lack Of Court Access. The AP (9/8, Yost) reports, "A federal appeals court Thursday questioned the Bush administration's handling of detainees at Guantanamo Bay, suggesting the judiciary might have authority to delve into the conduct of military tribunals which have categorized almost all of the inmates as enemy combatants." The AP continues, "The two hours of arguments were in sharp contrast to those of several years ago when the appeals court suggested detainees at the Guantanamo Naval base were not entitled to have access to the U.S. courts, and then ruled against them. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed that decision a year ago." The AP adds, "On Thursday, a panel of three appeals court judges two appointed by Republican presidents and one by a Democratic president aggressively questioned Justice Department attorney Gregory Katsas about the possibility of court scrutiny over the detainee review process. … 'There is nothing in the habeas statute that requires us to defer to a military tribunal,' A. Raymond Randolph, an appointee of President Bush's father, told Katsas. The other judges on the panel are David Sentelle, an appointee of President Reagan, and Judith Rogers, an appointee of President Clinton."

Reuters (9/8, Vicini) reports, "Guantanamo Bay prisoners should be given the chance to prove in court that they have been mistakenly labelled as 'enemy combatants' and have been unlawfully detained, their attorney said on Thursday. … 'Since day one, these people have been saying you've got the wrong guys. They want a fair hearing to show that,' attorney Thomas Wilner told a U.S. appeals court during more than two hours of arguments. … But Justice Department lawyer Gregory Katsas repeated the Bush administration's position that the prisoners were not entitled to any constitutional due process rights, and he defended the military tribunals set up to review their cases."

Witness Testifies Al Arian Associates Linked To PIJ-Connected Mosque. The Tampa Tribune (9/9, Silvestrini) reports, "A witness in the trial of Sami al-Arian testified Thursday morning that Ramadan Shallah served briefly as the religious leader of a mosque in Chicago. Mohammed Hasan, who testified under a grant of immunity, also placed Al-Arian codefendant Hatim Fariz at a 1991 rally in Chicago." The Tribune notes, "Prosecutors have alleged in court papers that the mosque was 'an entity we believe to be a component of the PIJ enterprise.'"

CAIR To Run Anti-Terrorism Ad In Tampa Markets This Weekend. The AP (9/9) reports the Council on American-Islamic Relations "plans to denounce terrorism in a paid television commercial airing in the Tampa market this weekend to coincide with the anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. The 30-second spot…features two American Muslims, a man and a woman, denouncing violence in the name of Islam and vowing to 'not to allow our faith to be hijacked by criminals.' The spot will run 105 times Thursday through Sunday on 13 cable channels in Tampa, including CNN, Fox Sports Net and the Weather Channel, according to CAIR's Florida office."

Aswat To Remain In Custody Pending Extradition Hearing. BBC (9/8) reports on its Web site, Haroon Rashid Aswat, "accused of trying to set up a terror training camp in the US has been ordered to remain in custody while an extradition case is prepared. … A lawyer for US authorities told Bow Street magistrates the extradition case would be complete within 10 days." Aswat "is due to appear again on 6 October."

PATRIOT ACT:

Michigan Town Rejects Anti-Patriot Act Resolution. The Grand Rapids Press (9/8, Martinez) reports that the Holland, MI, City Council "on Tuesday rejected a resolution expressing concern with sections of the federal Patriot Act." The Press continues, "The resolution was proposed by the city's Human Relations Commission and on put on the agenda Wednesday by Councilman David Hoekstra. … The council rejected the resolution 5-2, with only the 6th Ward councilman Hoekstra and Councilman At-Large Jerome Kobes voting in favor. Mayor Al McGeehan and 2nd Ward Victor Orozco were absent." The Press adds, "Both Mayor Pro-Tem Craig Rich and 5th Ward Councilman Kurt Dykstra said they felt the Patriot Act doesn't fall under the council's jurisdiction. … 'I'm one of those people who don't think its appropriate (for the City Council) to take a stand on a national issue. What's next? Are we going to be asked to vote on gay marriages next week or the war in Iraq the following week?' Rich said. 'We are elected to represent our constituents on local issues...This is grandstanding if we do it. That's all it is.'" The Press notes, "While he didn't agree with the HRC's recommendation, 4th Ward Councilman Bob Vande Vusse said he appreciated the work of the HRC, which spent more than a year studying the issue."

DOJ_NMG_0003721

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New York Recognizes 9/11 EMT Victim With Rescuer Status. The AP (9/8, Gormley) reports, "On Sept. 11, 2001, as Glenn Winuk's co-workers were ordered to run to safety from their lower Manhattan office building, he ran the other way a block toward ground zero. There he told New York City fire officials he was an emergency medical technician in his hometown volunteer fire department and wanted to help the victims. … Moments later, he died when the South Tower collapsed, the medical kit he was issued at his side." The AP continues, "On Thursday he was officially recognized by the state as a rescuer in the historic effort that saved thousands, rather than as a civilian casualty, a distinction his family has been seeking for nearly four years. … 'They all ran for safety, but he ran toward the scene as he did in "93"' for the first World Trade Center bombing, said Winuk's brother, Jay Winuk. 'He ran toward danger because he knew he could save lives.'" The AP notes, "The recognition was delayed because Glenn Winuk was technically an associate member of the Jericho Volunteer Fire Department in Nassau County and was no longer an active firefighter or EMT in the department he served with for 19 years. His status changed when he moved to Manhattan and became a partner in his law firm, keeping him from being recognized by the federal government as an official rescue worker for memorials, historic records, and for a $278,658 Public Safety Officers benefit for his parents. … The federal government rejected the family's request citing, in part, the fact that Winuk hadn't even been officially recognized by the state as a rescue worker, said state Sen. Carl Marcellino, a Long Island Republican. But his bill, co-sponsored by Democratic Assemblyman Charles Lavine and recently signed by Pataki, changed that. … A federal decision is expected in 30 days."

Port Authority Workers Among Posthumous Medal Of Valor Awardees. The Newark Star-Ledger (9/8, Marsico) reports, "After the terrorist planes hit the Twin Towers on 9/11, Edward Calderon, a civilian employee with the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, told a colleague by phone he was staying inside one of the buildings to help with evacuation operations. … 'I'm a Marine and we don't leave anyone behind,' snapped Calderon, a former member of the corps and a resident of Union." The Star-Ledger continues, "James Barbella, an agency property manager from Oceanside, N.Y., led would-be rescuers up the stairs desperately trying to find a way to save people trapped in the top-floor restaurant, Windows on the World. … Robert Lynch, another property manager from Cranford, ensured that a child-care facility and bookstore were clear before heading through the plaza to help with the evacuation of a tower." The Star-Ledger adds, "Lynch, Barbella and Calderon were killed when the buildings collapsed. Tomorrow, they will be among 13 Port Authority civilian employees given a special 9/11 heroes' 'Medal of Valor' posthumously by President Bush in Washington, D.C., along with the 37 Port Authority Police officers who also died that day. … Port Authority officials successfully lobbied to get the employees' families the medals because the 13 individuals provided critical electrical, structural, mechanical and operations information to police and fire officials during the evacuation that saved thousands. Officials said their role has been little known by members of the general public. … 'There was a great deal of unforgettable tragedy on 9/11. One positive note, however, was that approximately 25,000 people were evacuated from the World Trade Center,' the agency's chairman and executive director wrote in a June letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. 'These fallen Port Authority civilians assisted all uniformed rescue workers in all aspects of the evacuation and collectively all groups significantly contributed to saving all those lives.'"

Study Finds Mismanagement Of 9/11 SBA Program. The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 11, 0:30, Roberts) reported, "An investigation by the Associated Press finds the Federal Government's $5 billion program to help businesses recover after 9/11 was so badly managed, it gave low-interest loans to companies not affected by the attacks. Loan recipients included a country music radio station in South Dakota, a perfume shop in the Virgin Islands, a dog boutique in Utah, and more than 100 Subway Sandwich and Dunkin' Donuts shops."

Most Post-9/11 Loan Funds Went To Firms Far From New York, DC. The AP (9/9, Dobbin) reports, "An Associated Press review of two Small Business Administration programs that doled out Sept. 11 recovery loans, found the government provided, approved or guaranteed nearly $4.9 billion in loans, and took credit for saving 20,000 jobs. That puts the average cost of saving a job at about a quarter million dollars each." The AP continues, "Of the 19,000 loans, fewer than 11 percent went to companies in New York City and Washington, an AP computer analysis showed. Officials conceded the SBA allocated few resources to oversee the congressionally-approved loan programs, leaving banks on an honor system to determine who should get terror recovery loans." The AP adds, "SBA documents obtained by AP show the banks had a strong incentive to approve as many loans as possible from the terror program - their cost was reduced in half. … The SBA said it first learned of the problems through AP's review and was weighing whether an investigation was needed. … Among the hardest-hit enterprises in places far removed from the devastation were travel agencies, tourist shops, food caterers, limousine fleets, hotels and bars. Americans weren't traveling far from home like they used to."

DOJ_NMG_0003722

Citing Lack of Confidence In CIA Leadership, Senior Clandestine Service Official Retires. The Washington Post (9/9, A5, Priest, Pincus) reports, "Robert Richer, the second-ranking official in the CIA's clandestine service, has announced his retirement, telling colleagues that he lacked confidence in the agency's leadership." Some officials say "Richer's decision revolved around an ongoing debate over how to improve human intelligence and the direction of the CIA," but other assert it "involved disputes over 'operational issues' that they would not specify, and a clash of personalities between Richer" and CIA Director Porter J. Goss "and his top aides," the reason "Richer's predecessor and his boss resigned" last year.

Pentagon's Freedom Walk Has "Unusual" Security Constraints. The Washington Post (9/9, A1, Dvorak) reports that the Pentagon's 9/11 memorial Freedom Walk has "extraordinary measures to control participation in the march and concert." The route has "not been specified but will be lined with four-foot-high snow fencing to keep it closed and 'sterile,'" and "the U.S. Park Police will have its entire Washington force of several hundred on duty and along the route," ready to "arrest anyone who joins the march or concert without a credential and refuses to leave." It's "unusual" for an event on the Mall to have "fences, required preregistration and the threat of arrest." Allison Barber, deputy assistant secretary of defense, said "police had requested" the "stringent measures," but Park Police Chief Dwight E. Pettiford said "the Pentagon restricted the event in its permit application."

Ground Zero Rebuilding Could Take "A Generation" To Complete. The Christian Science Monitor (9/9, Marks) reports that rebuilding at ground zero in New York City "has been slow going, due in part to the seeming incompatibility of rebuilding a vital commercial, retail, and financial hub on what many now consider to be a sacred burial ground." Also, it takes extra time to ensure "that ground zero…rises stronger than before." The project is "expected to be the most publicly debated, disputed, reviewed, and revised in world history," an "urban rebirth that could take more than a decade, if not a generation, to complete."

WAR NEWS:

Powell Regrets Relying On Intelligence Pointing To Existence Of Iraqi WMD. In an interview to be broadcast on ABC Friday evening former Secretary of State Colin Powell reiterated his disappointment with US intelligence on Iraqi weapons programs. The New York Times (9/9, Weisman) reports Powell says "his 2003 speech to the United Nations, in which he gave a detailed description of Iraqi weapons programs that turned out not to exist, was 'painful' for him personally and would be a permanent 'blot' on his record." Powell said he felt "Terrible" when he learned "that he had been misled about the accuracy of intelligence on which he relied" and "added that it was 'devastating' to learn later that some intelligence agents knew the information he had was unreliable but did not speak up." He "also implied in the interview that the United States did not go to war in Iraq with sufficient troops to secure the country and failed to keep sufficient Iraqi forces to help stabilize the country." Powell's "expressions of regret about the weapons intelligence and the lack of troops were consistent with many of his statements in office, especially after it became clear that Iraq had none of the weapons that Mr. Powell had said it was stockpiling."

200 Insurgents Captured In Syrian Border Staging Ground. US and Iraqi forces captured 200 mostly foreign insurgents at a staging ground near Tall Afar along the Syrian border. The New York Times/AP (9/9) reports the US-Iraqi operation to clear Tall Afar of insurgents "would intensify." And "one of captives was Amr Omayer, an Iraqi who was believed to be commander of all insurgent operations stemming from Tal Afar." Some captives were believed to be from Afghanistan while others "were from Syria, Sudan, Yemen and Jordan."

Iraqi Forces Prove Effective In Identifying Insurgents. Iraqi forces are becoming increasingly effective as they work with US forces, particularly in helping interrogate insurgents. The Washington Post (9/9, A21, Finer) reports that "identifying fighters who blend seamlessly into the local population" is one of the most difficult tasks facing US forces and "American commanders have long insisted that growing numbers of Iraqi security forces will make that job much easier." But, "U.S. commanders also acknowledge that the Iraqi troops' reputation for heavy-handed treatment of prisoners cuts two ways: It can terrify prisoners into talking but undermine the rapport policemen and soldiers have with the populations they serve." Another negative is that few of the Iraqi forces are Sunni. Iraqi forces are not only "fully integrated into nearly every aspect of the Tall Afar operation," but hundreds "are also being brought to the city to man stations that U.S. forces have said they will establish once the fighting wanes." According to US commanders, the "performance of Iraqi troops in this region has improved dramatically since the 3rd Armored Cavalry arrived in April."

DOJ_NMG_0003723

Insurgents Forced Out Of Tall Afar. The Washington Post (9/9, A21, Finer), in an article on the improvement of Iraqi forces, also reports, "Heavy bombing continued Thursday evening, as U.S. jets dropped 500-pound J-DAM precision bombs and other munitions into the insurgent-controlled neighborhood of Sarai, while playing messages over loudspeakers that called on residents to evacuate. Nearly 1,000 people left the city through U.S. checkpoints Thursday, and commanders said intelligence showed that insurgent leaders were attempting to vacate the city."

US Forces Struggle With Toll Of Duty In Iraq. The Washington Post (9/9, A1, Fainaru) in a front page story examines the daily dangers facing US troops operating in Iraq. After describing the aftermath of an IED attack on one US platoon the Post reports, "Six hours after the attack, and with only a few hours of sleep" the platoon was "back patrolling the bomb-cratered streets of Balad. … The attack quickly faded, taking its place alongside myriad others that have occurred during the platoon's first eight months of a yearlong combat tour in Iraq." Their experiences "go to the heart of the growing debate over the continued involvement of U.S. troops in Iraq. The days are infused not with the politics of war but the stark realities of it: tragedy and loss, loneliness and exhaustion, resilience and camaraderie in the face of a stubborn and deadly insurgency. The platoon's daily life has been ordered by nothing more than the merciless patrol schedule, twice-daily, four-hour combat missions that inevitably place the soldiers in the paths of attacks aimed at killing them." In interviews "the physical and emotional toll of prosecuting the war in Iraq was vividly apparent."

Indicators Highlight Importance Of Passing Iraq Constitution. Nina Kamp and Michael O'Hanlon, a senior research assistant and a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, and graphic designer Amy Unikewicz in an op-ed in the New York Times (9/9) updates their chart tracking progress in Iraq and warn, "It was not a good summer in Iraq. After the midwinter bright spots -- reductions in violence, greater economic vitality, the famous purple fingers of voters -- the situation worsened as the weather warmed. Most worrisome, the constitutional process has failed to bring aboard Sunni Arabs, who remain the core of the insurgency. While Shiites and Kurds wisely compromised on some key points, they favor an oil-allocation scheme that Sunnis fear could deprive them of their fair share of Iraq's natural wealth." Despite some positive news, "on balance the indicators are troubling. … On one point at least, pessimists and optimists about Iraq tend to agree: the situation needs a major boost from the political process. In that light, the Oct. 15 referendum on the draft constitution looms very large."

Columnist Urges Iraqi Political Factions To Support Constitution. Thomas Friedman in his column in the New York Times (9/9) urges Iraqi Shiites, Kurds and Sunnis to work together to approve a constitution because in the aftermath of Katrina the US may become distracted. Friedman says "most Democrats have opposed the war from the start, and many Republicans no longer support the war per se, but only George Bush." Bush "has carried this war on his shoulders, and the more he's weakened politically by Katrina, the less he will be able to carry. Yes, Mr. Bush has said we'll do whatever it takes to finish the job in Iraq, but he said that before there was another huge job to do." Friedman states, "If there is a constitution basically supported by all the key parties, a decent outcome is still possible in Iraq. Yes, Mr. Bush says he intends to stay the course there no matter what, but without a constitution embraced by all three communities, there will be no course to stay. The pressure on us to leave will only grow."

Oil-For-Food Report Reflects Badly On Democratic Party "Icon" Sorensen. The New York Sun (9/9, Avni) reports, "A Democratic Party icon of the Kennedy days, Theodore Sorensen, was hired in 1993 by an agent of Saddam Hussein, Samir Vincent, to influence top Turtle Bay officials, according to Wednesday's Volcker report on the U.N. oil-for-food program. Vincent and his Korean partner, Tongsun Park, also financed an American pro-U.N. organization known as UNA-USA with Taiwanese money." Sorenson was hired by Vincent "to shape what ultimately became oil for food."

WSJournal Says Volcker Report Shows Corruption At Heart Of UN. The Wall Street Journal (9/9) says in an editorial, "With the release Wednesday of Paul Volcker's fourth report on Oil for Food, we have the clearest account yet of what this quote-unquote" oil for food "scandal is really about." Oil for Food is "not about some isolated incidents of perceived or actual wrongdoing during the course of a seven-year effort to maintain sanctions on Iraq, monitor its oil flows and feed its people. Oil for Food is a story about what the U.N. is. And our conclusion from reading the 847-page report is that the U.N. is Oil for Food." Press reports "often cite the overall size of Oil for Food at $60 billion, but Mr. Volcker's report makes clear that the real figure was in excess of $100 billion. From this, Saddam was able to derive $10.2 billion from illicit transactions. But the important point is that he was able to steer 10 times that sum toward his preferred clients in the service of his political aims." Volcker's report "is replete with examples of incompetent U.N. oversight and tales of political wrangling among the permanent members of the Security Council. But the abiding fact is that it was the Western powers, not Saddam, who wanted Oil for Food at virtually any cost, because it offered the appearance of a meaningful policy in the absence of a real one, namely regime change."

DOJ_NMG_0003724

The Wall Street Journal (9/9) also excerpts a portion of the latest report of Paul Volcker's Independent Inquiry Committee on the United Nations' Oil for Food program.

Taliban Insurgents Kill Six Afghan Policemen. The New York Times (9/9, Gall) reports Taliban insurgents "attacked an Afghan National Army weapons depot south of Kabul on Thursday, killing six Afghan policemen, the state Bakhtar news agency said." Two suspected Taliban insurgents "were killed in the firefight that ensued, and one was captured, Bakhtar reported, quoting the press office of the Interior Ministry." Gunmen "also attacked a parliamentary candidate in eastern Afghanistan. The candidate, Safia Siddiqui, a well-known figure and spokeswoman at the national constitutional convention in 2004, was campaigning in her native Nangarhar Province when she came under fire. She was not injured, but three of her supporters were wounded, Agence France-Presse reported."

Funds For War On Terror Said Better Spent On Disease Prevention, Research. Reuters (9/9, Fox) reports Dr. Erica Frank of the Department of Family and Preventive Medicine at Emory University School of Medicine in Atlanta says "the US 'war on terror' is saving fewer lives than just spending the money on disease prevention and research, and has probably caused deaths by taking money away from basic services." The "accusation is not new, but" Dr. Frank "said she has calculated the cost, in terms of lives, of the Bush administration's terror policies." Frank "warned there is a threat that because of the U.S. government's policy, enormous numbers of Americans will die unnecessarily."

US Strategy In "Global War Against Terrorism" Critiqued. In a Washington Post op-ed (9/9, A25), former diplomat Richard Holbrooke says global war on terror "is not an accurate description of America's enemy or of what we are engaged in. Unless people know whom we are fighting, it will be virtually impossible to win the war of ideas that is such a key part of this struggle. The new undersecretary of state for public diplomacy, Karen Hughes, who is charged with primary responsibility for this part of the war, has a chance to fix the problem, but only if she is willing to change some deeply ingrained rhetoric and the political reasons behind it." The "long-term battle is against the underlying ideas and leaders behind these specific groups of terrorists. Despite factionalism and fierce doctrinal disputes, our enemies, broadly speaking, constitute a movement, with goals, gurus, ideologues, myths and martyrs. They share a core set of virulently anti-Western beliefs and have common goals: to destroy the moderate (and still majority) wing of Islam, to establish Islamist theocracies that look backward toward a mythic 'golden age,' to seek the destruction of Israel, and to inflict maximum damage and human suffering through acts of terrorism." But the US "has not made it a primary goal to expose Osama bin Laden as the monster he is, something Roosevelt and Winston Churchill did to Hitler, and American leadership did to communism during the Cold War by demonstrating its moral and intellectual bankruptcy."

Mark Helprin, Senior Fellow of the Claremont Institute and Distinguished Visiting Fellow of Hillsdale College, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (9/9) faults the Administration for not committing enough resources to national security and says, "The war in Iraq has been poorly planned and executed from the beginning, and now, like a hurricane over warm water, the insurgency is in a position to take immense energy from the fundamental divisions in that nation. The rise of Chinese military power, although lately noted, has met with no response. America's borders are open, its cities vulnerable, its civil defense nonexistent, its armies stretched thin. We have taken only deeply inadequate steps to prepare for and forestall a viral pandemic that by the testimony of experts is a high probability and could kill scores of millions in this country alone. That we do not see relatively simple and necessary courses of action, and are not led and inspired to them, represents a catastrophic failure of leadership that bridges party lines."

9/11 Recruits' Motivations, Fates Examined. USA Today (9/9, Hampson) report that "contrary to popular belief, there never was an upsurge in military enlistments as a result of the attacks that killed almost 3,000 people four years ago. But in a time of retreat and collapse, when Americans were urged to maintain their routines and get on with their lives, a few people stepped forward and did just the opposite.

DOJ_NMG_0003725

Although statistically insignificant, they epitomized a raw patriotism that bolstered the nation's spirit in the bleakest days since Pearl Harbor." USA goes on to profile a number of 9/11 recruits.

Panel Disciplines New York Judge Who Left Bench To Work In Iraq. The New York Law Journal (9/9, Caher) reports, "For the first time in its history, the New York State Commission on Judicial Conduct has disciplined a judge for flat-out failing to do his job." The Journal continues, "In a determination released Thursday, the commission called for the removal of North Hudson Town Justice Glenn T. Fiore of Essex County, who abandoned his judicial position to take a yearlong position as a truck driver in Iraq." The Journal adds, "Justice Fiore continued to draw his $10,000 a year judicial salary, leaving North Hudson, where he was elected, without a town judge. The town had to pay a neighboring judge to handle matters within its borders while Justice Fiore worked for a private subsidiary of the Halliburton Corp. … Records show that Fiore returned from Iraq after four months, indicating that he was giving up his private position to resume his judicial duties. However, he did not resume his position and ultimately resigned under pressure last month for what he said were patriotic reasons."

The AP (9/9, Johnson) reports, "Fiore, 54, said he would not appeal the ruling. … In March, he took a one-year job in Iraq driving a truck for Kellogg, Brown & Root Services Inc. … He didn't give the town of North Hudson, 90 miles north of Albany, any notice that he was leaving. Instead, he left his son in place as court clerk to cover for him and planned to render decisions when he returned." The AP adds, "Fiore said Thursday that he took the job in Iraq because he went out of business as an independent truck driver and needed to pay some bills. Fiore, who served in the Marines in Vietnam, said he also headed to Iraq out of a sense of patriotism."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Lay, Skilling Attorneys Allege Prosecutorial Misconduct. The AP (9/8, Hays) reports, "Lawyers for Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling say 'deliberate, systematic prosecutorial misconduct' has choked their efforts to prepare for trial in January." The AP continues, "Lay, Skilling and the third defendant in their case, former top Enron accountant Richard Causey, say obvious or veiled threats from prosecutors that dozens of witnesses may be indicted or, if they have pleaded guilty to crimes, face harsh prison sentences if they talk to the former executives has shut off critical information sources." The AP adds, "Daniel Petrocelli, Skilling's lead trial lawyer, said the defense teams have whittled that list to 38 particularly crucial witnesses who have consistently refused to talk to them. … Lay's lawyer, Michael Ramsey, told U.S. District Judge Sim Lake in a hearing Thursday that the defense teams have seen a 'pervasive freeze-up of witnesses,' though he acknowledged out of court that it was possible at least some just don't want to help his client or the others." The AP notes, "The trio wants to dismiss the sprawling case against them on grounds that the Justice Department's Enron Task Force 'has engaged in deliberate, systematic prosecutorial misconduct that has irreparably harmed defendants' ability to prepare for trial,' according to a court filing made public this week. … But while awaiting Lake's ruling on that request, the trio wants the judge to compel those witnesses to appear in court later this month so Lake can assure them that they can talk to the defendants about the case and testify on their behalf without fear of government reprisal. … Sean Berkowitz, head of the task force, insisted that prosecutors do not want to block anyone from talking to the defense teams. … 'The government does not want any witness to not speak to the defense out of fear of retribution from the United States,' he said."

Florida Attorney Charged In Currency Trading Scheme. The Palm Beach Post (FL) (9/8, Sedore) reports, "A federal grand jury in Cleveland has indicted a Palm Beach County securities lawyer on charges of securities fraud in connection with a $14 million currency trading scheme." The Post continues, "The indictment, dated Sept. 1, alleges that Delmer C. Gowing III, 61, of Ocean Ridge helped a Cleveland-based brokerage, Capital Markets Trading Group, convince 10 investors that they could earn yields as high as 20 percent a month through a currency trading deal Capital Markets claimed it had with insurance giant AIG. That arrangement didn't exist, and most of the millions invested four years ago was either lost in trades or allegedly pocketed by Capital Markets' principals, including Gowing." The Post adds, "Gowing, arrested Friday by U.S. marshals, was released Monday from the Palm Beach County Jail on $100,000 bond. He faces a trial in federal court in Cleveland. A call Wednesday to the U.S. attorney's office in Cleveland wasn't returned. … Gowing's attorney, Gary Eric Susser of Boynton Beach, said his client is innocent and denies that he had an active role in the scheme other than acting as the lawyer for Capital Markets. … According to the indictment, Capital Markets began soliciting money in early 2000 from investors by claiming it had an arrangement to trade foreign currencies through AIG, one of the largest insurers in the world. … But the indictment alleges that no such arrangement existed. Instead, Capital Markets wired the money to an Irish company called Magenta Forex Corp. Ltd., which did the trading and produced 'substantial losses' that weren't disclosed to investors."

DOJ_NMG_0003726

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ In Settlement Talks With Boeing To Close Two Probes. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Pasztor, Squeo) reports, "The Justice Department and Boeing Co. are negotiating a settlement in which the company could be required to pay up to $500 million but would avoid prosecution in two federal probes, said people familiar with the details." The Journal continues, "The settlement would resolve allegations that Boeing improperly acquired thousands of pages of Lockheed Martin Corp.'s proprietary documents dealing with rocket programs, and illegally recruited a senior Air Force official while she still had oversight of billions of dollars in other Boeing contracts." The Journal adds, "Talks are continuing and details could change, these people said, with a final agreement expected to take at least several more weeks to emerge. But the terms currently under discussion would make the pact one of the largest and most comprehensive corporate fraud settlements in recent years. … Based on the broad outlines so far, the settlement also is likely to entail the stiffest financial penalty ever imposed on a U.S. defense contractor for alleged procurement violations, said people familiar with the situation -- far exceeding those meted out during Pentagon scandals in the 1980s and 1990s, which stayed under $200 million." The Journal notes, "The two separate, much-publicized probes, which spanned two years, sent two former high-ranking Boeing executives to jail and set off events that helped lead to the departure of two Boeing chief executives. The company wasn't formally charged in that period, but it was stripped of some important contracts, became a frequent target of Congressional critics and ended up embroiled in the most serious military-procurement scandal of the past two decades."

Lawyers Say Plame Leak Probe Could Be Nearing End. The Boston Globe/Reuters (9/9) reports, "New York Times reporter Judith Miller, locked up for refusing to reveal who told her a covert CIA operative's name in a probe that may be nearing a conclusion" this week "marked two months -- 65 days as of Thursday -- at the Alexandria Detention Center just outside Washington for refusing to testify to a grand jury trying to determine who in the Bush administration leaked CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity." Miller's attorney Floyd Abrams "said Miller remained 'resolute' and would not reveal her confidential source to a grand jury in the case, which could shake up an administration already reeling from criticism over its response to Hurricane Katrina. The probe has ensnarled President George W. Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove. … But lawyers close to the investigation say there are signs that the 20-month-long inquiry could be wrapped up within weeks in a final flurry of negotiations and legal maneuvering." Reuters adds, "Asked if talks were under way with special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald, a Justice Department prosecutor, to secure Miller's testimony and release, Abrams said: 'If there are any discussions, they would be private.'" Reuters notes, "Several lawyers involved in the case say Fitzgerald was likely to wrap up his inquiry this fall, if not sooner, though they say they have not heard from his office in weeks."

Berger Fined $50,000 For Taking Documents. Former Clinton national security advisor Sandy Berger was fined $50,000, ordered to serve 100 hours of community service and sentenced to two years' probation for removing classified documents from the National Archives. The Wall Street Journal/AP (9/9) reports the fine "exceeded the $10,000 fine recommended by government lawyers. Under the deal, Mr. Berger avoids prison time but he must surrender access to classified government materials for three years." The Washington Post (9/9, A7, Leonnig) adds Berger "admitted to stuffing copies of documents in his coat jacket as he left the National Archives and then destroying some at his office and pretending he had never possessed them."

The New York Times (9/9, Lichtblau) reports, "His motivation in taking the documents remains a matter of fierce debate in political circles, and Mr. Berger himself did little to shed light on the mystery Thursday, except to say, without elaboration, that he had put his own 'personal convenience' in reviewing the documents ahead of federal law." But new court records provide some possible explanations, suggesting "that prosecutors and defense lawyers believe Mr. Berger's decision to remove the documents was triggered by pressure, fatigue and confusion, rather than by any intent to hide damaging information about the Clinton administration, as Republican critics have charged." Berger's lawyers "said in their pre-sentencing memorandum to the judge this week that Mr. Berger, in reviewing material at the archives for several days for as long as 10 hours a day, became overwhelmed." DOJ prosecutors "offered no evidence to suggest any ulterior motive by Mr. Berger. On the contrary, prosecutors noted that the Sept. 11 commission reviewed copies of all the documents that Mr. Berger took and that there was 'no evidence that any unique document was destroyed or lost.'"

Federal Agents Raid Chicago-Area Police Station. The AP (9/9) reports, "Federal agents armed with a search warrant raided the police station in suburban Melrose Park on Thursday, an FBI spokesman said." FBI spokesman Ross Rice said that the raid "was part of an ongoing investigation but he declined to give details. He also declined to say what the agents were looking for and what, if anything, they found. 'No arrests have been made and no charges have been filed,' he said." The AP notes, "In recent years, a federal investigation of illegal electronic gambling devices controlled by the mob found that many were installed in Melrose Park taverns and strip joints. And the FBI said recently that the mob has a street crew based in the suburb."

DOJ_NMG_0003727

The Chicago network affiliates also report on the raid on their Web sites from stories broadcast Thursday. WLS-TV (9/8, Thomas) reports, "ABC 7 has learned the investigators were searching employment records going back several years to determine on what days and at what times certain officers worked." WMAQ-TV (9/8, Rogers) adds, "The investigators came from the FBI and the IRS, as well as the postal inspectors and the U.S. Department of Labor. The investigation has been lengthy and there are no signs it is nearing completion," and "it is believed that the federal agents on Thursday were seeking records relating to a private security firm operated by Melrose Park Police Chief Vito Scavo." WBBM-TV (9/8, Tucker) notes, "For four hours the FBI agents, along with investigators from the labor department and the U.S. Postal Service, collected documents and information."

Powerful Illinois Lobbyist's Top Aid Sentenced To Probation In Operation Safe Road Probe. The Chicago Tribune (9/9, O'Connor) reports, "Saying she regretted ever getting involved in 'the world of politics and political favors,' a former trusted lieutenant to one of the state's most powerful lobbyists was spared prison Thursday for lying to investigators in the Operation Safe Road probe. Julie Starsiak, a longtime close aide to lobbyist Al Ronan, was placed on probation for 5 years and ordered to complete 200 hours of community service by U.S. District Judge Blanche Manning. Ronan hasn't been charged with wrongdoing, but his lobbying firm, Ronan Potts LLC, pleaded guilty to rigging a bid so a client won a contract to oversee a huge expansion at McCormick Place." The Tribune notes, "Assistant U.S. Atty. Scott Levine called Starsiak's cooperation valuable and confirmed her help resulted in the opening of an investigation that 'is bearing fruit.'"

The AP (9/9, Robinson) notes Starsiak "pleaded guilty in February 2004 to making false statements to FBI agents who were investigating bid rigging in the competition to get the contract to manage the expansion. She said she lied when she told them" Ronan "was the one who called an engineering firm with confidential bidding information. Starsiak now says that she made the call, although defense attorney Chris Gair told Manning that Ronan was part of the scheme."

Daley Names Former Federal Prosecutor Chicago Inspector General. The AP (9/9, Reichgott) reports, "Mayor Richard M. Daley, struggling to clean up his administration's image amid an ongoing federal investigation of bribe-taking and political hiring, named a former federal prosecutor Thursday to be his new inspector general. David Hoffman will take over for Alexander Vroustouris, who resigned in June amid allegations that investigations performed by his office were delayed and incomplete." The AP notes, "Eight members of Daley's Cabinet have either resigned or been fired since May as the mayor has worked to maintain the public's confidence. Federal investigators have been looking into City Hall for months, first examining bribes traded for jobs in a contract hauling program and most recently looking into allegations of fraud in the city's hiring practices." The Chicago Tribune (9/9) also reports on Hoffman's appointment.

Philadelphia Defense Lawyer Sentenced To House Arrest In Ticket Fixing Probe. The Philadelphia Daily News (9/9, Warner) reports, "A widely known defense attorney who admitted taking $7,000 in bribes in a parking-ticket scandal was spared a jail sentence yesterday by a federal judge. Charles P. Mirarchi III, who cooperated with prosecutors and pleaded guilty to one count of mail fraud, will have to spend six months under house arrest, pay a $5,000 fine and face additional restitution payments, U.S. District Judge Bruce W. Kauffman ruled." Kauffman "cited Mirarchi's 'substantial and significant cooperation' with the prosecutors and wished Mirarchi 'Good luck' after pronouncing the sentence." The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/9, Ditzen) notes, "The moral of the story yesterday…was this: He who admits his crime and diligently atones for it may hope for kindness at sentencing."

FBI, Minneapolis Police Raid City Councilman's Home. KARE-TV Minneapolis (9/8) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Thursday, "FBI agents pulled up to the home of Minneapolis City Councilman Dean Zimmerman around 3 p.m. on Thursday afternoon. Agents were executing a search warrant at the councilman's home. … Neither the FBI or the Minneapolis Police, who were assisting in the removal of items from Zimmerman's home, would comment on the reason for the search warrant. But during the three hours police and FBI officials were at the house, they were seen removing everything relating to Zimmermann's re-election campaign plus personal financial records." WCCO-TV (9/8) notes, "The FBI said they executed a 'court-authorized federal search warrant as part of an ongoing federal investigation.'" Zimmerman campaign manager Lauren Maker "said she believed the search was politically motivated because it was so close to the election."

North Carolina Housing Official Pleads Not Guilty To Embezzlement Charges. The Winston Salem Journal (9/9, Gutierrez) reports, "A senior official with the Housing Authority of Winston-Salem pleaded not guilty yesterday in U.S. District Court here to three felony charges:

DOJ_NMG_0003728

stealing, embezzlement and money laundering. Federal prosecutors filed the charges Aug. 30 against Kenneth Love, the assistant director of housing services for the housing authority, after a four-year investigation by the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and the FBI. The same charges were filed against a Virginia businessman, Sylvester Clay, who pleaded not guilty on Tuesday. … Federal investigators say that Love and Clay worked together to bid on contracts and get paid for phantom jobs through Clay's maintenance companies."

New Jersey Bribery Probe Suspect Arrested On Assault Charges. The AP (9/9) reports, "A developer accused of bribing officials in Monmouth County has been charged with threatening a 22-year-old woman at gunpoint in a community-college parking lot." Anthony Spalliero "fled when an officer at the Middletown campus of Brookdale Community College heard the woman scream about 1:30 p.m. Tuesday, college spokesman Stephen Nacco said. Spalliero had put a gun against the woman's ribs and told her to come with him, Nacco said. … He was charged with possession of a weapon for an unlawful purpose, making terroristic threats, and aggravated assault, the Monmouth County Prosecutor's Office said." The AP notes, "In May, Spalliero was arrested by the FBI and charged with passing bribes, including offering then-Mayor Matthew V. Scannapieco of Marlboro about $143,500 from 2001 to 2003."

Fourth Person Charged In Alleged Scheme To Defraud Kodak. The AP (9/9) reports former Eastman Kodak executive David Finnman "on Thursday became the fourth person charged in a multimillion-dollar scheme that federal prosecutors claim defrauded the company and suburban Rochester taxpayers." Finnman "faces two felony counts of mail fraud and one count of conspiracy to defraud. He worked at Kodak from 1970 to 1999. … The FBI said Finnman and co-defendant Charles Schwab, a former Greece assessor, created a business in the Bahamas around February 1998 to hide bribes and kickbacks paid by co-defendant John Nicolo, a regional appraiser. Investigators claim Finnman and Schwab each admitted receiving about $200,000 and investing it in an offshore account. The new charges said another company, Global Crossing, was the victim of fraud because Finnman worked there until 2003."

Tennessee Lt. Gov. Reverses Statement About Loan Under Federal Scrutiny. The AP (9/8, Gouras) reports Tennessee Lt. Gov. John Wilder "has changed his position on whether he talked to a fellow lawmaker about a bank loan now involved in a federal fraud trial." On Wednesday, Wilder said that "he was incorrect when he said last week that he had talked with Sen. Jerry Cooper about getting a loan at Wilder's bank." Cooper "is an unindicted co-conspirator in a federal indictment alleging fraud against two men involved in the sale of property owned by Cooper." The AP notes, "It's the second time this year that Wilder has backtracked from public comments. In May, right after the Tennessee Waltz sting that nabbed five current and former lawmakers, Wilder criticized the FBI for 'entrapping' the indicted legislators. A week later, he said the remarks were meant to express only his belief that 'entrapment is wrong.'"

Grand Jury Indicts PAC Linked To DeLay. The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Schmitt) reports, "A Texas grand jury today indicted a political action committee affiliated with House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), alleging that it took illegal campaign contributions during the 2002 election that led to a historic realignment of the Texas Legislature."

The Washington Post (9/9, A3, Smith) reports, "DeLay, who was a member of the committee's advisory board, signed fundraising solicitations and participated in at least one conference call to discuss the committee's plans." But "DeLay spokesman Kevin Madden responded to the indictment with a written statement saying that it 'is limited to a political organization and does not affect Mr. DeLay.'" He "also disclosed for the first time that DeLay had 'voluntarily' talked to Earle's office about the investigation last month, and that DeLay said then that his involvement in the committee's activities was 'limited to serving on the political action committee's advisory board along with other elected Texas officials and…appearing at fundraising events.'"

The New York Times/AP (9/9) reports DeLay "was not indicted by a Travis County grand jury in the charges made public Thursday, although three of his political associates were charged earlier." Reuters (9/9, Seba) also reported the details of the indictment.

Missouri Senators Seek To Close Sexual Predator Loophole. The AP (9/9, Hananel) reports, "Missouri's senators want to close a legal loophole they say allowed a Missouri judge to throw out a conviction of a sexual predator." The AP continues, "Sens. Kit Bond and Jim Talent, both Republicans, introduced a bill Thursday that makes it a crime to solicit sex online from a minor even if the person solicited is an undercover agent over 18. … The move is a response to the case of Jan P. Helder, a Mission Hills, Kan., attorney accused of using an Internet chat service to solicit sex from someone he believed to be a 14-year-old girl." The AP adds, "A federal jury convicted Helder, 42, but U.S. District Judge Dean Whipple in Kansas City threw out the verdict last month, saying Helder could not be guilty because the person he communicated with online was actually an undercover Platte County detective. … Whipple's decision outraged children's advocates who worried it could curb the success of such Internet stings. Undercover agents typically pose as minors, waiting for sex offenders to make contact and arrange in-person meetings. … Don Ledford, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Todd Graves in Kansas City, said the government plans to appeal Whipple's decision. Ledford said the office would have no other comment on the decision or the legislation because the case is pending." The AP notes, "At least four federal appeals courts have rejected the type of defense used by Helder, but those decisions are not binding on Whipple. The 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers Missouri, has not yet addressed the issue. … Under the change proposed by Bond and Talent, federal law would expressly provide that communicating with a law enforcement officer pretending to be a child is not a defense. Such language is already included in state law in Missouri."

DOJ_NMG_0003729

California City To Ask For DOJ Audit Of Accounts. The Palm Springs (CA) Desert Sun (9/8, Rodriguez) reports, "The Desert Hot Springs (CA) City Council voted unanimously to ask the U.S. Department of Justice to look into the city's accounts for the past five years." The Sun continues, "Interim City Manager Corky Larson said she was approached by city residents in the past month who suggested that the city - growing fast, but struggling with City Hall openness and budget issues - ask for a Department of Justice forensic audit." The Sun adds, "Asked what types of things the citizens asked for the Department of Justice to look at, Larson said one example might be building fees, but she would not elaborate. … Desert Hot Springs - exploding with residential growth - has in recent years been collecting millions in building fees, which are required by state law to be deposited in particular city accounts. … Any audit performed would check all revenue and expense flows for the city, receipts, contracts and ensure that any fees associated with planning and building the thousands of new homes going up in the scenic city at the base of the mountains were sent to the appropriate budget accounts."

US Charges Florida Deputy Sheriff With Embezzlement. The Orlando Sentinel (9/9) reports, "An Orange County deputy sheriff indicted on federal embezzlement charges was arrested today by deputy U.S. marshals and relieved of duty without pay, authorities said. The Sentinel continues, "Deputy Tawanda McNeil, a four-year veteran, was assigned to the agency's uniform patrol division in the agency's Sector 2, which covers east Orange County." The Sentinel adds, "The U.S. Attorney's Office in Orlando said a federal grand jury indicted McNeil on Wednesday on 18 counts of embezzlement related to payments she erroneously received when the U.S. military called her up for duty. … McNeil was not activated and was not entitled to the the payments, said Carolyn Adams, chief of the U.S. Attorney's Office in Orlando."

Minnesota School District Sues For Items Seized In FBI Probe Of School Shooting. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (9/9, Haga) reports, "Red Lake's school district has gone to federal court to seek recovery of documents and equipment seized by the FBI during its investigation of the March 21 shootings on the reservation, in part to protect itself against potential liability lawsuits. In a motion filed Thursday in U.S. District Court in Minneapolis, the district said it needs the return of security video footage, education records of shooter Jeffrey Weise, witness statements of district employees and computer hard drives, among other things. Those materials are 'crucial,' according to the filing, for the district to evaluate its security system and procedures in effect on March 21 'and to defend against likely lawsuits.'" Red Lake District attorney Shamus O'Meara said that "federal investigators 'basically told us to seek access to the materials through the Freedom of Information Act. … We did that, and it was denied. From the district's perspective, this is a last resort.'"

The St. Paul Pioneer Press (9/9, Ragsdale) notes, "U.S. Attorney Tom Heffelfinger, whose office is leading the criminal investigation into the shootings, said he had not yet reviewed the papers and could not comment on the district's request. … The school district said it is also seeking access to educational records for Weise, who was at home that day on the school's homebound instruction program. Included in the district's request are records from the teacher who visited Weise at home during the school year. The district also said it believes the FBI has a psychiatrist's report on Weise."

Arizona Man Sentenced To Prison For Child Pornography. The Tucson Citizen (9/9, Rowley) reports, "A Tucson martial arts instructor has been sentenced to 2.5 years in federal prison for possessing hundreds of child pornography images." The Citizen continues, "David Michael Lader, 41 will also be fined $30,000 followed by lifetime supervised release with sex offender conditions, a U.S. Attorney's Office news release said. He was ordered to provide a DNA sample." The Citizen adds, "Lader pleaded guilty to possessing more than 300 child pornography images on his home computer. Many were acquired over the Internet and involved children younger than 12, officials said. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents arrested him in April 2004. Lader, who is not in custody, must surrender to U.S. marshals Oct. 12. … In delivering the sentence yesterday, U.S. District Judge Raner Collins noted that at the time of the crime, Lader was a registered sex offender yet was teaching children and adults."

DOJ_NMG_0003730

Wisconsin Murder Trial Pits Rural, Urban Ways. The New York Times (9/9, Ruethling) reports, "A jury was chosen in this liberal bastion on Thursday for the trial of a Hmong immigrant charged with killing six hunters, causing consternation in the North Woods, where the shootings took place." The Times continues, "Some residents of Rice Lake, where all the victims lived or grew up, said they were concerned that the jurors from Dane County, which encompasses Madison, might not grasp the nuances of rural life." The Times adds, "Judge Norman L. Yackel of Sawyer County Circuit Court ruled in June that the jury for the trial of the immigrant, Chai Soua Vang, would be chosen from Dane County after the defense argued that publicity and strong emotions in the Rice Lake area jeopardized Mr. Vang's chances for a fair trial. … The concern about the composition of the jury stems in part from the racial overtones of the case. Mr. Vang, 36, a refugee from Laos who lived in St. Paul, Minn., told police that he had been sitting in a tree stand on private hunting land about 25 miles northeast of Rice Lake one Sunday last November when the hunters, who were white, swore at him and used ethnic slurs."

CIVIL LAW:

Ginsburg Rejects Administration Appeal To Block BRAC Challenges. The New York Times/AP (9/9) reports, "The Bush administration lost a last-minute bid on Thursday to persuade the Supreme Court to intervene and protect a federal panel's recommendations for the closing and realignment of military bases." The AP continues, "Judges in Connecticut and Tennessee had blocked the panel from recommending changes at local Air National Guard bases, and Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg on Thursday rejected the administration's request for intervention. Another appeal could be filed later and handled by the full court."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post/AP (9/9, A26) reports, "Separately, Illinois, Missouri and New Jersey lost emergency Supreme Court appeals intended to stop the commission from sending the report to the president. Facilities in those states are among hundreds targeted by the panel for closure or consolidation in the first round of base closings in a decade."

Caremark Settles Whistleblower Suit With DOJ. The AP (9/8) reports, "Pharmacy benefits manager Caremark and the Justice Department agreed Thursday to a $137.5 million settlement of lawsuits originally filed by whistleblowers claiming a predecessor company received kickbacks affecting several federal health care programs." The AP continues, "Nashville-based Caremark Rx Inc. admitted no wrongdoing in making the settlement, which was approved by a Philadelphia federal court Thursday. … The lawsuits were filed in 2002 under the whistleblower provisions of the Federal False Claims Act by three former executives of AdvancePCS Inc., a Texas-based pharmacy benefits manager that Caremark acquired in March 2004. The Justice Department joined the lawsuits after they were filed." The AP adds, "The lawsuits contended AdvancePCS took kickbacks from drug manufacturers to give their products favorable treatment under contracts with the Federal Employees Health Benefit Program, the Mailhandlers Health Benefit Program, Medicare+Choice and other government programs. … The court filings also charged that AdvancePCS paid existing and potential customers kickbacks to sign pharmacy benefits management contracts. All the allegations date to before Caremark took over AdvancePCS. … Also pending against Caremark is a separate Justice Department and whistleblower lawsuit alleging the company did not appropriately repay Medicaid and other federal health insurance programs. Caremark has denied those claims."

Senate Panel To Subpoena Asbestos Companies. Reuters (9/9, Cornwell) reports in a unanimous vote the Senate Judiciary Committee "gave its leaders authority to subpoena information from companies facing asbestos lawsuits as lawmakers work on legislation creating a $140 billion fund for asbestos victims." Chairman Arlen Specter "told members he did not know if subpoenas would be necessary, but he wanted 'a little muscle' in case companies continued to resist producing the data." He "said he hopes to bring the bill to the Senate floor the first week of October. Aides said the industry information could be used to make changes necessary to build Senate support for the bill."

US Alleges Safety Violations By American Airlines. The AP (9/9) reports, "American Airlines put its passengers at risk and violated multiple U.S. air-safety regulations in 2003 by allowing one of its jets to fly with a leaky fuel tank, according to a civil complaint filed by the U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn." The AP continues, "The complaint, which was made public on Thursday, seeks more than $1 million in penalties against the airline." The AP adds, "The complaint alleges that on Nov. 17, 2003, a Federal Aviation Administration inspector was a passenger on an American flight from Orlando, Florida, to New York's La Guardia Airport when he saw fuel leaking from a wing of the McDonnell Douglas MD-82. … The inspector warned the flight crew about the leak and demanded it be recorded in the aircraft's maintenance log. However, 'no such entry was made by the pilot or maintenance personnel,' the complaint said."

SCOTUS Could Broaden Civil RICO's Reach. The National Law Journal (9/9, Maclean) reports, "Many believe that the 1970 civil racketeering law was created to apply only to traditional Mafia-style criminals as a way to force them to pay for their criminal enterprise." The Journal continues, "Over the years, interpretation of civil RICO (Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act) has evolved into a tug of war between the U.S. Supreme Court, which reads the law broadly to reach beyond the mob, and appellate courts, which have repeatedly curtailed plaintiffs' use of the act." The Journal adds, "The notion that the law should only allow recovery for harm caused by organized crime members is a myth, said G. Robert Blakey, drafter of the original statute and a law professor at Notre Dame University. … 'The mob was the occasion for RICO but it does not define its scope,' he said. 'When it was argued on the House and Senate floors, the principal spokesman said, "No, it is not a mafia statute,"' Blakey said." The Journal notes, "The welter of legal standards imposed by courts over the years has created a patchwork of splits in the circuits around the country. Despite this, the Supreme Court has been 'vacillating in the degree to which it is willing to intervene to clarify,' Blakey said. … But the new term may change that. The justices have granted review in two RICO cases, and the U.S. solicitor general is pushing for review of a third, while a fourth appeal is on the way."

DOJ_NMG_0003731

Bankruptcy Attorneys Brace For Changes To Code. The National Law Journal (9/9, Geier) reports, "The bankruptcy bar is bracing for the bumpy landing many practitioners expect when the new Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 touches down next month." The Journal continues, "Most bankruptcy lawyers agree that the new code is highly complex and technical, that it will cause significant changes in consumer and business bankruptcy practice, and that it is so poorly drafted that it will take time for the courts to sort out its ambiguities." The Journal adds, "Observers also warn that a law purportedly aimed at financially undisciplined consumers is sure to bear unintended consequences for entrepreneurs, independent contractors and self-employed people -- particularly innovators who use bankruptcy relief when caught in a lean business cycle. … Alan N. Resnick, a co-editor-in-chief of 'Collier on Bankruptcy,' a comprehensive 23-volume treatise on statutory and procedural bankruptcy law and a professor of bankruptcy law at Hofstra University School of Law in Hempstead, N.Y., said lawyers will have their hands full getting used to the changes. … 'First and foremost for lawyers and practitioners is the learning curve. It's a very large bill, it's voluminous -- over 500 pages. Every time you look at the bill you see something else,' said Resnick, also of counsel to the bankruptcy and restructuring department at Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver & Jacobson in New York and a member of the bankruptcy rules advisory committee of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He agrees with many other bankruptcy practitioners that the legislation, which becomes effective Oct. 17, is very poorly written and filled with ambiguities. … 'I don't think there's any doubt that we will see a lot of litigation in the year to come over interpreting many ambiguities in these provisions. It needs a technical amendments bill to clean it up,' Resnick said."

Pope Seeks Head-Of-State Immunity From Texas Lawsuit. The Texas Lawyer (9/9, Jeffreys) reports, "Joseph Ratzinger, a defendant in a Texas suit filed before he was elected Pope Benedict XVI, wants to be dismissed from the litigation, arguing he has head-of-state immunity. … But lawyers for the three plaintiffs, who allege in the civil suit they were abused by a former seminary student in Houston, vow to challenge any suggestion of immunity issued by the U.S. Department of State in response to Ratzinger's request, a challenge that could put the immunity argument to a test. … 'This is a case of first impression,' says plaintiffs lawyer Tahira Kahn Merritt of Dallas. … 'We shall see what the political arm of government does,' says Daniel Shea, a solo practitioner in Houston who represents one of the plaintiffs in John Doe 1, et al. v The Archdiocese of Galveston-Houston, et al., which is pending before U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal in Houston. … 'It's a legitimate political question,' Shea says. 'I would assume that they wouldn't make a decision on that without running it by the president of the United States.'" The Texas Lawyer continues, "According to a status report filed by Ratzinger on Aug. 23, the request remains under review before the State Department. Joanne Moore, a press officer for the State Department, says it does not comment on specific cases. … A lawyer for Ratzinger, Jeffrey S. Lena, a solo practitioner in Berkeley, Calif., says he cannot comment on the allegations in the suit or on the request for immunity. But in Ratzinger's Amended Motions to Dismiss, filed in May, the pope alleges he should be dismissed from the suit on several grounds, including his presumed immunity. … Ratzinger also says he should be dismissed from the suit on First Amendment grounds because the plaintiffs' claims would intrude on the internal working of the Roman Catholic Church and would require the court to interpret the meaning of religious documents and resolve issues of church governance."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Settles Pregnancy Bias Charges With DC Fire Department. WUSA-TV, CBS 9, Washington, DC (9/9) reports, "The Justice Department today announced a settlement agreement with the District of Columbia regarding pregnancy-related discrimination in the District's Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department (FEMSD)." WUSA-TV continues, "The complaint alleged that individuals seeking employment as emergency medical technicians with the FEMSD were required to undergo a pre-hiring pregnancy test, with subsequent employment offers contingent on a negative test result. The complaint further alleged that, once hired, emergency medical technicians were advised by FEMSD management that any technician who became pregnant during her first year of employment would be in jeopardy of losing her job. … 'Using pregnancy as a barrier to a woman's entry into the workplace and continued job security is illegal and inexcusable,' said Bradley J. Schlozman, Acting Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division. 'Forcing women to choose between their baby and their job clearly contravenes federal law and will not be tolerated by this Administration.'"

DOJ_NMG_0003732

Jury Acquits Border Officer Of Civil Rights Violation. The AP (9/8, Thompson) reports, "A Homeland Security officer was found not guilty (in Buffalo, NY) Thursday of beating a female Chinese tourist." The AP continues, "Jurors deliberated about five hours over two days before acquitting Robert Rhodes, a Customs and Border Protection officer, of a single federal count of violating the civil rights of Zhao Yan, 38, a businesswoman from Tianjin, China, who was touring Niagara Falls." The AP adds, "The case provoked anger in China after pictures of Zhao, her face swollen from pepper spray and her eyes and forehead bruised, were widely published after the incident last July. … Defence lawyer Steven Cohen accused the U.S. government on Thursday of prosecuting Rhodes to protect delicate U.S.-Chinese relations. Cohen said Rhodes was an easy target because he was openly gay and had complained about discrimination on the job. … Despite that, Cohen said, Rhodes would like to return to the job he has held for 17 years." The AP notes, "Government prosecutors claimed Rhodes used excessive force by slamming Zhao's head into pavement and striking her with his knee after pepper-spraying her at a Niagara Falls inspection station in July 2004. … Rhodes told investigators he believed Zhao and two companions might have been associated with a drug suspect who had just been caught and that the women ran when ordered inside. He said he followed proper Customs and Border Protection procedure in subduing the struggling woman."

NAACP Calls For Immediate FBI Probe Of Ohio Police Shooting Death. WEWS-TV Cleveland (9/8) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Thursday, "Funeral services were held Thursday for a Cleveland teen shot and killed by police last week, and now the Cleveland NAACP is joining the chorus of those calling for answers and for action. Brandon McCloud, 15, was shot by police last Thursday in the bedroom of his home. … Police were carrying out a search warrant at McCloud's Jeffries Street home when they say the teen came at the officers from a closet with a knife. The preliminary ruling was that the shooting was justifiable." WEWS notes, "Cleveland police said they have asked the FBI civil rights team to step in and monitor their process. But the NAACP wants specific action taken, and they want it now."

FBI Finds No Racial Motivation For UVa Graffiti. The Charlottesville Daily Progress (9/9, Mayhew) reports, "Cryptic graffiti scrawled on the University of Virginia's Beta Bridge…was not racially motivated, the FBI has concluded. UVa President John T. Casteen III recently asked the Civil Rights Unit of the FBI in Washington to review photos of the graffiti images to determine their meaning. James Lamb, an FBI special agent, reported the FBI's findings to university police. 'A review by agents in the Civil Rights Unit found nothing to suggest racial implications,' Lamb said." The Daily Progress notes, "Members of two historically black organizations had painted announcements for their events on both sides of the bridge. Shortly after they began advertising their events, the graffiti appeared. … The information from the FBI is one more step in quelling hatred at the university, said Leonard W. Sandridge Jr., executive vice president and chief operating officer."

Azeri Man In California Sentenced To Prison For Immigrant Smuggling. The San Diego Union Tribune (9/7, Soto) reports Azeri native Yervand Asriyants was sentenced on Tuesday "to three years in prison and forced to give up his house." The Union Tribune notes, "Asriyants was arrested after an investigation by FBI and Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents into a series of smuggling attempts at the region's border crossings involving Eastern European men, women and children. 'He was smuggling aliens across the border that were not what we consider to be typical,' said FBI agent Roy Lemons, who added that the case had special urgency because of security concerns after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Lemons said no terrorist links were found."

Massachusetts Anti-Gay Marriage Initiative Moves Forward. The AP (9/9, Emery) reports, "A proposed ballot initiative that would ban gay marriage passed a key hurdle Wednesday when the state attorney general ruled it would be permitted under a section of the state constitution allowing voters to overturn court decisions." The AP continues, "The action by Attorney General Tom Reilly, a Democrat who is expected to run for governor in 2006, clears the way for conservative groups to begin the long process of gathering signatures and lobbying lawmakers in hopes of putting the issue before voters in 2008." The AP adds, "Supporters now must go out and gather the signatures of at least 65,825 Massachusetts voters. If they are successful, the question then must by approved by 25 percent of two successive sittings of the 200-member state Legislature. The question would then be placed before voters again as a constitutional amendment in 2008. … The state's highest court ruled in 2003 that it was unconstitutional for the state to ban marriages between gays and lesbians. The following spring, the nation's first state-sanctioned same-sex marriages began taking place in Massachusetts and thousands of gay couples have since tied the knot."

DOJ_NMG_0003733

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Files Antitrust Suit Against Realtors Association Over Internet Listings. The AP (9/9) reports, "The Justice Department sued the National Association of Realtors on Thursday, claiming it unfairly limits competition by allowing real estate agents to withhold home listings from Internet-based brokers." The AP continues, "The antitrust lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in Chicago, follows lengthy negotiations in which the government pressed the Realtors to drop restrictions designed to protect traditional brokers. … The association announced changes to its original plan Thursday, but the new steps were insufficient to ward off the lawsuit because the organization kept in place brokers' ability to discriminate against competitors who post listings online, said J. Bruce McDonald, deputy assistant attorney general in the Antitrust Division."

The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Wilke, Hagerty) reports, "The lawsuit is part of a broader effort by the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission to protect competition in the residential-real-estate market. Strong sales and rising prices have been a huge boon to brokers, who despite higher prices continue to charge commissions of 5% to 6% of a home's sale price -- reaping an estimated $60 billion in such fees last year." The Journal adds, "Officials of the National Association of Realtors defend their bylaws as promoting competition, and they had hoped that a revised, less-restrictive Internet rule that was offered in settlement talks with the government might head off a suit."

Reuters (9/9) reports, "The Justice Department said in a statement that the National Association of Realtors (NAR) rule 'prevents consumers from receiving the full benefits of competition and threatens to lock in outmoded business models and discourage discounting.'" Reuters adds, "The NAR said in May it would back away from the disputed bylaw that the department's antitrust division feared would allow real estate brokers to bar their property listings from being displayed by some discount rivals. … The Justice Department Thursday acknowledged that the NAR had revised the rule but said the modified version still discriminated against 'innovative' brokers and did not resolve its concerns."

The Washington Post (9/9, Downey) reports, "Discount brokerages are undercutting the traditional 6 percent commission rate that has continued to dominate even as home prices in some markets, including the Washington area, have doubled over the last five years. … The Realtors group announced yesterday that it was changing its online sales listing policy to make listings more widely available, but Justice Department officials said the changes do not go far enough." The Post adds, "At issue in the lawsuit are Internet listing rules adopted by the Realtors in 2003 that would have allowed real estate brokers to opt out of having their listings appear on the Web sites of other brokers. The rules were controversial from the beginning and association officials said they were never fully implemented, but Justice Department officials said at a news conference yesterday that of about 1,000 affiliated multiple listing services, about 200 adopted the restrictive policy."

The Agence France-Presse (9/9) quotes McDonald as saying, "The purchase of a home is one of the most significant financial decisions a family can make, and NAR's policy stifles competition to advantage some of its members at the expense of home buyers and sellers across the country … Consumers benefit when real estate brokers are free to compete vigorously by offering innovative services."

The Chicago Tribune (9/9) reports, "The suit is the latest chapter in a long-running industry fight over who should be able to access home listings. The earlier policy, known as Virtual Office Website, allowed brokerages that are members of multiple listing services to pick and choose which competitors' Web sites could display their listings. … Critics said VOW effectively undercut smaller, Internet-based competitors with lower overhead than traditional bricks-and-mortar brokerages. But many brokerages maintain that they spend so much money in marketing in order to obtain the listings--essentially their "inventory"--that they don't owe competitors any such access." The Tribune adds, "The new policy, called Internet Listing Display, forbids real estate agents from selecting which brokers can and can't receive their listings. However, individual real estate companies can opt out of sharing their data across the board. … 'The new policy raises some of the same problems as the old one,' said Deputy Assistant Atty. Gen. J. Bruce McDonald. He said the Justice Department would like to eliminate the opt-out provision entirely because consumers should have full access to online listings in order to find homes more efficiently, presumably at a lower cost. … 'The way we go about obtaining goods and services on the Web is threatening to bricks-and-mortar business models,' McDonald said."

Bloomberg News (9/8) reports, "The lawsuit is part of a broader effort by U.S. authorities to open the real estate business to more competition, McDonald said. Internet brokers, who seek to cut costs by letting customers do much of the work of traditional real estate agents, sprung up in the late 1990s and now operate in all major metropolitan areas." Bloomberg adds, "The Chicago-based realtors group announced a revised policy earlier today that it said responded to Justice Department concerns. The association has more than 1 million members who work in residential and commercial real estate. … Responding to today's lawsuit, the realtors issued another statement saying their new 'policy is fair, pro-consumer, pro- competitive and accommodates innovation' in the real estate business."

DOJ_NMG_0003734

Inman News (9/8, Swesey) reports, "While NAR's new policy no longer allows brokers to pick and choose who among their competitors is allowed to display their listings, it still enables them to withhold listings from all brokers in the MLS. The Justice Department claims the NAR policy prevents consumers from receiving the full benefits of competition and threatens to lock in outmoded business models and discourage discounting. … 'The repackaged policy narrows the opt-out a bit, but it remains effective,'" McDonald said. "

The Baltimore Sun (8/9, Mirabella) reports, "The suit…highlights the profound transformation the Internet is bringing to the housing market, just as it has changed the way consumers shop for everything from airline tickets to stocks, cars, books and music. The NAR has reported that seven of 10 home buyers turn to the Internet when buying a home." The Sun adds, "The Realtors contend that brokers who work for their listings should be able to choose whether or not to help their competitors' business. … 'A broker gets the opportunity to choose whether or not he wants to facilitate the business fortunes of another competitor, and he ought to have that right,' said Ralph Holmen, associate general counsel for NAR in Chicago. 'Real estate is unique in that competitors cooperate in the sale of property in a way you don't see in many other industries.' … But one local Realtor, John E. Rawlings Jr., a Coldwell Banker agent in Owings Mills, said the Internet has already become a crucial tool for both traditional and Web-based brokers and agents. … 'It's the wave of the present,' he said. 'Most people shop on the Internet for listings before they even call their Realtor. It would do a disservice to the seller if they didn't have the maximum coverage possible. ... A full-service company has to show the value clients are getting for the service we offer.'"

The IDG News Service (9/9, Gross) also reports on the suit.

Taubman Family To Relinquish Control Of Sotheby's. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Baram) reports, "Sotheby's Holdings Inc. announced a major recapitalization that saw the auction house's leading shareholders, the Taubman family, relinquish control and open the company to more outside investment." The Journal continues, "As of midnight Wednesday, former chairman A. Alfred Taubman and his family and affiliates reduced their stake in Sotheby's from almost 22% of total shares outstanding and 62% of the votes to 12.4% of both. They exchanged 14 million of their special Class B shares for 7.1 million in common stock and $168 million in cash from the auction house. As a result, Sotheby's dropped its two-class voting structure involving Class B super shares and Class A shares for a single class of stock. The dual class share structure, which is rare in public companies, had been instituted at Sotheby's before the New York-based company went public in 1988. … 'There are a lot more investors who will consider investing in Sotheby's when you have a single class of stock,' says William Ruprecht, Sotheby's president and chief executive officer. 'This will give us a degree of financial flexibility and open us up to a lot of opportunities for the future, such as equity-linked securities.' … The move also represents a retreat for Mr. Taubman, a real-estate developer, who bought the company in 1983 and served as its chairman until he was convicted of price fixing in 2001. … Mr. Taubman will remain an investor for at least two years and his son, Robert, will remain on the board of directors but will step down as a member of the executive and nominating committees, the company said. With the Taubmans ratcheting down, the largest shareholder now is Ariel Capital Management, which currently owns 8.7 million shares. Last June, Ariel informed their investors that despite Sotheby's tough year so far, they 'are confident in the long-term prospects of the business.'"

The New York Times (9/9, Sorkin, Vogel) reports, "The deal closes the chapter on the Taubman family's long role at Sotheby's and has already ignited speculation that the transaction could be a precursor to a sale or merger of the company, the largest publicly traded auction house in the nation." The Times adds, "The price-fixing scandal sent Mr. Taubman to prison for 10 months starting in July 2002 after he was convicted of conspiring to rig auction prices with Sotheby's archrival, Christie's. Afterward, employees say, he lost interest in the auction house. His son, Robert, who joined the board, had little interest in the art world and was just keeping an eye on the family investment." The Times notes, "The exorbitant expenses of the price-fixing scandal drained Sotheby's cash. The company became so cash poor that two and a half years ago it was forced to sell its York Avenue headquarters to RFR Holding for $175 million."

Art Dealers Spar With Archaeologists Over US-Italian Art Pact. The New York Times (9/9, Eakin) reports, "Lawyers representing art dealers and Sotheby's auction house sparred with archaeologists and cultural property experts on Thursday at a State Department committee hearing on the future of a sweeping agreement banning the import of antiquities from Italy." The Times continues, "Known formally as a memorandum of understanding, the five-year-old agreement is intended to reduce the flow of illicitly excavated Italian antiquities to the United States in return for heightened cultural cooperation between the Italian government and American arts institutions. … In the hearing, before the State Department's cultural property advisory committee, archaeologists argued for the effectiveness of the agreement, which is set to expire in January unless it is renewed. … 'The agreement has had very significant consequences,' said Malcolm Bell III, a University of Virginia archaeologist and specialist in Sicilian archaeology, citing improved policing of looting of ancient artworks in Italy and the availability of long-term archaeological loans to American institutions." The Times adds, "Mr. Bell's comments were echoed by Patti Gerstenblith, a law professor at DePaul University and cultural property specialist, who said the agreement helped provide a basis for a growing number of international regulations for the antiquities trade. … But William Pearlstein, a lawyer representing several dealers, asserted that Italian officials were not living up to the agreement. … 'In contrast to the love fest portrayed here, there is a not-so-quiet war between Italy and American museums against which it is trying to pursue cultural patrimony claims,' he said, referring to Italian action to recover some artworks."

DOJ_NMG_0003735

Investment Group To Purchase Hertz For $15 Billion. The New York Times (9/9, Sorkin) reports, "In one of the largest leveraged buyouts in more than a decade, the Ford Motor Company yesterday agreed to sell Hertz, the nation's largest rental car company, to a consortium of private investors for about $15 billion in cash and debt, executives involved in the negotiations said. … Ford is expected to announce the transaction as early as today, the executives said." The Times continues, "The sale, to a group including Clayton, Dubilier & Rice, the Carlyle Group and Merrill Lynch Global Private Equity, is the latest super-sized buyout by a team of private equity firms. … Earlier this year, a consortium of investment firms paid $11.3 billion for SunGard Data Systems, which provides software and services to financial companies." The Times adds, "The largest leveraged buyout ever remains the purchase by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company of RJR Nabisco in 1989 for $25 billion. … The deal ends a heated auction for Hertz, which started after Ford announced in April that it was considering putting the company up for sale or spinning it off. The winning investor group beat another team that included Bain Capital Partners, the Blackstone Group, the Texas Pacific Group and Thomas H. Lee Partners. "

European Companies Takeovers "Surge." The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Singer, Karnitschnig) reports, "A sudden surge in takeover activity in Europe, with more than $70 billion of potential deals disclosed in the first several working days of September alone, highlights a new willingness by European corporate chiefs to pursue mergers and acquisitions." The activity is "unusual in its outright aggressiveness," suggesting the region's approach to business "may have changed for good." The activity "is notable because the deals are bigger and there are more of them" than normal, and "executives and bankers say there are signs the spurt will continue." While the many industries are involved in the trend, "fueled by a confluence of factors," the "main driver of the new deal-making is a realization that shareholders have started rewarding ambitious tie-ups."

Takeover Bid Sides Seek Favorable Regulators. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Singer, Jacoby, Johnson) reports that in Gas Natural SDG SA's $28 billion hostile takeover bid for domestic rival Endesa SA, the two companies are "clashing over who would approve any potential deal: the Spanish government or the European Commission," with each seeking the "regulator it thinks will be most sympathetic to its side." However, "lawyers who specialize in European antitrust issues say Endesa won't be able to wrest control of the approval process from Madrid."

Dell To Retain E-Mail, Data For Use In AMD-Intel Suit. Reuters (9/9) reports, "Dell Inc. has agreed to retain e-mail and other documents that could be used against its close partner Intel Corp. in a private antitrust suit filed by Intel rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc. , court papers show." Reuters continues, "The agreement, filed on Wednesday in the U.S. District Court in Delaware, comes as AMD presses its case against Intel, accusing the world's largest chip maker of using its market power to lock out AMD and its microprocessors from computer makers such as Dell, Hewlett-Packard Co. and others." Reuters adds, "Dell, the largest PC maker, buys microprocessors exclusively from Intel. The Texas-based PC maker agreed to preserve relevant information and copy hard drives of employees identified as 'custodians' -- those who were involved in negotiating microprocessor purchases. … Among the 28 custodians listed were Michael Dell, the company's founder and chairman. Dell Inc. reserved its right to contest a subpoena for the documents." Reuters notes, "AMD has sought information on pricing, contracts and other information from dozens of PC makers and distributors, and virtually all companies in the United States and Japan have agreed to take steps to protect data, AMD's lead counsel, Chuck Diamond, said in an interview. … AMD began talks with companies on legal document preservation in early July, Diamond said. A process of culling millions of pages of documents will follow before the case goes to trial. AMD has already served a subpoena on PC maker Gateway Inc. , according to court papers filed this week."

DOJ_NMG_0003736

ENVIRONMENT:

Bipartisan Resolution Would Block Rule On Mercury Emissions. The New York Times (9/9, Janofsky) reports, "With a deadline for action approaching," Sens. Susan Collins, Patrick Leahy and James Jeffords "rallied support on Thursday for a resolution that would kill the Bush administration's proposed rule to limit mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants." They "said the rule was written to satisfy the utility industry and would take too long to produce benefits, causing serious health problems for thousands of people, especially pregnant women and young children living near the plants." The Times notes, "The deadline for the vote is Monday, although Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, said other issues might force him to extend it by several days."

3rd Circuit Rejects Substantial Continuity Test In Superfund Case. The Legal Intelligencer (9/9, Duffy) reports, "It's not too often that a federal judge declares that five of the judges on her own bench were wrong about a point of law in a string of decisions spanning a decade. … What's even rarer is when that lone judge learns, just days after she sticks her neck out, that she was right to do so -- due to the coincidence of an appellate court decision in an unrelated case that tackles the same legal question." The Intelligencer continues, "Both decisions are sure to grab the attention of environmental lawyers because they clarify the rules courts should use in deciding when a corporation may be held liable under the Superfund law on a theory of 'successor liability.' … On Aug. 31, U.S. District Judge of the Eastern District of Pennsylvania Anita B. Brody handed down a 37-page decision in Action Manufacturing Co. Inc. v. Simon Wrecking Co., in which she rejected the plaintiff's argument that Marcegaglia USA Inc. should share responsibility for the costs of an environmental clean-up in Malvern, Pa. … Lawyers for Action Manufacturing had argued that Marcegaglia was also liable as the successor-in-interest to Bishop Tube Co. because it had purchased the assets of Bishop Tube in a bankruptcy court sale. … To win its argument, Action Manufacturing had to persuade Brody to apply the so-called 'substantial continuity' test." The Intelligencer adds, "Brody said she recognized that five of her Eastern District colleagues have applied the substantial continuity test in toxic clean-up cases brought under the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act, or CERCLA, in a string of decisions spanning from 1993 to 2002. … Although the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has never endorsed the test, Brody found that, in light of the 1998 decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in United States v. Bestfoods, it is no longer good law, and that 'the national trend is to reject the substantial continuity test.'"

NYTimes Applauds Challenge To Administration On Forest Protection. The New York Times (9/9) editorializes, "The Bush administration has largely succeeded in its systematic effort to roll back environmental protections for America's national forests." But now "a rebellion is brewing where the White House least expected it. Western governors are challenging the most controversial rollback of all: the decision to repeal a popular rule approved near the end of the Clinton administration to protect nearly 60 million acres of remote national forest from commercial development." It "is an embarrassment for an administration that had assumed that the governors would leap at the chance to exercise states' rights." It "should also improve the prospects of" a bipartisan bill introduced by Rep. Sherwood Boehlert and Rep. Jay Inslee "to restore the old roadless rule. Now that the governors have spoken, there seems to be no reason to further indulge the commercial interests of a few timber companies."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Five California Prison Gang Leaders Sentenced To Life. The AP (9/9) reports, "Five Pelican Bay State Prison gang leaders were sentenced Thursday to life in federal prison on various racketeering, drug and weapons violations after Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger commuted their state terms." The AP continues, "The inmates were already serving life sentences at the notorious state prison in Crescent City that houses California's worst offenders. With their convictions, they will be transferred to separate federal prisons around the country. … 'By incarcerating these defendants in federal maximum security prisons, this organization's operational capabilities will be seriously disrupted,' U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said." The AP adds, "Defendants Cornelio Tristan, 44, James Morado, 57, Joseph Hernandez, 55, Gerald Rubalcaba, 50, and Tex Hernandez, 50, were leaders of the Nuestra Familia prison gang. They admitted that while they were behind bars, the organization murdered two former gang members and engaged in numerous drug transactions from which they profited. … The five defendants were the last of 22 Nuestra Familia members and associates sentenced in the federal case that began five years ago." The AP notes, "The U.S. Justice Department's key witness in the case, former Nuestra Familia leader Daniel Fred Hernandez, will soon walk free even though he admitted to selling drugs and committing other crimes while working for the government. … Hernandez, 42, cut a deal with federal prosecutors for a reduced sentence in return for providing evidence against fellow gang members. He was arrested nearly five years ago and faced life in prison on the same racketeering charges as the others. … As part of his plea deal, Hernandez agreed to wear a wire and set up drug and gun buys for fellow gang members."

DOJ_NMG_0003737

The Monterey Herald (9/9, Reynolds, Sanchez) reports that after the sentencing, US District Court Judge Charles Breyer said that "federal prison officials now…need to make sure they keep the gang from spreading throughout the country the way it spread though the California prison system. … 'At the time of the pleas, I voiced concerns' about the potential for contamination of the federal system, Breyer said. 'I think what I said then is true today. It is a serious concern.'" The Herald notes, "Operation Black Widow began with the promise of crippling the Nuestra Familia. In 2000, federal prosecutor Robert Mueller, now head of the FBI, began the case in Salinas with 11 indictments, saying the arrests would have 'a dramatic impact on criminal activities' in Monterey County and elsewhere. This week, it all ended quietly and without fanfare."

Hundreds Of Suspected Latin Gang Members Arrested In International Crackdown. The AP (9/9, Sherman) reports, "More than 650 suspected members of MS-13 and other gangs were arrested in the United States, Mexico, El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras in a coordinated crackdown on violent Hispanic gangs, officials said Thursday. But even as a senior FBI official set a goal of dismantling MS-13 in the next 18 months, police officials from the other countries described vast challenges in quelling gang activity in their prisons and disrupting recruitment. The roundup, conducted Wednesday by 6,400 law enforcement officers in the five countries, was run out of FBI headquarters in Washington, FBI assistant director Chris Swecker said. 'Our end game is to take out the leadership elements especially,' Swecker said at a news conference. 'These arrests are a means to that end.' Police and federal agents made 73 arrests, more than half on immigration charges, in 13 states, Swecker said." The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Kraul) notes, "U.S. police and federal agents made 73 arrests, more than half on immigration charges, in 13 states, Swecker said. Thirty-two of the arrests were in California.

CNN.com (9/8, Frieden) adds, "Top officials from each country coordinated from a joint command post at FBI headquarters in Washington. 'I haven't seen anything like this in 23 years,' said veteran FBI Assistant Director Chris Swecker, who oversaw the operation. … The operation's scope and collaborative effort 'sent a message to MS-13 and other like gangs that their criminal enterprise and the violence they perpetrate will not be tolerated,' Swecker said." KNBC-TV Los Angeles (9/8) reports on its Web site that Swecker said in a statement, "These gangs are organizing internationally, and so are we." KNBC adds, "The effort was..coordinated by the FBI's National Gang Task Force, which was established last year to fight gang violence. … Swecker described Thursday's operation as 'historic ... unprecedented in scope.' … 'This represents but a beginning, another step, in an ongoing national and international effort to go on offense and to strike back against gang violence,' Swecker said."

Oregon Arrests. The Oregonian (9/8, Crombie) reports, "Federal agents arrested five self-described MS-13 gang members on Wednesday as part of a nationwide crackdown on the notoriously brutal street gang. … Immigration authorities would not release the names, citing their practice of not identifying individuals accused of administrative violations." FBI Oregon SAC Robert Jordan "announced the arrests, saying authorities are 'seeing the beginnings of a movement of members to Oregon, and we are very serious about making sure MS-13 can't establish a strong foothold in our communities.' The suspected gang members were identified through criminal investigations throughout the country, said Dan Nielsen, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI in Portland." The AP (9/8) notes that Jordan, announcing the arrests, "said the FBI is serious about ensuring that MS-13 can't establish a strong foothold in the communities. Last year, the FBI set up a national task force to focus on dismantling MS-13."

Georgia Arrests. The Gwinnett Daily Post (9/9, Brooks) reports, "Four arrests were made Wednesday in Gwinnett County as part of an international investigation into the violent street gang 'Mara Salvatrucha,' federal officials said Thursday. Nationwide, 73 individuals were arrested in the FBI-led crackdown involving local police officers and federal agents in 15 states. … Six gang members were arrested across metro Atlanta, including four in Gwinnett, said FBI Special Agent Steve Emmett." The Daily Post notes that among those arrested was Gustavo 'Conejo' Martinez, who "is the leader of a local 'set of MS-13,' according to the FBI."

Wisconsin Police Arrest OTC Drug Theft Suspects With Possible MS-13 Ties. WMTV-TV Madison (9/8, Swaby) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Thursday, "'$45,000 to $55,000 on an average day,' says Captain Richard Bach of Madison Police's North District. Police claim that dollar figure is what their suspects brought in by allegedly stealing over the counter medications while having ties to MS-13, a violent gang." WMTV notes, "An FBI tip brought officers to a Northside Madison motel on August 29th. A four hour stake out brought in the two suspects, 21-year old Leonel Avendano and 23-year old Elvis Fuentes-Lazo as well as two boxes of evidence. Bach says, 'in their possession was about $10,000 worth of stolen over the counter medication that they had stolen from about 22 Walgreens in the Madison area the day before.'"

DOJ_NMG_0003738

Federal Agents Arrest 10 Suspects In Haiti-Miami Cocaine Ring. The Miami Herald (9/9) reports, "Federal agents arrested 10 suspects in an alleged Haiti-to-Miami cocaine-smuggling ring whose members include a trio of baggage handlers at Miami International Airport, according to sources familiar with the investigation. The illegal drugs were transported in suitcases on American Airlines flights departing from Port-au-Prince and arriving at MIA, sources said. The baggage handlers received tips about which luggage contained the cocaine, so they could unload it to evade authorities." The Herald notes, "The unsealed indictment names 11 defendants, including one who is still at large. The investigation, by the FBI, Drug Enforcement Administration and Immigration and Customs Enforcement, is targeting other suspects. Officials with the FBI, which is leading the inquiry, declined to comment."

US Law Enforcement Fighting Increased Drug Gang Currency Smuggling. Reuters (9/8, Gaynor) reports, "For decades, U.S. law enforcement agencies have clamped down on Mexican drug cartels hauling cocaine, marijuana, heroin and amphetamines north over an ever-more tightly watched border to the United States. Now, with stricter controls on bank accounts and wire transfers, officials are concerned that drug gangs are increasingly running illicit profits back to Mexico in piles of hard cash in cars, trucks and even on foot. U.S. authorities have seized almost $40 million in bank notes headed into Mexico since 2002." Reuters notes, "Hard currency seizures are also vigorous within the interior of the United States, where the Federal Bureau of Investigation netted $12 million bound for the so-called Juarez cartel in just one operation last year, dubbed 'Baja Kings.'"

DEA, Local Authorities Arrest 44, Seize Drugs In East Palo Alto, California Crackdown. The San Francisco Chronicle (9/9, Gaura) reports that a "crackdown on organized drug gangs in East Palo Alto has resulted in 44 arrests and the seizure of $500,000 worth of crack and powdered cocaine, methamphetamine and heroin, police officials announced today. Police are searching for another 12 fugitives connected with the case. Spurred by a rising tide of violence and homicides in East Palo Alto, which has seen 13 killings since January, local officials teamed up with an array of state and federal law enforcement agencies to crack down on drug gangs that have taken over local parks and terrified residents here." East Palo Alto Police Chief Ron Davis said the city "acted on lessons learned in the early 1990s, when gang warfare and 42 homicides in one year made the town the per-capita slaying capital of the United States. 'We made promises at that time that we would never let the violence rise as high as it was in the '90s,' Davis said. Officials sought help from state and federal agencies in March, when the city had experienced four homicides, but observers could tell that gang violence was on the rise. The resulting collaboration with the Mobile Enforcement Team -- a special group of agents within the federal Drug Enforcement Administration -- brought together officers from Palo Alto police, the San Mateo County Sheriff's Department, the San Mateo County Narcotics Task Force, the U.S. Attorney's Office, the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and U.S. Immigration and Customs. In the course of serving 20 search warrants, agents seized 6.1 pounds of crack cocaine, 3.8 pounds of powdered cocaine, 2.7 pounds of methamphetamine, 3.5 pounds of heroin, five vehicles, 17 firearms and $129,113 in cash. Those arrested face anywhere from 10 years to life sentences in prison, according to DEA Special Agent Javier F. Pena."

The San Francisco Examiner (9/9, Carpenter) reports, "Sheriff Don Horsley said the DEA was brought in for its Mobile Enforcement Team program, which can be deployed to a city to investigate individuals and organizations involved in drug trafficking. 'We asked that the DEA come and give us a hand on this, in light of an 18-month upswing in gang violence' in East Palo Alto and other Peninsula cities. Since January, 13 people have been shot to death in East Palo Alto. Horsley pledged to continue working with state and federal authorities to gather intelligence on the most violent gangs and those responsible for drug distribution in the county over the long term. The increased gang activity in East Palo Alto and on the Peninsula in general can be largely attributed to recruitment efforts by prison parolees looking to regain territorial control in the area, police said."

US Illicit Drug Use Down In 2004. USA Today/AP (9/9) reports that the "percentage of Americans using illicit drugs declined slightly last year, though the results were more pronounced for youths, according to a survey released Thursday. For people ages 12-17, there was a 9% drop in illicit drug use between 2002 and 2004, the federal government announced." ONDCP Director John P. Walters said, "Today's survey confirms the welcome trend on teen drug use." Overall, "19.1 million Americans used illicit drugs last year, or 7.9%. The numbers were basically the same for the surveys taken in the previous two years, when about 8% of Americans reported using illicit drugs within the previous month. The National Survey on Drug Use and Health is an annual survey of close to 70,000 people. It measures drug and alcohol use through several categories, including age, ethnicity and type of drug. The survey showed that illicit drug use dropped from 11.6% to 10.6% among youths ages 12-17 from 2002 to 2004. However, binge drinking, which is defined as five or more drinks in one setting, increased in the same age group -- from 10.6% to 11.1% from 2003 to 2004."

DOJ_NMG_0003739

House Government Reform Panel Mulls What To Do About Palmeiro. The Baltimore Sun (9/9, Barker) reports that the House Committee on Government Reform "remains uncertain whether there is enough evidence to warrant referring Rafael Palmeiro's steroids case to the Justice Department for a perjury investigation, and it is considering several options for handling his case." In one scenario, the committee "would make public the documents it received Aug. 12 from Major League Baseball related to the Orioles first baseman's positive steroids test, according to officials familiar with the discussions. That way, the public could decide for itself about Palmeiro, who had told lawmakers in a March 17 hearing that he had never used the performance-enhancing drugs. The document release could happen in the next two weeks. The documents include the results of Palmeiro's drug tests, the date of the tests and a record of secret proceedings before an arbitration panel to which Palmeiro had appealed the results of his positive test. His appeal was denied, and Palmeiro served a 10-day suspension beginning Aug. 1." Releasing the documents "would answer at least one important question: How did Palmeiro choose to defend himself when he appeared before the arbitration panel several months ago with his reputation at stake?"

San Antonio Couple Pleads Guilty To Drug Ring Role. The San Antonio Express-News (9/9, Contreras) reports, "A San Antonio couple pleaded guilty Thursday to charges they were involved in a drug-distribution cell linked to the Texas Mexican Mafia that used a local police officer to avoid detection." Mike Flores and Toni Lopez "also admitted that federal prosecutors could show at trial that they dealt heroin and cocaine and that then-San Antonio police officer Enrique Hinojosa, 32, tipped them off to drug investigations. The conspiracy is alleged to go back to at least April 2001. Flores pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute more than 100 grams of heroin, and Lopez pleaded guilty to aiding and abetting the possession of heroin. Their pleas came just days before their trial was to begin. Hinojosa, who worked with the San Antonio Police Department from January 2001 to March 2004, is now the only one in the case scheduled for trial Monday before U.S. District Judge Orlando Garcia."

IMMIGRATION:

Danbury, CT, Police Enforcing Federal Immigration Laws. The Danbury (CT) News-Times (9/9, Reid) reports, "Earlier this year, (Danbury, CT) Mayor Mark Boughton wanted the federal government to deputize state police officers so they could enforce immigration laws. … As it turns out, the extra authority might not have been needed." The News-Times continues, "A recently unearthed U.S. Justice Department memo says state and local cops can make arrests after traffic stops if they find civil immigration violations, such as someone overstaying a visa. … No specific federal authority is needed for local officers to make such arrests, according to the 2002 memo, which came to light in a recent court case." The News-Times adds, "Danbury officials said the memo will have little impact on law enforcement in a city that has seen a sizable increase in South American immigrants in recent years. … At the same time, however, Danbury officials confirmed city police officers are checking the immigration status of some drivers and making some arrests on immigration charges. … They complained, however, they receive little help from the federal government in prosecuting the cases. … 'The problem of enforcement is not at the local level,' Boughton said. 'We don't get the cooperation we need from Immigrations and Custom Enforcement.'"

Schwarzenegger Expected To Veto Immigrant Drivers License Bill. The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Salladay, Vogel) reports, "The fate of a bill that could extend driver's licenses to illegal immigrants remained unclear today as some Californians condemned it and others praised the measure." The legislature sent it to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "despite signals that the Republican governor would veto it" because he is waiting for the DHS to implement new Federal regulations. Federal lawmakers "gave states the option to create distinct driver's licenses for illegal immigrants under the Real ID Act passed in May. That sweeping law will require most states to change the information they include on driver's licenses, the documents they require to issue a license and how they store driver's license data." Many state are waiting for the new DHS rules which will be issued in 2006.

NYTimes Criticizes Expected Veto Of Gay Marriage Bill. The New York Times (9/9) in an editorial says, "Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger was a profile in timidity this week when he vowed to veto a pioneering bill authorizing gay marriage in California." He "could not find the courage to sign the bill into law. Instead, even before receiving the bill, he announced a tortured rationale for vetoing it." The Times surmises he vetoed the bill because while he "was initially hailed as a centrist Republican superhero…his popularity has plummeted, and polls show that most Californians are inclined to oppose his re-election. Only his Republican base continues to back him." His "own views of gay marriage are hidden beneath vague, elusive, sometimes contradictory comments that add up to ducking the issue." He "is afraid to say what he really thinks. He falls back on a rationale that would leave the issue to the courts or another vote of the people. Anything to get him off the hook."

DOJ_NMG_0003740

Immigration Judge Orders Minnesota School Squatter Deported. The AP (9/9) reports, "A Mexican immigrant who was found living at a (Bloomington, MN) high school last winter must leave the country, an immigration judge decided Wednesday." The AP continues, "Francisco Serrano was ordered to depart within 120 days, though he plans to appeal the decision." The AP continues, "Serrano, who is in his early 20s, hid at Apple Valley High School, which he had once attended, and was arrested by immigration officials after he was discovered in the school's boiler room. … He has said he and his family moved to Connecticut after his sophomore year here. He said he returned to Minnesota on Christmas Eve with only $200 in his pocket." The AP adds, "Serrano's situation drew some support from parents who e-mailed the school after the man was discovered, though the school was also criticized for allowing someone to live there undetected. … Tim Counts, a spokesman for the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said it was a clear case of someone abusing their visa privileges."

TAX:

US Indicts "Survivor" Winner Hatch For Tax Evasion. Reuters (9/8) reports, "A federal grand jury on Thursday indicted Richard Hatch, who took home $1 million as the first winner of the CBS hit reality show 'Survivor,' for tax evasion, bank fraud and other charges." Reuters continues, "The U.S. Attorney's office in Providence, Rhode Island, accused Hatch, a motivational speaker, of failing to report the $1 million winnings in 2000 and about $391,000 he earned from half a dozen other sources. … The 10-count indictment follows a grand jury investigation that began in March when Hatch backed out of a deal with prosecutors to plead guilty to two tax evasion charges that carried a maximum 10-year jail sentence and a $500,000 fine."

The AP (9/8, Johnson) reports, "Hatch faces 10 charges, including tax evasion, filing a false tax return, wire fraud, bank fraud and mail fraud. U.S. Attorney Robert Clark Corrente said Hatch, 44, did not pay taxes on his 'Survivor' prize, income from a radio show and rental income. The Newport resident also allegedly used donations to his charity, Horizon Bound, to cover personal expenses." The AP adds, "Prosecutors charged Hatch with two counts of tax evasion in January. He agreed to plead guilty, but backed out of the deal in March, saying he thought CBS was responsible for paying the taxes on his prize. CBS has said Hatch was well aware of his obligations to pay taxes on the money. … The grand jury, which received the case after the plea deal fell apart, indicted Hatch for filing false 2000 and 2001 tax returns, which omitted his income from the reality show, $327,000 he was paid to co-host 'The Wilde Show' on a Boston radio station and $28,000 in rent on a property he owns in Newport."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Signs Katrina Relief Bill, Vows Federal Action "For The Long Haul." President Bush last night signed a $51.8 billion relief package for Katrina recovery aid. The President also vowed to take steps to speed up the Federal effort in the affected region, and tried to reassure the victims that the government will be at their side "for the long haul." Throughout the day, the President continued to come under fire from Democrats and media commentators, and new polls show the American people are also giving him low marks for his handling of the hurricane's destruction. These developments take place in an atmosphere of increased partisan sniping in Washington. As the Washington Post (9/9, A18, Babington) says this morning, yesterday's events "left little doubt that political reaction to the catastrophic storm will be dramatically more partisan than was the response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks." GOP Sen. Jeff Sessions of Alabama may have summed up mood on Capitol Hill when he told reporters, "We are reaching a perfect political storm."

Earlier yesterday, the President tried to reassure the hurricane's victims. ABC World News Tonight (9/8, lead story, 3:25, Vargas) reported, "A week and half after Hurricane Katrina, the government and the country's major relief agencies are still struggling in a major way to get hurricane victims the help they need. $10 billion has already been spent on that effort. $10 billion. And today, President Bush said it was only the beginning." Bush was shown saying, "The government is going to be with you for the long haul. In all the steps we take, our goal is not simply to provide benefits, but to make them easy and simple as possible to collect." CNN's The Situation Room (9/8, Blitzer) added Bush also" declared next Friday, September 16, a national day of prayer and remembrance."

Reuters (9/9, Cowan) reports Bush signed the aid bill last night. The Senate approved it "by a vote of 97-0 after receiving it from the House of Representatives," where it "also passed it overwhelmingly." In a statement, the President said, "The people affected by this storm have immediate needs that we must continue to meet without delay. More resources will be needed as we work to help people get back on their feet."

Analyzing the politics of the Katrina recovery effort, the CBS Evening News (9/8, story 2, 2:50, Borger) added, "There's no rallying around the President as there was after 9/11. This time, the enemy is incompetence." A "new CBS poll shows that two out of three Americans think the President himself responded too slowly. His leadership rating, usually his strong suit, is the lowest of his presidency, a full 35 points less than it was after 9/11. Democrats see a political opportunity, criticizing what they describe as the President's mismanagement of the crisis and his skewed domestic priorities. The Republican refrain: Look ahead, blame later." NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 2, 2:10, Gregory) added, "The criticism grows. A new Pew Research poll shows two-thirds think the President should have done more to speed up relief efforts. And the President's mother has herself been criticized as being insensitive" for her remarks about Katrina victims.

DOJ_NMG_0003741

CNN's The Situation Room (9/8, Bash) analyzed the Administration's moves yesterday from a political standpoint, saying, "What we're seeing here at the White House…is a continuation of the attempt to try to reverse some of that initial criticism. Today, what the President announced were some initiatives to try to cut through the red tape, some initiatives like relaxing requirements in order to get some of these evacuees their benefits, federal benefits, like Medicare, Medicaid, unemployment checks faster." He also "promised that states taking in evacuees would be reimbursed. All of this, the president said, is part of an effort that will take some time." CNN added, "The White House is well aware of the fact that Americans will start seeing a lot more of what we have been record reporting on CNN today, bodies being recovered. And they want to show that the President is, first of all, in touch with what was is going on, on the ground. And also, they understand that Americans might have some more outrage when they hear more and more of the grim news."

The Washington Post (9/9, A1, Baker, Goldstein) reports on the new poll numbers, and says Bush "has scrapped his schedule to focus on hurricane relief after being criticized for reacting too slowly to Katrina's devastation." A Pew Research Center survey "found that 67 percent of Americans think Bush could have done more to respond to the storm. The survey placed his overall job approval rating at 40 percent, down 10 points since January. A poll by Zogby America recorded its lowest-ever approval rating for Bush, 41 percent." The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Vieth, Curtius) also says "new polls suggested that many Americans were displeased with the government's performance. … The dissatisfaction suggested that the White House was still struggling to divert attention from mistakes made during the initial response and focus instead on signs of progress moving forward." The Financial Times (9/9, Daniel), Reuters (9/9, Whitesides) and Bloomberg (9/9), among other sources, also report on the new poll numbers.

The Christian Science Monitor (9/9, Feldmann) says this morning, "As distasteful as it is to many Americans, the politics of hurricane Katrina have rushed in to fill the agendas of elected officials nearly as quickly as the floodwaters inundated New Orleans." Katrina, says the Monitor, "has become an anti-9/11 of sorts. Whereas four years ago people dropped their red and blue identities to rally around their leaders, Katrina seems to have exacerbated the extreme polarization of the Bush years."

The Baltimore Sun/AP (9/9, Espo) notes Congress acted "with extraordinary speed" on the spending bill. White House "officials said the money was needed without delay to prevent an interruption in the massive operation designed to repair the damage along the Gulf Coast and bring hope to an almost unimaginable number of evacuees forced to flee." The bill "brought the total in disaster aid to $62.3 billion -- a total that is certain to rise as the full impact of the storm becomes clear." Also commenting on the speed of Congress' actions, the Wall Street Journal (9/9, Rogers) adds, "Rarely has the House, for example, considered such a large appropriations bill under the strict procedures applied yesterday, which severely limited debate and permitted no amendments."

Throughout the day, TV broadcasts across the nation continued to provide saturation coverage of Katrina's aftermath. On the networks' evening news shows, approximately 60% of the coverage of the hurricane zone last night was devoted to stories of human suffering and hardship, such as the ongoing evacuation of New Orleans and health threats in the city, difficulties in finding aid or applying for it, and other stresses on social service networks coping with the influx of Katrina survivors. About 40% of the coverage was devoted to the Federal Government's response to the disaster, including political debate over the funding for relief efforts, criticism of FEMA's response, and events such as visits to the zone by Vice President Cheney and First Lady Laura Bush.

A majority of local newscasts chose to lead their coverage with the news that a large hurricane aid package has been approved in Washington. KCAL-TV Los Angeles (9/8, 8:00 p.m.) reported, "Late tonight, Congress joined forces to approve the $51.8 billion bill that will help victims of Hurricane Katrina. The Senate vote was unanimous." KTVT-TV Dallas (9/8, 10:11 p.m.) noted that the bill has already been signed by the President: "Nearly $52 billion of Federal aid will pour into areas hit hard by Hurricane Katrina. Congress approved the aid package requested by the White House and President Bush immediately signed it."

Many reports also noted Bush's call for a day of prayer. For example, WABC-TV New York (9/8, 5:08 p.m.) reported, "President Bush has called for September 16th as a National Day of Prayer for the victims of Hurricane Katrina." Many other stations pointed out that Vice President Cheney paid a visit to the region affected by Katrina. KTVI-TV Chicago (9/8, 5:40 p.m.) reported, "Fresh from his vacation in Wyoming, Vice President Dick Cheney is touring the hurricane devastation." Cheney "arrived in Mississippi today to meet with local and state officials and [assess] the damage caused by Hurricane Katrina. His wife, Lynne, and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales are with him on the trip." KGMH-TV Denver (9/8, 11:01 a.m.) led with the Cheney story, stating that he was also "accompanied by [Homeland Security Secretary] Michael Chertoff."

DOJ_NMG_0003742

KSAZ-TV Phoenix (9/8, 9:41 p.m.), as many other stations across the country, put the story in the context of criticism being lobbed at the Federal government for its performance in response to the disaster. As the station reported, "In wake of bitter criticism [that] this Federal government bungled its response to Hurricane Katrina, Vice President Cheney toured Gulfport, Mississippi, promising to cut through the red tape."

Some stations noted criticism of the Administration from local lawmakers. WLS-TV Chicago (9/8, 5:06 p.m.) reported, "US Senator Dick Durbin is joining the Democratic chorus demanding that the FEMA head resign. Durbin says Michael Brown lacked experience and exercised poor judgment in the early response to Hurricane Katrina." Still, even with such accusations seeming commonplace, WGN-TV Chicago (9/8, 12:05 p.m.) reported, "A widespread 'blame game' on the response to Hurricane Katrina has been going on for days. But a new CNN/USA Today poll finds most of people surveyed think no one is to blame. Of the 609 people questioned, 38% said no one is to blame"

Other stations focused on the economic impact the hurricane will have on the country as a whole. A good example of this was WAGA-TV Atlanta (9/8, 6:23 p.m.), which reported, "Experts say Hurricane Katrina will impact more than just jobs and the price of gasoline. The storm's destruction will put a strain on home-building supplies made from oil such as asphalt, shingles, plastic plumbing pipe and some types of insulation. The Farm Bureau estimates that Katrina caused a billion dollars in damage to agriculture, wrecking sugar cane and poultry farms. The price of coffee could also go up."

"Yankee Reserve," Management Style Among Reasons Offered For Bush's Performance. A number of newspaper stories this morning analyze Bush's actions in Katrina's aftermath, and offer differing explanations for what many consider a lackluster performance. USA Today (9/9, Keen, Benedetto) says, "Bush has shown that he can be empathetic, sensitive and decisive." But "there's another side to Bush. He can seem detached and unaware of the messages conveyed by his words and conduct." Bush's "critics say his response to the hurricane proves that he's not a leader. … Others say he inherited from his parents a Yankee reserve that sometimes prevents him from quickly grasping the emotional requirements of pivotal events." In his 1992 re-election campaign, "President George H.W. Bush seemed disconnected from the pain of persistent joblessness and glanced at his watch during a debate with Bill Clinton. Bush's mother, former first lady Barbara Bush, said Monday at Houston's Astrodome that some evacuees there 'were underprivileged anyway, so this is working very well for them.'" NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 2, 2:10, Gregory) also reported "the President's mother has herself been criticized as being insensitive" for remarks about Katrina victims.

Meanwhile, Knight Ridder (9/9, Thomma) blames Bush's perceived failure on his "long record of avoiding critics, rewarding loyalty even in the face of failure and shunning -- even punishing -- those who disagree with him. It's a management style that shapes how he governs -- disdaining compromise with Democrats in Congress, for example -- and one that brushes off whole sectors of the American electorate." That "could come back to haunt him, as is now evident in the two problems -- Iraq and Katrina -- that together have sent his approval ratings to the lowest levels of his presidency and threaten his second-term agenda." His "style of isolating himself from unwelcome voices pleases his core supporters, who don't want him to compromise, but it sacrifices the broader public appeal that helped Ronald Reagan and Bill Clinton weather second-term setbacks."

More criticism of Bush's performance appears in the opinion pages of major newspapers today. Al Neuharth writes in his USA Today column (9/9), "Bush used to be part owner of a major league baseball team. He once coveted the Baseball Commissioner's job. So, he'll understand this baseball parlance." He "has had three really big at-bats during his four-plus years in the White House. First, 9/11. Then, the Iraq War. Now, the Katrina Hurricane tragedy. His batting performance: One home run (9/11). Two strikeouts (Iraq and Katrina)." Neuharth adds, "A .333 batting average is pretty good for a baseball player." But "in the Oval Office, two strikeouts in three crucial at-bats is bringing boos from more than half the crowd, as national polls show."

Columnist David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (9/9, A25) reports, "In the aftermath of Katrina, there's an opening for a different kind of politics in America. The new politics isn't about values; it isn't about settling scores. It's about performance. It's about putting a wounded, shaken country back on its feet, much as Franklin Delano Roosevelt did in his famous First Hundred Days." The Administration "remains in its hunkered-down defensive crouch," and it is "outrageous to read that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has been telling members of Congress that media reports are overstating the problems for storm survivors -- this from a man who was denying on National Public Radio last Thursday that there was any crisis at the New Orleans convention center at the very hour reporters were finding dead bodies and abandoned, starving people there. If the administration maintains that tone, it will self-destruct."

E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (9/9, A25), "'Accountability.' Keep that word in mind whenever you hear defenders of President Bush accusing his political opponents of playing the 'blame game' by daring to pose pointed questions about why so many people in New Orleans, most of them very poor, had to wait so long for relief from their suffering." The White House "must have run the phrases 'blame game' and 'finger-pointing' through its focus groups. In his Wednesday briefing, White House press secretary Scott McClellan used variations on those formulations eight times each." Bush's critics "aren't backing off, because they've been here before. Former Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle, who cooperated with Bush in the days after Sept. 11 but lost his South Dakota seat after a long, White House-inspired campaign accusing him of being 'obstructionist,' speaks from experience. 'Democrats to this day remain outraged at the blatant efforts that Republicans, especially in the administration, made to undermine the perception of our patriotism and our motivations,' Daschle said in an interview."

DOJ_NMG_0003743

Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (9/9), "Now that the Bush administration has botched its own response to disaster, we're not supposed to play the 'blame game.' Scott McClellan used that phrase 15 times over the course of just two White House press briefings." Krugman later writes, "In Iraq, the administration displayed a combination of paralysis and denial after the fall of Baghdad, as uncontrolled looting destroyed much of Iraq's infrastructure. The same deer-in-the-headlights immobility prevailed as Katrina approached and struck the Gulf Coast. The storm gave plenty of warning."

Dana Milbank wrote in Washington Post's (9/9, A2) "Washington Sketch" column, "The image of the United States has taken a beating over the past 10 days, as foreign television and newspapers show images of death, chaos and disease in New Orleans. Even lowly Bangladesh (per capita income: $400 a year) was moved to send $1 million in foreign aid. But Karen Hughes has another view. The Bush confidante, now undersecretary of state for public diplomacy, held a meeting with her staff in Foggy Bottom yesterday and was asked about the international ramifications of the response to the New Orleans flooding. The problem, Hughes replied, was not a failed relief effort but a foreign press that did not appreciate the federal government's good work. … Ten days after Katrina struck, the administration and its critics faced credibility challenges. On one side, Bush and his aides continued to admit what even key Republicans in Congress have said: that the response to the hurricane was a debacle. On the other side, liberals ratcheted up their criticism of the administration, giving Bush support for his accusation that they are playing politics. … Yet the Bush administration, whether discussing Iraq or Katrina, remains unfailingly upbeat."

GOP Senators Ask Bush To Appoint Relief Czar; Giuliani, Powell, Franks Mentioned. Reuters (9/9, Zakaria) reports GOP Sens. Sens. Kay Bailey Hutchison and Rick Santorum "pressed President George W. Bush on Thursday to appoint a top official to lead the long-term recovery from the devastation of Hurricane Katrina." White House officials "have not ruled out such an option, saying it is among several being discussed for confronting long-term problems in Katrina's aftermath." Reuters adds, "Various names have been mentioned in Washington for the job, such as former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, former Secretary of State Colin Powell and retired Gen. Tommy Franks, former head of the US Central Command."

Democrats Reject GOP Plan For Hill Inquiry, Will Not Appoint Members. The New York Times (9/9, Hulse) reports, "Congressional Democratic leaders said Thursday that they would not appoint members to a new House-Senate committee to investigate failures in the government response to Hurricane Katrina, calling instead for an independent inquiry." House Minority Leader Nancy Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "said they would not cooperate because the committee would be controlled by Republicans, would have uncertain authority and was created without consultation with Democrats." Reid "said he would not place any Senate Democrats on the panel 'as it is currently described,' adding: 'The only way to ensure that all levels of our government are held accountable to the people is to take this process out of the hands of politicians with a vested interest in the outcome.'" Republicans "said they would still move forward with the panel initiated Wednesday by the House speaker, J. Dennis Hastert, and Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader, and would try to persuade Democrats to drop their objections."

Reuters (9/9, Smith) adds, "While the joint congressional inquiry appears to be getting off to a rocky start, a Senate panel began its investigation into the government response effort." Sen. Susan Collins, "who heads the Senate Homeland Security Committee, said she is committed to pushing the inquiry forward on a bipartisan basis." She and Sen. Joseph Lieberman, the top Democrat on the panel, "spoke to reporters following a closed-door committee session with officials from the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Coast Guard."

Democrats Forced Vote On Taking Control Of Relief Funds Away From FEMA. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Rogers) reports that during debate on the relief package in the House, there was "growing frustration that Congress finds itself in a situation where it is pouring tens of billions of dollars into disaster accounts administered by the same Federal Emergency Management Agency that many lawmakers have so roundly criticized." On a "party-line 221-193 vote," Democrats "made a doomed attempt to permit a vote calling for a reorganization of the relief effort." The House "modified the administration's request to provide $15 million to beef up the inspector general's office at the Department of Homeland Security to audit FEMA's expenditures. But the agency is spending money so quickly that neither the House nor Senate has held a single hearing on the requests."

DOJ_NMG_0003744

Costs Of Relief Effort Generate Partisan Sniping. As estimates of the costs from Hurricane Katrina exceed $100 billion, the political debate in Washington over how to fund the unprecedented disaster relief and recovery effort also took on a more charged and partisan tone. ABC World News Tonight (9/8, story 3, 2:45, Vargas) reported "people are asking all across the country and in Washington, can this country really afford it?" ABC (Moran) added there is "going to be a huge political fight over how to pay" for Katrina. Treasury Secretary John Snow "said the growing US economy can handle it." Secretary Snow was shown saying, "The fact that the underlying fundamentals are so solid, gives us a better ability to deal with the disaster." Moran: "Many Democrats are mindful that the country is spending $5 billion per month in Iraq, and demand that Mr. Bush curtail his tax cuts." Conservatives "are worried about the costs, too, with some House Republicans suggesting a one-year delay in the new prescription drug benefit program." The Administration "says the country can simply borrow the money, since the costs of Katrina, while huge, are one-time expenses." White House spokesman Scott McClellan: "It will have an impact on the budget, at least in the short-term. But these are one-time costs we're talking about."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/8, Henry) reported that "today for the first time we started hearing some tough questions by leaders in both parties about how high this price tag will be and whether or not it's a blank check. You're hearing Republican lawmakers like Mike Pence say they're concerned. They want to see some cuts in other federal programs in order to offset all this relief money. You're hearing Democrats like Senator Harry Reid say they're concerned that over 90 percent of the money is going to go to FEMA, the beleaguered federal agency that has had a lot of questions about its management raised. … And Senator John McCain told me that Congress could probably have a better job of finding ways to pay for this if they cut some of the pork out of the recent highway and energy bills, but obviously that's very unlikely to happen."

USA Today (9/9, Wolf) reports Katrina "has set the federal government on a spending spree. … As the months pass, the government will face pressure to pay for health and education services usually rendered by states, cities and school districts. That will apply not just in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, but in states housing and caring for Katrina's evacuees." That is "likely to push the deficit for fiscal year 2006, which begins Oct. 1, beyond last year's record $412 billion. Before Katrina, the 2006 deficit was projected to be $314 billion." Bill Hoagland, the top budget aide to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, "agreed that the deficit is likely to top $400 billion." Leon Panetta, White House chief of staff and budget director under President Clinton, "said it could hit $500 billion."

The New York Times (9/9, Andrews, Hulse) adds, "Other ideas circulating through Congress that could entail significant costs include these notions: Turning New Orleans and other cities affected by the storm into big new tax-free zones. Providing reconstruction money for tens of thousands of homeowners and small businesses that did not have federal flood insurance on their houses or buildings. Making most hurricane victims eligible for health care under Medicaid and having the federal government pay the full cost rather than the current practice of splitting costs with states." The Times adds, "The torrent of money -- more than $2 billion a day over the weekend, and expected to remain above $500 million a day for the foreseeable future -- prompted several lawmakers to warn about the perils of an open checkbook."

Lobbyists Try To Work Projects Into Katrina Relief Bills. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Mullins) reports, "Bolstered by the shift in political winds from Hurricane Katrina, US corporations are pressing lawmakers to approve a range of issues that have languished on Capitol Hill, some of which have little to do with hurricane relief." For example, "airlines are asking Congress to suspend federal jet-fuel taxes. Oil and gas companies want drilling rights in new parts of the Gulf Coast. Insurance companies want the ability to use tax-free funds to create a multibillion-dollar industry fund to cover future claims from natural disasters. Shipbuilders such as Northrop Grumman Corp. want billions of dollars to help rebuild shipyards in Mississippi. Even small chicken farmers are asking Congress for low-interest loans to fix or replace hundreds of damaged or destroyed chicken coops in Mississippi."

Katrina Evoked In Medicaid Overhaul Debate. The Wall Street Journal's (9/9, A4, Harwood) "Washington Wire" reports, "A bipartisan group of senators urges Finance Chairman Grassley to delay slicing $10 billion from Medicaid and other entitlement programs serving many of those displaced by Katrina. 'We must remain focused on the relief efforts and ways to deliver both short- and long-term aid,' write Republicans Smith and Snowe, joined by Democrats Bingaman and Lincoln." But "conservatives like Rep. Barton of Texas warn Katrina shouldn't become an excuse to block Medicaid overhaul. 'Let me repeat, so that everybody hears me -- evacuees from Hurricane Katrina would not be hurt!' he says."

LATimes Urges Congress To Reconsider Bankruptcy Law In Wake Of Katrina. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (9/9) discusses a specific category of Hurricane Katrina victims, those "families with the means to flee the hurricane, perhaps even with insurance to cover some losses, but without the resources to make a living immediately. … They have lost their homes but are living off their credit cards and maybe a little savings. As those savings dwindle, however, the mortgage keeps coming due and their credit card nears its limit. Soon the paycheck may stop, and with it their health insurance." The Times argues that Congress "should take this opportunity to revisit the new bankruptcy law, which goes into effect Oct. 17," and "treats those affected by a natural disaster the same as the deadbeat who spent it all on luxury cars, jewelry and cocaine." The Times states, "Before Katrina, supporters of the new law argued it would curb abuse of the bankruptcy code. This argument was always dubious, and in the aftermath of the hurricane, the new law appears simply callous. Does Congress really want to use Katrina's victims as test cases in some sort of grand experiment in bankruptcy reform?"

DOJ_NMG_0003745

US Hurricane Response Criticized In World Media. USA Today (9/9) examines coverage in the world press of Hurricane Katrina. Mehdi Mohammadi, "in a column in Keyhan (Tehran, Iran): 'Reports come from New Orleans that show that the pitiful situation of the people in affected areas cannot be entirely attributed to Katrina. A greater tragedy that has astonished the world's people is the widespread chaos, insecurity and plundering that have been caused by thieves, criminals and murderers. ... What kind of human beings are these people who have ambushed and plundered the helpless men and women? ... Americans have created a nationwide scandal." People's Daily in Beijing editorialized, "People have reason to feel disgusted: when Indonesia was hit by a tsunami last year, everybody lent a helping hand and nobody looted. But now this happened in the United States, showing people another side of this 'civilized country.' In fact, it revealed a fragility of the American society, as well as despair and disorder." Ontario's National Post editorialized, "The sense that government would be there to make everything all right…is not surprising given that for so many New Orleanians, a general reliance on social assistance is a normal part of daily life. … If there was a problem, many of the residents had been conditioned to think, then surely the same people who came through every month with money for food, prescription drugs, housing and child care would be there to take care of it."

Brown's Résumé Said To Contain Fabrications.

Time (9/8, Fonda, Healy) reports on its website that when President Bush nominated Michael Brown to head FEMA in 2003, "Brown's boss at the time, Joe Allbaugh, declared, 'the President couldn't have chosen a better man to help...prepare and protect the nation.'" But Time has now "found discrepancies in his online legal profile and official bio, including a description of Brown released by the White House at the time of his nomination in 2001 to the job as deputy chief of FEMA." Before joining FEMA, Brown's "only previous stint in emergency management, according to his bio posted on FEMA's website, was 'serving as an assistant city manager with emergency services oversight.'" The White House said in 2001 that "Brown worked for the city of Edmond, Okla., from 1975 to 1978 'overseeing the emergency services division.'" But an Edmond official said Brown "was an 'assistant to the city manager' from 1977 to 1980, not a manager himself, and had no authority over other employees." And Brown's "lack of experience in emergency management isn't the only apparent bit of padding on his resume, which raises questions about how rigorously the White House vetted him before putting him in charge of FEMA." His FindLaw.com profile lists an Oklahoma university professorship that the school says he never held, and also says he directed an Edmond nursing home. An administrator at the home said Brown "is 'not a person that anyone here is familiar with.'"

Criticism Of FEMA Moves Beyond Brown. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/8, Henry) reported that criticism of the relief effort has "gotten beyond Michael Brown at this point. The administration is not really putting him out there very much. You can see Michael Chertoff and other officials being put out further. And in fact, while some Republicans, like Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist just today, said that clearly the federal government, including FEMA, did not do enough early on."

DSCC Removes Fundraising Pitch From Online Petition Calling For Brown's Firing. The AP (9/9, Barrett) reports, "A new Democratic effort to whip up indignation about the Bush administration's handling of Hurricane Katrina also tried to raise money for Democratic candidates." DSCC Chairman Charles Schumer "issued an appeal Thursday urging people to sign an online petition to fire the head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency over his handling of the Katrina response." When the AP questioned the appeal "the DSCC quickly pulled down the page and said they would donate to charity any money raised by the anti-FEMA petition." At the top of the online petition a link "had asked for a donation to the DSCC." NRSC spokesman Brian Nick said, "It's a disgrace to exploit Hurricane Katrina to raise political funds."

NYTimes Says Brown Too Focused On Public Relations. The New York Times (9/9) editorializes that Brown "was made the director after he was asked to resign from the International Arabian Horse Association, and the other top officials at FEMA don't exactly have impressive résumés in emergency management either. … When Mr. Brown finally got around to asking Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff for extra people for Katrina, it wasn't much of a departure for Mr. Brown to say that one of the things he wanted them to do was to 'convey a positive image of disaster operations to government officials, community organizations and the general public.' We'd like them to stay focused on conveying food, water and medical help to victims."

DOJ_NMG_0003746

Five Top FEMA Officials Had "Virtually No Experience" With Disasters. The Washington Post (9/9, A1, Hsu) reports that "five of eight" leading FEMA officials "came to their posts with virtually no experience in handling disasters and now lead an agency whose ranks of seasoned crisis managers have thinned dramatically since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks." Brown, Chief of Staff Patrick Rhode, and Deputy Chief of Staff Brooks Altshuler "arrived with ties to President Bush's 2000 campaign or to the White House advance operation, according to the agency. Two other senior operational jobs are filled by a former Republican lieutenant governor of Nebraska and a U.S. Chamber of Commerce official who was once a political operative."

The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Silverstein) also reports that Brown "is just one of at least five current and former senior FEMA officials appointed under President Bush whose professional backgrounds showed few qualifications in the area of disaster relief when they arrived at the agency." But Vice President Cheney "defended the administration's FEMA appointees in remarks to reporters on Thursday." Cheney said, "You've got to have people at the top who respond to and are selected by presidents, and you pick the best people you can to do the jobs that need to be done. We've also got some great career professionals, an absolute and vital part of the operation -- couldn't do it without them." But congressional Democrats "have attacked Brown and other top FEMA appointees." Rep. Henry Waxman said, "FEMA is an important agency and needs to be run by professionals, not political cronies. Instead of a loyalty test, we need people with experience and competence."

The New York Times (9/9, Stout) reports that Cheney said in Mississippi, "Most of government runs on the basis of the combination of civilian leadership that's elected and career professionals that fill the jobs underneath them. And we're always trying to strike the right balance. But I think generally that overall principle has served us well as a government over the years."

FEMA Union Says Inclusion In DHS Hurt Disaster Response. ABC World News Tonight (9/8, story 5, 3:00, Stark) reported, "Inside FEMA, long-time employees were convinced FEMA wasn't ready for Katrina." Leo Bosner, FEMA employee union president: "All of us were just shaking our heads and saying, 'This isn't going to be enough, and the Director has to know this isn't going to be enough, but nothing more seemed to be happening." Bosner "says FEMA has been systematically dismantled since it became part of the massive Department of Homeland Security." Bosner: "One of the big differences I see, aside from taking away our staff, our budget and our training, is homeland security, now, in my view, slows down the process." Stark: "The union also sent this letter to Congress a year ago, warning about FEMA's decline. It's a view widely shared by stage emergency managers, who also warned Capitol Hill and the Department of Homeland Security, just weeks ago, that the department was too focused on" terrorism.

Meanwhile, USA Today (9/9) editorializes, "Katrina was a blow from nature, not man. But it has amounted to the first test of the new and improved security system constructed after Sept. 11, 2001. The storm's effects were much like an assault with weapons of mass destruction, something that has long been the worst U.S. terrorism nightmare: thousands of displaced people, many needing medical help along with food, shelter and information. … Have the past four years, and the vast sums spent on better protection, been squandered? By one measure, the answer would seem to be no. Since 2001, there hasn't been a terrorist attack on U.S. soil. … Nevertheless, as Hurricane Katrina has shown, the answers to three central questions are troubling: Are preparations in place if an attack happens? … What about the aftermath of an attack? … Is enough being done to prevent an attack?"

Columnist Finds Plenty Of Blame To Go Around. In his Washington Post (9/9, A25) column, Charles Krauthammer writes, "In less enlightened times there was no catastrophe independent of human agency. When the plague or some other natural disaster struck, witches were burned, Jews were massacred and all felt better (except the witches and Jews). A few centuries later, our progressive thinkers have progressed not an inch. No fall of a sparrow on this planet is not attributed to sin and human perfidy. The three current favorites are: (1) global warming, (2) the war in Iraq and (3) tax cuts. Katrina hits and the unholy trinity is immediately invoked to damn sinner-in-chief George W. Bush. … The author of this calamity was, first and foremost, Nature (or if you prefer, Nature's God). The suffering was augmented, aided and abetted in descending order of culpability by the following: 1. The mayor of New Orleans. He knows the city. He knows the danger. … The governor. It's her job to call up the National Guard and get it to where it has to go. … The head of FEMA. Late, slow and in way over his head. … The president. Late, slow, and simply out of tune with the urgency and magnitude of the disaster. … Congress. Now as always playing holier-than-thou. … The American people. They have made it impossible for any politician to make any responsible energy policy over the past 30 years."

FEMA To "Rethink" Debit Card Distribution Following Problems. ABC World News Tonight (9/8, lead story, 3:25, Vargas) reported that in Houston, "thousands and thousands of evacuees began lining up to get these -- debit cards from the Red Cross," but "many of those people came away, however, empty-handed." ABC (Osunsami) added, "Thousands of people showed up today, hoping for the FEMA credit card, worth $2,000. If they came home with anything at all, they walked home with a Red Cross debit card, worth much less. It was total confusion." Late today, FEMA "announced that their debit cards will only be distributed here, in Houston, which means evacuees in other locations have to wait for direct deposit to hit their checking accounts."

DOJ_NMG_0003747

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/8, Nguyen) reported, "FEMA has decided to rethink these debit cards, which they were planning to distribute tomorrow. We have learned that, indeed, they will continue distributing debit cards tomorrow. … But outside of this Houston area we've learned from a regional officer with FEMA that they've decided to rethink that, and they're going to go with electronic funds, transferring."

The New York Times (9/9, Dewan) reports that in announcing the debit card program on Wednesday, FEMA Director Michael Brown said it was "designed to 'empower' evacuees 'to make their own decisions about what they need to have to restart their lives.' But he did not say when and where the cards would be distributed. In Baton Rouge, The Associated Press reported, people went to a Red Cross office believing they could get the debit cards there. Callers to a Baton Rouge radio station from as far away as Atlanta and Houston complained that they did not know how to get the cards. One person said she had called the FEMA office in New York, only to be told that the cards were in Atlanta."

The New York Times (9/9, Stout) additionally writes that the "continuing confusion in the federal response to the crisis could be discerned in a comparison of the president's remarks with those of Mr. Passey, the FEMA spokesman." Bush, "in speaking to those affected by the storm, said he understood that 'some of you do not have access to a savings or checking account, or ways to cash a check.'" But Passey said, "As we've looked at the logistics of expanding the debit card, we believe that our normal methods of delivery -- checks and electronic funds transfer -- will suffice."

The Houston Chronicle/Reuters (9/9) reports that "after seeing mile-long lines form today for Red Cross cards, authorities were urging those who aren't yet registered with FEMA to do so by calling 1-800-621-FEMA or going to the agency's Web site. … Organizers and evacuees alike are hoping that Friday's inevitable lines won't match today's, which included elderly hurricane victims in wheelchairs and children who haven't yet been registered for school. Hurricane victims held newspapers and scraps of cardboard over the heads to shield themselves from the sun as volunteers passed out water and doctors arrived to watch for overheating or dehydration."

FEMA's Website Found Difficult To Use. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 6, 1:35, Corke) reported, "It's supposed to be easy: If you're an evacuee displaced by Katrina, just click on FEMA.gov…to register for help. Of course, that assumes you're lucky enough to have Internet access to begin with." But it "took us six tries just to get onto the home page. Then we had to click here, and here, and here, and here, and here, and here, and here -- seven pages total before we even got to the application."

Cheney Visits Hurricane Zone. Vice President Cheney yesterday visited areas affected by Hurricane Katrina. His trip was noted by all three networks. On CBS and NBC last night it was characterized in both reports as "damage control." The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 2, 2:50, Roberts) reported Cheney "got a look at" the scenes of devastation "as he flew from Mississippi to New Orleans to review the relief operations." CBS (Borger) added, "Ten days after Hurricane Katrina flooded the Gulf Coast, the Administration is still knee-deep in damage control." Cheney defended the relief effort, saying, "I think the progress we're making is significant."

NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 2, 2:10, Williams) reported, "On all fronts today, it was Administration damage control. The Vice President was dispatched to tour the hurricane zone." Cheney was shown saying, "The President asked me to come down to take a look at things, to begin to focus on the longer term."

ABC World News Tonight (9/8, story 2, 2:40, Woodruff) added the Vice President "was impressed by all of the relief efforts. Most of the people who the Vice President met today were happy he was there. Although a few said this was just a media opportunity for him."

The AP (9/9, Raum) reports, "Standing by Louisiana's governor, Democrat Kathleen Blanco, Cheney spoke of how the flooding of New Orleans and the destruction of many communities in the region was 'a major tragedy in modern times.'" Joining Cheney on the trip, says the AP, "were Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/8, Blitzer) said Cheney hailed "what he called significant progress made so far in devastated areas. The vice president saw a housing development in Gulfport that was leveled by the hurricane." CNN (Chernoff) added that Cheney "did try to lift spirits here. He said we face a tremendous challenge, but he also said he believes the country is up to the task and he certainly was very encouraging in terms of offering federal support."

Man Shouts Obscenity At Cheney. Reuters (9/9, Bohan) reports from New Orleans that "while he was speaking, a young man shouted an obscenity at the vice-president, saying 'Go fuck yourself, Mr Cheney' in an outburst that reflected frayed tempers and patience in the stricken region." The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 2, 2:50, Borger) showed an unidentified male shouting, "Go [no audio] yourself, Mister Cheney!"

The AP (9/9) also reports that while Cheney spoke, "a passer-by hurled an expletive at the vice president. 'First time I've heard it,' Cheney said, when asked if he was hearing a lot of such sentiments."

DOJ_NMG_0003748

Gonzales Tours Gulf With Cheney. Attorney General Gonzales was often mentioned by local television news as accompanying Vice President Dick Cheney as he toured the hurricane damage and relief efforts in the Gulf. WWL-TV New Orleans (9/8, 12:01 p.m.) reported, "Vice President Dick Cheney and attorney general Alberto Gonzales toured stricken Gulf Coast areas this morning beginning with coastal Mississippi before heading later to Louisiana. Air Force 2 flew over heavily damaged houses as it landed at Gulfport Biloxi airport."

WLBT-TV Jackson, MS (9/8, 5:01 p.m.) reported, "Cheney was also accompanied by attorney general Alberto Gonzales and homeland security secretary Michael Chertoff."

WAFB-TV Baton Rouge (9/8, 12:02 p.m.) reported, "Flew over heavily damaged houses as it landed at the Gulfport- Biloxi international airport this morning."

KRIV-TV Houston (9/8, 12:06 p.m.) reported, "They'll be busy spending the day visiting with storm victims and reviewing thousands of people still holding out."

WDAF-TV Kansas City (9/8, 5:59 p.m.) reported, "They met with local and state officials."

Amongst the other stations carrying this story are WJTV-TV Jackson, MS (9/8 6:15 p.m.), CLTV-TV Chicago (9/8, 11:04 p.m.), WJLA-TV Washington, DC (9/8, 12:00 p.m.), WAGA-TV Atlanta (9/8, 10:29 p.m.), KTVK-TV Phoenix (9/8, 7:00 a.m), WFOR-TV Miami (9/8, 12:21 p.m.) , WTAE-TV Pittsburgh (9/8, 12:01 p.m.), WCPO-TV Cincinnati (9/8, 4:57 p.m.), and WGME-TV Portland (9/8, 5:23 p.m.).

First Lady Defends Government Response. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 2, 2:10, Gregory) reported, "At a school in Mississippi, it was the First Lady defending the government's response to Katrina." Laura Bush was shown saying, "I think we've seen a lot of the same footage over and over that isn't necessarily representative of what really happened in both, in a lot of ways. Overall, it was a very good response." On the CBS Evening News (9/8, story 2, 2:50, Borger), the First lady was shown saying, "Well, I think across the board, very, very well."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/8, Blitzer) added Mrs. Bush "addressed the plight of children displaced by the hurricane. She urged parents to make sure their children are safe in school. And, earlier, she visited a school in Iowa that is taking care of children of evacuees."

The Des Moines Register (9/9, Beaumont) also reports the First Lady visited Des Moines, where she visited Lovejoy Elementary School. Mrs. Bush "toured the school" with US Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings.

The Biloxi Sun Herald (9/9) reports, "First Lady Laura Bush visited with hurricane victims in Southaven Thursday and cradled what could be the storm's youngest refugee -- a three-day old infant born to a New Orleans couple seeking shelter in Mississippi." She spoke at Greenbrook Elementary School and "praised DeSoto County residents and Superintendent Milton Kuykendall for enrolling storm refugees in the DeSoto County School District."

The Commercial Appeal (TN) (9/9, Covington) reports, "Hurricane evacuees at a Southaven church shelter said a visit by first lady Laura Bush on Thursday raised their spirits as they try to deal with their losses." Bush "drew applause from more than 100 evacuees and church volunteers when she entered the foyer of the church's education building shortly after 2 p.m." Bush "also was greeted warmly at Greenbrook Elementary School in Southaven, where she visited a second-grade music class and met with nine evacuee children at the school and 12 of their parents."

First Lady Describes Dean, West Criticism Of Bush As "Disgusting." The AP (9/9) reports, "Laura Bush described as 'disgusting' comments by rapper Kanye West and Democratic chairman Howard Dean blaming her husband for the disproportionate number of black hurricane victims. 'I think all of those remarks are disgusting, to be perfectly frank, because of course President Bush cares about everyone in our country,' the first lady said Thursday in an interview. … 'And I know that. I mean, I'm the person who lives with him,' she said. 'I know what he's like and I know what he thinks and I know how he cares about people.'" The AP notes, "On a nationally televised telethon Friday, broadcast live on NBC, West departed from the script to declare 'George Bush doesn't care about black people.'" Dean, earlier this week, "told the National Baptist Convention of America, a black religious group, that race played a role in the hurricane casualty numbers. Mrs. Bush said it was clear that poor people were more vulnerable when the hurricane hit. 'They lived in poorer neighborhoods. Their neighborhoods were the ones that were more likely to flood, as we saw in New Orleans. Their housing was more vulnerable,' she said. 'And that's what we saw, and that's what we want to address in our country.'"

White House Considered Taking Direct Control Of Louisiana Relief Effort. The New York Times (9/9, Lipton, Schmitt, Shanker) reports that as New Orleans "descended into chaos last week and Louisiana's governor asked for 40,000 soldiers, President Bush's senior advisers debated whether the president should speed the arrival of active-duty troops by seizing control of the hurricane relief mission from the governor. For reasons of practicality and politics, officials at the Justice Department and the Pentagon, and then at the White House, decided not to urge Mr. Bush to take command of the effort. Instead, the Washington officials decided to rely on the growing number of National Guard personnel flowing into Louisiana, who were under Gov.

DOJ_NMG_0003749

Kathleen Babineaux Blanco's control." The debate began after officials realized Katrina "had exposed a critical flaw in the national disaster response plans created after the Sept. 11 attacks. According to the administration's senior domestic security officials, the plan failed to recognize that local police, fire and medical personnel might be incapacitated."

The Wall Street Journal (9/9, McKinnon) reports that while the "Bush administration briefly sought to take control of local law enforcement to quell the violence and get help to victims" in New Orleans. Blanco, "in a letter to the White House on Saturday morning, said she would retain control of her state's National Guard troops, and requested the creation a federal joint task force that combined regular military and National Guard units."

Chaotic Logistics, Flawed Decisions Said To Have Hurt Rescue Efforts. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 5, 2:40, Myers) reported, "As the floodwaters rose last Tuesday, the civilian director of the New Orleans Port Police," Cynthia Swain, "made a stunning decision. She ordered all harbor officers to abandon their posts and flee to higher ground," and "only the police chief and two officers stayed on duty." The decision "was just one of many questionable calls, at all levels of government, which delayed or deprived victims of desperately needed help." One medical assessment team, "veterans of 31 disasters, can treat hundreds of patients a day. But for 11 days, it's been repeatedly redirected by FEMA, from Alabama to Biloxi to Dallas to Galveston. So far, they've treated one small cut." Last Friday, Mississippi "asked FEMA for 20,000 trailers for temporary housing. On Monday, when nothing had happened, Sen. Trent Lott asked the President to intervene personally. The next day he was told that 400 trailers are on the way." Today "hundreds of trailers" are "still sitting in a facility in Georgia."

The Houston Chronicle/AP (9/9) reports that according to a Louisiana State University civil engineering professor, New Orleans officials "had 550 municipal buses and hundreds of additional school buses at their disposal but made no plans to use them to get people out of New Orleans before the storm. … Instead, local buses were used to ferry people from 12 pickup points to poorly supplied 'shelters of last resort' in the city." And "at least two public hospitals, loaded with more than 1,000 caregivers and patients, had their generators in their basements, which made them vulnerable in a flood. That violated the state's hurricane plan but had gone uncorrected for years because the hospitals did not have the money to fix the situation."

New Orleans Mayor's Office Lost Contact With Outside World For Days. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Rhoads) reports that a "small corps" of New Orleans city leaders, "holed up at the Hyatt Hotel," had "virtually no way to communicate with the outside world" for the first days of the crisis. At "12:27 a.m. on Wednesday, Aug. 31, the mayor's inner circle made its first outside call in two days. … During the first days of Katrina, the besieged mayor's office struggled to stay connected. It was forced to rely on ingenuity and extreme methods, including breaking in to an Office Depot -- as the chief of police stood watch and chased away unofficial looters -- to obtain necessary equipment."

Landrieu Defends Louisiana Response. USA Today (9/9, Stone) reports that Sen. Mary Landrieu "returned to Capitol Hill on Thursday to defend Louisiana's response to Hurricane Katrina and chastise how Washington handled the disaster." Landrieu, "speaking on the Senate floor for the first time since the disaster, dismissed critics who have blamed local officials." In an interview later, she said, "I'm angry that some people in Washington….would blame state and local governments for something that is a federal responsibility. For God's sake, they were trying to make decisions under 10 feet of water."

The Washington Post (9/9, C1, Leibovich) reports that as Landrieu returned to Washington yesterday, she "had the shellshocked bearing of someone who's been in a place difficult to describe. People greeted Landrieu delicately, like a mourner." Landrieu "had spent the past 10 days at an Embassy Suites in Baton Rouge after evacuating her family's summer home in Slidell on Lake Pontchartrain, since obliterated. Last she heard, her childhood home in New Orleans was filled with five feet of water. … She was reluctant to come back to Washington, Landrieu said. Don't focus on her, she pleaded -- a rare instance of a senator saying something like that and maybe even meaning it. But of course, there was fuss everywhere Landrieu went, the clop-clop-clop of her heels echoing down hallways amid camera clicks, processions of well-wishers, trailing reporters, the whole bit."

Displacements Could Alter Louisiana Political Equations. The Wall Street Journal's (9/9, A4, Harwood) "Washington Wire" reports Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu "could find margins squeezed if thousands of Democratic-leaning African-Americans don't return by her 2008 re-election. Louisiana political analyst John Maginnis says state could even lose one of seven House seats in next redistricting. Two shaky House incumbents, Democrat Melancon and Republican Boustany, hope response to hurricane rallies voters behind them. House Republican campaign chief Reynolds touts chance to market conservative social-policy solutions; Rep. Baker of Baton Rouge is overheard telling lobbyists: 'We finally cleaned up public housing in New Orleans. We couldn't do it, but God did.' Baker explains later he didn't intend flippancy but has long wanted to improve low-income housing."

Police, Military Urge Remaining New Orleans Residents To Leave. Police and the military set on what a front page story in the Washington Post (9/9, A1, Dwyer, Tyson) calls "an aggressive door-to-door campaign" Thursday to urge remaining New Orleans residents "to leave or be removed by force. … The evacuation effort, however, appeared haphazard at best. Affluent areas that were not flooded, such as parts of the Garden District and Uptown, appear to be a low priority for mandatory evacuations."

DOJ_NMG_0003750

USA Today (9/9, Johnson) says police and soldiers "held back" from "their threatened use of force." Police Superintendent Eddie Compass "urged residents to leave and said that at some point police and the National Guard would begin using a 'minimal amount of force' to get people to leave. … Mayor Ray Nagin had said he would order people out of the city if they did not leave."

Knight Ridder (9/9, Pompilio, Nesmith, Merzer) says, "More people seemed motivated to leave, having heard the term 'mandatory evacuation,' and fewer than 10,000 people remained."

The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Cooper, Searcey) adds that "receding floodwaters could make some of those hunkered down in their homes more than 10 days after Hurricane Katrina hit even more determined to stay." The Journal adds that "key tourist and historic districts such as the French Quarter and Garden District, generally located near the Mississippi River, are dry, and soldiers said many people remain in those areas."

ABC World News Tonight (9/8, story 2, 2:40, Woodruff) reported the police and the National Guard "got a lot tougher on the holdouts. Not only the flooded areas. But New Orleans' driest and wealthiest neighborhoods, too." There are "no orders to use force, just strong persuasion. Sometimes entering open houses with guns drawn and instructions to disarm anyone inside." For "many of the police and guard troops, it is an uncomfortable job to do this in an American city."

The CBS Evening News (9/8, lead story, 3:35, Roberts) added, "The police say most who were willing to leave voluntarily have done so. For the rest, officers have orders to remove them, but they say they will do that with as little force as necessary."

Police Confiscate Weapons In Anticipation Of Forced Evacuations. The New York Times (9/9, Berenson, Broder) reports that police "began confiscating weapons from civilians in preparation for a forced evacuation of the last holdouts still living here, as President Bush steeled the nation for the grisly scenes of recovering the dead that will unfold in coming days. … Although it appeared Wednesday night that forced evacuations were beginning, on Thursday the authorities were still looking for those willing to leave voluntarily. The police said that the search was about 80 percent done, and that afterward they would begin enforcing Mayor C. Ray Nagin's order to remove residents by force."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/8, Penhaul) reported that there is "no idea when the process of forced evacuations will get underway. But it's essential to get the first wave out first. Nor any details of how those forced evacuations will get underway, because many of the agents that are involved in law enforcement here, although they say, yes, they're willing to take part in forced evacuations, say they don't yet feel comfortable going into people's homes and dragging people out. They say they feel that they have suffered enough so far."

Louisiana Provides 25,000 Body Bags To New Orleans. The CBS Evening News (9/8, lead story, 3:35, Pitts) reported, "There are still decomposing bodies on the streets here. But now, there are makeshift morgues sets up outside the city, and the state of Louisiana has provided 25,000 body bags to the city: A sign perhaps of what's to come."

Crews Work To Repair New Orleans Flood Walls. USA Today (9/9, Levin) reports on efforts to repair holes in New Orleans' flood walls. The Army Corps of Engineers "is leading the effort to drain the vast areas of rotting water covering this city. So far, water levels throughout the city have dropped no more than a foot or two. … With the closure earlier this week of a breach in the 17th Street Canal, the Army Corps' efforts to dry out New Orleans have shifted here to London Avenue. … Across the city, crews continued to try to get giant pumps that failed in Hurricane Katrina's wake to come back to life. The corps predicts it could take up to 80 days to drain the city. The debris clogging pumps could contain human remains, and in some cases that was slowing the recovery effort."

USA Today (9/9, Cauchon) says the "skeleton of normality is slowly returning to the Mississippi Gulf Coast." In "a few patches…civil society is being restored thanks to electricity, running water, cellular phones and the extraordinary efforts of business owners and workers.'

Traditional New Orleans Funerals Gone In Wake Of Hurricane. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (9/9, Gray, Perez) reports, "Few cities bury their dead in the high style of New Orleans, where funerals can last a week, feature jazz bands as well as parades and draw bigger crowds than weddings do. But those traditions are, for the time being, yet another casualty of Hurricane Katrina. The same flood that ended so many lives in New Orleans shut down most of the city's institutions of death -- its funeral homes, churches and cemeteries. It also scattered the crowds that make New Orleans funerals so extraordinary. For thousands of survivors, this loss could complicate the effort to accept the death of a loved one."

FEMA Restrictions On Media Access Draw Criticism. The Washington Post (9/9, C1, Kurtz) reports in its "Media Notes" column, "As rescue and recovery efforts continue in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, reporters and press analysts are growing increasingly critical of restrictions on media access. The Federal Emergency Management Agency, under heavy journalistic fire for its slow response to the disaster, has sparked new criticism by asking news organizations not to take pictures of bodies being recovered in Louisiana and Mississippi. FEMA spokesman Mark Pfeifle said yesterday that the agency 'has asked that those images not be shown,' but that this is only a request. … Some Louisiana officials, whether taking their cue from FEMA or not, are attempting to make the policy mandatory."

DOJ_NMG_0003751

Katrina Sparks Debate About Military Role In Disaster Response. The Washington Post (9/9, A15, Graham) reports that the "breakdown of local and state agencies" in the Katrina response has "spurred fresh debate about whether disasters of such magnitude ought to be turned over to the U.S. military and other federal authorities to manage at the outset. National plans developed after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks rest on the notion that police, fire and other emergency groups are best positioned to serve as first responders. Federal agencies are supposed to function as backup to state and local ones, and military forces are meant to play a largely supporting role to civilian authorities. But Katrina showed what can happen when the foundation of this organizational structure is quickly overwhelmed and disintegrates, according to government officials and independent analysts."

In his Wall Street Journal (9/9, A16) "Wonder Land" column, Daniel Henninger writes, "The popular impression left the past week -- that the government was wholly unprepared for Katrina -- is not true. Significant U.S. military assistance was on alert throughout the week prior to Katrina's landfall. Why those highly trained and drilled assets did not move into New Orleans sooner is a question that should now sit at the center of a debate over who should have the authority -- the states or the federal government -- to be the 'first mover.'"

Honoré Seen As "Giuliani Of The Gulf Coast." The Christian Science Monitor (9/9, Jonsson) profiles First Army Lt. Gen. Russel Honoré, who "has emerged as the Rudy Giuliani of the Gulf Coast." A "rough-talking Louisiana native, he is credited with changing the character of the relief effort from a mad scramble to an increasingly orderly and effective rescue and restoration. But General Honoré is also having to navigate a fine line between necessary leadership and the specter of federal troops using force against American citizens. So far, he appears to have succeeded."

Hurricane Decimates Region's Legal System. The New York Times (9/9, Applebome, Glater) says Hurricane Katrina "decimated the legal system of the New Orleans region. More than a third of the state's lawyers have lost their offices, some for good. Most computer records will be saved. Many other records will be lost forever. Some local courthouses have been flooded, imperiling a vast universe of files, records and documents. Court proceedings from divorces to murder trials, to corporate litigation, to custody cases will be indefinitely halted and when proceedings resume lawyers will face prodigious - if not insurmountable - obstacles in finding witnesses and principals and in recovering evidence." The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Burton) adds, "The extent of the destroyed evidence and lawsuit files remains uncertain, as several courts remain inaccessible or under water. But because of the damage, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco this week issued an order suspending all state civil-court deadlines, such as statutes of limitations dictating when cases must be filed, at least through Sept. 25. Many civil and criminal trial courts have suspended operations in the parishes, or counties, in the New Orleans area. The federal district court in New Orleans says it is 'closed until further notice' and that it hopes to reopen in three locations -- Houma, Baton Rouge and Lafayette, La. The Louisiana Supreme Court has moved to Baton Rouge, and the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals has shifted temporarily to Houston." Knight Ridder distributes a Dallas Morning News article (9/9, Townsend, Hancock) that reports, "The Louisiana Supreme Court building was flooded and many critical files and evidence boxes are presumably destroyed. City and district court buildings in neighboring parishes have been similarly hit. … Lawyers and judges alike are scrambling to answer previously unimaginable questions: What will happen to pending cases? What about the out-on-bail defendants, witnesses and even law-enforcement officials who are among the several hundred thousand evacuees sprinkled throughout the country, many in Texas?" The News adds, "Judge Patrick Higginbotham said his formerly New Orleans-based 5th Circuit Court of Appeals will be back in business in Houston by next week. … But Katrina's devastating aftermath will be 'enormously disruptive' for the Gulf Coast region's state and local courts, he said. … 'I don't think the tasks we face are nearly as difficult as those in the state courts in the Gulf Coast region,' the Austin, Texas-based Higginbotham said."

Compass Defends Efforts Of New Orleans Police. The New York Times (9/9, Longman) reports on New Orleans Police Superintendent P. Edwin Compass III, who has been "widely criticized for his inability to keep the peace as New Orleans sank into mayhem, and to sustain the morale of his officers, about 500 of whom abandoned the 1,700-member force in anger or despair." Compass "has returned the verbal fire with a raw, impassioned defense of his department. He pointed to those officers who stayed and helped restore order despite a shortage of manpower and ammunition, and volleys of gunshot from what he said were dozens of people trying to thwart rescue efforts." Compass "said he believed that his officers did the best they could, considering that their communications system was inoperable and that the city's ammunition depot was left inaccessible beneath 10 feet of water." The Times adds, "Some police officers, speaking on the condition of anonymity, complained Wednesday that the superintendent was largely invisible immediately after the flooding began. But others said he had maintained a strong public presence, and they praised him for supporting his officers in a department whose reputation suffered severe damage from corruption scandals in the 1990's."

DOJ_NMG_0003752

Hundreds Of New Orleans Police Officers Missing. The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Cart, Chen, Gold) reports, "Hundreds of police officers are missing and many may be dead from Hurricane Katrina, according to a top police official, who in an interview today also said that the population of the city may sharply drop because of the storm. Deputy Police Supt. Warren Riley said about 700 of the city's 1,600-officer force was told to stay home until the storm passed so that they would be available to be deployed wherever they were needed. Between 400 and 500 officers remain unaccounted for and many are feared dead, though some are believed to have walked away from the job, he said."

DOJ To Set Up Katrina Anti-Fraud Task Force. Agence France-Presse (9/9) reports, "With billions of dollars pouring in to help victims of Hurricane Katrina, the US government has established a task force to hunt down fraud, White House spokesman Scott McClellan announced. … 'Unfortunately, there are some who are intent on setting up fraudulent schemes to take advantage of the victims and the people who are trying to help those who have been affected,' he told reporters. … 'These are despicable acts that will not be tolerated. Those who take advantage of the situation will be pursued and will be prosecuted,' said McClellan." AFP adds, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has created the Hurricane Katrina Task Force on Fraud 'to deter, investigate and prosecute disaster-related federal crimes including fraudulent charities, insurance fraud, identity theft and government benefit fraud,' said the spokesman. … The national task force includes officials with the Justice Department's criminal division and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, he said."

Experts Warn Katrina Victims Of ID Theft. Reuters (9/8, Sullivan) reports, "Birth certificates and other sensitive documents left among the waterlogged debris of Hurricane Katrina could put the storm's victims at heightened risk for identity theft, experts said on Thursday." Reuter continues, "U.S. officials and consumer advocates said they had not yet heard of any cases of identity theft related to the disaster because the crime usually takes months to unfold. … But consumers should keep a close eye on their bank statements and order a copy of their credit reports once they get their lives back together to make sure they are not being victimized, they said. … 'We tell people not to be alarmed but to be cautious,' said Betsy Broder, an assistant director in the Federal Trade Commission's Bureau of Consumer Protection." Reuters adds, "Those who wish to contribute to relief efforts are at risk as well. Internet-security company Websense said on Sunday that it had found a 'phishing' e-mail campaign that seeks to trick Internet users into providing their credit-card numbers to a Web site that looks like one run by the Red Cross. … In order to avoid such scams, donors should type the address of charitable Web sites directly into their browsers, rather than clicking on a link in the e-mail, experts said. … The FBI is investigating at least a dozen suspicious Web sites and e-mail messages for fraud, spokesman Paul Bresson said."

Administration Hires Contractors, Suspends Davis-Bacon Rules. The Bush Administration has hired five private contractors to accelerate efforts to rebuild damaged areas in the Gulf region. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Dreazen) reports, "The Federal Emergency Management Agency announced yesterday that it was awarding contracts to Bechtel National Inc. of San Francisco and Fluor Corp. of Aliso Veijo, Calif., both of which are involved in Iraq. The other companies awarded FEMA work are Shaw Group of Baton Rouge, La., Denver-based CH2M Hill, which is providing housing in Alabama, and Dewberry Technologies of Fairfax, Va., which is providing planning and reporting tools to help guide the efforts." The White House also "took the controversial step" of "suspending in the disaster area so-called Davis-Bacon rules requiring prevailing wages be paid to workers on federal contracts." The Washington Post (9/9, D3, Edsall) adds "the action infuriated labor leaders and their Democratic supporters in Congress, who said it will lower wages and make it harder for union contractors to win bids."

Relief Agencies Organize Emergency Medical System. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 3, 1:55, Teague) reported on "the health threat all along the Gulf Coast: We know already of those four deaths from seawater-borne bacteria and several cases of Norwalk virus have broken out in a Mississippi shelter. Then there's the potential health disaster in New Orleans. But there's also been a huge medical response here." NBC (Bazell) added, "Navy hovercrafts are now bringing tons of medical supplies hourly to beaches in Biloxi. Nearby at a shelter, Navy and FEMA doctors form a so-called strike team today to check the residents for the first signs of illness. Those who are sick get care onsite immediately, while state and CDC experts monitor the medical records daily for any signs of a dangerous outbreak."

Norton Express Concern Over Water-Borne Diseases. In New Orleans. Interior Secretary Gale Norton said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/8), "We in the United States have been fortunate that we have not had to cope with the kinds of health problems that people in many parts of the world have to cope with on a daily basis. The concern about having clean drinking water for people is obviously a big one. The concern about water-borne diseases is something we usually don't have to cope with in the United States. We're working to try to address those things. My bureau of reclamation, for example, has just provided a water purification system for the hospital in Biloxi that will help 40,000 people have pure water. That's something that is vitally important that we focus on, the basic needs right now, for the health and safety."

DOJ_NMG_0003753

Charity Hospital Doctor Profiled. The New York Times (9/9) reports on Dr. Norman E. McSwain Jr., Chief of Trauma Surgery at Charity hospital, who became "\would become one of the hurricane's reluctant celebrities. As Charity Hospital withered around him - low on electricity, water and oxygen; its food supplies down to canned fruit cocktail; surrounded by thugs firing at rescue boats - he finally despaired of official channels and cried out to the news media: 'We have been trying to call the mayor's office. We have been trying to call the governor's office. We are turning to you. Please help us.'"

HUD, VA Offer Some Southern Homes To Katrina Victims. USA Today (9/9, 1B, Koch) reports that the Federal government "is making some, but not all, of the thousands of homes it owns in Southern states available to displaced victims of Hurricane Katrina." HUD has "taken all its homes in stricken states off the market to consider which ones can house evacuees. It has identified 1,380 homes in seven states as livable and plans to move people into them, spokesman Lemar Wooley says. But the Department of Veterans Affairs continues to sell its homes. In some cases, wealthier Katrina evacuees are buying them." VA spokesman Scott Hogenson said, "If there's a need for additional housing, VA houses will be taken off the market immediately. We are ready to move." He adds that the VA is coordinating its efforts with HUD and FEMA.

Evacuees Airlifted To New England. Hurricane evacuees were airlifted to the Northeast yesterday. The New York Times (9/9, Cowan) reports that they taken to Cape Cod "where they will be temporarily housed in a rejuvenated barracks at the Otis Air National Guard Base. The trickle of arrivals - 107 people moved out of homes or plucked off rooftops and off highways in recent days, and flown to Massachusetts by the Federal Emergency Management Agency - marked the first official evacuation to New England of victims of Hurricane Katrina. But thousands of beds in shelters, barracks and apartments have been prepared by state and local governments in the region, awaiting an influx of families from the South that has been slow to come."

Many Evacuees Leaving Astrodome For Other Housing. The New York Times (9/9, Romero) says the population at the Houston Astrodome "dwindled to about 3,000 on Wednesday from an estimated 15,000 over the weekend, with many people seizing on local job opportunities and inexpensive housing. Because of a building boom over the last few years, there is a glut of affordable housing in Houston and its metropolitan area, which includes about 4.5 million people. Hotels are also offering a 14-day stay at no charge to storm victims, with reimbursements to come from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Add the outpouring of offers of shelter across the country and an acknowledgment by the government that the original estimates may have been high, and it appears that the Astrodome might be empty soon."

Influx Of Katrina Survivors Strains Baton Rouge. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 4, 2:20, Williams) reported, "They call it West New Orleans these days because Baton Rouge has absorbed so many people. It has almost doubled in size overnight." NBC (Seigenthaler) added, "The influx of a quarter of a million evacuees has pushed Baton Rouge to its limit." The "parking lot at stores like Wal-Mart fills up quickly each day. Inside, there are plenty of empty shelves." People here "have to wait in line for almost everything, including gas. Housing here is also limited. There are no apartments available for rent. And some homebuyers are purchasing sight unseen." Some "are actually frightened that this sudden explosion in population will lead to an increase in crime, and that's why stores like this are selling 10 times the number of guns they sold before the storm." The Baton Rouge Police Department "has said there has been no increase in crime. But there is fear based on stereotyping of evacuees."

Small Texas Town Welcomes Hurricane Evacuees. The Washington Post (9/9, A16, Reid) reports on the town of Orange, Texas, "a bayou town on the Texas-Louisiana border that has seen its population swell from more than 18,000 to about 20,000 in one week as evacuees have moved in. … If New Orleans has been a locus of destruction, chaos and crime, the news from Orange and numerous other small-town havens is the old familiar story of neighbor helping neighbor. The exodus from Katrina has filled the string of hotels along Interstate 10 at the north end of town. Beyond that, Red Cross officials say five shelters have opened in Orange, plus two more in nearby hamlets."

Computer Forecast Last Year Predicted Damage Similar To Katrina. The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 10, 2:10, Mason) reported that while Katrina "seemed to catch many government officials by surprise," last summer, "this computer model forecast just what Katrina would bring." The storm surge projection for the fictitious Hurricane Pam "showed the levees" of New Orleans "would be overwhelmed by even a Category 3 hurricane they were designed to withstand, and the city would be swamped under 20 feet of water."

DOJ_NMG_0003754

Hurricane Ophelia Lurking Off Florida Coast. ABC World News Tonight (9/8, story 4, :20, Woodruff) reported, "Another hurricane is brewing. This would be the seventh of the season. Ophelia is now 70 miles off the coast of Cape Canaveral, with sustained winds of 75 miles per hour. There's no way to tell right now if it will make landfall. But the coast is already seeing heavy rains and strong winds."

The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 5, 0:40, Roberts) reported, "Ophelia is expected to head farther out to sea then perhaps make a U turn back to Florida next week. But experts admit they really don't know yet where it's going."

WPost Calls For "Rational Construction" Of Gulf Coast. The Washington Post (9/9, A24) editorializes, "Even with the evacuation unfinished and the structural damage unassessed, it is not too early to start talking about how to rebuild New Orleans and the rest of the Gulf Coast. When residents return to their communities, many will want to rebuild everything exactly as it was. That is understandable. But lessons of the past suggest that this is exactly what should not happen. … The time to start planning for a rational reconstruction of the Gulf Coast is now. Six months or more down the road, when the rebuilding has already begun, will be too late."

Officials Urge Insurers To Pay Valid Claims. Mississippi's insurance commissioner has notified carriers that they will be required to prove that damage was caused by water, not by wind if they deny a claim. The Washington Post (9/9, D1, Crenshaw) reports that Lousiana's insurance commissioner "also urged a large group of insurers and reinsurers to pay all valid claims. In many cases, the key to deciding which homeowners recover will be whether wind or water caused the damage. Many homeowners' and business insurance policies exclude flood damage from their coverage. Flood coverage is written by the federal government through its National Flood Insurance Program, but only a small fraction of property owners in Mississippi and Alabama have bought it."

US Seeks NATO Help In Transporting Aid From Abroad. The Bush Administration has asked NATO for help transporting to the US relief equipment that has been offered by other nations to hurricane victims. The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Richter) reports, "Ninety-five countries have offered about $1 billion in cash and goods, as well as technical assistance, U.S. officials said. But some of the supplies remained abroad, where foreign officials in some instances said they had not heard back from U.S. counterparts on whether their offers would be accepted. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization told U.S. officials that its crews could transport aid to the Gulf Coast. Eleven cargo planes landed Thursday in Little Rock, Ark., carrying aid from abroad, after 11 others Wednesday. But some countries said they still had no word on whether their offers would be accepted."

MoveOn Anti-Roberts Ad Will Not Use Images Of Katrina Evacuees. USA Today (9/9, Memmott) reports MoveOn said "one of its officials was wrong when he said it would broadcast a TV ad with images of poverty-stricken hurricane victims to raise questions about the civil rights record of John Roberts." The "change underscores how quickly political messages can backfire if they trod too hard on sensitive issues, said Brooks Jackson, director of the University of Pennsylvania's Annenberg Political Fact Check program."

Conservatives Seek Female Supreme Court Nominee. The Wall Street Journal's (9/9, A4, Harwood) "Washington Wire" reports, "Conservatives tout female court pick to block Gonzales. Right rallies around antiabortion appeals-court judges, including Edith Jones and Priscilla Owen; Janice Rogers Brown, an African-American, would meet post-Katrina calls for Bush to appoint a minority. All are seen as more conservative than Attorney General Gonzales, who'd be the first Hispanic pick. Some close to White House predict Bush won't announce O'Connor's successor until Roberts clears Senate Judiciary Committee."

Bush Urged To Nominate Latino To Supreme Court. Attorney Raul A. Reyes, a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors, in an op-ed in USA Today (9/9) writes that "a Latino presence on the high court is overdue and would have monumental implications for the country." For example, a Latino "would recognize that 'Mexican appearance' is a flawed basis for an immigration check. He would see that English-only laws and the Real ID Act, which prohibits driver's licenses for illegal aliens, can be adversely applied to Hispanics." Reyes concludes, "It's worth noting that the Supreme Court will face issues with broad effect on Latinos: bilingual education, affirmative action, immigration and workers' and voters' rights. It is imperative that the concerns of Latinos are represented."

NC8-TV Washington, DC (9/8, 10:47 a.m.) reported, "President Bush has rekindled speculation that he may nominate attorney general Alberto Gonzales to the Supreme Court. The president said the list of potential candidates to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor is 'wide open,' then he proceeded to look directly at Gonzales, which drew laughs during the meeting."

Role Of Veteran Guides For Top Nominees Examined. Lobbyist Kenneth Duberstein describes the behind-the-scenes role of former top officials in helping top Administration nominees survive the nomination process. The Washington Post (9/9, A23, Lee) reports, "When John G. Roberts Jr. was nominated by President Bush in July to be an associate justice, he was promptly provided with two guides: former senator Fred D. Thompson (R-Tenn.) and former Republican National Committee chairman Ed Gillespie. Both are considered savvy Washington insiders who are now comfortably on the outside." Duberstein says, "There are several roles you play. … You are the chief strategist for the ultimate goal of getting that person confirmed. You are also the traffic cop, because everybody wants to see the prospective nominee. You are a coach and you're also a confidant of the nominee. You are the chief liaison with the Hill, but also the chief liaison within the administration. You are an enforcer, but you are also a negotiator.'" He "said the job of guiding Roberts should not change because he has been nominated for chief justice. 'I don't recall that there would be any distinction,' he said."

DOJ_NMG_0003755

OTHER NEWS:

Economists Expect Katrina To Cut GDP By 0.4% In Second Half Of Year. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Annett) reports a group of economists surveyed by the journal think Hurricane Katrina "is likely to slow growth and boost inflation pressures in the second half of this year," but "the economy could receive a modest boost early next year amid recovery efforts on the Gulf Coast." To "reflect the expected economic impact of Katrina," the surveyed economists "marked down their annualized forecasts for growth in gross domestic product for the second half of this year by 0.4 percentage point. The survey was conducted Sept. 2-7." These private-sector economists "expect a somewhat smaller impact than what has been predicted by the Congressional Budget Office, which has said that second-half growth could be trimmed by a half to a full percentage point." The 56 economists "now expect GDP, the broadest measure of U.S. economic activity, to expand at a 3.6% seasonally adjusted annual rate in the third quarter and at a 3.2% rate in the fourth quarter."

Katrina Expected To Affect Job Growth Adversely. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Rebello, Bater) reports Hurricane Katrina "caused at least 10,000 job losses in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama last week, although nationwide the number of U.S. workers filing first-time applications for unemployment benefits declined slightly, the government said Thursday." Initial jobless claims "declined by 1,000 to a seasonally adjusted level of 319,000 in the week that ended Saturday, the Labor Department said." However, a Labor Department statistician "said the claims numbers are likely to be revised upward in coming weeks." Economists "have begun to predict that the nation's job growth will suffer this month because of Katrina's devastation."

The Washington Post (9/9, D1, Williams) reports, "The assimilation of Hurricane Katrina evacuees into Texas's big cities and into communities across the country will be far from seamless. Almost all the evacuees are now unemployed, and many are also homeless. They are scrambling to find work so they can get out of the Federal Emergency Management Administration's massive shelters, into apartments and on with their lives. … The Congressional Budget Office has estimated that 400,000 jobs were lost throughout the Gulf Coast due to Katrina. So far, only an estimated 10,000 workers who lost their jobs have filed for unemployment benefits, the Labor Department said Thursday. That number would have been higher, but many claims offices in the affected region were shut down. The Labor Department predicted that the number of disaster-related claims will rise sharply in coming weeks and that hundreds of thousands of displaced workers will soon be seeking benefits."

The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 4, 2:30, Roberts) reported, "As many as one million survivors have been displaced. And then there's the growing economic toll of this disaster. The government said today that, so far, 10,000 of the workers who lost their jobs because of Katrina have joined the line for unemployment insurance. Others joined the line for those $2,000 debit cards the government is offering."

Katrina Expected To Boost Inflation. USA Today (9/9, Kirchhoff) reports Hurricane Katrina, "which has already pushed gasoline above $3 a gallon, is prompting higher prices for everything from building supplies to natural gas and chemicals." Economists have "increased their projections for consumer inflation, some significantly. Global Insight expects inflation to reach 5.7% at an annual rate in third-quarter 2005, compared with its earlier 3.4% estimate. Economy.com expects 3.4% inflation through the end of 2005, up from 2.7%." Both firms "expect the inflation gains to be transitory — oil is off its $70-a-barrel peak, though still running $64.49 — with more manageable inflation in 2006. There are questions regarding how much of the price increases will bleed through to core inflation, which excludes food and energy and is the inflation measure most watched by the Federal Reserve." But some "say price gains could last longer."

Stock Markets Down On Katrina Uncertainties. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 8, 0:15, O'Donnell) reported, "In business news tonight, economic uncertainties in the wake of this hurricane have pushed stocks lower. On Wall Street, the Dow lost more than 37 points today [to close at 10, 595.93]. NASDAQ ended this day down 6 points [to close at 2,166.03]."

The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Patterson) reports after "two days of solid gains on Wall Street, investors stepped away from the plate Thursday, and stocks drifted lower as crude oil ticked up." Home builders "took it on the chin amid concerns that the housing boom could slow. The trigger was a lackluster earnings report by Hovnanian Enterprises, which posted net income of $1.76 a share for the third quarter late Wednesday, two cents below expectations." Light, sweet crude "jumped toward the end of open-outcry trading on the New York Mercantile Exchange, settling up 12 cents to $64.49 a barrel on news of a large decline in output from the Gulf of Mexico." The report "was one of the first yardsticks of the damage done to the oil-and-gas supply system in the Gulf Coast since Hurricane Katrina struck last Monday."

DOJ_NMG_0003756

Gulf Coast Banks Rebound. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Sidel, Bauerlein, Hagerty) reports the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. "estimates that some 280 locally based institutions may have been affected by Katrina, representing $270 billion in assets and $201.3 billion in deposits. Big names in the area include Regions Financial Corp., AmSouth Bancorp, Compass Bancshares Inc. and Whitney Holding Corp." Although the "stocks of some affected banks tumbled last week when the storm's devastation became apparent, investors are betting that the area's economic recovery will generate enormous revenue and loan growth next year."

Other Gulf Coast Industries Hard Hit. The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 4, 2:30, Whitaker) reported, "The Mississippi Department of Wildlife, on a mercy mission delivering food to shrimpers trapped in a fetid canal, reeking of rotted shrimp, unrecovered bodies, sewage and fuel. … This is the $250-million a year Mississippi shrimp industry today." If you "made your living on the Gulf, you're hurting: Ports, from Gulfport, Mississippi to the granddaddy of them all -- New Orleans -- out of commission. In Mississippi, they build their casinos on the water. Katrina destroyed all of these along the Gulf Coast, washing away the $500,000 a day they pay in state taxes, a big hit for a poor state. Katrina closed down the Hard Rock even before its grand opening." But "things are slowly recovering."

NBC Nightly News (9/8, lead story, 2:45, Brown) reported, "There are signs that some are beginning to think about rebuilding." In the New Orleans suburbs "where flooding wasn't so bad, a few places are already up and running: Too few, judging by the line at this Domino's Pizza, or this Walgreen's, where dozens of people waited to fill prescriptions. And some here say they were told by their companies to show up for work as early as Monday." But the "number of people who will lose their jobs because of Katrina is staggering. The Labor Department estimates 10,000 people on the Gulf Coast have already filed for unemployment benefits, with that number likely to spike next week. And the government predicts another 400,000 jobs will be lost in the months ahead. Mitch Landrieu, Louisiana's lieutenant governor, is already asking businesses for a firm commitment to come back and expecting the Federal Government to step up." Lt. Gov. Landrieu: "What we need is a long-term commitment from the government to rebuild. If we don't get that, that's going to be very difficult thing to do." Brown: "He says the Federal government and others, meaning the taxpayers, will have to make a hefty contribution. They predict it will cost $150 billion to rebuild New Orleans."

WSJournal Calls For Cutting Duties On Four Products In Response To Katrina. The Wall Street Journal (9/9) says in an editorial that if "the feds really want to help the economy post-Katrina, here are four words: lumber, cement, shrimp and steel. They all have prices higher than necessary because of U.S. anti-dumping trade law." Lumber and cement "will soon be in great demand to rebuild the tens of thousands of damaged homes. Prices are sure to rise as reconstruction begins, but thanks to U.S. tariffs as high as 27% on Canadian lumber, American home buyers already pay an extra $1,000 on average for their shelter. The same goes for U.S. duties on Mexican cement, which have averaged 55% since 1990. Now would be an ideal time for Washington to declare a truce in these trade spats and reduce the price of rebuilding." Then "there's shrimp, an increasingly popular part of the American diet whose prices may well rise sharply in Katrina's wake. Louisiana shrimpers represent the bulk of the domestic industry and were all but wiped out by the hurricane." While "we're at it, consider specialty steel, which depends on hydrogen gas produced in the Gulf."

Analysts Suspect Strategic Oil Release Aimed At Price, Not Supply. The Financial Times (9/9, Hoyos, Blas) reports the US and Europe are "releasing more emergency crude oil than refineries in the Gulf of Mexico can handle, reinforcing suspicions that governments are using the crisis triggered by Hurricane Katrina to cap record oil prices." US refineries "will on Friday begin to bid for the 30m barrels of crude oil that the US government is releasing from the its emergency reserves but, with many refineries disabled, analysts say the additional supply may not be needed." Data released on Thursday "suggested that, while petrol is in short supply, oil companies still have plenty of crude in their inventories. The companies' stocks fell 6.45m barrels last week, significantly less than the 13.6m barrels of production capacity lost to the hurricane suggesting that the shortfall did not warrant the scale of the governments' responses."

Energy Experts Predict Gulf Output Won't Recover For Some Time. The USA Today (9/9, Lynch) reports, "Restoration of energy output to pre-Katrina levels stalled late this week as industry specialists began addressing some of the worst damage to the region's sprawling energy infrastructure." Ten days after Katrina, "gulf oil production Thursday was less than 40% of normal levels, down from 43% one day earlier, according to the U.S. Minerals Management Service." Natural gas output Thursday "stood at 59%, almost unchanged from the previous day." Oil prices, which "had eased a bit earlier in the week, rose slightly on the discouraging gulf numbers. Light sweet crude for October delivery closed at $64.49 a barrel, up 12 cents, on the New York Mercantile Exchange."

DOJ_NMG_0003757

Gas Inventories Fall To Lowest Levels In Five Years. The New York Times (9/9, Bajaj) reports the nation's gasoline inventories "fell last week to their lowest levels in almost five years, the government said yesterday, quantifying for the first time Hurricane Katrina's effect on energy supplies and production." Americans "bought and used about as much gasoline as they did a year earlier - 9.3 million barrels a day - in the week that ended last Friday, but gasoline inventories fell 2.2 percent from the previous week because of supply and production disruptions, the Energy Department reported." A gallon of regular unleaded gasoline "was selling yesterday for an average of $3.03 nationwide, down from $3.04 on Wednesday, according to AAA."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/9, Trumbull) reports gasoline prices "have begun to ease, but even when all Gulf Coast refineries are running again later this year, consumers may not see a full retreat to pre-Katrina levels. That conclusion, analysts say, stems from a simple equation involving the cost of a barrel of crude, markups by middlemen, and little margin for error in the nation's energy infrastructure." How far "and how quickly prices fall now depend on a few critical factors: When four damaged refineries come back on line, how quickly emergency shipments of gasoline from foreign refineries arrive, and most important, where oil prices go from here."

But Demand For Gas Appears To Have Dropped. The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Peltz, Hoffman) reports drivers' "demand for gasoline appears to have downshifted since Hurricane Katrina sent pump prices soaring above $3 a gallon across much of the nation." Katrina "initially sparked panic buying, sporadic shortages and televised images of long lines at some service stations. Then, consumers pulled back as prices hit record highs, analysts said Thursday."

The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Ball, Gold) reports Americans "used 4% less gasoline amid skyrocketing pump prices last week than they did the week before Hurricane Katrina hit, the federal government reported. But whether that indicates consumers have decided to conserve or merely that they couldn't find all the gasoline they wanted isn't clear."

Arizona Governor Says Administration Not Dealing With High Gas Prices. The Phoenix Business Journal (9/9, Sunnucks) reports Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano "criticized the Bush administration Thursday for failing to deal with the oil industry and record high gasoline prices." Napolitano said the Bush Administration "has not been aggressive enough in dealing with sky high gasoline prices in recent years and in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. The Democratic governor said the Republican White House has not been interested in consumers when it comes to the energy industry."

Gas Stations Report Growing Number Of "Drive Offs." The New York Times (9/9, Steinhauer) reports as "fuel prices rise, and the tempers of American drivers with them, so, too, has the number of people who are stealing gasoline." From Maine to Oklahoma, "gas station owners are reporting a surge in the number of drivers who pull up to the pump, fill up and drive off without paying. The incidents, known as 'drive offs' - which are typically concentrated at stations near big cities and Interstates - are forcing stations across the country to adopt prepay policies for cash customers."

State Department Shifts Position On Cuban Biological Weapons. The Christian Science Monitor (9/9) "Terrorism and Security" column writes that in 2002, John Bolton said Cuba had "'biological weapons capabilities' and was sharing them with 'rogue nations.' Mr. Bolton and the Bush administration were adamant that Cuba was a potential threat to the United States because of this. So it came as somewhat of a surprise last Tuesday when the US retreated from this early claim that Cuba has 'an offensive biological weapons effort.' The new position was made public in a State Department document released last Tuesday, when almost the entire United States was focusing on the effects of Hurricane Katrina in the Gulf of Mexico region." A Knight Ridder report "notes that this is the first time that the US has 'publicly softened' its charge that Cuba had biological weapons, which has been 'controversial from the outset.'"

China Announces Resumption Of North Korean Nuclear Talks. The New York Times (9/9, Brinkley) reports that China said that "six-nation talks over North Korea's nuclear weapons program will resume Tuesday," prompting several parties to restate "positions that helped push the last round into a stalemate." The same day, Jay Lefkowitz, the US special envoy on human rights in North Korea, "said he planned to publicize whatever he learned about human rights abuses in North Korea," such as "starved to death" political prisoners. "North Korea typically reacts quickly and angrily to critical statements from Washington," and Lefkowitz's mere appointment to his position "was a factor in the North's decision to postpone resumption of the disarmament talks by two weeks."

Experts Brief Rice On North Korea Visit. The Washington Post (9/9, A21, Kessler) reports that John W. Lewis, a retired Stanford University professor, and Siegfried S. Hecker, retired director of Los Alamos National Laboratory, both "prominent experts on North Korea who recently made an unpublicized visit" there, "briefed Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday." They provided "details of their talks with key North Korean officials" and "summarized their conversations in Pyongyang, made some suggestions for bridging gaps, and provided an assessment of the chances of reaching an agreement." North Korean officials "made it clear that they intend to insist that the statement of principles acknowledge North Korea's right to peaceful use of nuclear power."

DOJ_NMG_0003758

Ukrainian President Fires Cabinet. The Financial Times (9/9, Warner) reports, "Ukraine's President Viktor Yushchenko yesterday sacked his cabinet and appointed" Yuri Yekhanurov, a veteran government official "with a record of avoiding direct political confrontations," to take over as prime minister "from the populist Yulia Tymoshenko." The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Murphy) adds that the move was Yushchenko's "attempt to reassert his leadership. Tymoshenko's "popularity had been one of Yushchenko's most valuable weapons." The New York Times (9/9, Myers) adds that Oleksandr V. Turchinov, chairman of the Ukrainian Security Services, "resigned in protest" warning that "the president's decision 'threatened the national security of Ukraine.'"

The Financial Times (9/9, Warner) reports that Yushchenko cited "the long-simmering conflict between Ms Tymoshenko and" national security chief Petro Poroshenko, which reached a "crisis point after the surprise resignation earlier this week of Olexander Zinchenko, the president's chief of staff, who on Monday accused Mr Poroshenko of corruption and interference in the media and justice system."

The New York Times (9/9, Myers) adds that Yushchenko "described his decision as a reluctant, though necessary one, saying that as president he 'should not baby-sit' his squabbling aides." The "heart of the divisions - and evidently the source of the accusations of corruption - have been the government's efforts to undo some of the dubious privatizations that took place under Mr. Kuchma."

The Washington Post (9/9, A20, Finn) adds, "The dismissal was triggered by a series of resignations by top officials who charged that some of the most powerful people around Yushchenko were using their positions to enrich themselves and reneging on one of the most important promises of last December's revolt, the eradication of endemic graft." Analysts said that "the public airing of" allegations of corruption "was designed to force other divisions to a climax."

The Financial Times (9/9, Warner) reports that the "dismissal of Ms Tymoshenko is likely to lead to a damaging confrontation with her and her political team that could further bog down reforms."

The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Murphy) adds that Yulia Mostovaya, assistant editor of the respected liberal weekly Zerkalo Nedeli, said, "Without Tymoshenko's support…Yushchenko never would have become president," but he's now created his own powerbase, "building it up on a basement of wealthy, financially strong tycoons."

The Washington Post (9/9, A20, Finn) adds that after the next election "the prime minister and cabinet will be chosen by parliament rather than the president, as they currently are. The powers of the prime minister will also increase at the expense of the president." However, "the crisis is likely to deepen public disillusionment with the government's failure to deliver quickly on some of the basic promises of the Orange Revolution, particularly rapid economic improvement."

Fate Of Ukrainian Reform Said To Rest With Tymoshenko. Robin Shepherd, an adjunct fellow of the Center for Strategic and International Studies, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (9/9, Shepherd) argues, "We are watching…the first tentative steps in a desperately difficult transition," and "will get a pretty good idea of whether that task can, in the end, be accomplished in the days and weeks ahead." The political crisis "should be understood…in terms of flaws in the" Orange Revolution "which were apparent from the start," especially "the fractious nature of the democratic forces that took power in January." Prime Minister Yulia Tymoshenko "has barely concealed her own ambitions to take the president's place as the key player in national politics and has been engaged in all-out warfare with other members of the government for months." If she works against Yushchenko and other reformers, it "could prove disastrous for the reform movement, either pushing it out of power completely or, more likely, forcing reformists to make damaging concessions to supporters of the previous administration in order to form a new government."

NYTimes Calls Political Upheaval "Serious Blow" For Regional Reform. The New York Times (9/9) editorializes, "Yushchenko declared that his one goal was to ensure stability. But the Ukrainian protesters wanted change." Tymoshenko "is certain to turn" her "fiery speeches and powerful presence" on "the president and his new government." The situation "is a serious blow to the hopes and expectations that had been raised for the future of Ukraine, and for reformers in Belarus and other former Soviet republics." Yushchenko and Tymoshenko "squandered the momentum generated on Kiev's streets, struggling over control of lucrative industries, over relations with Russia and over how to cope with soaring energy prices." Yushchenko "needs to convince his country, and a very wary West, that he not only believes in democracy, free markets and the rule of law, but is also capable of leading Ukraine in that direction."

West Praises Egyptian Vote Amid Fraud Charges. The Washington Post (9/9, A20, Williams, Wright) reports, "Egyptian government officials leaked partial results Thursday of the first multi-candidate presidential election to show that President Hosni Mubarak had won at least 70 percent of the vote, but controversy still swirled about alleged irregularities and fraud in Wednesday's vote." As

DOJ_NMG_0003759

"government officials worked hard to persuade the public that the vote was valid, outside Egypt Butros Boutros-Ghali, the former U.N. secretary general, "declared the election a 'positive experience,'" and the State Department "praised the vote." One senior administration official said, "it's important to get all the public political energy into the political sphere, or it will go elsewhere."

WPost Says Bush Needs To Push Egypt For Additional Reforms. The Washington Post (9/9) editorializes that when the results of Egypt's vote are announced, "there will be no reason for anyone to take them seriously," due to the irregularities Mubarak allowed. However, "another election coming this fall, for parliament, that in many ways is more important than the presidential poll … If the upcoming vote is fair, it will drastically reduce the suffocating authority of the ruling party." The Bush administration "cites the democratization of the Middle East as one of its top priorities," but "persists in describing" the election "as 'a positive first step,'" despite "Mubarak's insistence on heavy-handed steps to control the election's outcome." The Administration can do more, and "need not ask Mr. Mubarak for radical change -- only for steps that liberal activists in his own party favor," such as "allowing slates of parliamentary candidates to be elected by proportional representation," allowing "more of the real Egyptian opposition into the process," and making the "next vote…free and fair, and certified as such by both local and international monitors."

Koizumi Coalition Poised To Win Election. USA Today (9/9, Wiseman, Takahashi) reports, "Advocates for change in Japan could emerge rejuvenated from Sunday's legislative elections, thanks to Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi's decision last month to wage war on obstructionist lawmakers in his own ruling party. A poll this week by the daily Asahi Shimbun showed Koizumi's ruling coalition -- his Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) and its ally New Komeito -- leading the top opposition party." When members of his party in parliament defeated his plan to privatize the post office, he "dissolved the legislature and called the election," had an "internal purge of the party," then "recruited a group of attractive candidates, dubbed by the daily Mainichi the 'assassins' and 'female ninjas,' to defeat them in the polls."

EU Nations Raise Billions For Vaccination Of Needy. The New York Times (9/9, Dugger) reports, "Britain, France, Spain, Italy and Sweden will announce an agreement on Friday to raise almost $4 billion on the bond markets for an enormously expanded use of vaccines across the developing world … The pact marks the first time rich nations have used pledges of increased aid to back government bonds as a means of financing a major development program. This so-called international finance facility is the brainchild of Gordon Brown, Britain's chancellor of the exchequer." The World Health Organization estimates the money will "save the lives of five million children over the next decade." Administration officials explained earlier this year that they would not join the effort because "the long-term commitment to raise money through the bond market is not consistent with the annual appropriations process in Congress."

China Unexpectedly Rehabilitates Reformer Whose Death Triggered Demonstrations. The Washington Post (9/9, A1, Pan) reports, "Chinese President Hu Jintao has agreed to restore the standing of the reform-minded Communist leader whose death triggered the 1989 Tiananmen Square demonstrations, a surprising reversal of party dogma that could prompt new calls for democratic change in China." While there are "no plans to change the party's position that the 1989 Tiananmen Square protests were subversive, or to admit it was wrong to use troops to crush them," the "decision to rehabilitate Hu Yaobang…suggested such reversals might be possible in the future." It was "unclear why the Chinese president…decided to rehabilitate Hu Yaobang." The move "was out of character for the president, who has developed a reputation over a long career in the party as an extremely cautious bureaucrat unwilling to take risks" and "surprised many party officials."

Columnist Says Administration Deference To Chavez Due To "Sheer Ignorance." Anastasia O'Grady, in her column in the Wall Street Journal (9/9) argues, "The overly deferential Washington mindset toward Venezuela's Hugo Chávez, based on the myth that we need his oil," is a "display of sheer ignorance in the area of energy -- mixing dangerously with personal ambition, of course -- that threatens a policy mess." When the State Department endorsed "the results of the fraudulent recall referendum," it fed "the egomania of South America's newest would-be dictator." In reality, "Chávez has very little influence over how much the U.S. pays for oil, unless of course he wants to take Venezuela out of its role as a producer. That's unlikely, since he's now spending like a drunken sailor on arms and politics and relies on oil income to hold onto power." As long as Venezuela is selling oil to the world at large, economic theory shows it "cannot punish one buyer over another."

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

DOJ_NMG_0003760

PRESIDENT BUSH — Speaks at the swearing in ceremony for Karen Hughes as Undersecretary of State for Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs, State Department; remarks at the 9/11 Heroes Medal of Valor Award Ceremony, White House.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: PRESIDENT JALAL TALABANI OF IRAQ _ Highlights: 11 a.m. Holds news conference. Room 1528-A, VOA, 330 Independence Ave. SW. Event contact: Joe O'Connell, 202-401-7000. 1:15 p.m. Attends honor cordon at the Pentagon, hosted by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Pentagon steps, Pentagon River Entrance. Media must arrive no later than 12:45 p.m. at North Parking Entrance for escort.

BIOETHICS _ Meeting of the President's Council on Bioethics at which, among other things, it will continue its discussion of ethical issues relating to the treatment of the aged and the long-term care of patients with dementia. Location: Wyndham City Center, 1143 New Hampshire Ave. NW.

KATRINA-BLACK CAUCUS _ Rep. Melvin Watt, D-N.C., Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., and other members of the Congressional Black Caucus visit Baton Rouge, La. and Houston to visit hurricane evacuees. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Visit hurricane survivors, The River Center, 175 S. River Rd. East Baton Rouge, La. 1 p.m. Visit hurricane suvivors, George Brown Convention Center, Houston, Texas.

UN REFORM _ 8:30 a.m. - 12 p.m. Bridging Nations, CSIS, the Mansfield Foundation, and the Asia Society Washington Center, host a breakfast discussion on ``Prioritizing U.N. Reform" in advance of the September 2005 UN summit in New York to review progress since the Millennium Declaration adopted by all member states in 2000. Participants include John Hamre, CEO, CSIS; Shirin Tahir-Kheli, advisor to the Secretary of State on UN Reform; Shashi Tharoor (via video), Under-Secretary-General for Communications at the UN; and John Zogby, CEO, Zogby International. Location: CSIS, Conference Room B-1, 1800 K St. NW.

COUNTER DEMONSTRATION _ 9 a.m. A coalition of conservative groups hold a news a news conference to announce a series of counter demonstrations to the anti-war protests scheduled around the World Bank-IMF meetings. Location: National Press Club.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION _ 9:30 a.m. The American Enterprise Institute (AEI) hosts three former secretaries of education and a former presidential education advisor to examine lessons learned about the crafting of federal education policy from the department's first quarter century, with William Bennett, Claremont Institute; Sen. Lamar Alexander, R-Tenn.; Rod Paige, Woodrow Wilson Center; Andrew Rotherham, Education Sector; and moderator Frederick Hess, AEI. Location: AEI, Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th Floor, 1150 17th St. NW.

HUGHES _ 10 a.m. Swearing in ceremony for Karen Hughes as Undersecretary of State for Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs. Location: Franklin Room, State Department.

TERRORISM-UNIVERSITIES _ 10 a.m. The University of Maryland, College Park, hosts a panel discussion on ``Strategic Visioning Four Years After 9/11: The University's Role in Informing Counter-Terrorism Policy and Practice. Panelists include: Melvin Bernstein, Department of Homeland Security director of university programs; Jacques Gansler, University of Maryland vice president for research and former U.S. under secretary of defense; Arie Kruglanski, University of Maryland psychologist and expert on the psychology of terrorism; Gary LaFree, University of Maryland criminologist and director of the National Consortium for the Study of Terrorism and Responses to Terrorism. The event is part of the official launch of a consortium of 25 institutions around the world focusing on research that can assist the war on terror. Highlights: 10:30 a.m. - 11 a.m. DHS Under Secretary Charles McQueary gives remarks. Location: Univerity of Maryland, College Park, Stamp Student Union, Colony Ball Room.

KATRINA-HEALING COMMUNITIES _ 10:15 a.m. Senators Edward Kennedy and Debbie Stabenow, Rep. Donna Christensen and others hold a news conference with NAACP President Bruce Gordon and members of the faith community to discuss long-term support for the communities destroyed by Hurricane Katrina. The news conference follows a closed meeting among the participants. Location: Capitol, LBJ Room, S-211.

WOLF-AFGHANISTAN _ 10:30 a.m. Rep. Frank Wolf holds a press conference to report on his most recent trip to Iraq and Afghanistan. Location: House Radio and TV Gallery.

CENSUS-UNINSURED _ 12 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute holds a panel discussion to discuss the Census Bureau's recent annual estimate of the uninsured, comparing it to other HHS estimates showing different results. Keynote address by Sen. Robert Bennett, with presentations by Linda Bilheimer and Robin Cohen of the National Center for Health Statistics, Steve Cohen of the Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality, others. Location: 12th floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

KATRINA-PROTEST _ 12 p.m. Black Voices for Peace and the National Black Environmental Justice Network hold a demonstration to demand accountability for the Hurricane Katrina response and to protest the treatment of victims. Location: Lafayette Park.

THE TROUBLE WITH MEDICAID _ 12 p.m. The Cato Institute hosts a Capitol Hill briefing on ``The Trouble with

DOJ_NMG_0003761

Medicaid." Speakers are Stephen Moses, president, Center for Long-Term Care Reform; Jagadeesh Gokhale, senior fellow, Cato Institute; and Michael Cannon, director of health policy studies, Cato Institute. Location: Room B-354, Rayburn House Office Building.

BIBLE CURRICULUM _ 1 p.m. Actor Chuck Norris, his wife Gena, Alveda king of King for America, others, hold a news conference to speak about the inclusion of an elective Bible course in schools nationwide. Location: National Press Club.

PELOSI-HOUSTON _ 1 p.m. House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and other members of Congress visit hurricane evacuees in Houston. Press availability to follow at 2 p.m. Location: George R. Brown Convention Center, 1001 Avenida de las Americas, Houston. Hall C Entrance.

KATRINA _ 3 p.m. Georgetown University Law Center holds a panel discussion on whether human decisions made the impact of Hurricane Katrina worse. Participants include Vicki Arroyo, Pew Center on Global Climate Change; Mark Davis, Coalition to Restore Coastal Louisiana; others. Robert R.M. Verchick, Loyola University, New Orleans. Location: room 200, at the law school, 600 New Jersey Ave. NW.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Bush Pledges Aid For 'Long Haul.'"
"Putting It All On The Line."
"Among The Ruins, Something To Build On."
"Lives And History Adrift On A Soggy Paper Trail."
"Many L.A. County Jail Inmates Still Held Too Long."
"Crews Roust Holdouts, Brace For The Body Count."

USA Today:
"9/11 Recruits: They Enlisted When USA Was Under Fire."
"Police Hold Off Use Of Force."
"Katrina Aid Package Could Push Deficit To New High."

New York Times:
"Cost Of Recovery Surges, As Do Bids To Join In Effort."
"Political Issues Snarled Plans For Troop Aid."
"Storm Leaves Legal System A Shambles."
"Holdouts On Dry Ground Say, 'Why Leave Now?'"
"9/11 Firefighters Told Of Isolation Amid Disaster."
"A Bleak Symbol Of Apartheid, Soweto Sees Signs Of Prosperity."

Washington Post:
"Congress Approves $51.8 Billion For Victims."
"Troops Escalate Urgency Of Evacuation."
"Leaders Lacking Disaster Experience."
"Tight Constraints On Pentagon's Freedom Walk."
"For U.S. Platoon In Iraq, Merciless Missions."
"China Plans To Honor A Reformer."

Washington Times:
"Congress OKs $51.8 Billion."
"Berger Fined For Taking Papers."
"Unwed Women Set Record For Births In 2003."
"Cropp Signs Proliferate In D.C."

Detroit Free Press:
"Michigan Squads Lay Down Law In The South."
"Grief Persists For Vets' Families."
"Veteran Journalist Joins Out Team Of Editors."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Thousands Seek Public Assistance."
"Inhaled Insulin Closer To Reality."
"Agencies Ease Rules For Evacuees With No ID."
"Thunderbolts Fly As Preachers Vie."

Dallas Morning News:
"Stragglers Surrender."
"Bush's Advisers Debated Seizing Louisiana Effort."
"N. Texas Absorbing Part Of Wiped-Out Economy."
"A Legal Quagmire Without Precedent."
"Business Group Charged With Illegal Funding."

Houston Chronicle:
"A Crush For Debit Cards."
"Relatives Cling To Hope, Anxiously Await Word."
"BP Kept Unit Running Despite Memo On Eroded Pipes."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Hurricane Relief Costs; New Orleans Evacuation; Hurricane Recovery Costs; Hurricane Ophelia; FEMA-Hurricane Response; Hurricane Zone-Reunited Families; Hurricane Zone-Animals.
CBS: New Orleans-Health Threat; Bush-Hurricane Response; Death Toll; Hurricane-Gulf Economy; Hurricane Ophelia; Iraq KIA Honored; Storm Babies; Hurricane Zone-Animals; FDA-Inhaled Insulin; FEMA-Hurricane Exercise; Mismanaged 9/11 Funds; Hurricane Relief Efforts.
NBC: New Orleans Evacuation; Bush-Hurricane Response; Medical Strike Teams; Baton Rouge-Overcrowding; Emergency Response Delays; FEMA-Complicated Website; Hurricane Zone-Animals; Stock Market; Galveston Hurricane Anniversary; Hurricane-Young Evacuees.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Congress-Hurricane Relief; Hurricane-FEMA Debit Cards; New Orleans Evacuations; Hurricane Preparations; Hurricane Ophelia.
CBS: Congress-Hurricane Relief; Hurricane-Red Cross Debit Cards; Hurricane-International Aid; Brown-Biography Questions; Hurricane Ophelia; CA-Illegal Immigrant Driver's

DOJ_NMG_0003762

Licenses; Hatch-Tax Evasion Allegations; ABC Television-Spanish Translations; Wall Street.
NPR: Congress-Hurricane Relief; Hurricane-Cheney Visit; New Orleans Evacuations; Hurricane-International Aid; FBI-Hurricane Charity Scams; Wall Street; Iraq-Saddam Confession; DeLay PAC Indictment.

Copyright 2005 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent: Friday, September 09, 2005 8:22 AM
To: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject: Department of Justice News Clips 9/9/05
Attachments: dojclips050909.pdf; dojclips050909.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 2005 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

N.Va. Man Indicted In Plot Against Bush (WP)....4
Court Questions Guantanamo Detainee Issues (AP)....5
Guantanamo Bay Prisoners Seek US Court Hearings (REU)...6
Witness Testifies Under Grant Of Immunity (TAMPTRIB)....7
Muslim Anti-terrorism Ads To Coincide With 9/11 Anniversary (AP)....7
US 'terror Camp' Suspect Remanded (BBC)....8

Patriot Act:

Patriot Act Resolution Rejected (GRPRESS)....8

Homeland Response:

Fallen EMT Volunteer On Sept. 11 Gets Rescuer Status (AP).9
Fallen Heroes To Get 9/11 Medals (NSL)....9
AP: 9/11 Loans Wind Up Far From Manhattan (FINDLAW/AP)....10
Key Official In Clandestine Service Of CIA To Retire (WP)....12
Tight Constraints On Pentagon's Freedom Walk (WP)....12
After Four Years, First Signs Of Renewal At Ground Zero (CSM)....14

War News:

Powell Calls His U.N. Speech A Lasting Blot On His Record (NYT)....15
U.S.-Iraqi Sweep Arrests 200 In Rebel Staging Area (NYT/AP)....16
U.S. Forces Chase Ghost Fighters Amid Iraqis (WP)....17
For A U.S. Platoon In Iraq, Merciless Missions (WP)....18
The State Of Iraq: An Update (NYT)....22
New Orleans And Baghdad (NYT)....22
Saddam Aide Hired Camelot Attorney To Bribe U.N. Staff (NYSUN)....23
Oil For Food As Usual (WSJ)....24
The View From The 38th Floor (WSJ)....26
Taliban Kill 6 Afghan Police In Attack On Army Arms Depot (NYT)....26
"War On Terror" Saves Few Lives: Expert (REU-Y2)....27
Our Enemy's Face (WP)....28
'They Are All So Wrong' (WSJ)....29
9/11 Recruits: They Enlisted When USA Was Under Fire (USAT)....31
N.Y. Judge Who Abandoned His Post For Iraq Is Removed (LAW)....33
Panel Says N.Y. Judge Should Be Removed (FINDLAW/AP) .34

Corporate Scandals:

Skilling, Lay Allege Case Misconduct (AP)....34
Local Lawyer Charged In Currency Trading Scheme (PALMBEACHP)....35

Criminal Law:

Boeing Could Avoid Prosecution, Pay Up To $500 Million To U.S. (WSJ)....36
CIA Leak Probe May Be Nearing End Game: Lawyers (BOS/REU)....38
Judge Orders Berger To Pay $50,000 Fine (WSJ/AP)....39
Berger Is Fined For Smuggling Classified Papers (WP)....39
Ex-Clinton Official Draws Higher-Than-Expected Fine (NYT)40
Federal Agents Armed With Warrant Raid Melrose Park Police Station (AP)....41
Federal Agents Raid Melrose Park Police Station (WLS-TV).41
Melrose Park Police Department Shut Down For Federal Raid (WMAQ-TV)....42
FBI Searches Suburban Police Department (CBS2CHI)....42
'Safe Road' Figure Sentenced In Bid-rigging Probe (CHIT)...43
Lobbyist's Former Aide Gets Probation, Sorry She Got Into Politics (BVND)....44
Daley Names Inspector General (CHIST/AP)....44
Daley Names New City Hall Watchdog (CHIT)....45
Mirarchi Dodges Jail (PHI)....46
Lawyer Who Cooperated Is Sentenced In Ticket Fixing (PHI)47
FBI Removes Items From Councilman's Home (KARE-TV)..47

City Councilman's House Raided (WCCO-TV) 48
A Top HAWS Official Pleads Not Guilty (WSJ) 48
Bribe-case Builder Has 2d Arrest (PHI) 49
Former Kodak Executive Charged In Bribery Probe (NSDY) 49
Lt. Gov. Now Says He Never Talked To Cooper About Loan (AP) 50
PAC Linked To DeLay Indicted In Funding Probe (LAT) 51
DeLay PAC Is Indicted For Illegal Donations (WP) 51
Political Committee Formed By DeLay Is Indicted (NYT/AP) 52
Texas Groups Linked To DeLay Indicted In Scandal (REU-Y2) 53
Missouri Senators Want To Close Loophole For Sexual Predators (AP) 54
City To Request A Federal Audit (PSDS) 54
Orange County Deputy Sheriff Arrested (ORS) 56
Red Lake Seeks Items Seized By FBI (MINNST) 57
FBI Pressed To Share Red Lake Evidence (STPPP) 58
Man Gets Prison Over Child Porn (TUSCCIT) 58
Rural Vs. City Ways At Issue In A Wisconsin Murder Trial (NYT) 59

Civil Law:

Bush Loses Appeal On Base Closings (NYT/AP) 60
White House Gets Base-Closing Recommendations (WP/AP) 61
Caremark Pays $137.5M To Settle Case (AP) 61
U.S. Senate Panel OKs Asbestos Subpoena Power (REU-Y2) 62
U.S. Prosecutors Allege Safety Violations By American Airlines (FINDLAW/AP) 63
Will The Supreme Court Unleash Civil RICO? (LAW) 63
Attorneys Brace For Impact Of New Bankruptcy Code (LAW) 65
Pope Wants Head-of-State Immunity From Texas Suit (LAW) 67

Civil Rights:

Justice Dept. Settles Charges Against DCFD (WUSA-TV) 70
Jurors Acquit U.S. Border Officer In Civil Rights Case Filed By Tourist (AP) 70
NAACP Calls For Action In Police Shooting Of Teen (WEWS-TV) 71
FBI Ends Beta Bridge Probe (CHARDP) 72
Smuggler To Serve 3 Years In Prison (SDUT) 72
Anti-Gay-Marriage Initiative Passes Hurdle (FINDLAW/AP) 73

Antitrust:

Justice Department Files Antitrust Lawsuit (AP) 73
U.S. Sues Realtors, Claims Web Rules Limit Discounting (WSJ) 74
DOJ Wants Real Estate Market Fairness (REU) 74
Antitrust Lawyers Go After Realtors (WP) 75
US Files Antitrust Suit Against Biggest Real Estate Group (AFP) 76
Justice Department Sues Chicago-Based National Association Of Realtors (CHIT) 76
National Realtors Group Sued By U.S. Over Web Policy (Update2) (BLOOM) 77
Justice Dept. Sues NAR For Antitrust (INMAN) 77
U.S. Fights Limit On Home Sale Listings (BSUN) 79
DOJ Sues Real Estate Group For Web Listing Policy (IDG) 80
Taubmans Give Up Control Of Sotheby's (WSJ) 81
Taubman Family Sells Its Interest In Sotheby's (NYT) 81
Archaeologists And Dealers Spar Over U.S.-Italian Art Accord (NYT) 82
Private Investors To Buy Hertz For $15 Billion (NYT) 83
European Corporations Catch Merger Mania (WSJ) 84
EU, Spanish Antitrust Watchdogs Become Pawns In Takeover Battle (WSJ) 85
Dell To Protect E-mail, Data For AMD V. Intel (REU) 86

Environment:

Some In Senate Seek To Change Mercury Rule (NYT) 87
3rd Circuit Rejects Substantial Continuity Test (LAW) 88
A Light In The Forests (NYT) 89

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Pelican Bay State Prison Gang Leaders Get Life Sentences (AP) 90
Gang Leaders In Federal Hands (MHCA) 91
Gang Members Arrested In Major Crackdown (MH) 92
Gang Crackdown Nets 650 Suspects (LAT) 93
Massive International Sting Nets 660 (CNN) 93
FBI Makes Arrests Against Violent Gang Members (KNBC-TV) 94
FBI Arrests Suspected MS-13 Gang Members (OREG) 95
FBI Arrests Suspected MS-13 Gang Members (AP) 95
Four Gwinnett Men Arrested In Gang Sting (GWINNDP) 95
Police Investigate Crime Spree (WMTV-TV) 96
Baggage Handlers Jailed In Smuggling Probe (MH) 96
Drug Cash Smuggling Booming On U.S.-Mexico Border (REU) 98
Drug Crackdown Nets 44 Arrests (SFC) 99
Dozens Arrested In Drug Sting (SFE) 99
Survey Shows 9% Decline In Teen Drug Use (USAT/AP) 100
S.A. Couple Plead Guilty To Playing Role In Drug Ring (SAEN) 100

DOJ_NMG_0003766

Immigration:

Local Police Can Enforce Laws On Immigration (DANNT) .101
Immigrant License Bill Is Sent To Governor (LAT) 102
Where's The Governator Now? (NYT) 104
Squatter At Minn. School Ordered Deported (FINDLAW/AP)105

Tax:

'Survivor' Winner Hatch Indicted For Tax Evasion (REU).....105
'Survivor' Winner Indicted On Tax Charges (AP).....106

Congress-Administration:

Partisan Rancor Accompanies Passage Of Disaster Aid Bill (WP) 106
Bush Signs $51.8 Bln Storm Relief Bill (REU).....107
Congress Approves $51.8 Billion For Victims (WP).....108
Bush Pledges Aid For 'Long Haul' (LAT) 110
Bush's Leadership Skills Questioned, Polls Show (FT).....112
Bush Suffers In Polls Post-Katrina (REU) 113
Americans Give Bush Poor Marks On Handling Katrina, Polls Show (BLOOM).....114
Partisan Bickering Over Katrina Escalates - To Peril Of Both Sides (CSM).....115
Congress Clears $51.8 Billion Relief Bill (BSUN/AP).....116
Congress Approves Katrina Package Of $51.8 Billion (WSJ)118
A Compassionate Bush Was Absent Right After Katrina (USAT).....118
Katrina Underscores Bush's Isolated Style (KRT) 119
Bush Batting Average Calls For New Coaches (USAT) 121
The Party Of Performance (WP) 121
Inescapable Accountability (WP) 122
Point Those Fingers (NYT).....123
Hughes Is Varnishing The Nation's Tarnish (WP).....124
Senators Press Bush On Hurricane Relief Czar (REU).....126
Democratic Leaders Reject G.O.P. Storm Inquiry Plan (NYT)127
Democrats Spurn Republican-backed Katrina Probe (REU)127
Katrina Aid Package Could Push Deficit To New High (USAT).....128
Cost Of Recovery Surges, As Do Bids To Join In Effort (NYT)129
Lobbyists Seek Leverage From Storm (WSJ).....130
Louisiana Lawmakers Aim To Cope With Political Fallout (WSJ) 132
Bankrupting The Victims (LAT).....133
Opinionline: Katrina Exposes America's Fragility (USAT) 134
How Reliable Is Brown's Resume? (TIME) 135
Democrats' Anti-Bush Petition Also Seeks Political Contributions (NYNSDY/AP).....136
Advance Men In Charge (NYT) 136
Leaders Lacking Disaster Experience (WP).....137
Critics Maintain Drumbeat Of FEMA Criticism (LAT) 139
Congress Approves New Storm Aid, And Bush Pledges To Expedite It (NYT).....140
Four Years After Sept. 11, Lessons From Another Blow (USAT).....141
Where To Point The Fingers (WP) 142
Confusion On Debit Card Aid (NYT).....143
George R. Brown Evacuees To Get Red Cross Cards Tonight (HC).....144
Cheney, Gonzales Tour Stricken Gulf Coast (AP) 146
Cheney Tours Katrina Devastation, Backs Chertoff (REU) ...147
Relieft Effort 'very Impressive,' Cheney Says (AP) 148
First Lady Gives Award, Talks About Katrina's Impact (DMR)148
First Lady Comforts Storm Refugees In DeSoto County (BSH) 149
First Lady Visits Southaven, Cheers Evacuees (CA).....149
Wife Says Criticism Of Bush 'Disgusting' (MACT).....151
Political Issues Snarled Plans For Troop Aid (NYT) 151
State Rebuffed Security Overture (WSJ) 153
City Had Evacuation Plan But Strayed From Strategy (HC)...154
Cut Off At Center Of Crisis, City Officials Faced Struggle To Keep In Touch (WSJ) 156
La. Lawmaker Rebukes Federal Disaster Response (USAT)159
Senator Bears Witness And Bares Emotions (WP) 160
Troops Escalate Urgency Of Evacuation (WP) 161
Police Hold Off Use Of Force (USAT).....163
Katrina Holdouts Yield To Power Of Persuasion (KRT) 163
Some Holdouts Leave, Others Stay As Authorities Urge Evacuation (WSJ) 165
Police Begin Seizing Guns Of Civilians (NYT) 166
Holes In New Orleans Flood Walls Slowly Being Patched (USAT).....168
Some Areas Inch Toward Normality (USAT) 168
A City That Made An Art Of Funerals Now Just Makes Do (WSJ).....170
Standing In The Way Of A Good Story (WP).....171
Some Urge Greater Use Of Troops In Major Disasters (WP)173
Who Should Call The Cavalry If Katrina Calls? (WSJ) 174
A Native Son Takes Charge In Gulf Coast (CSM).....175
Storm Leaves Legal System A Shambles (NYT).....176
Louisiana Legal System Is Snarled (WSJ).....178
Katrina Leaves Louisiana Criminal Justice System In Disarray (KRT) 179
Amid Barrage Of Criticism, Defending His Department (NYT)180
Hundreds Of Police Officers Missing In New Orleans (LAT)181

DOJ_NMG_0003767

US Watching Katrina-related Fraud (AFP) 185
Katrina Victims At Risk For ID Theft, Experts Say (REU) 185
U.S. Names 5 Firms To Build Housing (WSJ) 186
Bush Suspends Pay Act In Areas Hit By Storm (WP) 187
A Surgeon Caught Up In The Flooding Tells Of A Week Of Chaos, Peril And Heroism (NYT) 187
HUD, VA Offer Homes For Some Katrina Victims (USAT) 189
Airlift Of Evacuees To Northeast Is Under Way (NYT) 190
Shelters Grow Empty As Apartments Open Up (NYT) 191
Town Improvises To Absorb Evacuees (WP) 192
Learning From Katrina (WP) 193
Insurers Are Urged To Pay Valid Claims (WP) 194
NATO To Help U.S. Transport Aid From Abroad (LAT) 195
MoveOn.org Says It Won't Use Evacuee Images In Roberts Ad (USAT) 195
What A Hispanic Justice Would Mean (USAT) 196
Hill Veterans Light The Way For Nominee (WP) 197

Other News:

Gauging Katrina's Impact (WSJ) 198
Weekly Jobless Claims Drop, But Katrina May Spur Revision (WSJ/DJN) 200
Trying To Absorb The Newly Unemployed (WP) 201
Gas Prices Have Eased, But Other Prices Rising (USAT) 203
Stocks Take A Breather (WSJ) 203
Gulf Banks May Come Out On Top (WSJ) 204
Four Easy Pieces (WSJ) 206
Crude Oil Supplies Overwhelm Refineries (FT) 206
'A Significantly Slower Recovery' (USAT) 207
Gas Inventories At A 5-Year Low (NYT) 208
Where Do Gas Prices Go Next? (CSM) 209
After Buying Surge, Demand For Gasoline Eases (LAT) 210
U.S. Gasoline Use Fell 4% Last Week (WSJ) 211
Governor Criticizes Bush, Oil Industry Over Record Gas Prices (BJ) 212
Gasoline Thefts Increasing As Fuel Prices Keep Rising (NYT) 213
US Changes Position On Cuba's Weapons (CSM) 214
China Says North Korea Nuclear Talks Will Resume Tuesday (NYT) 215
North Korea Stands Fast On Nuclear Energy Use (WP) 216
Yushchenko Sacks Ukraine Government (FT) 217
Ukraine's President Fires Prime Minister (LAT) 221
Ukraine Leader Fires Cabinet As Reform Coalition Splits (NYT) 219
Ukraine's President Fires Cabinet (WP) 221
Peeling Away The Revolution (WSJ) 222
Ukraine's Orange Flame, Dimmed (NYT) 223
Controversy Swirls Over Egypt Vote (WP) 224
Egypt's Unfree Vote (WP) 225
Koizumi Backers Look Poised To Win In Elections (USAT) . 226
Billions For Vaccines For The Poor To Be Raised In Bond Markets (NYT) 227
China Plans To Honor A Reformer (WP) 228
Chávez's 'Oil Weapon' Is A Popgun (WSJ) 229

TERRORISM NEWS:

N.Va. Man Indicted In Plot Against Bush (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

An American student was charged yesterday in an al Qaeda plot to kill President Bush, with prosecutors alleging that Ahmed Omar Abu Ali and his confederates planned to use multiple snipers to shoot Bush or to blow him up in a suicide bombing.

The expanded indictment of Abu Ali, returned by a federal grand jury in Alexandria, also claimed for the first time that he proposed a plan to bring members of an al Qaeda cell into the United States through Mexico. They would then link up with Abu Ali to conduct terrorist operations in this country, the indictment said.

Abu Ali, 24, of Falls Church was first charged in February with terrorism counts that included trying to establish an al Qaeda cell in the United States. That indictment referred to the plot to kill Bush, but Abu Ali was not charged with conspiring to assassinate the president until yesterday. The case is among the highest-profile terrorism prosecutions in the United States since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0003768

The new nine-count indictment also adds charges of conspiracy to commit aircraft piracy and destroy aircraft, part of the Justice Department's allegations that Abu Ali was plotting with al Qaeda to conduct a Sept. 11-style attack in the United States that would include hijacking planes.

If convicted on the assassination count alone, Abu Ali faces up to life in prison. Earlier, his maximum penalty on all counts had been 80 years in prison.

An attorney for Abu Ali, who has pleaded not guilty, did not return telephone calls late yesterday, and a White House spokesman referred calls to the Justice Department. Prosecutors would not comment beyond the indictment.

Abu Ali was arrested by security officials in June 2003 while studying at a university in Saudi Arabia. His family mounted a highly public campaign in the United States for his release. He was held until he was flown back to the United States in February to face charges.

Defense attorneys and Abu Ali's family have contended that any statements he made in Saudi custody were obtained through torture. Two doctors who examined Abu Ali found evidence that he was tortured in Saudi Arabia, including scars on his back consistent with having been whipped, defense lawyers have said in court papers.

Prosecutors have denied that Abu Ali was tortured. But if a federal judge concludes that he was, much of the evidence against him could be thrown out because it was obtained under duress. The torture allegations are expected to play a key role in a hearing scheduled to start Sept. 19.

Law enforcement sources have said the plot against Bush, allegedly hatched while Abu Ali was studying in Saudi Arabia and after he joined an al Qaeda cell there, never advanced beyond the talking stage. The new indictment says two options were considered: multiple snipers shooting the president or a suicide operation.

The earlier indictment said nothing about snipers, only that Abu Ali would get close enough to Bush to "shoot him on the street" or would detonate a car bomb.

Several other allegations emerged yesterday about Abu Ali's alleged relationship with Osama bin Laden's organization. The indictment says he performed guard duty in 2003 for an al Qaeda cell at one of its locations in the Medina area of Saudi Arabia. It also says that in response to a request from an al Qaeda co-conspirator, Abu Ali translated from English into Arabic the audio portions of a video concerning operations by U.S. military aircraft in Afghanistan.

Abu Ali's case has generated strong interest among Muslims in Northern Virginia. The government says he confessed to the assassination plot while being detained in Saudi Arabia and admitted discussing with al Qaeda his plans to conduct attacks in the United States that included crashing hijacked planes into buildings.

Abu Ali will be arraigned on the charges in the new indictment on Wednesday.

Court Questions Guantanamo Detainee Issues (AP)

By PETE YOST, The Associated Press

AP, September 8, 2005

Sep. 8, 2005 - A federal appeals court Thursday questioned the Bush administration's handling of detainees at Guantanamo Bay, suggesting the judiciary might have authority to delve into the conduct of military tribunals which have categorized almost all of the inmates as enemy combatants.

The two hours of arguments were in sharp contrast to those of several years ago when the appeals court suggested detainees at the Guantanamo Naval base were not entitled to have access to the U.S. courts, and then ruled against them. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed that decision a year ago.

On Thursday, a panel of three appeals court judges two appointed by Republican presidents and one by a Democratic president aggressively questioned Justice Department attorney Gregory Katsas about the possibility of court scrutiny over the detainee review process.

"There is nothing in the habeas statute that requires us to defer to a military tribunal," A. Raymond Randolph, an appointee of President Bush's father, told Katsas. The other judges on the panel are David Sentelle, an appointee of President Reagan, and Judith Rogers, an appointee of President Clinton.

DOJ_NMG_0003769

The detainees are not allowed to have legal representation before the tribunals and cannot see classified information being used to classify them as enemy combatants.

Lower court judges are divided on the detainee procedures at Guantanamo Bay. U.S. District Judge Joyce Hens Green ruled that the tribunal hearings are unconstitutional. U.S. District Judge Richard Leon threw out a lawsuit by some of the detainees, saying the place for them to challenge the procedures is before the U.S. military, not in civilian courts.

Katsas said the detainees are granted many rights by the tribunals, which ruled that all but 38 of 596 detainees were enemy combatants and were not entitled to prisoner-of-war protections under the Geneva Conventions.

The government is trying to beat back challenges on behalf of dozens of the Guantanamo Bay detainees who say they are not being afforded a legally proper opportunity to challenge their status as enemy combatants.

In the nearly three years since the U.S. military started transporting detainees to the Navy prison camp in Cuba, the words Guantanamo Bay have become synonymous with the Bush administration's tactics in the war on terror: indefinite detention and no legal rights.

Evidence of detainee abuse at Guantanamo Bay has put the administration on the defensive and the government is trying to deal with the problem by downsizing the prison camp, returning many of the detainees to their home countries.

In the meantime, the government has dug in for a protracted legal battle, defending the course it set in late 2001 with Bush's declaration that all suspected terrorists are enemy combatants rather than prisoners of war entitled to protections under international treaty.

The Pentagon says it is holding 505 prisoners at the Guantanamo Bay prison compound. Many were captured in Afghanistan in the months following the U.S. invasion in October 2001, and some have been there since the detention compound was opened in January 2002.

Guantanamo Bay Prisoners Seek US Court Hearings (REU)

By James Vicini

Reuters, September 8, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Guantanamo Bay prisoners should be given the chance to prove in court that they have been mistakenly labelled as "enemy combatants" and have been unlawfully detained, their attorney said on Thursday.

"Since day one, these people have been saying you've got the wrong guys. They want a fair hearing to show that," attorney Thomas Wilner told a U.S. appeals court during more than two hours of arguments.

But Justice Department lawyer Gregory Katsas repeated the Bush administration's position that the prisoners were not entitled to any constitutional due process rights, and he defended the military tribunals set up to review their cases.

More than 500 prisoners are now being held at the U.S. military base in Cuba after the U.S. government designated them as enemy combatants. Only four have been charged with a crime.

The suspected al Qaeda and Taliban members were captured after the U.S.-led Afghanistan war that followed the September 11, 2001, attacks. Many have been held since the Guantanamo prison camp opened in January 2002.

Under the military's review process, 38 prisoners, accounting for 7 percent of the detainees, were determined to not be enemy combatants despite their earlier designation.

The appeals court considered a pair of Guantanamo cases after two different U.S. District Court judges in Washington came to opposite conclusions in January.

One judge ruled the prisoners have the constitutional right not to be deprived of liberty without due process of law, and that the military tribunals were constitutionally flawed. The other judge said the prisoners have no constitutional rights.

Wilner argued that the prisoners do have fundamental rights under the U.S. Constitution, that they also can use the habeas law to challenge their detention and they have the right to review in court.

Under that law, the government must give a legal and factual basis for the detention, he said.

All three appellate judges sharply questioned the government's lawyer.

Judge David Sentelle questioned the government's position that the prisoners have no rights because the base was outside the United States. "What does Cuba really have left in terms of sovereignty over Guantanamo?" he asked.

DOJ_NMG_0003770

Judge A. Raymond Randolph repeatedly asked why the prisoners under the habeas law would not be entitled to some determination in court on whether they have been held under lawful authority.

Sentelle and Randolph both questioned whether the courts could defer to the judgments of the military tribunals.

Judge Judith Rogers questioned whether the military tribunals provided sufficient legal protections.

Lawyers for the prisoners have said the tribunals improperly denied detainees legal representation and provided no opportunity for them to rebut the allegations and evidence against them.

The three-judge panel is expected to rule sometime next year. Any decision most likely will be appealed to the full appeals court or to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Witness Testifies Under Grant Of Immunity (TAMPTRIB)

By ELAINE SILVESTRINI

Tampa Tribune, September 9, 2005

TAMPA - A witness in the trial of Sami al-Arian testified Thursday morning that Ramadan Shallah served briefly as the religious leader of a mosque in Chicago.

Mohammed Hasan, who testified under a grant of immunity, also placed Al-Arian codefendant Hatim Fariz at a 1991 rally in Chicago.

Now the secretary general of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad, Shallah worked at Al-Arian's think tank, World and Islam Studies Enterprise in the early 1990s and also was employed as an adjunct professor at the University of South Florida.

Fariz and fellow codefendant, Ghassan Zayed Ballut, were members of the Al Quassam mosque in Chicago, said Hassan, who lives in a Chicago suburb.

Hassan said Shallah, whom he knew as Ramadan Abdullah, served as imam of the mosque for four or five months in 1990 or 1991. He was replaced by Suleiman Odeh, brother of Abd Al Aziz Awda, the spiritual leader of the Islamic Jihad. Odeh was later replaced by Naim Nasser Bulbol.

Both Odeh and Bulbol are considered unindicted coconspirators in the case. Prosecutors have alleged in court papers that the mosque was a ``an entity we believe to be a component of the PIJ enterprise."

Muslim Anti-terrorism Ads To Coincide With 9/11 Anniversary (AP)

AP, September 8, 2005

TAMPA -- A Muslim civil liberties group plans to denounce terrorism in a paid television commercial airing in the Tampa market this weekend to coincide with the anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

The 30-second spot, produced by the nonprofit Council on American-Islamic Relations, features two American Muslims, a man and a woman, denouncing violence in the name of Islam and vowing to ``not to allow our faith to be hijacked by criminals."

The spot will run 105 times Thursday through Sunday on 13 cable channels in Tampa, including CNN, Fox Sports Net and the Weather Channel, according to CAIR's Florida office.

CAIR spokesman Ahmed Bedier said the spots were produced after the London bombings in July and distributed nationwide as public-service announcements, meaning stations could choose to air them or not. Research showed they were seen by as many as 5 million people.

Members of the Tampa chapter donated the money to get the ads on as paid commercials in prime time in the local market this weekend, at a cost of more than $10,000, Bedier said. He said he didn't know of any other CAIR chapters airing the ads as paid commercials.

``We're basically piloting it to consider doing it in other markets," Bedier said. ``We'll be following up and try to gauge the perception and see if there's positive feedback."

For Tampa Muslims, adding to image problems in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks is the ongoing federal trial of former college professor Sami Al-Arian, who is accused of supporting the Palestinian Islamic Jihad, an Islamic terrorist group that targeted Israelis.

Washington D.C.-based CAIR is America's largest Muslim civil liberties group with 31 offices and chapters in the United States and Canada.

DOJ_NMG_0003771

US 'terror Camp' Suspect Remanded (BBC)

BBC.com, September 9, 2005

Haroon Rashid Aswat was initially deported from Zambia to the UK A British man accused of trying to set up a terror training camp in the US has been ordered to remain in custody while an extradition case is prepared.

Suspected terrorist Haroon Rashid Aswat, 30, who denies the claim and opposes extradition, appeared by video link from Belmarsh Prison.

A lawyer for US authorities told Bow Street magistrates the extradition case would be complete within 10 days.

Aswat of Dewbury, West Yorks, is due to appear again on 6 October.

'Fight jihad'

US prosecutors allege that Aswat, who was deported from Zambia to Britain in August and arrested by UK authorities, conspired to provide material support for terrorism in the US in 1999-2000.

They said he and another man helped to set up a camp in Bly, Oregon, to train people to "fight jihad" in Afghanistan.

The camp was to provide weapons training and schooling for hand-to-hand combat and martial arts for militants, US prosecutors said.

They say he flew to New York on 26 November 1999 and then a bus to Bly, via Seattle.

Two-year term

US prosecutors say he was carrying CD-ROM information on how to make bombs and poisons and on military conduct.

A second claim was that he conspired with others so that any training would "arouse reasonable apprehension" that people were being prepared to "fight jihad" in Afghanistan.

James Ujaama, 38, a Muslim convert from Seattle who has lived in Britain, pleaded guilty to involvement in a plot in April 2003.

He faced up to 25 years in prison but received a two-year sentence after agreeing to co-operate in terrorism investigations until 2013.

Family's fears for terror suspect

PATRIOT ACT:

Patriot Act Resolution Rejected (GRPRESS)

By Shandra Martinez, The Grand Rapids Press

The Grand Rapids Press, September 8, 2005

HOLLAND -- The City Council on Tuesday rejected a resolution expressing concern with sections of the federal Patriot Act.

The resolution was proposed by the city's Human Relations Commission and on put on the agenda Wednesday by Councilman David Hoekstra.

The council rejected the resolution 5-2, with only the 6th Ward councilman Hoekstra and Councilman At-Large Jerome Kobes voting in favor. Mayor Al McGeehan and 2nd Ward Victor Orozco were absent.

Both Mayor Pro-Tem Craig Rich and 5th Ward Councilman Kurt Dykstra said they felt the Patriot Act doesn't fall under the council's jurisdiction.

"I'm one of those people who don't think its appropriate (for the City Council) to take a stand on a national issue. What's next? Are we going to be asked to vote on gay marriages next week or the war in Iraq the following week?" Rich said. "We are elected to represent our constituents on local issues...This is grandstanding if we do it. That's all it is."

While he didn't agree with the HRC's recommendation, 4th Ward Councilman Bob Vande Vusse said he appreciated the work of the HRC, which spent more than a year studying the issue.

"(But) it wouldn't be responsible on my part to give the impression that the entire city shares this position," said Vande Vusse, adding that as a librarian, he has some concerns about the federal legislation.

Hoekstra, council liaison on the HRC, said after a lot of study, he agreed with the resolution and felt the Patriot Act poses a threat to civil rights.

DOJ_NMG_0003772

"My fear is in our well-intentioned effort to be safe, we forget what makes us truly strong," Hoekstra said.

While the resolution drew comment from council members, no one in the audience addressed council on the subject. Hoekstra said he was pleased with the discussion council gave to the topic.

"We talked about it, wrestled with it. That's a victory," Hoekstra said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Fallen EMT Volunteer On Sept. 11 Gets Rescuer Status (AP)

By MICHAEL GORMLEY, The Associated Press

AP, September 8, 2005

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) — On Sept. 11, 2001, as Glenn Winuk's co-workers were ordered to run to safety from their lower Manhattan office building, he ran the other way a block toward ground zero. There he told New York City fire officials he was an emergency medical technician in his hometown volunteer fire department and wanted to help the victims.

Moments later, he died when the South Tower collapsed, the medical kit he was issued at his side.

On Thursday he was officially recognized by the state as a rescuer in the historic effort that saved thousands, rather than as a civilian casualty, a distinction his family has been seeking for nearly four years.

Advertisement

"They all ran for safety, but he ran toward the scene as he did in `93" for the first World Trade Center bombing, said Winuk's brother, Jay Winuk. "He ran toward danger because he knew he could save lives."

Gov. George Pataki called him a hero.

"His bravery, service, and dedication on that terrible day saved the lives of many, and must never be forgotten," Pataki said.

The recognition was delayed because Glenn Winuk was technically an associate member of the Jericho Volunteer Fire Department in Nassau County and was no longer an active firefighter or EMT in the department he served with for 19 years. His status changed when he moved to Manhattan and became a partner in his law firm, keeping him from being recognized by the federal government as an official rescue worker for memorials, historic records, and for a $278,658 Public Safety Officers benefit for his parents.

The federal government rejected the family's request citing, in part, the fact that Winuk hadn't even been officially recognized by the state as a rescue worker, said state Sen. Carl Marcellino, a Long Island Republican. But his bill, co-sponsored by Democratic Assemblyman Charles Lavine and recently signed by Pataki, changed that.

A federal decision is expected in 30 days.

A Justice Department spokesman didn't immediately respond to a request for comment.

"We're not talking about a fortune and money is not the point," said Jay Winuk of Mahopac, Putnam County. "It's only about doing the right thing."

He said the Justice Department first supported the request, but then denied it after he passed on the good news to his parents, Seymour and Elaine, in Jericho.

"It's been a painful road for my family to pursue," he said. But, "he's my little brother."

"He stood up when it was time to stand up," Marcellino said of Glenn Winuk. "I think we should stand up for him now."

Fallen Heroes To Get 9/11 Medals (NSL)

By RON MARSICO, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, September 8, 2005

After the terrorist planes hit the Twin Towers on 9/11, Edward Calderon, a civilian employee with the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, told a colleague by phone he was staying inside one of the buildings to help with evacuation operations.

"I'm a Marine and we don't leave anyone behind," snapped Calderon, a former member of the corps and a resident of Union.

DOJ_NMG_0003773

James Barbella, an agency property manager from Oceanside, N.Y., led would-be rescuers up the stairs desperately trying to find a way to save people trapped in the top-floor restaurant, Windows on the World.

Robert Lynch, another property manager from Cranford, ensured that a child-care facility and bookstore were clear before heading through the plaza to help with the evacuation of a tower.

Lynch, Barbella and Calderon were killed when the buildings collapsed. Tomorrow, they will be among 13 Port Authority civilian employees given a special 9/11 heroes' "Medal of Valor" posthumously by President Bush in Washington, D.C., along with the 37 Port Authority Police officers who also died that day.

"They were true first responders that day," said Alan Reiss, who on 9/11 was director of the Port Authority's World Trade Department and oversaw the 13 employees who served as civilian emergency responders. "They just didn't wear a uniform. They wore a suit."

Port Authority officials successfully lobbied to get the employees' families the medals because the 13 individuals provided critical electrical, structural, mechanical and operations information to police and fire officials during the evacuation that saved thousands. Officials said their role has been little known by members of the general public.

"There was a great deal of unforgettable tragedy on 9/11. One positive note, however, was that approximately 25,000 people were evacuated from the World Trade Center," the agency's chairman and executive director wrote in a June letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. "These fallen Port Authority civilians assisted all uniformed rescue workers in all aspects of the evacuation and collectively all groups significantly contributed to saving all those lives."

Port Authority officials also credited U.S. Rep. Joseph Crowley, a New York Democrat, for helping get the recognition for the 13 civilians.

Overall, a total of 2,749 people died at the World Trade Center on 9/11.

The role of the Port Authority Police, which lost 37 officers that day, has been well documented. Those to be similarly honored by Bush also include members of the New York City Police and Fire Department who perished that day. In total, 443 responders will be recognized on the White House lawn.

The other 10 civilian employees to be honored are Douglas Karpiloff of Mamaroneck, N.Y.; Eugene Raggio of Staten Island; Edward Strauss of Edison; Francis Riccardelli of Westwood; Carlos Da Costa of Elizabeth; Frank DeMartini of Brooklyn; David Ortiz of Nanuet, N.Y.; Joseph Amatuccio of Baldwin Harbor, N.Y.; Peter Negron of Elizabeth, and Ken Grouzalis of Lyndhurst.

They had received training for emergencies and participated in response drills. On 9/11, they helped staff the fire command center and direct rescuers to people trapped in elevators and various other parts of the buildings.

All 13 civilians were not obligated to go to the emergency posts because the building had been leased to developer Larry Silverstein the previous July, and the Port Authority had become the tenant. But the employees still felt duty-bound and stayed voluntarily.

"These people knew these buildings like the back of their hands," said Lillian Valenti, chief of the Port Authority's Office of Medical Services. "They were really the road map and the eyes and ears of people who didn't know the complex."

Ron Marsico covers the Port Authority. He may be reached at rmarsico@starledger.com or (973) 392-7860.

AP: 9/11 Loans Wind Up Far From Manhattan (FINDLAW/AP)

By Ben Dobbin, Ap Business Writer

Find Law, September 9, 2005

(AP) - CHURCHVILLE, N.Y.-Richard Parsons Jr., a veterinarian in a country suburb 280 miles from ground zero in Manhattan, felt the ripple effects of Sept. 11, 2001, about a year later. It almost put him out of business.

Called up for duty with the Army Reserves in fall 2002, Parsons spent 10 months in Afghanistan. He hired a substitute vet and barely kept his one-man practice near Rochester from going bankrupt by obtaining a low-interest, $72,800 loan from a federal program designed to help small businesses recover from 9/11.

DOJ_NMG_0003774

It upsets the 43-year-old father of two that all manner of companies in upstate New York not damaged in the slightest by the terror attacks - from chiropractors to auto-repair shops to fast-food franchises - could dip into the same $5 billion disaster-relief fund administered by the Small Business Association.

"It seems like when the government has a big pot of money, there's always charlatans that are going to try to, in some way, finagle out money," he said. "I guess when you're dealing with such massive amounts of money and numbers of applications, people are going to get away with things."

His words reverberated in cafes, on street corners and around the dinner table.

"It doesn't sound right to me, it doesn't sound fair," said security guard Doug Kleinhammer, 50, as he hopped on his motorcycle outside the World Wide News store in Rochester. "It's unnecessary spending of money. The people who needed it were those directly affected."

An Associated Press review of two Small Business Administration programs that doled out Sept. 11 recovery loans, found the government provided, approved or guaranteed nearly $4.9 billion in loans, and took credit for saving 20,000 jobs. That puts the average cost of saving a job at about a quarter million dollars each.

Of the 19,000 loans, fewer than 11 percent went to companies in New York City and Washington, an AP computer analysis showed. Officials conceded the SBA allocated few resources to oversee the congressionally-approved loan programs, leaving banks on an honor system to determine who should get terror recovery loans.

SBA documents obtained by AP show the banks had a strong incentive to approve as many loans as possible from the terror program - their cost was reduced in half.

The SBA said it first learned of the problems through AP's review and was weighing whether an investigation was needed.

Among the hardest-hit enterprises in places far removed from the devastation were travel agencies, tourist shops, food caterers, limousine fleets, hotels and bars. Americans weren't traveling far from home like they used to.

"The country as a whole was not in a jovial mood. We saw people drinking less, eating less and buying less tickets to special events," said Stephen Waite, whose three-story brew pub in downtown Albany saw a sudden 25 percent to 30 percent drop in revenues.

"It was like this kind of guilt feeling of, `There's no time for just foolhardily passing the time like we used to, we need to be serious and more into our family.'"

Waite, 51, a lawyer who recently sold The Big House Brewing Co., got a $1.1 million loan from the Small Business Administration's "supplemental terrorist activity recovery" program in 2002. Even though his nightlife venture took about 18 months to recover, he had no idea the fund was specifically intended to deal with the terrorist aftershocks.

"We just went through a banking group, that's a typical way to obtain loans," he said. "There was no discussion of the 9/11 situation. I wasn't even aware of that program.

"As long as people are filling out applications correctly, I guess I'm not as upset as I would be at the people approving them," he said. "I'm sure every governmental agency is going to get a ton of applications that don't fit within the program and their job responsibility is to reject."

Lorraine Serpe, 44, was on the brink of folding her Lorraine's Lunch Basket food-catering firm in Rochester when her $153,500 loan came through in June 2002.

"Business was just dead, it was just nothing," Serpe said. "We were catering to Xerox, Bausch & Lomb, Kodak and they just all stopped traveling. I was speaking to my accountant about the hard times I was in and, by a miracle of God, she said `Oh my God, I've heard of this disaster relief fund.' She says `Try it, try it!' I tried it. I explained my situation and they said I qualified."

Thre "affected the world," Serpe said. "It affected me, and I'm only in little Rochester."

In contrast, chiropractor Colby Shores said his business in Irondequoit, a Rochester suburb along Lake Ontario, was unaffected. While his patients "were devastated" by 9/11, "they weren't putting their health second to anything else," he said.

Nonetheless, Shores obtained a $87,000 loan with a 4 percent interest rate. He, too, said he was unaware of the type of program he was tapping into.

"I had nothing to do with the financing," he said. "I hired a contractor and they found the correct amount of funds I needed for my small business loan."

In Bath in western New York, Arvind "Andy" Patel, 50, said his $350,000 loan in fall 2002 to remodel his Dunkin' Donuts store was arranged through a bank approved by the fast-food chain's corporate office.

Patel, a native of Bombay, India, who bought another Dunkin' Donuts in Wilmington, Del., in 1998, moved into his Bath store on Sept. 6, 2001.

The catastrophe five days later had no impact on his business. "Not at all," he said.

On the Net:

An AP interactive with data on SBA loans in each state can be viewed at:

http://hosted.ap.org/dynamic/files/specials/interactives/-national/terror-lo ans/index.html

SBA: http://www.sba.gov

Key Official In Clandestine Service Of CIA To Retire (WP)

By Dana Priest And Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Robert Richer, the second-ranking official in the CIA's clandestine service, has announced his retirement, telling colleagues that he lacked confidence in the agency's leadership, according to current and former intelligence officials.

Richer, who was one of CIA Director Porter J. Goss's key personnel choices, made his announcement last Friday at a meeting of the Directorate of Operations leaders, according to some of the officials.

Some of them said Richer's decision revolved around an ongoing debate over how to improve human intelligence and the direction of the CIA. The agency's role and influence have waned with the appointment of John D. Negroponte as the overall director of national intelligence.

Other government officials disagreed with that assertion and said Richer's departure involved disputes over "operational issues" that they would not specify, and a clash of personalities between Richer, a former Marine, and Goss and his top aides.

Last year, Richer's predecessor and his boss resigned after clashing with Goss's aides. During Friday's meeting, Richer said he and his boss, the deputy director of operations -- who cannot be named because he remains undercover -- had been frustrated by Goss and his staff in their efforts to implement certain measures, sources said. Richer subsequently met with national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley to explain his decision.

A CIA spokesman declined to comment on the matter. Other intelligence sources would speak only anonymously because of agency rules and traditions against speaking to the media.

Yesterday, Goss sent an unusual worldwide message to all CIA employees praising Richer for his nearly 35 years of service. That only fueled the belief among some former intelligence officials that Richer's resignation reflects ongoing problems at the agency.

Richer has served for less than a year as the number two in the spy service, having been promoted from being chief of the Near East division.

The CIA has been under pressure to make changes after a presidential commission and the Sept. 11 commission found last year that human intelligence collection had failed regarding both the al Qaeda terrorist network and whether Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction.

The presidential commission recommended creation of a Human Intelligence Directorate within the CIA, which would rank above the agency's Directorate of Operations and coordinate foreign human-intelligence collection across the intelligence community, including the Pentagon and the FBI.

Some top administration officials favor a plan to make the clandestine service, as the Directorate of Operations is known, the central focus of the CIA, with all other functions -- such as analysis and technology -- subordinate to the human intelligence role.

Tight Constraints On Pentagon's Freedom Walk (WP)

By Petula Dvorak

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003776

Organizers of the Pentagon's 9/11 memorial Freedom Walk on Sunday are taking extraordinary measures to control participation in the march and concert, with the route fenced off and lined with police and the event closed to anyone who does not register online by 4:30 p.m. today.

The march, sponsored by the Department of Defense, will wend its way from the Pentagon to the Mall along a route that has not been specified but will be lined with four-foot-high snow fencing to keep it closed and "sterile," said Allison Barber, deputy assistant secretary of defense.

The U.S. Park Police will have its entire Washington force of several hundred on duty and along the route, on foot, horseback and motorcycles and monitoring from above by helicopter. Officers are prepared to arrest anyone who joins the march or concert without a credential and refuses to leave, said Park Police Chief Dwight E. Pettiford.

The event, the America Supports You Freedom Walk, is billed as a memorial to victims of the 2001 terrorist attacks and a show of support for those serving in the military, topped off with a concert by country singer Clint Black, known for his pro-troops anthem, "Iraq and Roll." Organizers said they expect 3,000 to 10,000 participants.

Barber said that organizers would rather not have such stringent measures on their event but that police had requested them.

Pettiford said officers would patrol to keep interlopers out because the Pentagon restricted the event in its permit application. "That is what their permit called for, so we have those fences to keep the public out."

Once the National Park Service approves the permit, it is normal for police to do what they can to adhere to the organizers' requests. "It's a permitted event. That means [organizers] are allowed to say who is in and who's out," said Sgt. Scott Fear, a Park Police spokesman. He declined to say how many officers were in the Park Police, which had a Washington detail of about 400 two years ago.

What's unusual for an event on the Mall is the combination of fences, required preregistration and the threat of arrest.

Park Police officials said security and safety were concerns, especially because Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld will participate in some of the day's events. They said they have approved a permit for a small group of protesters that plans to stand along Independence Avenue.

Barber at first said this week that event organizers would rather not be so strict but that they were complying with police orders. But yesterday she said Park Police offered two options: Screen participants at the Mall, as police did for the Fourth of July fireworks and concert, where bags would be searched and restricted items such as alcohol, weapons, animals or glass bottles would be seized; or screen them at the Pentagon and, by restricting access throughout the march, "make sure the same people who were screened at the Pentagon are the same people going to the concert," she said.

Barber added: "We didn't want a bottleneck at the concert. We didn't want people to miss the concert while waiting to be screened. So we decided to do the screening at the Pentagon. That means the entire route has to be kept closed."

Some military supporters have welcomed the event as a way to counter the antiwar movement and back the troops abroad. Antiwar groups say they are convinced that the event was orchestrated to boost the war effort and link the war to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks -- and to undercut an antiwar protest planned for Sept. 24.

One restricted group will be the media, whose members will not be allowed to walk along the march route. Reporters and cameras are restricted to three enclosed areas along the route but are not permitted to walk alongside participants walking from the Pentagon, across the Memorial Bridge to the Mall.

The Washington Post and other corporate entities initially signed on as co-sponsors. But critics from within the newspaper and from the antiwar movement said partnering with the Pentagon raised questions about objectivity, and three weeks ago The Post pulled its co-sponsorship.

Other media co-sponsors -- WTOP radio, WJLA-TV and NewsChannel 8 -- support the effort with advertising.

Opponents of the Freedom Walk took issue with the way the Pentagon is staging the event. When the walk first was publicized, participants were required to submit their names, ages, e-mail addresses and home addresses. After some groups accused the Pentagon of using the registration as a recruiting tool for the military, the requirements were changed.

Barber said the government now asks for a full name, age group, T-shirt size and e-mail address (each registered walker will get a T-shirt). Walkers have until 4:30 p.m. today to register, which must be done online (http://www.asyfreedomwalk.com).

DOJ_NMG_0003777

Officials at the Pentagon, where 184 people died in the attack, decided to open the attack site and memorial chapel to the public tomorrow for the first time.

Visitors will be welcome from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. and can see the stone that marks the crash site of American Airlines Flight 77 and the memorial chapel built there.

There is no need to register to visit the memorial chapel tomorrow.

After Four Years, First Signs Of Renewal At Ground Zero (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, September 9, 2005

NEW YORK - Dust still powders ground zero where the World Trade Center once stood, but it's construction dust that the wind now whips gently around this deep, 16-acre hole.

Called "the bathtub," it reveals the strides and the stumbling, as well as the dogged determination, that have marked the rebuilding effort in the four years since terrorists slammed two planes into the twin symbols of New York's financial prowess.

There has been progress: A grand master plan is in place, complete with a soaring 1,776-foot Freedom Tower and a sunken, sacred memorial where waterfalls cascade in the two footprints of the original towers.

But it has been slow going, due in part to the seeming incompatibility of rebuilding a vital commercial, retail, and financial hub on what many now consider to be a sacred burial ground. What's more, there's a determination to see that ground zero - an international symbol of the West's refusal to bow to terrorism - rises stronger than before. Though it's taking extra time to ensure that happens, planners hope ground zero will come to stand for America's resilience, its ability to overcome hatred, and a celebration of its values.

Chief among those values, particularly in New York, is democracy. But that, too, is adding to the slow pace of development. In this gritty city that pioneered urban planning, everybody has an opinion: Wall Street tycoons and cabbies alike aren't afraid to tell you exactly what they think.

So before a new skyline pierces the void now in lower Manhattan, this major urban project is expected to be the most publicly debated, disputed, reviewed, and revised in world history. As a top developer puts it, the master plan is very much a "living document."

Add to that the challenge of making the new structures as secure as possible to prevent future devastation, and you have an urban rebirth that could take more than a decade, if not a generation, to complete.

"I'd like to tell you we're building a city on a hill, and we may get there, but it's certainly in fits and starts," says Robert Yarrow, president of the Regional Planning Association, which has been involved with the planning process from the start. "While a lot of progress has been made, there's a lot that's still very much in the air."

From the vantage point of the bottom of the bathtub, progress is evident on the eastern wall of the hole, where sunlight glints off the new, exposed steel of the temporary train station that's already moving commuters uptown and across the Hudson River. On the west side, the massive steel bolts that reinforce a retaining wall dot the barren concrete. In the northwest corner hangs a huge American flag, marking where ground was broken this week on a new transportation hub.

The design of the transportation center is meant to evoke the rising wings of a dove. Underground, the hub will connect 11 subways, the PATH train system, and walkways to the Hudson River ferries, as well as future rail links to Kennedy International Airport and Long Island. Gov. George Pataki (R) calls it an "iconic transportation facility - an architectural marvel and a grand terminal." When construction begins Monday, it will be the first time in four years a spade was put in this 16-acre site to begin construction on a permanent structure.

This summer the city secured a commitment for another permanent anchor in the area: Goldman Sachs, the massive investment house that last spring pulled plans to build its $2.9 billion headquarters across from the site because of security and traffic concerns. After state officials moved a planned tunnel and offered an additional $1.6 billion in 9/11 Liberty Bonds, the firm changed its mind again. Construction is slated to begin later this year.

But hovering above all the activity, the damaged and contaminated Deutsche Bank building still stands shrouded in black mesh cloth, awaiting the demolition ball. In the ground, the Freedom Tower cornerstone sits ignored. Both are testaments to the legal, insurance, security, and political obstacles that have stymied the rebuilding. The Freedom Tower is a case in point. The cornerstone was solemnly laid a year ago, only to have the police department demand that construction be halted. The NYPD's security experts said the design - already approved by other parties - would leave the new building too vulnerable to attack from a suicide truck bomber.

DOJ_NMG_0003778

Plans for a new tower were finally agreed upon and presented to the public in June, but construction could be a year off. The cornerstone, meanwhile, sits there waiting to be moved.

"Anyone who thinks the agenda is done when the shovels are put in the ground here are sadly mistaken, but at least in the last few months there's been some real progress," Sen. Charles Schumer (D) of New York said before this week's groundbreaking. "Goldman Sachs and now this station are a one-two punch that say maybe this culture of gridlock and inertia is changing."

The rebuilding lessons at ground zero may prove instructive to the Gulf Coast - inspiring hope that reconstruction can be done, but also providing a reality check. These things take time. Gulf Coast planners, to their credit, are moving quickly. They've already contacted the Lower Manhattan Development Corp. (LMDC), created to oversee the rebuilding of ground zero.

"We plan to continue assisting in any way that will be useful in terms of the precedents established here, the lessons learned, and ... to offer encouragement that there is a better future ahead," says Stefan Pryor, LMDC president. "We have every confidence that Louisiana and the Gulf states will recover better than ever, just as lower Manhattan is doing."

Part of that confidence comes from the rebuilding process itself, despite the setbacks and slow pace.

"I would have loved it if it had gone faster," says Mayor Michael Bloomberg. But given the magnitude of the project, it is probably not unusual to be taking some time, he adds. "In the end, the only thing that people will remember is whether we do the right thing, not whether it took two years or four years or eight years."

WAR NEWS:

Powell Calls His U.N. Speech A Lasting Blot On His Record (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - The former secretary of state, Colin L. Powell, says in a television interview to be broadcast Friday that his 2003 speech to the United Nations, in which he gave a detailed description of Iraqi weapons programs that turned out not to exist, was "painful" for him personally and would be a permanent "blot" on his record.

"I'm the one who presented it on behalf of the United States to the world," Mr. Powell told Barbara Walters of ABC News, adding that the presentation "will always be a part of my record."

Asked by Ms. Walters how painful this was for him, Mr. Powell replied: "It was painful. It's painful now." Asked further how he felt upon learning that he had been misled about the accuracy of intelligence on which he relied, Mr. Powell said, "Terrible." He added that it was "devastating" to learn later that some intelligence agents knew the information he had was unreliable but did not speak up.

Mr. Powell also implied in the interview that the United States did not go to war in Iraq with sufficient troops to secure the country and failed to keep sufficient Iraqi forces to help stabilize the country.

"What we didn't do in the immediate aftermath of the war was to impose our will on the whole country with enough troops of our own, with enough troops from coalition forces or by re-creating the Iraqi forces, armed forces, more quickly than we are doing now," he said.

But with Iraq still violent and plagued by sectarian conflict, the United States has "little choice but to keep investing in the Iraqi armed forces and to do everything we can to increase their size and their capability and their strength."

Since leaving office in January, Mr. Powell has declined interview requests. But his expressions of regret about the weapons intelligence and the lack of troops were consistent with many of his statements in office, especially after it became clear that Iraq had none of the weapons that Mr. Powell had said it was stockpiling.

DOJ_NMG_0003779

He acknowledged several times that intelligence failures lay behind his presentation on the eve of the Iraq war two years ago, but he has never expressed any regret about the war itself. Asked by Ms. Walters, "When the president made the decision to go to war, you were for it?" Mr. Powell said, "Yes."

Asked about editorials asserting that he had put loyalty "ahead of leadership," Mr. Powell parried the question. "Well, loyalty is a trait that I value, and yes, I am loyal," he replied. "And there are some who say, 'Well, you shouldn't have supported it, you should have resigned.' But I'm glad that Saddam Hussein is gone."

Mr. Powell said he did not blame George J. Tenet, then the director of central intelligence, for the failures and did not believe that Mr. Tenet tried to mislead him.

"No, George Tenet did not sit there for five days with me, misleading me," he said, referring to the week he spent at the Central Intelligence Agency reviewing the evidence on Iraq before making his presentation to the United Nations. "There were some people in the intelligence community who knew at that time that some of these sources were not good, and shouldn't be relied upon, and they didn't speak up. That devastated me."

U.S.-Iraqi Sweep Arrests 200 In Rebel Staging Area (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

TAL AFAR, Iraq, Sept. 8 (AP) - As a joint force of American and Iraqi troops moved into Tal Afar, a major insurgent staging ground near the Syrian border, the Iraqi Army said Thursday that it had arrested 200 people suspected of being militants in the sweep and that three-fourths of them were foreigners.

Most of the estimated civilian population of 200,000 has fled this predominantly Turkmen city, where 70 percent of that ethnic group is Sunni Muslim, the sect that dominates the Iraqi insurgency. The American military reported killing seven insurgents in the last two days, and indications were growing that the joint force would intensify the operation.

Tal Afar was swept as election officials tallied voter registration figures from three Sunni-dominated provinces, where registration had been extended a week in preparation for the Oct. 15 nationwide referendum on the new constitution.

"Turnout was unbelievable, and people were very enthusiastic, especially in Falluja and Ramadi," said Farid Ayar, an electoral commission spokesman in Baghdad. Falluja and Ramadi are Sunni insurgent bastions in Anbar Province, which stretches west from Baghdad to the Syrian, Jordanian and Saudi borders.

The heavy voter registration suggests the minority Sunnis are mobilizing to defeat the draft charter, a shift from January, when their boycott of the parliamentary vote gave control of the National Assembly to Shiites and Kurds.

The draft constitution was approved and sent to voters by a coalition of Shiites and Kurds, over the objections of Sunnis, who fear it would allow the country to split into sectarian and ethnic mini-states. That could cut Sunnis out of Iraq's oil wealth.

Sunni clerics are now urging their people to take part in the referendum and the parliamentary balloting in December.

Rejection of the draft constitution would mean elections in December for a Parliament under the rules of the interim constitution. The new Parliament would start drafting a constitution from scratch.

Demographics are a big problem for the Sunni Arabs, about 20 percent of Iraq's 27 million people. Sunnis form the majority in four of the 18 provinces, but their numbers are overwhelming in only two, Anbar and Salahuddin. Under election rules, a "no" vote by a two-thirds majority in any three provinces would defeat the referendum.

In Anbar and Salahuddin, about 75 percent of eligible voters had signed up by Wednesday, the deadline, election officials said, while cautioning the tally was not final. In Diyala, a province with a Sunni majority where the count was final, 417,000 of 750,000 eligible voters, or 56 percent, had registered, said Amir Latif, director of the provincial elections commission. He spoke from Baquba, the provincial capital, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad.

Sunnis also hold a majority in Nineveh Province, home to Mosul, Iraq's third-largest city, and Tal Afar. But much of the Sunni population in the province is Kurdish and committed to the draft charter.

In the Tal Afar sweep, Capt. Muhammad Ahmed of the Iraqi Army said that one of captives was Amr Omayer, an Iraqi who was believed to be commander of all insurgent operations stemming from Tal Afar.

Captain Ahmed said some of those arrested could not speak Arabic.

DOJ_NMG_0003780

"We believe they are Afghans, but we have not checked their nationalities so far," he said. The Arab-speaking captives were from Syria, Sudan, Yemen and Jordan, he said. Captain Ahmed said eight civilians were killed Wednesday in the city by a suicide car bomber. The Iraqi police said Thursday that they had found 17 bullet-ridden bodies near Mahmudiya, a heavily Sunni town south of Baghdad. Two more bodies, blindfolded and handcuffed, were found on Baghdad's outskirts. The United States announced the death on Wednesday of a soldier in an accident at Camp Taqaddum near Falluja.

U.S. Forces Chase Ghost Fighters Amid Iraqis (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

TALL AFAR, Iraq, Sept. 8 -- The U.S. soldiers sensed something wasn't quite right when an ambulance carrying two dead bodies arrived Thursday morning at a checkpoint for people evacuating this city under siege.

Hanging off the sides of the vehicle were three young men who said they were escorting the remains of family members killed in the previous night's bombardment to a local hospital. But when an Iraqi policeman looked them over, he pointed to a man who wore white sweatpants and a white shirt and appeared to be in his early twenties. "I know him. He must be detained," the officer said. "He murdered a policeman."

The interrogation by American soldiers initially went nowhere. The man insisted he spoke Turkish, not Arabic, and therefore could not communicate with the Americans' interpreters. Asked his name, he kept alternating between "Habib" and "Faris." At one point, he rolled on the floor making retching noises as if he were going to throw up. But everything changed when exasperated soldiers said they had no choice but to turn him over to the Iraqis, who were anxious to take him into custody.

"Yes, I am a terrorist, yes," the man said in perfect Arabic, his ailment apparently forgotten. "I would rather you shoot me in the head than give me to them."

The episode underscored what many U.S. troops have said is among the most difficult tasks they face in battling the insurgency across Iraq: identifying fighters who blend seamlessly into the local population.

American commanders have long insisted that growing numbers of Iraqi security forces will make that job much easier by providing an insider's knowledge of local communities. Privately, U.S. commanders also acknowledge that the Iraqi troops' reputation for heavy-handed treatment of prisoners cuts two ways: It can terrify prisoners into talking but undermine the rapport policemen and soldiers have with the populations they serve.

In Tall Afar, where a week ago U.S. and Iraqi troops launched their largest urban assault since the push into Fallujah last November, soldiers are simultaneously working to help people flee in anticipation of an imminent attack on the city center and to prevent insurgents among them from escaping undetected.

Heavy bombing continued Thursday evening, as U.S. jets dropped 500-pound J-DAM precision bombs and other munitions into the insurgent-controlled neighborhood of Sarai, while playing messages over loudspeakers that called on residents to evacuate. Nearly 1,000 people left the city through U.S. checkpoints Thursday, and commanders said intelligence showed that insurgent leaders were attempting to vacate the city.

Iraqi policemen and soldiers are fully integrated into nearly every aspect of the Tall Afar operation, often attached to units from the U.S. Army's 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, which is leading the assault, or advised by small groups of U.S. Special Forces soldiers. Among the units here are several battalions of the Iraqi army's 3rd Division, which is based in northwestern Iraq, and a battalion of Kurdish soldiers assigned to Tall Afar for this operation. Hundreds of regular Iraqi policemen and police commandos are also being brought to the city to man stations that U.S. forces have said they will establish once the fighting wanes.

The performance of Iraqi troops in this region has improved dramatically since the 3rd Armored Cavalry arrived in April, U.S. commanders said. In early June, an Iraqi platoon led by two U.S. soldiers was ambushed in Sarai. When machine-gun fire rained down on the platoon, most of its members fled. An American lieutenant colonel was killed in the engagement.

"When we started with them, whenever they would receive a little fire they would either run or do what we called the 'death blossom' -- basically spraying in all directions, which was dangerous for us and dangerous for the town," said Lt. Col. Christopher

DOJ_NMG_0003781

Hickey, who leads the 3rd Armored Cavalry's Sabre Squadron and works closely with Iraqi commanders. "Through leadership and experience, they have become more disciplined."

Lacking sufficient numbers of skilled interpreters for interrogations, U.S. forces operating independently of Iraqi units have sometimes struggled in their attempts to find insurgents during several days of house-to-house searches in Tall Afar.

On Sunday, soldiers from Eagle Squadron's Blue Platoon raided the home of a suspected insurgent named Suleiman Dawou. When they arrived at the house, Dawou was gone, but they found a man they believed to be his cousin. They asked in English if the cousin knew where Dawou was, and the man said no. Believing he was lying, the soldiers placed him in plastic cuffs and told him that he was being detained. They began filling out paperwork required to take him into custody when an interpreter arrived and tried questioning him one last time.

"I thought the soldiers said Salman Dawou," the man told the interpreter. "I know Suleiman, but I have not seen him for months." The soldiers let him go.

But while Hickey and other commanders said the participation of Iraqi troops will help immeasurably with efforts to identify insurgents, there is also concern here, as in other Sunni Arab communities across Iraq, because the Iraqi units are predominantly composed of Shiite Muslims or ethnic Kurds. Hickey said that U.S. forces have met with local Sunni leaders to encourage recruitment of Sunnis into police and army units. But after a series of meetings last month in which the tribal leaders said they would provide lists of candidates, only three names were put forward.

"Part of the problem is the security situation is so bad here that no one wants to be a policeman," Hickey said. "Once that improves, we are hoping more of them will sign up. The ideal is for people to be policing their own people, their own neighborhoods, so they have a stake in doing it right."

Civilians fleeing Tall Afar, where most residents are Sunnis from the Turkmen ethnic group, were told by U.S. troops to evacuate through checkpoints in the southern part of the city. But many said they were too afraid to enter south-side neighborhoods where most police and residents are Shiites.

The Kurdish soldiers involved in the operation here are members of the pesh merga militia that battled the Sunni-led government of former president Saddam Hussein and that supports Kurdish forces fighting the government of neighboring Turkey. They will particularly relish their role invading a stronghold of the Turkmens, who have strong ethnic ties to Turkey, American commanders said.

"They are champing at the bit," said Hickey, who denied that zeal would lead to overly aggressive tactics. "They are a professional fighting force with a good reputation. They want to keep that intact."

The man who was plucked from the ambulance and interrogated Thursday appeared genuinely frightened of facing the Iraqi police. "Please no," he repeated several times. Once soldiers realized they had a lever to extract information, they called for Iraqi policemen to sit in on the questioning. The officers said the man was involved in a gruesome killing of a local policeman who was beheaded, his corpse placed on the street with a bomb lodged inside of it that exploded when a dog began sniffing at the body.

When the policemen first entered the room, the man turned to face the corner, refusing to look at them. After a series of increasingly pointed questions shouted at him, he became defiant.

"No matter what you say, I am a holy warrior. I am going to paradise," he told the interrogators, referring to the belief cited by many insurgent fighters that those who die for their cause have a special place in the afterlife. "The rest of you are infidels who will go to hell."

For A U.S. Platoon In Iraq, Merciless Missions (WP)

By Steve Fainaru

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

BALAD, Iraq -- On an asphalt road surrounded by apple trees and date palms, a bomb went off beneath an armored Humvee leading a midnight patrol. The towering fireball, followed by an explosion, lit up the night and propelled the five-ton vehicle two feet into the air.

DOJ_NMG_0003782

The Humvee fell and sputtered to a halt, its bulletproof windshield cracked, its electrical system shut down. Inside, four American soldiers and an Iraqi interpreter choked on dust and grit. The attack was witnessed by a reporter riding along on the Aug. 26 patrol and later described by soldiers involved.

"My face! My face! I can't see!" screamed Sgt. Jason Fishbein, 30, a diminutive gunner from the New York City borough of Queens. Along with the Humvee's other occupants, Fishbein was unharmed: the gray dust had momentarily blinded him and it was sweat -- not blood, as he feared -- that poured from his face.

"Man, I got a headache now," said Cpl. William Young, the 24-year-old driver of the second Humvee, which careened into a ditch as fist-sized chunks of asphalt hurtled toward it. Young reached into the back seat, where Sgt. Joseph Smith, 29 and deaf in his right ear from an earlier blast, handed him an extra-large bottle of migraine medicine.

Six hours after the attack, and with only a few hours of sleep, the soldiers of the 3rd Platoon, Charlie Company, 5th Battalion, 7th Cavalry Regiment, were back patrolling the bomb-cratered streets of Balad, an agricultural city about 50 miles north of Baghdad. The attack quickly faded, taking its place alongside myriad others that have occurred during the platoon's first eight months of a yearlong combat tour in Iraq.

The experiences of the 17-man "Blue Platoon," as the unit is called, go to the heart of the growing debate over the continued involvement of U.S. troops in Iraq. The days are infused not with the politics of war but the stark realities of it: tragedy and loss, loneliness and exhaustion, resilience and camaraderie in the face of a stubborn and deadly insurgency. The platoon's daily life has been ordered by nothing more than the merciless patrol schedule, twice-daily, four-hour combat missions that inevitably place the soldiers in the paths of attacks aimed at killing them.

"I can tell you right now: We ready to go home," said L.B. Baker, 38, a lanky trumpet player and farmer from Belcher, La., who as platoon sergeant is responsible for holding the unit together.

"I tell my guys every day, 'Look, this is the home stretch,' " Baker said. "I don't want them to relax right now. It's not the time to start thinking this is a game."

In three days of patrols culminating in the roadside attack, the physical and emotional toll of prosecuting the war in Iraq was vividly apparent in interviews, personal diaries written by the soldiers, and even songs they recorded in makeshift barracks studios. Weighted down by 50 pounds of body armor and ammunition, the soldiers venture out every day in 120-degree heat to find the insurgents. More often than not, they never do, even after bombs explode directly on them, a source of endless frustration compounded by what the soldiers said is the unwillingness of most Iraqis to help them.

"It's always kul shee maku ," said Sgt. Rob Hammer, a 32-year-old squad leader from Sublette, Kan., reciting the Arabic phrase for "there is nothing," which the entire platoon has memorized.

In such an unforgiving environment, the Americans said they found meaning in their commitment to each other, "the friends who would take a bullet for me, friends who would kill their own selves to save my life," said Sgt. Patrick Hagood, 24, of Anderson, S.C.

In the tense moments after Friday's bombing, Blue Platoon's medic, Pfc. James Tickal, 23, of Oviedo, Fla., first checked to make sure his soldiers were okay. He then took out a brown, leather-bound diary he keeps inside his Humvee and recorded the incident in the middle of rubble.

Prefacing the entry with an obscenity, he wrote: "I'm still shaking. Boom! My humvee just got hit by an IED about two minutes ago. I am sick of getting hit w/ this crap. Aw man that was a big bomb that they blew up right underneath us. Thank God for keeping everyone OK in my humvee. Now that's a direct hit."The First Losses

Tragedy hit the platoon on Feb. 13. While patrolling the outskirts of Balad around 4:30 a.m., one of the four Humvees overshot a right turn and tumbled upside down into a freezing, seven-foot-deep canal, and three soldiers drowned, along with an Air Force firefighter who fell in during the rescue effort.

Memories of the three popular men -- Sgt. Rene Knox Jr., 22, of New Orleans; Sgt. Chad Lake, 26, of Ocala, Fla., and Sgt. Dakotah Gooding, 21, of Des Moines -- hovered over soldiers "like a mist," said Tickal, Tickal soon began to narrate what he was seeing, first in jottings in an all-weather field book he kept behind his Humvee's sun visor, then in the thick diary that his ex-girlfriend, Spec. Jessica Williams, a reservist, sent him from the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0003783

"I am currently in Iraq, my tour is half way over," he wrote in June. "When we first got to Iraq I lost three friends in the first month: Gooding, Knox and Lake. Gooding and I were pretty chill. He told me how he met his wife and mostly how much he loved her. He was also the funniest guy I have ever met. He would always say, 'foreeeal.' "

Even as the scorching summer heated up, Tickal, a bespectacled 23-year-old who studied biology at the University of Central Florida before joining the Army, frequently began his entries: "Today is a beautiful day." A self-described "dreamer" he punctuated passages with smiley faces or frowning faces; on one page he sketched a picture of Garfield, the cartoon cat, firing an M-4 assault rifle from the turret of a Humvee.

Tickal described himself as apolitical: "Truthfully, I don't care who the president is. I would have signed up to come over here anyway." But he criticized the apathy of Americans who, he wrote, failed to understand the stakes in Iraq: "I hope people back home understand what we are doing, keeping our country free. Truthfully I think our country needs a kick in the ass. Most people believe it doesn't affect them. Who cares? Well, I CARE."

Tickal worried that he "could die any day." On July 4, he described a phone conversation in which Williams "asked me what my biggest fears are. I never told her but I imagine a car bomb going off all the time. People screaming in my dreams."

"If I was a cat I would be down to maybe 2 lives left, I hope," he wrote six days later. "There is no way I am going to die in a place like this."Growing Frustration

By July, Blue Platoon was increasingly under attack.

The frequency of indirect fire -- mortars and rockets fired at Camp Paliwoda -- had diminished significantly. But the number of roadside bombs, which have accounted for about 26 percent of the nearly 1,900 deaths of U.S. military personnel in Iraq, had more than doubled, to nearly two a day, within the battalion's 20-by-15-mile area of operation.

Many of the attacks were concentrated in al-Ruashid, a Sunni tribal neighborhood northwest of Balad. The insurgents seemed to operate invisibly amid the orchards. The locus was a one-lane road known as the Isaki Highway, its asphalt surface pocked with an obstacle course of bomb craters.

Tickal's diary reflected the growing tension, the platoon's exhaustion and frustration. "The day is half way over. It's about 136 degrees out," he wrote on July 29. "This morning seemed to disappear. The heat kind of puts you to sleep."

On Aug. 5, the platoon was hit by a roadside bomb on the way back from picking up a commander, who was returning from leave in the United States. "I told the captain, Welcome home,' " wrote Tickal. Using a racial epithet, he wrote, "I am getting tired of getting bombed and not catching" them.

On Aug. 6, Charlie Company's "Red Platoon" captured some insurgents with an artillery round. "That make me feel really great when we catch these jerkoffs," Tickal wrote. "They think they can get away w/anything. The thing is that it could be anyone. Everyone is poor in this country and I don't blame them. If I was poor I would take a few thousand dollars to place a road bomb. Man, I hate these insurgents."

On Aug. 7, the company's "White Platoon" was "hit by an IED for the 6th time in 2 days," Tickal wrote. "This time Big Will got hit. His whole right leg was hit by shrapnel."

By Aug. 10, it was "full out war," Tickal wrote. White Platoon was attacked by two roadside bombs and rocket-propelled grenades, wounding two soldiers. When Blue Platoon arrived to assist, the soldiers came under small-arms fire. "I kept on hearing, pew, pew, pew," Tickal wrote. "Taylor my gunner started unloading amo can after amo can into the wood line. We ended up being there about 2 hours. The first hour was nothing but gunfire."

Each day, the platoon would seek out information to find the men who were attacking them. The soldiers acted on tips and stopped at random houses. They questioned nervous residents through masked translators who went by nicknames like "Fly" and "Steve" and struggled with English themselves.

The platoon did not expect much. Few residents offered information; some were openly hostile. On the morning of Aug. 24, the platoon dismounted and strolled through a neighborhood of modest homes and mud huts. The soldiers came upon a young farmer, Bassam Hazim Mohammed, 19, sitting in the shade beneath an arbor.

"He says he doesn't like coalition forces," the interpreter told the platoon.

DOJ_NMG_0003784

"I'm gonna tell him right now the fastest way to get rid of us: approve a constitution, stop shooting at us, and stop blowing stuff up," said 1st Lt. Lamarius Workman, 31, the platoon leader. As he spoke, a few Americans split off to search Mohammed's home.

"So, basically, the easiest way to get rid of us is to just fake like they like us, just fake it," implored Workman. "I'm serious. Just sacrifice a little pride and fake it for six months and you'll see we'll be gone in no time."Lyrics of Loneliness

As the grueling month wore on, Baker, the platoon sergeant and an accomplished trumpet player, recorded his latest song about Iraq with Anthony Blocker, 27, of Marietta, Ga., another platoon sergeant in Charlie Company.

The two men used a music software program and microphone, mixing the songs on a laptop computer in a tiny wooden studio that Blocker built in his room. Baker wrote songs about the three drowned soldiers, the platoon's desolate base, the isolation of being away from family. "If it feels like I'm gonna cry a little bit, then I know it's good," he said.

Baker called this latest song, "August." Its haunting melody was set against lyrics that spoke of loneliness and resilience during endless separation:

A year long
A year gone
Is so damn long
Baby, hold on
It won't be long
Till I come home
There's been ups
There's been downs
We stay strong
Hold on
It won't be long
Till I come homeMidnight Attack

On Aug. 26, Blue Platoon went back on patrol at 8 p.m. It was the second patrol of the day; earlier that morning, the platoon had been shot at outside a mosque.

Dusk was fading as the soldiers made their way around the city, stopping to question residents, inspecting an Iraqi police checkpoint. The brutal afternoon heat broke, giving way to a soft summer night.

At 10:30, the four Humvees raced down the dangerous Isaki Highway. The platoon reached a shuttered white store at the end of the road, stopped to fix a jammed grenade launcher, then doubled back down the highway.

The convoy slowed to about 20 miles per hour and headed east, the vehicles' headlights cutting a path through the darkness. Every hundred yards or so, the Humvees swerved to avoid bomb craters in the asphalt road.

Baker, driving the lead vehicle, swerved right to avoid one of the three-foot-deep craters. Beside it, buried beneath the asphalt and unbeknownst to him, was another bomb. "I was just going around the hole and it blew," Baker said.

"The truck came off the ground, sir," he continued, recounting the incident the next day in his room. "It kind of lifted it up and set it back down on the ground."

"It felt like we were flying," said Fishbein, the gunner.

About 25 yards back, Young found himself driving toward an orange fireball. Rocks and huge chunks of the road smashed the windshield, spreading a web of cracks. Young jerked the Humvee to the right. "Stop! Stop!" yelled Hagood, who was seated in the passenger seat. The vehicle stopped in a ditch surrounded by tall grass.

The gunners shot illumination flares and lit up the night. Now, able to see across the orchards, the gunners opened a barrage of fire with their M-240 machine guns, hoping to kill the unseen insurgents who had detonated the bomb. The red-hot shell casings fell down into the Humvees; one landed on Smith, scorched him through his pants.

"Ow!" he screamed, swearing.

The soldiers became euphoric as they learned no one had been hurt.

DOJ_NMG_0003785

Inside the lead vehicle, Baker and Sgt. Ernest Daniels, of Harlem, N.Y., patted the dashboard, thanking the Humvee for protecting them.

"Good job, baby," Baker said.

"Yeah, baby," Daniels said. "Good job, good job."

Young backed the second Humvee out of the ditch and parked in the middle of the road.

"Thank God, whoever's praying for us," he said as the shooting subsided.

Once bomb experts arrived to inspect the site, the soldiers got out of their Humvees and walked over to the crater.

It stretched about six feet wide and three feet deep. Thousands of pieces of rubble were spread across the road. Next to the new crater was the old one that had been used as a decoy. Inside it was a battery bound with masking tape and attached to a thin copper wire.

Young, Hammer, Hagood and an explosives expert followed the wire across the road, along a wide dirt path. The wire ended abruptly after about 50 yards away, at another path that led back into the orchard.

The soldiers used flashlights at the end of their M-16 assault rifles to search the darkened fields. They scanned the tall grass between the bushy, 20-foot apple trees, warily sweeping their weapons.

"Something's moving right there," Hammer said, pointing his rifle. "I got my laser on it."

The soldiers pointed in unison. Lights and three red dots danced over the grass, which seemed to move.

"It's a rabbit," someone said finally.

The soldiers hiked over gullies and through the scrub before finally turning back to the vehicles.

The Humvees slowly headed back to the base, Baker's vehicle hobbling on a flat tire. Their headlights were dark; to see, the drivers used night vision goggles.

About 20 minutes later, the platoon arrived at Camp Paliwoda. The sign outside the gate displayed the American and Iraqi flags and read: "Partners in Peace, Balad, Iraq."

Once inside, Young began to sing the Army promotional jingle: "Be all you can be"

Two days later, at the onset of a morning patrol, Tickal pulled out his diary. "The sun is starting to rise," he wrote. "Thank you God for another day on this beautiful planet. Yesterday my humvee's windshields were being replaced. Thank goodness for bullet proof glass, huh?"

The State Of Iraq: An Update (NYT)

By Nina Kamp, Michael O'hanlon And Amy Unikewicz

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

It was not a good summer in Iraq. After the midwinter bright spots - reductions in violence, greater economic vitality, the famous purple fingers of voters - the situation worsened as the weather warmed. Most worrisome, the constitutional process has failed to bring aboard Sunni Arabs, who remain the core of the insurgency. While Shiites and Kurds wisely compromised on some key points, they favor an oil-allocation scheme that Sunnis fear could deprive them of their fair share of Iraq's natural wealth.

There is, as always, some good news. The government has made progress on managing inflation, rewriting banking laws and adopting strict budgetary rules to prevent deficit spending. Telephone and Internet use continue to increase; gross domestic product is greater than during Saddam Hussein's latter years in power; school enrollment is up 20 percent since 2000. And somewhere between one-tenth and one-fifth of Iraqi security forces are now fairly capable.

But on balance the indicators are troubling. Electricity production remains stuck at prewar levels even as demand soars, and the power is off in Baghdad more often than it is on. Unemployment is stubbornly high. Infant mortality rates are still among the Middle East's highest. And Iraq is the most violent country in the region, not only in terms of war casualties but of criminal murders as well. On one point at least, pessimists and optimists about Iraq tend to agree: the situation needs a major boost from the political process. In that light, the Oct. 15 referendum on the draft constitution looms very large.

New Orleans And Baghdad (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

DOJ_NMG_0003786

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

Memo to: Iraq's Kurdish, Shiite and Sunni leaders.

From: An American friend.

Dear Sirs: As someone who really wishes you well, I am writing to give you my best sense of how the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina is going to affect the U.S. mission in Iraq. Let me begin with an analogy offered by Michael Mandelbaum, author of the forthcoming book "The Case for Goliath: How America Acts as the World's Government in the 21st Century." He points out: "The U.S. military presence in Iraq today is like the dikes and levees that were protecting New Orleans from the flood. The equivalent of the flood for Iraq is a civil war between Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds. The U.S. military right now is holding that back."

Therefore, the key question in Iraq is whether your constitutional process now unfolding can produce a power-sharing accord between Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds that can be a homegrown, self-sustaining dike against civil war, replacing the Americans. In the wake of Katrina, this is now an urgent question. No, we will not be pulling out tomorrow just because of Katrina, let alone before your December parliamentary elections. But after that, when we will be in a Congressional election year, who knows what pressures may build.

Why? Because most Democrats have opposed the war from the start, and many Republicans no longer support the war per se, but only George Bush. The president has carried this war on his shoulders, and the more he's weakened politically by Katrina, the less he will be able to carry. Yes, Mr. Bush has said we'll do whatever it takes to finish the job in Iraq, but he said that before there was another huge job to do.

Can you imagine if Mr. Bush had to go to Congress this week to ask for yet another $100 billion to keep fixing Iraq, when an entire U.S. city needs rebuilding? And the Katrina TV drama is not going away. Hell hath no fury like journalists with a compelling TV story where they get to be the heroes and the government the fools.

Now, as for your draft constitution, it is at one level a remarkable document - a rare example of the elected citizens of an Arab state having a horizontal dialogue and forging their own social contract. There is already more free politics in Iraq than anywhere else in the Arab world except Lebanon. But this draft constitution will come to life only if Iraqi Sunnis of good will publicly embrace it, and up to now they have not.

Some Sunnis are intimidated, others are posturing for the elections, and some are acting in bad faith, still fantasizing that their Baath Party will come to power again. But Sunnis of good will, and Iraq has many, can be brought around if the constitution creates a politically and economically viable central government, and doesn't pave the way for Kurdish and Shiite separatism, which would leave the Sunnis isolated in central Iraq without power or oil.

As Yitzhak Nakash, the Brandeis University expert on the Shiites, put it: "We need to see a form of federalism in Iraq that is uniting Iraqis, not dividing them - a form of federalism that gives Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds a degree of cultural and religious autonomy without compromising either Iraq's political unity or Baghdad's role as the locus of national politics. The draft constitution is not quite there yet."

I know how justifiably bitter the Shiites and the Kurds of Iraq are over what they have suffered at the hands of murderous Sunni Baathists and jihadist fascists. But it is in their interest and ours to see if we can nurture more Iraqi Sunnis who understand that their best future lies in working with a new Iraq, rather than trying to subvert it. Will Iraqi Sunnis, like the Palestinians, waste a generation trying to reverse history - and destroy themselves and Iraq in the process? Or will they accept the fact that they are a minority that can no longer rule all of a fascist Iraq, but can get its fair share of power and oil in a free Iraq? I don't know.

The only way to find out is to make them an offer they can't refuse. If there is a constitution basically supported by all the key parties, a decent outcome is still possible in Iraq. Yes, Mr. Bush says he intends to stay the course there no matter what, but without a constitution embraced by all three communities, there will be no course to stay. The pressure on us to leave will only grow.

And if the dikes of stability that U.S. soldiers are holding together in Iraq give way, well, you all will envy the people of New Orleans. Most of them had somewhere to go when their floods hit. You and your neighbors will not.

Saddam Aide Hired Camelot Attorney To Bribe U.N. Staff (NYSUN)

By Benny Avni

DOJ_NMG_0003787

New York Sun, September 9, 2005

UNITED NATIONS - A Democratic Party icon of the Kennedy days, Theodore Sorensen, was hired in 1993 by an agent of Saddam Hussein, Samir Vincent, to influence top Turtle Bay officials, according to Wednesday's Volcker report on the U.N. oil-for-food program. Vincent and his Korean partner, Tongsun Park, also financed an American pro-U.N. organization known as UNA-USA with Taiwanese money.

In the spring of 1993, Vincent, who has since pleaded guilty in a federal court to charges of acting as an unregistered agent for the Iraqi government, "sought legal advice" from Mr. Sorensen, according to the Volcker report. Attempting "to obtain an agreement between the United Nations and Iraq," Mr. Vincent retained the services of Mr. Sorensen, who is described in the report as "a New York attorney and former special council and adviser to the United States President John F. Kennedy."

The famed attorney was still basking in the glow of Camelot when he was hired by the Iraqi dictator's agent to shape what ultimately became oil for food. Launched officially in 1996, the program grew into a cash cow for Saddam, fraught with bribery and corruption, according to the U.N-authorized Independent Inquiry Committee's report. Mr. Sorensen was hired in the spring of 1993 for an undisclosed sum "to provide advice on how a 'plan of compliance' could be proposed to the United Nations between the two parties," the report says.

In the spring of 1993, as Mr. Sorensen was put on Saddam's payroll by Mr. Vincent - an undeclared foreign agent - the attorney's wife, Gillian Sorensen, was hired by then-Secretary-General Boutros-Ghali as his special adviser for public policy, according to a biography of her posted on the United Nations Foundation Web site. Ms. Sorensen has been involved in U.N. affairs ever since, and today is a senior adviser and national advocate at the U.N. Foundation, a pro-Turtle Bay organization founded by Ted Turner.

Ms. Sorensen is also involved in Democratic Party foreign policy circles, and was among a small group of Democratic "Friends of Annan" who last year gathered at the Manhattan apartment of a former U.N. ambassador Richard Holbrooke, to try to reshape Secretary-General Annan's agenda and save his job as he was criticized for his possible missteps in oil for food.

"There was no connection whatsoever" between her husband's work for Mr. Vincent and hers for being hired at the same time by Mr. Boutros-Ghali, Mrs. Sorensen told The New York Sun yesterday.

Mr. Vincent, who has been cooperating with the federal prosecutor for the Southern District of New York since pleading guilty, is said by the Volcker report to have solicited millions of dollars from the Saddam regime to target officials, including Mr. Boutros-Ghali, for bribery. Mr. Volcker told the Sun at a Wednesday press conference that the investigation regarding Mr. Boutros-Ghali is "ongoing."

Another man who was recruited for the bribery scheme, according to the Volcker committee, was the North Korean-born Mr. Park, who was at the center of a Washington influence-peddling scandal in the 1970s, and who was indicted this year for his part in the attempt to bribe top U.N. officials on behalf of Saddam. Already known for his involvement in the Washington scandal known as "Koreagate," Mr. Park, according to the new Volcker report, assisted Mr. Boutros-Ghali in 1993 and 1994 in raising funds for the 50th anniversary of the United Nations.

A company controlled by Mr. Park, according to the Volcker report, arranged a $4 million contribution to a Washington-based U.N. advocacy group, the United Nations Association of the United States of America. The contribution went through a Taiwanese entity known as the Chinese National Association of Industry and Commerce. The Volcker report stresses that although Mr. Boutros-Ghali knew Mr. Park was a Taiwanese lobbyist, he said he was not aware of the donation from Taiwan.

UNA-USA yesterday issued a statement welcoming the release of the Volcker report, using many talking points used in the last 48 hours by U.N. spokesmen, including support for Mr. Annan and calls for reform at Turtle Bay. The UNA-USA statement does not address Mr. Volcker's findings about the organization itself, and the questions it raises, including whether, as a non-for-profit organization, it listed Taiwan - a nonmember of the U.N. - as one of its donors.

An organization spokeswoman, in fact, first heard of the reference to UNA-USA in the Volcker report from a reporter. "We have no comment at this time," Director of Communications Peggy Atherlay told the Sun, adding that the $4 million donation was received when the organization was under a previous administration, and that it is now seeking answers.

Oil For Food As Usual (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0003788

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

"The scandal, quote, unquote, is, in my view, nonsense." Thus did Denis Halliday, a former United Nations Assistant Secretary General, opine in November 2004 on the U.N.'s Oil for Food program. With the release Wednesday of Paul Volcker's fourth report on Oil for Food, we have the clearest account yet of what this quote-unquote scandal is really about.

Let's begin with what this scandal is not about, at least not fundamentally. It is not about the dubious business practices of the Swiss Inspections company Cotecna, which was improperly awarded a multimillion-dollar Oil for Food contract while employing Secretary General Kofi Annan's son Kojo, although this taught us something about the nepotism that typifies U.N. dealings. Nor is it about Kofi Annan's personal probity, which had been called into question by evidence that he was aware of, and tried to influence, the Cotecna bid. Mr. Volcker has found no conclusive proof on this score.

In other words, Oil for Food is not about some isolated incidents of perceived or actual wrongdoing during the course of a seven-year effort to maintain sanctions on Iraq, monitor its oil flows and feed its people. Oil for Food is a story about what the U.N. is. And our conclusion from reading the 847-page report is that the U.N. is Oil for Food. * * *

To better understand the scandal, it helps to distinguish its political and managerial components. Responsibility for administering the program fell primarily to the U.N. Secretariat, which established the Office of Iraq Program (OIP) under the direction of Benon Sevan.

But the program itself was designed by members of the U.N. Security Council following protracted negotiations with the government of Saddam Hussein. It was the Security Council, for example, that approved Saddam's right to choose the companies, contractors and middlemen with whom Iraq would do business, and through which the entire program was corrupted. The Security Council also ran its own supervisory "661 Committee," named after the 1990 Security Council resolution that imposed sanctions on Iraq following its invasion of Kuwait.

The result of this bifurcated structure was that real responsibility for overseeing Oil for Food fell between two stools -- and into the lap of Mr. Sevan and his staff. Mr. Volcker's previous reports tell us that Mr. Sevan was in the pay of the Iraqi government.

The current report adds to our knowledge of what the Iraqis got for their money. For example, Mr. Sevan and his staff failed to inform the Secretariat and the 661 Committee of the extent of Iraq's various kickback schemes -- involving as many as 2,500 companies -- and dismissed media reports about them as "groundless allegations, provocative suggestions and factual mistakes." Mr. Sevan also fought tooth-and-nail the Bush Administration's successful attempt to impose retroactive pricing standards on the sale of Iraqi oil, which helped curb some of Saddam's abuses.

However, part of the reason Mr. Sevan was able to get away with his malfeasance was that neither the Secretariat nor the 661 Committee showed any appetite to exercise their fiduciary obligations. Mr. Annan testified to the Committee that Mr. Sevan worked directly for the 661 Committee. Yet as the report acidly notes, "the difficulty with the Secretary-General's view is that he appointed Mr. Sevan and he created OIP in the first place." Maybe former Enron CEO Kenneth Lay should call Mr. Annan to testify as an expert witness at his trial.

Mr. Annan is also on record telling the Committee he viewed Oil for Food as "a very transparent operation." Yet as the report shows, Mr. Annan was himself complicit in covering up Iraqi violations of the sanctions regime. Specifically, Mr. Annan was aware of the kickback issue from at least February 2001, yet "the Secretary General's quarterly reports never mentioned the emerging problem." (See the report excerpt nearby.)

Why Mr. Annan chose to see no evil on Iraqi sanctions violations, much less use his bully pulpit to denounce it (as he later denounced the Iraq war as "illegal"), is an interesting question. Our sense is that the U.N. Secretariat as a whole took the view that the sanctions regime was immoral and that Saddam was within his rights to break free of it.

Whatever the case, the Secretariat had a more than willing partner in the 661 Committee, and for reasons that are more easily comprehended. Iraq regularly steered contracts to Security Council members it believed were friendly to its political interests. Russian companies, for instance, did $19 billion in oil deals with Iraq, and French companies sold Saddam $3 billion in humanitarian assistance (much of which, the report notes, was diverted for Iraqi military purposes).

It's no coincidence, comrade, that France and Russia, as well as China (which did its own thriving business with Saddam) consistently downplayed the kickback allegations and pushed to have the sanctions regime eased. Only the U.S. and Britain made any effort to monitor Oil for Food for fraud, although even these efforts were lackluster until the Bush Administration came to office. We should also note the U.S. was itself guilty of looking the other way when it came to Iraq's oil smuggling through allies Jordan and Turkey. * * *

DOJ_NMG_0003789

So it was that the largest fraud ever recorded in history came about. Press reports often cite the overall size of Oil for Food at $60 billion, but Mr. Volcker's report makes clear that the real figure was in excess of $100 billion. From this, Saddam was able to derive $10.2 billion from illicit transactions. But the important point is that he was able to steer 10 times that sum toward his preferred clients in the service of his political aims.

None of this happened by accident. Mr. Volcker's report is replete with examples of incompetent U.N. oversight and tales of political wrangling among the permanent members of the Security Council. But the abiding fact is that it was the Western powers, not Saddam, who wanted Oil for Food at virtually any cost, because it offered the appearance of a meaningful policy in the absence of a real one, namely regime change. And it was the political convenience of this chimera that led the U.S. and the U.K. to tolerate, and the rest of the Security Council to feast on, the opportunities for corruption that were inscribed in the very nature of the program.

As for the U.N., it proved its worth to Saddam as the one hall of mirrors in which such shenanigans could take place. Yet even now we are told that "at least" Oil for Food fed the Iraqi people when they were on the edge of starvation, and this is accounted a U.N. success. That is false. Oil for Food offered a lifeline of cash and influence to a regime that was starving its people. The program did not corrupt the U.N. so much as exploit its essential nature. Now Mr. Annan wants to use this report as an endorsement of his "reform" proposals. Only at the U.N. could he dare to think he could get away with this.

The View From The 38th Floor (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

What follows is an excerpt from the latest report of Paul Volcker's Independent Inquiry Committee on the United Nations' Oil for Food program. Benon Sevan, the former director of the Office of Iraq Program (OIP) that oversaw Oil for Food, has been accused by the Committee of taking nearly $150,000 in bribes from Iraq. "The 38th Floor" refers to Secretary General Kofi Annan's offices at U.N. headquarters. The "661 Committee" was a U.N. Security Council body, outside of Mr. Annan's Secretariat, which helped oversee the Oil for Food program.

"When interviewed by the Committee, the Secretary General, the Deputy Secretary-General [Louise Frechette] and [Chief of Staff Iqbal] Riza each struggled to rationalize the role of the 38th Floor in overseeing OIP. Instead, they offered conflicting views of their own responsibilities as well the functions of Mr. Sevan vis-a-vis the program. These inconsistencies demonstrate a basic confusion within the highest offices of the Secretariat. . . .

"When interviewed by the Committee, the Secretary General insisted that the program was "a very transparent operation" -- "one of the most transparent programs [he has] seen" in terms of the process it required for reports to be made by the Secretariat to the Security Council. However, significant information was routinely withheld from the 661 Committee. Despite mounting evidence of a widespread kickback scheme, the Secretary General's quarterly reports never mentioned the emerging problem. . . .

"To be sure, the Secretary General and Deputy Secretary General were apparently not aware of the full scope of evidence that OIP had accumulated and, clearly, Mr. Sevan bears responsibility for withholding information. . . . But the Secretary-General and Deputy Secretary-General (and Mr. Riza) were aware of the kickback scheme at least as early as February 2001. The Secretary General discussed the kickback allegations and other sanctions violations with Mr. Sevan on numerous occasions. . . .

"In the final analysis, Mr. Sevan ran a $100 billion program with very little oversight from the supervisory authority that created his position and OIP. Through a combination of an unclear reporting structure, a lack of supervision by the 38th Floor, and a general unwillingness to recognize and address significant issues on the part of the Secretary General and Deputy Secretary General, Mr. Sevan had substantial autonomy to shape the program's direction. He failed to resist and challenge the Iraqi regime's rampant sanctions violations through which the regime diverted billions of dollars away from the humanitarian effort."

Taliban Kill 6 Afghan Police In Attack On Army Arms Depot (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

DOJ_NMG_0003790

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 8 - Taliban insurgents attacked an Afghan National Army weapons depot south of Kabul on Thursday, killing six Afghan policemen, the state Bakhtar news agency said. Two men suspected of being Taliban insurgents were killed in the firefight that ensued, and one was captured, Bakhtar reported, quoting the press office of the Interior Ministry.

The attack took place in Muqur, a district of Ghazni Province, south of Kabul, a spokesman for the ministry said.

Gunmen also attacked a parliamentary candidate in eastern Afghanistan. The candidate, Safia Siddiqui, a well-known figure and spokeswoman at the national constitutional convention in 2004, was campaigning in her native Nangarhar Province when she came under fire. She was not injured, but three of her supporters were wounded, Agence France-Presse reported.

International and Afghan security forces have tightened security in anticipation of the Sept. 18 elections, as the Taliban have increased attacks on candidates and government targets. Six candidates and four election workers have been killed recently, and government officials have warned that there may be more violence, in particular roadside bombs in the provinces and suicide bombs in the cities.

The violence on Thursday followed a report that a car laden with explosives had blown up Wednesday in southern Afghanistan, killing its two occupants. The local police said that the two were suspected of being suicide bombers and that their explosives had detonated early. A Taliban spokesman said that the group claimed responsibility and that the car bomb had been aimed at American forces.

"War On Terror" Saves Few Lives: Expert (REU-Y2)

By Maggie Fox, Health And Science Correspondent

Reuters, September 9, 2005

The U.S. "war on terror" is saving fewer lives than just spending the money on disease prevention and research, and has probably caused deaths by taking money away from basic services, an expert said on Thursday.

The accusation is not new, but Dr. Erica Frank of the Department of Family and Preventive Medicine at Emory University School of Medicine in Atlanta said she has calculated the cost, in terms of lives, of the Bush administration's terror policies.

"The most recent effects of these diversions of funding have been seen in the unfolding tragedy of Hurricane Katrina in New Orleans and the surrounding area," Frank wrote in a commentary published in the British Medical Journal.

"Governments must protect their citizens, and anticipating these possible future threats is appropriate and could prove essential to Americans' health."

Frank warned there is a threat that because of the U.S. government's policy, enormous numbers of Americans will die unnecessarily.

On September 11, 2001, 3,400 people died because of the four intentional plane crashes in New York, Washington and Pennsylvania. But 5,200 other Americans died that same day from common diseases, according to Frank.

To estimate how many Americans died of routine causes on September 11, Frank used national estimates of mortality from various causes.

"Predictable tragedies happen every day. We know strategies to reduce deaths from tobacco, alcohol, poor diet, unintentional injuries, and other predictable causes. And we know that millions of people will die unless we protect the population against these routine causes of death," she wrote.

Yet more money is spent to protect against deaths that are not likely to happen.

"For example, in September 2002, New York was awarded $1.3 million to reduce heart disease, the leading killer of New Yorkers, while $34 million was awarded for bioterrorism preparedness in the state," Frank added.

Proponents have argued that bioterror preparedness would build up the public health structure in general.

"If this is an improvement it sure is frightening to think what this might have looked like before," Frank said in a telephone interview.

She cited numerous reports showing the federal government cut spending to reinforce the levees built to protect New Orleans from the flood that has devastated the city.

DOJ_NMG_0003791

"Since the point of investing in counterterror is to protect American lives, the question is a dollar better spent in Iraq or is it better spent here?" she asked.

Our Enemy's Face (WP)

By Richard Holbrooke

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Let us take a hard look at some extremely important words: "the global war on terrorism." Since Sept. 11, this phrase -- often reduced in Washingtonese to "GWOT" -- has entered the English language, popularized by journalists and administration officials. It is the way our highest national priority is described by almost everyone.

But "GWOT" is not an accurate description of America's enemy or of what we are engaged in. Unless people know whom we are fighting, it will be virtually impossible to win the war of ideas that is such a key part of this struggle. The new undersecretary of state for public diplomacy, Karen Hughes, who is charged with primary responsibility for this part of the war, has a chance to fix the problem, but only if she is willing to change some deeply ingrained rhetoric and the political reasons behind it.

Stopping terrorists, using all necessary means, is vital in protecting the nation. We cannot win without the use of force and first-rate intelligence. But suicide bombers are merely the expendable, deluded cannon fodder of ruthless ideologues. This has been true with terrorists throughout history. The long-term battle is against the underlying ideas and leaders behind these specific groups of terrorists.

Despite factionalism and fierce doctrinal disputes, our enemies, broadly speaking, constitute a movement, with goals, gurus, ideologues, myths and martyrs. They share a core set of virulently anti-Western beliefs and have common goals: to destroy the moderate (and still majority) wing of Islam, to establish Islamist theocracies that look backward toward a mythic "golden age," to seek the destruction of Israel, and to inflict maximum damage and human suffering through acts of terrorism.

Among its leaders, there is one whose face is as internationally recognized today as Adolf Hitler's was in 1941. He was responsible for Sept. 11. Yet the United States has not made it a primary goal to expose Osama bin Laden as the monster he is, something Roosevelt and Winston Churchill did to Hitler, and American leadership did to communism during the Cold War by demonstrating its moral and intellectual bankruptcy. Bin Laden (unlike Saddam Hussein) has been virtually ignored in public by official Washington.

Terrorism is not an end in itself; it is a tactic, just as it has been for countless other movements throughout history that sought to destroy or paralyze the established order, or attract attention to their cause. Over two years ago, Zbigniew Brzezinski, among others, pointed out that a "war on terror" was like a "war on blitzkrieg" or a "war on war." For this important insight, the former national security adviser was both attacked and ignored. During the 2004 campaign, I stumbled into a public dispute with senior administration officials, including Vice President Cheney, when, as a John Kerry surrogate, I told a New York Times Magazine writer that the phrase could be considered a metaphor and compared it to phrases such as the "war on poverty." For this both Kerry and I were assailed as naive, and I was asked, in the sneering tones of certain cable television interviewers, if I really thought we were at war with a "metaphor."

Of course not. But despite the grand rhetoric, does anyone think the United States is actually fighting "terror" or "terrorism" globally? We may detest terrorism in Sri Lanka, but we are not engaged in that civil war. Nor in Nepal, northern Uganda, Aceh or countless places around the world.

By calling both Iraq and Sept. 11 part of the war on terrorism, the administration has been partially successful in linking public support for the less popular war in Iraq to the universally supported fight against al Qaeda, even though no convincing evidence has been produced connecting the two. No other explanation has proved as valuable in keeping Americans, albeit in declining numbers, behind our increasingly controversial involvement in Iraq. "GWOT," as Dan Froomkin wrote on The Post's Web site last month, is "the metaphor that has consistently been [President Bush's] most potent weapon in the battle for public opinion."

The struggle against violent extremism will continue, of course, long after bin Laden is eliminated by death or capture. It will be a long conflict, with casualties and high costs, just like the efforts against fascism and communism. But fundamentally this is a war of ideas, and a more aggressive, direct attack on those ideas, and the men behind them, is necessary.

DOJ_NMG_0003792

For starters, Osama bin Laden must be discredited, even if he remains at large. He is not, as some argue, irrelevant simply because his war will continue after he is gone (although, of course, it will). He remains a folk hero to millions of Muslims; youths wear T-shirts of him and children are named after him throughout the Muslim world. The United States should stop ignoring him and his henchmen; exposing them must become a top priority. He is a false prophet who incites mass murder, but he is clearly eloquent and charismatic. His ideas, no matter how insane they seem to us, appeal to many people. (Hitler had those qualities, too.)

Which brings us back to Karen Hughes. With her enormous bureaucratic clout, derived from her closeness with President Bush, the new undersecretary of state has a chance to make history. To do so, however, she must change some fundamental parts of our public message, and then devise better delivery systems for it -- precisely what she did so effectively for Bush during so many campaigns.

Hughes should begin by revisiting what her own boss said on Aug. 6, 2004, speaking without a text. "We actually misnamed the war on terror," the president said that day. "It ought to be the struggle against ideological extremists who do not believe in free societies, who happen to use terror as a weapon." He was, inexplicably, laughed at for this remark, and rapidly retreated to safer rhetorical terrain. More recently, when Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld tried to replace "GWOT" with the "global struggle against violent extremism" -- a somewhat more accurate phrase -- the president immediately overruled him and again linked GWOT closely to Iraq during a series of public appearances.

But the president got it right last year. Words matter, and we need better ones to explain to the world, and to ourselves, who the enemy is. How about making it simple and specific: something like "the war against Osama bin laden and his followers"? And then create an all-out, no-holds-barred campaign to expose, ridicule and destroy everything he and his ilk stand for -- murder, horror, intolerance, disrespect for human life and a false view of Islam.

Richard Holbrooke, an ambassador to the United Nations during the Clinton administration, writes a monthly column for The Post.

'They Are All So Wrong' (WSJ)

By Mark Helprin

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

September 11 was not so much a discrete event as part of a continuum. It was the result of broad strategic failures that, preceding it by decades, continue to this day and are likely to continue on. It is as if the country has lost, as exemplified by the Left now out of power, a great deal of the will to self-preservation, and, as exemplified by the Right now in charge, not a little of its capacity for self-defense. Our politics and policies have somehow been parceled out to opportunists like Michael Moore -- purveyor of conspiracy theories and hatreds, whose presentation, unclean in every respect, is honored nonetheless by the controlling rump of Democrats -- and to Bushmen like "Kip" Hawley of Homeland Security, father of the proposal to allow carry-on ice-picks, bows and arrows, and knives with blades up to five-inches long. * * *

For more than 20 years prior to September 11, Islamic terrorists imprisoned and murdered our diplomats and military personnel, destroyed our civil aviation, machine-gunned our civilians, razed our embassies, attacked an American warship and, in 1993, the U.S. itself. For varying reasons, none legitimate, we hesitated to mount an offensive against the terrorists' infrastructure, hunt them down, eliminate a single rogue regime that supported them, or properly disconcert our fatted allies whose robes they infested. This was comparable in its way to Munich. Only in 2001, when it became obvious to any rational being that we must, did we retaliate, but even then in the face of domestic pressure to judicialize the response, which was exactly what we had done all along.

The underlying corollary to this reflex of appeasement is the notion that our military options are constrained financially, as if we are not a nation of stupendous wealth and it has not been the American tradition since the Civil War to spend, in support of war, with the intensity of war itself. In 1945, we devoted 38.5% of GNP to defense, the equivalent of $4.76 trillion now. The current $400 billion defense budget is a twelfth of that and only 3.2% of GDP, as opposed to the average of 5.7% of GNP in the peacetime years between 1940 and 2000. A false sense of constraint has arisen in every quarter of society. It is the ethos of the administration, the press, the civilian side of the Pentagon, and many of the prominent uniformed military brought to high rank in recent years.

DOJ_NMG_0003793

They are all so wrong. In violating established tradition and throwing aside advantage and elemental common sense, they waste American lives. And for what? What moral construction would allow anyone to spend more than 2,000 dead and tens of thousands of wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan -- so far -- while insisting without major exception that cutting costs is a virtue? When is holding back from one's troops at war the reinforcements, armor and basic equipment they need a virtue rather than a sin?

Is it not the duty of the secretary of defense, his chiefs, and the wide array of generals to press energetically -- even to the point of resignation -- for whatever is necessary (not the minimum, but a safe surplus) to support the armies in the field? If they do not, who will? Had the president gone to Congress on September 12 and asked for almost anything, he would have been granted it. But he never did. This was a fundamental strategic error. If you must go to war, do not do so hesitantly, with half a heart. And in answer to the rationale that the casualties of this war are relatively light, one does not decently measure casualties against those of previous wars, but in terms of whether they can be avoided.

Apart from the paucity of armored vehicles, body armor, and other staples of battle, the chief problem of prosecuting the Iraq war has been the size and scale of the force. Despite inaccurate claims of unprecedented speed in the advance to Baghdad, the three weeks of halting action it took to get there, with lines of supply that are to this day poorly protected, were both spur and instruction for the insurgency. In what is only apparently a paradox, the military objective should have been less the conquest of territory and echelons than of morale, and, to accomplish this, territory and echelons would have to have been subdued with the blinding speed, shock and awe of the Six-Day and Gulf wars. The instant the Arab world realized that the promised shock and awe had not materialized, the insurgency was born.

We then nurtured it by deploying a fraction of the ratio (10:1) long experience indicates is necessary for suppression; by dismissing the enemy as mere "thugs," when, although they are thugs and worse, they have the thousand-year motivation of their civilization defending its heartland from Persians, Mongols, Shiites, and now Christians; and by gratuitously elevating our aims from the purely defensive to the transcendental, while steadily diluting the little power we have in the hope of forcing the entire Arab and Muslim worlds to a new politics. From a country where they have been held down in their beleaguered enclaves for two-and-a-half years, how are 140,000 soldiers to transform the highly aggressive and deeply rooted political cultures of 1.2 billion people? * * *

Ceaselessly, we court strategic error. At the end of the Cold War, assuming that history had concluded, we discarded too much military power. This continues through the present, rationalized by reference to transformation. But it is yet further error to believe that military-technical evolution can make up for the kind of deficiencies and poor strategic judgments from which no machine can save an army. Continual and remarkable innovation is both indispensable and expensive, but President Clinton required budgetary choice between innovation and everything else, and his successor has yet to disagree. The root of the error that offers transformation as a substitute for so much that is crucial is the conviction that having both would exceed reasonable military expenditures and somehow break the common weal.

Having made many wrong choices, we find ourselves at yet another strategic crossroads, where invisibly to the general public we are about to choose wrongly again. We are reshaping the military into a gendarmerie, configured for small wars, counterinsurgency, peacekeeping and nation-building, all at the expense of the type of force that could deter or defeat a rising China. Although we need a gendarmerie, we cannot do without heavy formations and the many additional ships required for a navy -- now less than half the size of the Reagan fleet and shrinking -- to exploit our natural advantage in the Pacific.

The U.S. will chase every terrorist mouse (which is good, unless it means also neglecting the core competencies of the armed forces), while lessening and dispersing its power, and moving from previous centers of gravity (Europe, the Western Pacific) to Africa, Central Asia and the Middle East. This will create a long and open alley through which China will run. Among other things, by placing markers in every trouble spot, we will probably be tied down and distracted, taxingly and often, to our enemies' delight.

When China completes its run up the broad alley we have afforded it, it will much sooner be the other pole in a once-again bipolar world, which will create the opportunity for terrorists in the guise of liberation movements to gather under its wing, as they did with the Soviet Bloc during the Cold War. Ironically, in reconfiguring the military to focus primarily on terrorism, we may not only give China a great opening, but create for the terrorists a new lease on life.

DOJ_NMG_0003794

The war in Iraq has been poorly planned and executed from the beginning, and now, like a hurricane over warm water, the insurgency is in a position to take immense energy from the fundamental divisions in that nation. The rise of Chinese military power, although lately noted, has met with no response. America's borders are open, its cities vulnerable, its civil defense nonexistent, its armies stretched thin. We have taken only deeply inadequate steps to prepare for and forestall a viral pandemic that by the testimony of experts is a high probability and could kill scores of millions in this country alone. That we do not see relatively simple and necessary courses of action, and are not led and inspired to them, represents a catastrophic failure of leadership that bridges party lines.

Perhaps this and previous administrations have had an effective policy just too difficult to comprehend because they have ingeniously sheltered it under the pretense of their incompetence. But failing that, the legacy of this generation's presidents will be promiscuous declarations and alliances, badly defined war aims, opportunities inexplicably forgone, ill-supported troops sent into the field, a country at risk without adequate civil protections, and a military shaped to fight neither the last war nor this one nor the next.

Mr. Helprin, a Journal contributing editor, is Senior Fellow of the Claremont Institute and Distinguished Visiting Fellow of Hillsdale College. He is the author, most recently, of "Freddy and Fredericka" (Penguin, 2005).

9/11 Recruits: They Enlisted When USA Was Under Fire (USAT)

By Rick Hampson

USA Today, September 9, 2005

One year ago, Cpl. Kevin Mincio stood before his platoon at an Army base in the Iraqi desert and tried to explain why a 31-year-old Goldman Sachs vice president had upped and enlisted in the infantry.

The short answer: 9/11.

“Three years ago,” he began, reading what he'd written down, “I stood in disbelief on the corner of Liberty and Church streets and watched as just a half a block away, a Boeing 767 flew into the south tower of the World Trade Center.”

Mincio was an unusual recruit in more than age and background. Contrary to popular belief, there never was an upsurge in military enlistments as a result of the attacks that killed almost 3,000 people four years ago.

But in a time of retreat and collapse, when Americans were urged to maintain their routines and get on with their lives, a few people stepped forward and did just the opposite. Although statistically insignificant, they epitomized a raw patriotism that bolstered the nation's spirit in the bleakest days since Pearl Harbor.

They were people like Kevin Mincio, people for whom the military has no exact count — the 9/11 recruits.

Four years later, USA TODAY spoke with about two dozen 9/11 recruits or their relatives. Most are still in active service or the reserves. Some are in Iraq or Afghanistan. A few never made it into the service. A few have been discharged. A few have been killed.

Most of the 9/11 recruits say they did the right thing and would do it again. They largely defend the war in Iraq but are far more enthusiastic in their support for the troops. Because many remain in the service, however, it's hard to know how free they feel to speak.

Many see a link between the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and the war in Iraq, although there is little evidence of ties between Saddam Hussein and al-Qaeda.

Above all, they say they're better for having served — that they grew personally through their military experiences. “You learn not to take for granted what we have in this country,” says Mincio, who spent a year in Iraq. “And you learn to handle pressure.”

The most famous 9/11 recruit was Pat Tillman, the NFL star who gave up a big contract to join the Army and was killed by friendly fire in Afghanistan.

But there were others.

DOJ_NMG_0003795

Mincio, who worked next door to the Trade Center, gave up his six-figure income, boat and beachfront house. He wound up in Iraq, where for a time he lived in his Army vehicle, showered once a week and dodged mortar fire. Why did he do it? Partly to do something different, to get out from behind a desk. Partly to do something about the crime he witnessed.

Mincio wasn't the only 9/11 recruit who was galvanized by a personal connection that Tuesday morning.

In Manheim, Pa., Patrick Troccoli, a financial-planning intern, was on the phone with his cousin in Brooklyn, who said he could hear the roar of the jetliners and the rumble of the towers collapsing.

In Hempstead, N.Y., Tom Duffy was visiting a friend at Hofstra University whose high-rise dorm room had a view of the smoke rising from lower Manhattan.

In Washington, PricewaterhouseCoopers senior associate Kyle Conley was driving to work over the Theodore Roosevelt Bridge when he saw black smoke rising from the Pentagon.

Until that day, Duffy was planning a career in law enforcement. Conley, married with a young child, had just begun training to swim the English Channel. Troccoli didn't even believe in the military. Within the month, each decided to enlist.

Some didn't even wait that long. On the day after, Sept. 12:

•Actor Sean Huze walked into the Marine recruiter's office at Sunset and La Brea in Los Angeles, expecting a line. Instead, he was the only one there. He signed up on the spot.

•Josh Hyland, who already had completed a four-year hitch in the Army as an enlisted man, signed up for ROTC at the University of Montana, where he was working on a degree in business. “He wanted to make a difference in the world,” his mother would recall. “He was excited about it.”

•Jim O'Shaughnessy, a philosophy major at John Carroll University in Cleveland, had been going summers to officer candidate school. But after 9/11, he decided not to wait and enlisted as a private in the Marines.

He told a Cleveland Plain Dealer reporter at the recruiting office he was “sick to my stomach angry. … If they need people now, this would be the time to go. I just didn't want to look back when I was 50 and everybody else did their share and I didn't.”

Over the next week and month, as Americans discussed how much life had or hadn't changed, 9/11 recruits made life-altering decisions.

Steven Gill of Round Rock, Texas, was so intent on signing up that his parents had to persuade him to finish the semester at Concordia University in Austin, where he was studying to be a youth minister before enlisting in the Marine reserve.

Bryan Hancock of Lebanon, Ohio, a former paratrooper, made two big decisions within 72 hours of the attacks: to re-enter the Army and to marry his girlfriend so she and their month-old son would be provided for. They married that Friday; the groom wore army boots.

Chris Petite of Lake Arrowhead, Calif., took the attacks personally — he was a volunteer firefighter, and his girlfriend's aunt was an American Airlines flight attendant. He enlisted a month to the day after the attacks, saying that the war on terrorism “is too big for me not to get involved in.” The first thing his father, an Air Force officer during Vietnam, knew about it was when Chris came home and told him, “I joined.”

They were brave, they were altruistic, and they were aberrations. In the weeks after 9/11 military recruiters got more calls, more visits, more website hits, but the upsurge in enlistments was an urban myth.

Many who volunteered were too old — the Kentucky National Guard got a call from a 48-year-old teacher. Others were disabled or unbalanced or unqualified. Jonathan Ridlin volunteered at the Marine recruiting station in Pasadena, Calf.; he was rejected because of a charge of driving under the influence.

For some, 9/11 was not the only motivation. Some already had been thinking about military service, often for the usual reasons — to learn a skill or earn college money. They were waiting to jump; the attacks just gave them a push.

Dan Greeley was a freshman at the State University of New York at Albany. On 9/11 he had an uncle in Rescue One, a New York Fire Department company in Manhattan. His uncle survived, but two other firefighters whom he knew did not.

Later that month, Greeley enlisted in the Marines. But it wasn't only the attacks, he admits: “I was bored in school.”

Today, the 9/11 recruits are scattered across the country and the globe. Duffy, who saw smoke that morning from the dorm room, will leave the Air Force this year and go into business with his brother back home in New Jersey. Troccoli is still in the Navy, waiting for his first overseas posting. Conley, who served seven months in Iraq in 2003, is back at PricewaterhouseCoopers.

DOJ_NMG_0003796

O'Shaughnessy, the philosophy major, served seven months in Afghanistan last year. Now he's the Marine recruiter in Wheeling, W.Va. He's nostalgic about the days after 9/11: "There was just blanket 'Go, America' patriotism. Now, there's not as strong a belief that what we're doing is right anymore."

Hyland, the Montana Army veteran who joined ROTC, got his officer's commission and went to Afghanistan in March. He was killed last month when a bomb exploded under a bridge his convoy was crossing.

Petite, the volunteer fireman from California, is with the Marines in Iraq.

In an e-mail, he writes that enlisting "was the best thing to do. Looking back on it now, out here in Iraq, I find a new reason every day. Mostly for my nephews, so that they don't have to grow up in a world filled with people hell bent on destroying everything that the U.S. stands for."

Hancock, the ex-paratrooper who got married as a prelude to re-enlisting, was eventually rejected because of back problems. He's a state prison guard in Ohio.

Gill, the future youth minister, was killed July 23 in Iraq when an improvised explosive went off during an operation near Zaidon. He was 24 and had been in the country since March.

Greeley, the bored college student, has completed two tours in Iraq. He says 9/11 gives meaning to those who fight there.

Mincio was discharged from the Army in May, two months after appearing with the secretary of the Army at a congressional appropriations hearing. He has a new job in Seattle, where he lives with his wife. He's not moving back to New York. He won't comment on the wisdom of the war in Iraq, other than to say: "There are a lot of soldiers over there trying to do the right thing. I'm with all those soldiers."

He stands by what he told his platoon one year ago. He's still trying to understand 9/11 and its role in where he is today:

"I am not proud of everything I have done since then, but I am proud to be amongst people who have done something, people who care about our way of life. People who haven't forgotten."

N.Y. Judge Who Abandoned His Post For Iraq Is Removed (LAW)

By John Caher, New York Law Journal

Law.com, September 9, 2005

For the first time in its history, the New York State Commission on Judicial Conduct has disciplined a judge for flat-out failing to do his job.

In a determination released Thursday, the commission called for the removal of North Hudson Town Justice Glenn T. Fiore of Essex County, who abandoned his judicial position to take a yearlong position as a truck driver in Iraq.

Justice Fiore continued to draw his $10,000 a year judicial salary, leaving North Hudson, where he was elected, without a town judge. The town had to pay a neighboring judge to handle matters within its borders while Justice Fiore worked for a private subsidiary of the Halliburton Corp.

Records show that Fiore returned from Iraq after four months, indicating that he was giving up his private position to resume his judicial duties. However, he did not resume his position and ultimately resigned under pressure last month for what he said were patriotic reasons.

"It is with great satisfaction that I am resigning my elected position of Town Justice," he wrote in a letter to the North Hudson Town Board. He said in the letter that the board, by complaining of his absence, had "revealed its true nature and color." He expressed a preference to "serve the boots on the ground" rather than his constituents.

"You people use words like honor, integrity, independence while the people I work with embody those very words," Fiore wrote. "Have any of you done anything for your country lately? I bet not. Thank GOD we don't have people like you defending this nation. ... Sleep well, the true Patriots are protecting you."

Commission Administrator Robert H. Tembeckjian said the matter has nothing to do with patriotism or the war in Iraq.

"It is simply about a judge who abandoned his post for paid private employment overseas, leaving his town without a judge, while still collecting his judicial salary," Tembeckjian said.

Tembeckjian said the commission has never before taken action against a judge for neglecting to show up for work.

DOJ_NMG_0003797

The commission, in its determination, noted that the state Constitution empowers the panel to discipline a judge for "persistent failure to perform his duties." Additionally, it said §100.3(A) of the Rules Governing Judicial Conduct require that the judicial duties of a judge take precedence over other interests.

"Respondent's flagrant, voluntary abandonment of his judicial position in order to pursue other employment requires the sanction of removal," the commission said in a 10-0 determination.

The panel noted that Justice Fiore apparently planned to have his son, who was also his clerk, cover for him and to perform judicial duties when the judge was home on vacation. However, he apparently never sought an ethics opinion or court administration approval of that plan.

"It would appear that his motive was to draw two salaries, one as a judge and the other as a [civilian] employee in Iraq," the commission said. "His conduct is inexcusable and in no way justified by his professed patriotism or support of the war effort."

Under the order, Fiore is barred from holding judicial office in the future.

Fiore was censured in 1998 for claiming on campaign literature that he was the "senior associate" at a law firm, Muller & Muller in Glens Falls. Actually, Justice Fiore was licensed to represent clients before the Workers' Compensation Board and permitted to represent individuals before the Social Security Administration. He is not licensed to practice law.

John T. Wilkins of Wilkins & Griffin in Lake Placid represented Fiore, but did not appear at oral argument before the commission. Appearing for the commission were staff attorneys Cathleen S. Cenci and Kathryn J. Blake.

Panel Says N.Y. Judge Should Be Removed (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mark Johnson, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 9, 2005

(AP) - ALBANY, N.Y.-A town justice who abandoned his part-time post, but not his paycheck, to take a job in Iraq should be removed from office, a judicial commission said Thursday.

The New York State Commission on Judicial Conduct said Judge Glenn Fiore's flagrant abandonment of his position requires the sanction of removal because ethical rules require a judge to put his judicial duties over all other activities.

Fiore, 54, said he would not appeal the ruling.

In March, he took a one-year job in Iraq driving a truck for Kellogg, Brown & Root Services Inc.

He didn't give the town of North Hudson, 90 miles north of Albany, any notice that he was leaving. Instead, he left his son in place as court clerk to cover for him and planned to render decisions when he returned.

Because of Fiore's absence from his $10,000 a year post, the town had to secure the services of a judge from another town at additional expense, according to the commission's ruling.

Fiore returned after four months and told the commission in an affidavit that he had resigned from his Iraq job and was ready to resume his court duties. Three weeks later he resigned his judgeship.

A resignation does not stop the commission from acting on conduct cases. Any recommendation or penalty can be used in the future should a person decide to pursue public office again.

Fiore said Thursday that he took the job in Iraq because he went out of business as an independent truck driver and needed to pay some bills. Fiore, who served in the Marines in Vietnam, said he also headed to Iraq out of a sense of patriotism.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Skilling, Lay Allege Case Misconduct (AP)

By KRISTEN HAYS, AP Business Writer

AP, September 8, 2005

HOUSTON (AP) - Lawyers for Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling say "deliberate, systematic prosecutorial misconduct" has choked their efforts to prepare for trial in January.

DOJ_NMG_0003798

Lay, Skilling and the third defendant in their case, former top Enron accountant Richard Causey, say obvious or veiled threats from prosecutors that dozens of witnesses may be indicted or, if they have pleaded guilty to crimes, face harsh prison sentences if they talk to the former executives has shut off critical information sources.

Daniel Petrocelli, Skilling's lead trial lawyer, said the defense teams have whittled that list to 38 particularly crucial witnesses who have consistently refused to talk to them.

Lay's lawyer, Michael Ramsey, told U.S. District Judge Sim Lake in a hearing Thursday that the defense teams have seen a "pervasive freeze-up of witnesses," though he acknowledged out of court that it was possible at least some just don't want to help his client or the others.

The trio wants to dismiss the sprawling case against them on grounds that the Justice Department's Enron Task Force "has engaged in deliberate, systematic prosecutorial misconduct that has irreparably harmed defendants' ability to prepare for trial," according to a court filing made public this week.

But while awaiting Lake's ruling on that request, the trio wants the judge to compel those witnesses to appear in court later this month so Lake can assure them that they can talk to the defendants about the case and testify on their behalf without fear of government reprisal.

Lake said Thursday that such a move could embarrass potential witnesses forced to appear in open court and therefore be counterproductive. He said instead he would send letters to attorneys for the 38 witnesses reiterating that they are free to talk to the defense teams without fear.

